VIRET (PETER) a Protestant minister, was born at Orbe (a) a small town in the canton of Berne in the year 1511. He studied at Paris where he became acquainted with Farel, whose fellow-labourer he was afterwards in the establishment of the Reformation in some towns of Switzerland (b). He went with him to Geneva in the year 1534, and strenuously seconded him in whatever was requisite for the abolition of Popery (c). The city of Lausanne having embraced the Reformation in the year 1536, Peter Viret was called to exercise the ministerial function there. He discharged it so well, that he acquired the love and esteem of the inhabitants. This appeared by the difficulty they made of lending him to the Church of Geneva for six months, when the absence of Calvin made that Church ardently desire the presence of Viret (d). To make this the more intelligible, I ought to mention that Calvin being resolved to return to Geneva, from whence he had been banished (e), could not come back at the desired time, being engaged to go to the conferences at Ratibon (f). During this time Viret very successfully served the Church of Geneva (g). Calvin being re-united to his flock, passionately desired Viret for his colleague (b), but had not that satisfaction. Viret was recalled to Lausanne, where he admirably well discharged all the duties of his office, until the Protestants of France by their entreaties obtained him for the Church of Lyons (i) [A].

Which

[A] The Protestants of France by their intreaties obtained him for the church of Lyons. Melchior Adam hath here left a gap, which ought to be supplied. He did not know that Viret served the church of Nismes, and afterwards that of Montpellier, before he went to be minister of Lyons. Of all which we are informed by Viret himself in an Epistle Dedicatory, dated from Lyons the 7th of December 1563. He there acquaints us, That two years before that, he fell into a distaste, which brought him so low, that he thought he had nothing to expect but the grave. . . . that GOD had, as it were, plucked him by the hair of the head from amongst the people, with whom he had passed the greatest part of his life (1). . . . I know very well, adds he, that my Lords, and also my brothers and companions, and the whole Church of which GOD had appointed me minister, would not easily have consented to my departure, and sent me away, if they had not seen and known the necessity which the Lord was pleased to put upon me, and chosen rather that I should serve in another place for the edification of the Church as weak as I am, than make an unprofitable stay amongst them, without being able to serve either one Church or the other, as I desired to do. . . . This is the method by which the Lord drew me from that Church which I had reason to love, as if he had taken me by the hand, in order to lead me faint and trembling with weakness and half dead, and bring me to you (2), who are the first in Languedoc, with whom I resided after my departure from Geneva. He very much praises his good reception at Nismes, though I looked, continues he, like a dry skeleton covered with skin, who had brought my bones to be buried there: in so much that even those who were not of our religion, but very contrary to it, pitied me, crying out, wherefore doth this poor man come into this country? Dost he come for any thing else than to die in it? Nay, I have heard that the first time I ascended the pulpit, several seeing me in that condition, feared that I should faint before I had finished the sermon.

(1) Viret, Epistle Dedicatory of the first volume of his Infructio Christiane.

Here are some things which I cannot comprehend nor explain; and perhaps Viret did not desire they should be manifest. He saith that he could no longer serve his old Church, which was the only reason why his superiors gave him leave to depart. That reason could

(g) Leti, ubi supra, Tom. ii, pag. 70. See also Bera, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1541.

(b) See the remark [B].

(i) Melch. Adam, ubi supra, pag. 121.

(2) He directs his speech to the Reformed church of Nismes.

(k) Id. ib.

which he served very faithfully in the midst of a thousand difficulties, it being in the time of civil-wars, and the Plague (k). He was obliged to quit Lyons when Charles IX, by an Edict explanatory of the peace concluded in March 1563, prohibited his Protestant subjects the having any ministers born out of the realm (l). Viret then retired to Orange, from whence the Queen of Navarre sent for him to Bern (m). He made a good use of his talents there till such time as he died in the year 1571 [B]. He was a little man, and of a weak constitution (n), which was yet impaired by the blows he received from a Priest, and the poison which was put into his victuals [C]; but he had a great share

(l) The true and complete History of the Troubles, book i, fol. 6, verso, ad ann. 1564.

(m) Melch. Adam, ubi supra.

(n) Id. ibid.

(3) See, the remark [FF], of the article CALVIN.

could not be the state to which his distemper had reduced him; for notwithstanding that, he was able to serve the church of Nismes. We might conjecture that this church was smaller than that of Lausanne or Geneva, and that the same person who was not strong enough to preach in a large church, might yet be able to perform that function to a small auditory. But this conjecture is scarce satisfactory (3).

His Epistle Dedicatory to the second tome of his Christian Instruction, is a proof that he was afterwards minister of the church of Montpellier. This epistle is dated at Lyons the 12th of December 1563, and addressed to that church as a grateful acknowledgment of the favours he had received from them during the exercise of his ministerial function there; and he takes notice of it as a happiness that several of the Physicians and Surgeons of Montpellier were Protestants. Amongst others, he mentions the Physic Professors, Rondellet, Saporis, and their associates, Joubert, Feynes, Trial, and Michael Herouart a famous Surgeon. I infer this particular, because it is unknown to several who are very well acquainted with the merit of those illustrious Professors.

(4) In the fifth book, pag. 886, & seq.

In the ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches of France (4), we find a very excellent letter of Viret written from Nismes on the 15th of January 1562 (5), to the ministers of Languedoc assembled in the colloquy of Montpellier, in which he exhorts them to comply with the desire of the court. By both the Epistles Dedicatory which I have cited, it appears that he was no trumpet of sedition; but rather a man of a peaceable and moderate temper, who always dissuaded the people from violence and popular commotions, to the utmost of his power. The same History informs us (6), that he went to Montpellier to recover his health, and began the exercise of his ministry there, the edit of January having been published on the 7th of February 1562. Pasquier is certainly mistaken when he saith that Viret preached at Paris towards the end of the year 1561 (7).

(5) It is 1557, in Bess's History of the Reformed churches of France, which is an error of the press.

(6) Ibid. pag. 888.

[B] He made a good use of his talents in Bern, till such time as he died in the year 1571. He taught at Orthez, as Melchior Adam observes (8). Some say he died there (9), but Moreri and several others affirm that he died at Pau: and very few authors there are who tell us, that he was for some time imprisoned in that country. D'Aubigné is the only one who informs me of it. He saith that the Governor of a town which the Protestants took by assault in 1569, was discharged from his imprisonment on promise that he should ransom Peter Viret a minister, who was prisoner in Bern (10). What is certainly to be depended on, is that this minister ended his days in the territories of the Queen of Navarre, and consequently there is a falsity in the following words of Mr Ancillon. Viret taught for some time at Orthez, from whence he returned to Lausanne, where he published books enough to make up a small library (11). Most of his works were published before he went into Bern, and therefore Mr Ancillon would be mistaken, though he were in the right as to Viret's return to Lausanne.

(7) Pasquier's Letters, book iv, pag. 201.

(8) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. exter. pag. 121.

(9) Paulus Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 225.

(10) D'Aubigné, Hist. Universelle, Tom. i, lib. v, ch. xii, pag. m. 412, ad ann. 1569.

(11) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 217.

(12) Partim vulgata in agro Paternacensi à sacroculo ipsius per insidias invadente infesta ut adeo gravis, ut joentem pro mortuo reliquerit. Melch. Adam, ubi supra.

[C] By the blows which he received from a Priest, and the poison which was put into his victuals. He was so violently beaten by a Priest, who treacherously attacked him, that he was left for dead on the spot (12). In the punning ages, they would have said, that this Priest did not know how to form any other argument than those in Feris, and in Barbara. If he was unjust in having recourse to such means to prevent innovations, he was not less imprudent in giving over beating before he was sure that the minister could never escape with life. On such occasions the maxim, 'Nunquam tentabis ut non pericias, - - - Nothing ought to be attempted which cannot be accomplished, ought to be well remembered. The same consequence was drawn against the Church of Rome, from an unfinished assassination, which would have been inferred from a completed one. All those who were capable of going by this rule, a cause must be very bad, whose defenders murder those who attack it, drew the same conclusions from their ministers being confuted by the blows of a cudgel or the fist. Wherefore the Priest who beat Viret, did as much mischief to his cause by raising prejudices against it as if he had killed him; and by not killing him he left his cause exposed to great dangers. For Viret armed with resentment more vigorously endeavoured the destruction of Popery, and took very effectual measures to that purpose. He fought out the absurdities of their errors, and compiled in French, several diverting books filled with ralleries on that head. Books of this sort are of all others the most dangerous that can be published (13); so that if we consider it only on the side of interest, the Swiss Priest would have done very well not to have reckoned Viret dead, without unquestionable proofs. The certificate of two Surgeons perhaps would not have been too much.

But to come to the poison. Some say, it was given to Viret by a servant of a Canon of Geneva (14); others charge this crime on a woman suborned for that end by the Canons. However it be, the life of this good minister was endangered by it, and it is said that this ill action completed the ruin of the Roman Catholic cause at Geneva. And indeed at a critical time when both parties were almost equally strong, nothing could more contribute to turn the balance in favour of the Reformed. A people wavering in their opinions, and full of suspicions, will scarce ever find fault with this argument, viz. if these people maintained the cause of God, they would never make use of infamous ways in order to destroy their adversaries. The author whom I am going to quote, adds, that there was a current report, that the Priests had resolved to cause all the Reformed to be killed at once by poisoning the bread which they used at the Lord's Supper. I am fully persuaded that a report of this nature, spread all over the city, whether it were true or false, might have a more forcible effect on the minds of a great many people, than a hundred demonstrative reasons.

Cum præterea venefica quædam, è Bressæ comitatu vicino oriunda, quæ nigros succos verbi divini Ministris tollendis miscuerat, P. Vireti lethali morbo in scelere deprehensa, sed ad id flagitii à Canonicis conductam, fateretur, mirum quantum omnium animi à nefandarum artium institoribus fuerint averti, præsertim cum in vulgus innotesceret, à sacrificiis deliberatum de inficiendis symbolis sacris, Cænæ Dominicæ celebrandæ destinatis, quò Evangelicis omnes facili operâ in sacratissimo suæ Religionis actu, ad generum Cereris non sicca morte vel descenderent, vel deducerentur. Cujus flagitii, quod ne Thetis quidem ipsa universis suis undis abluerit, sola cogitatio ingenti horrore & indignatione omnium animos confudit. Experimentis id genus alius compluribus compertum omnes Clericorum machinas ad subruendam Evangelii instaurati structuram compatas, occultæ Dei directione in summum ejus incrementum cessasse (15). Moreover a certain Sorceress, born in the neighbouring county of Bresse, had made up a Spanhemius, ist poison, by which she designed to cut off the Ministers of the word of God: but when she was detected in this crime by the dangerous disease with which the poison infected Peter Viret; and when she confessed that the Canons had prompted and encouraged her to it, it can hardly be imagined how much the authors of these wicked arts were abhorred, especially when it came to be known among the common people that the Priests intended to poison the holy symbols appointed for the celebration of the sacraments.

(13) See, shortly the remark [G] of the article SAINTE-ALDEGONDE.

(14) Fuit corpusculo per se imbecillo: quod naturæ vitium vehementer auxerunt partim venenum ipsi à Genevensis cujusdam Canonici servo propinatum, partim vulnera, &c. Id. ibid. These words and those of the foregoing quotation, are taken from Bess's in Iconibus.

(15) Fridericus Spanhemius, ista, pag. 74, 75.

share of learning, accompanied with a charming eloquence. He published a vast number of books [D]. He was pretty well skilled in the knowledge of the Pagan authors. This appears by a book (o) he published at Geneva in the year 1560, intituled, Of True and False Religion, concerning lawful and unlawful vows and oaths, and especially the vows of sacrament, and to destroy all the Protestants when engaged in the most sacred act of their religion. The very thoughts of this vile and execrable design struck the minds of all men with the greatest horror and indignation. By several instances of this kind it appeared, that all the machinations devised by the Priests for the overthrow of the Church, did, by the secret direction of the Almighty GOD, greatly conduce to the increase and establishment of it. The conclusion of this passage is very judicious; the ill conduct of the Romish Clergy hath been a very successful instrument for the increase of the Protestants. The Church of Rome could not have been attacked at a more favourable opportunity: her clergy were very ignorant, and very vicious, and, on the contrary, those who preached up a reformation, were most of them eloquent and learned, and more or less acquainted with the Hebrew and Greek tongues; by virtue of which they got the better of the Priests in almost all disputes. The Priests were not able to hold up against disputants, who threatened them with the original languages of Holy Writ, and who easily made it appear that the religious practices, to which the people were subjected, were not prescribed by the Scripture. Two or three sermons of these ministers in some parishes, served to convert half the inhabitants. And what should hinder it? Would the Romanists have offered reason against reason? But was it possible for a Priest or an ignorant Monk to succeed against Viret, or Farel? Not in the least. They were then obliged to have recourse to violent measures, to poisoning, assassination, and other detestable means, which fully confirmed that a cause which defended itself in this manner was not of GOD.

(o) It is a book in 8vo, of 864 pages.

Mr Leti informs us, that the name of the woman who poisoned Viret was Mary Navau; that she was born at Bourg in Bresse; that at the solicitation of some Ecclesiastics, who promised her a good reward, she fled to Geneva on pretence of being persecuted for her religion; and acting the devout part, she very effectually insinuated herself into the good opinion of Farel, Viret, and Saunier, the three Geneva Ministers; by which means she found an opportunity of poisoning the dish of soup when Farel's two colleagues dined with him; that Farel and Saunier disliking this soup did not eat of it, as Viret did, who was very well pleased with it, and immediately found the effects of the poison; that this woman was imprisoned on suspicion, and that without being put to the torture, she accused a Canon, and having confessed the whole crime, was hanged on the twenty-second of April 1535; and that the Canon, out of respect to his family, was only banished (16).

(16) Taken from Leti's Historia Genevrina, Tom. ii, pag. 541, 542.

(17) You will find the catalogue of them, in Gessner's Epit. in Melchior Adam, ubi supra, pag. 122, and in Verheiden, ubi infra, pag. 120, 121.

(18) The Bishop of Condom in his Exposition de la Doctrine Catholique.

[D] He published a vast number of books (17). I have already said that he exposed the ridiculous absurdities of the adverse party, and put on an air of humour and raillery. He examined their Ritual and Ceremonial; in a word, he engaged the Church of Rome rather on the practices she permits in her Priests and Monks, than on her decisions in her œcumenical councils. This was attacking her weakest side, for in our days those who laboured with the greatest address to defend her (18), have requested us to distinguish betwixt what the councils prescribe as an article of faith, and what is not obligatory, or is perhaps an abuse. I shall here cite a long passage of Verheiden. Sic ut Ecclesia Lugdunensis frequentissima, alique vicinarum regionum, ob egregiam operam quam præstitit in proleminando Dei Verbo, hunc virum maxime coluerint, scriptaque temporum ingenio risu Papismum excipientibus summâ voluptate perlegerint. Is autem Viretus erat, qui Mysticam illam Papistaram Theologiam cognitam habebat: quam variis libris explicans lectori risum sæpe movet, propter mira illa miracula & ridicula quæ continet. Ethnicam præterea Theologiam cum ex prophanis Scripturis hausisset, eandem cum Papistarum Sacris ita contulit, tamquam hæc Romana Sacra Parellela essent Veterumque Romanorum horrendâ Idololatriâ plenius responderent. Fortè inter sinceriores Theologos nullus fuit, qui mysticum illud Romanum Jovis Regnum ita aperuit & perlustravit atque hic

Viretus, quod vel uno illo Centone (ut alia multa mittam) de Theatrica Mistæ Saltatione, ex veteribus Poëtis confarcinato, probari potest: qui lectorem, præcipuè in Poëtis versatum, novo genere voluptatis (ut apud Belgas decantatum illud Apiarium Romanum) perfundit & recreat (19). - - - So that the church of Lyons, and others in the neighbourhood, had the greatest veneration for this man, on account of his extraordinary diligence in propagating the word of GOD; and it was with the biggest degree of pleasure that they read his books, which were adapted to the humour of the times, people being then very much disposed to laugh at Popery. Now Viret was a man who thoroughly understood the mystical Divinity of the Papists, and in such a height does he set it forth in the various books which he has written that he often moves the reader's laughter at the wonderful and ridiculous miracles contained in it. As he had likewise learned the Heathen Theology from prophane writers, he compared it with the Popish ceremonies in such a manner as if those were just parallel, and fully came up to the abominable idolatry of the ancient Romans. Among all the true Divines, perhaps, no man has explained and revealed the mystical kingdom of the Romish Jupiter so well as Viret; which might be very easily proved from that one poem of his, which he patched up and collected from the ancient Poets (not to mention many more of his reflexions upon the theatrical ceremony of the mass). This piece (like the Apiarium Romanum, so much talked of in Holland) will give a new pleasure to the reader, especially if he is much conversant with the Poets.

For the rest, we ought not to imagine that all this author's works are of the character I have mentioned, nor that amongst those which are, any of them are tainted with buffoonry. He always observed a wise moderation. Take notice, that he did not confine himself to superstitions only, a very fit subject for raillery, but very seriously, and, with all due gravity, attacked the unbelievers. To this purpose I shall cite a long passage in the Epistle Dedicatory to the second tome of his Christian Instruction, where we are informed that the multitude of unbelievers determined him to turn his arms against Deism. There are several who indeed profess to believe that there is some Deity or God, as the Turks and Jews do: but as for Jesus CHRIST, and all those things which the doctrine of the Evangelists and Apostles testifies concerning him, they take them for fables and dreams. . . . It is much more, or at least as difficult to deal with these people as with the Turks. For they entertain some opinions concerning religion, which are more extravagant than those of the Turks, or any other Infidels. I hear that some of this band call themselves Deists, a new word in opposition to that of Atheists. For the word Atheist signifies one that is without GOD, so they would hereby signify, that they are not without GOD, because they believe that there is one, whom they even acknowledge for creator of Heaven and Earth, as well as the Turks: but as for JESUS CHRIST, they do not know who he is, nor do they believe in him or his doctrine. These Deists of whom we speak, adds Viret, ridicule all religion, tho' they accommodate themselves to the religion of those with whom they are obliged to live, out of complaisance or fear: some among them have a kind of notion of the immortality of the soul; others agree with the Epicureans on that as well as on the Divine providence with regard to mankind: they think he doth not intermeddle with human affairs, and that they are either governed by fortune, or by the prudence and folly of men, according as things happen. I am struck with horror, when I think that there are such monsters among those who bear the name of Christians. But my horror is redoubled, when I consider that several of those who make profession of learning and human Philosophy, and even are frequently esteemed the most learned, most acute and subtil genius's, are not only infected with this execrable Atheism, but also profess it, teach it, and poison several persons with this venom. Wherefore we live in a time when we of perpetual continence, anathema, and execration, the sacrifices of human victims, and excommunication in all Religions. Item, Of the Jewish, Pagan, Turkish, and Popish Monks, and the corporal as well as spiritual sacrifices to Moloch. His article in Moreri is confused, and false in several places [E].

At what time the Deists began to be talked of.

I will mention a thing which I have read since the second edition came out. It is that Viret employed the authority of the Papists to curb some dangerous sects that were formed among the Protestants at Lyons. The author who tells me this draws a proof from it against Toleration, and in favour of the maxim Compelle intrare, - - - Compel them to come in [F].

'are in danger of having more difficulty in contending with these monsters, than with the superstitious and idolaters, if God doth not, which I hope he will, prevent it. For amongst the present differences in religion, several very much abuse the liberty given them of chusing which of the two contending religions they will adhere to. For several are of neither, and indeed live without any religion. And if those who have no good opinion of any religion, would content themselves to perish alone in their error and Atheism, without infecting or corrupting others by their wicked discourses and examples, and leading them into the same perdition with themselves, this evil would not be so deplorable as it is. For this reason, in revising my Christian Instruction, formerly printed, I have very much enlarged it, especially on the head of the creation of the world, and the Divine providence towards all creatures, and particularly man, for two reasons: First, because the Holy Ghost frequently in holy writ, proposes this visible world, as the great book of nature, and of true natural Theology, and all the creatures as preachers, and universal witnesses of God their creator, and of his works and glory . . . The other reason, which moved me to treat of these subjects so amply, is the present Atheism and its professors: of which I have already spoken (20).'

[E] His article in Moreri is confused and false in several places. I. It is false that Viret and Farel joined with Calvin in order to preach up their new doctrines at Geneva, and drive out the Catholics in year 1535. Calvin did not go to Geneva till 1536. II. Moreri says, that when Calvin departed for the conference at Worms, Viret was called to preach at Geneva, whereby he gives us clearly to understand, that Calvin set out from Geneva. But that is false. He had been at Strasbourg two or three years, when he went to those conferences. III. It is ridiculous to bestow the title of preference on Viret's vocation, for the people of Geneva had recourse to Viret only, because they could not oblige Calvin to return home before the holding of the Conferences. This shews us that Moreri was persuaded that Calvin went from Geneva at that time; for his meaning is, that this minister was very sorry that he was deputed to the conferences, and that, during his absence, Viret should perform the ministerial function. IV. It is very false that Calvin testified a displeasure at the calling of Viret. V. It is very false that he managed it so well that they sent back his competitor. VI. It is very false that the people of Lausanne had much ado to receive Viret (21). Calvin was so far from being desirous that his pretended competitor should be sent back to Lausanne, that on the contrary he made pressing efforts to retain him at Geneva. Melchior Adam, one of the authors whom Moreri cites, clearly testifies it (22). The same is attested by Theodorus Beza (23), and we have a literal proof of this under Calvin's own hand, for thus he wrote to Farel: 'Quod bene vertat Deus, hic retentus sum ut volebas: superest ut Viretum quoque mecum retineam, quem à me avelli nullo modo patiar. Tuæ quoque omniumque fratrum partes me hic adjuvare, nisi vultis me frustra ex cruciari, ac sine commodo esse miserum (24). - - - What you desired is come to pass, I am kept here: God grant it may be for some good end. It remains that I should likewise keep Viret, whom I will by no means suffer to be taken from me. In bringing this about, it becometh you, and all the brethren to assist me, unless you would have me to undergo a great deal of uneasiness and trouble to no manner of purpose nor advantage.' I shall, by the way, observe a mistake of Mr Hofman. He saith, that Viret being Minister at Lausanne in the year 1535, was called to Geneva: than which nothing is more false. He was Minister at Geneva in the year 1534, and before he was at Lausanne.

[F] He employed the authority of the Papists to curb some . . . sects . . . The author who tells me this draws a proof from it . . . in favour of the maxim . . . Compel them to come in. The first edict of pacification was no sooner published in France than instantly there sprung up a sect of Arians at Lyons, which had been long hatched there, and in other places, by a German and an Italian, who were the heads of it. For this reason Mr Peter Viret, then a Minister of Lyons, was pressed to have recourse to Mr Buatier, great Vicar of the Archbishop of that city, in order to quench that growing fire, which threatened a great conflagration, if it should be allowed time to gather strength. And indeed, the Postellians, the Trinitarians, or Servetians, and others, even the Atheists and Deists, were ready to shew themselves; all of them pretending that they ought to enjoy the benefit of the edict, which in general provided, that no man should be molested for the sake of his conscience. It is likewise said that all the forementioned sectaries, and others, boasted that their faith was grounded on texts or reasons, as pertinently drawn from Scripture as any which the Calvinists could alledge to prove their opinions: to such a height of impudence does a presumptuous assertion come when it invades the place of truth. Such was the extremity to which the desire of liberty of conscience had almost reduced us. Such was the prodigious confusion in which religion was very near swallowed up; and in this manner was the different variety of opinions ready to extinguish the faith of several, and to raise doubts that could not be solved in the minds of believers. These reasons induced me to believe that we ought to be very humble in our opinions, and wholly submit them to the determinations of the holy, apostolical, and Roman Catholic church (25). . . . I say, that we ought to give up our senses and our human understandings, in order to believe through faith what, by reason of our infirmity, we cannot otherwise comprehend. We ought also to obey our superiors, according to the Scripture; without seeking to find them guilty of faults, which are not subject to our correction: . . . But if some men are so hard to work upon, that they will obstinately persist in despising and separating themselves from the true Church, in that case we should follow the advice of the Prophet (26), who says; Coge eos intrare, - - compel them to come in. Compare with this what I have quoted from the same author in the article S T E L L I N G I.

(25) Pierre de St Julien, Melanges Paradoxales, pag. 202, 203, 204, and more false. He was Minister at Geneva in the year 1534, and before he was at Lausanne. (26) He should have said of Jesus Christ in the Gospel according to St Luke, ch. xiv, ver. 23.

(20) Viret, Epistle Dedicatory of the second volume of his Christian Instruction. It was printed in 1563.

(21) They could hardly be prevailed upon to send him to Geneva for half a year.

(22) Reverfus Calvinus omnem quidem movit lapidem ut ne Vireto spoliaretur, quo sublatum ecclesiam salvam retinere se posse negabat: sed Viretus apud suos Lausanenses agere maluit. Melch. Adam, ubi supra, pag. 121. See also, pag. 73.

(23) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1541.

(24) Calvin. Epist. l. pag. m. 109, 110. That letter is dated on the 16th of September, 1543, but this date seems to be false; it should be 1541, for it were an absurd thing that Calvin writing to a minister of Neuchâtel, should tell him as a piece of news that he was returned to Geneva, two years after his arrival.

(a) Called Ander, See Donatus, in Vita Virgilii.

VIRGIL, in Latin Publius Virgilius Maro, the most excellent of all the ancient Roman Poets, flourished in Augustus's time. He was born on the fifteenth of October, in the year of Rome 683, in a village (a) not far from Mantua. He spent his first years at Cremona (b); after which he made some stay at Milan, and then went to Naples, where he studied with the greatest diligence the Latin and Greek Literature, as he did afterwards the Mathematics and Physic. Some authors say, that he was far from being chaste in his youth; others, on the contrary, assure us that he was so modest, so reserved, and regular in his words and deportment, that the inhabitants of Naples gave him

(b) Initio ætatis, id est usque ad septimum annum, Cremonæ egit. Donatus, ibid. Du Verdier Vau-Prives, Preface, Tom. i, pag. 766, and several others say that he studied at Cremona, when he was 17 years old.

him a firname, derived from Virginité [A]. This affords me matter for a long remark,

[A] A firname derived from Virginité.] The life of Virgil, ascribed to Donatus, informs us, that he was very sober, but that he was reported to be inclined to the unnatural sin; that equitable persons gave no credit to this rumour, and believed he had no other affection for youth, than what resulted from his intention of instructing them (1); that his lying with Plotia Hieria was talked of, but that he frequently said that he always refused the share in that mistress which Varius offered him. Vulgatum est consuevisse eum cum Plotia Hieria. Sed Asconius Pedianus affirmat ipsam postea minoribus natu narrare solitum, & invitatum quidem se à vario ad communionem mulieris, verum se pertinacissime recusasse (2). The following words are very remarkable, for they affirm, not as a report, but as a certain truth, that the inhabitants of Naples gave him the firname of Virginal, by reason of the purity of his words and manners. Cetera sane vita & ore & animo tam probum fuisse constat, ut Neapoli Parthenias vulgo appellaretur. Here follows a manifest proof of his modesty. He preferred living retired in the country, to residing at Rome, where he was admired. He seldom went thither, and so little affected appearing there, that when he observed that he was followed and shewed, he ran into the first house he found open. Si quando Romæ, quod rarissime commeabat, viseretur in publico, scitantes demonstrantesque se subterfugere solitum in proximum telum (3). What is certain, is, that in his youth he wrote some lascivious verses. This is not to be doubted, since Pliny (4), who had likewise done so, justifies himself by many great examples, and namely by that of Virgil. Nec vero moleste fero hanc esse de moribus meis existimationem, ut qui nesciunt talia doctissimos, gravissimos, sanctissimos homines scriptitasse, me scribere mirentur. Ab illis autem quibus notum est quos quantotque auctores sequear facile impetrari posse confido (4). An ego verear . . . ne me non satis deceat quod decuit M. Tullium, Caium Calvum. . . . Neronem transeo, quamvis sciam, non corrumpi in deterius, quæ aliquando etiam à malis; sed honesta manere, quæ sæpius à bonis fiunt. Inter quos vel præcipue numerandus est P. Virgilius, Corn. Nepos, & prius Ennius, Acciusque, non quidem hi Senatores, sed sanctitas morum non distat ordinibus (5).

(1) Cibi vinique minimi: fama est cum libidiniosis prœtoris in pueris fuisse. Sed boni ita eum pueros amasse putaverunt, ut Socrates Alcibiadem. Donatus, in Vita Virgiliti.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) That is, Pliny the younger.

(5) Plinius, Epist. iii, lib. v.

(6) Joannes Maria Catanæus is one of them. See his Commentary upon Pliny the younger, pag. 290.

(7) In the article VAYER, citation (25).

(8) Aufonius, in Centone nuptiali, sub finem, pag. m. 519.

decent expressions? Wherefore if any man shall censure my jocose way of writing out of a pretended severity, let him know that I have Virgil for my pattern.' He had better have imitated Pliny the younger, who doubtless aimed at some particular small poems, in which Virgil expressed himself too licentious on wanton subjects. The passage of the Æneis which Aufonius points out, contains nothing too bold for those times: those who censured it deserve rather the title of Cavillers than of Critics: and it is very observable, that part of those who did not entirely approve it, bestowed great eulogies on the Poet, as Aulus Gellius informs us. 'Annius poeta & plerique cum eo ejusdem Musæ viri summis assidue laudibus hos Virgilii versus ferebant; quibus Vulcanum & Venerem junctos mixtosque jure conjugii, rem lege naturæ operiendam, verecunda quadam translatione verborum quum ostenderet demonstraretque, protexit: sic enim scripti:

..... Ea verba locutus
Optatos dedit amplexus; placidumque petivit
Conjugis infusus gremio per membra foporem.

Minus autem difficile esse arbitrabantur in istiusmodi re dicenda verbis uti uno atque altero brevi tenuique eam signo demonstrantibus. . . . Tot verò & tam evidentibus ac tamen non prætextatis, sed puris honestisque verbis venerandum illud concubii pudici secretum neminem quemquam alium dixisse (9). . . . (9) Aulus Gellius, lib. xii, cap. 2.

The Poet Annianus, and several others with him, bestowed the greatest praises on these verses of Virgil, wherein he describes Venus and Vulcan in the height of conjugal familiarity; a thing which the light of nature forbids to be exposed, and which for that reason he veils under a modest and discreet metaphor, at the same time that he gives a strong and lively representation of it; for in this manner does he write:

Trembling he spoke, and eager of her charms,
He snatch'd the willing goddess to his arms;
'Till in her lap infus'd he lay pass'd
Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.

DRYDEN.

They thought it less difficult in a thing of this kind to make use of one or two words which give a short and slight hint of it. . . . But that no man besides himself had ever told the venerable secrets of the marriage-bed in so many words, which were so clear, and at the same time so pure and chaste without the least mixture of obscenity. Let us see how he hath censured a more rigid Critic. 'Annæus Cornutus, homo sanè plerique alia non indoctus neque imprudens, in secundo tamen librorum, quos de figuris sententiarum composuit, egregiam totius istius verecundie laudem insulsa nimis & odiosa scrutatione violavit. Nam quum genus hoc figuræ probasset, & satis circumspicte factos esse versus dixisset; membra tamen, inquit, paulò incautiùs nominavit (10). (10) Id. ibid.

Annæus Cornutus, a man who in most other things wanted neither learning nor sense, has nevertheless in his second book on the figures of speech, sought to diminish the noble praise that is due to the modesty of this passage, by an infipid and odious scrutiny. For where he had approved this kind of figure, and owned that the verses were wrote with great circumspection, he adds notwithstanding that the word membra was introduced somewhat too rashly. To which may be added likewise the following, 'Quod Annæus Cornutus versus Virgilii, quibus Veneris & Vulcani concubium pudice aperteque dixit, reprehensione spurca & odiosa inquinavit'. . . . That Annæus Cornutus has with an unclean and odious censured that passage of Virgil, where he chaste and covertly describes the conjugal familiarities of Venus and Vulcan. The gravity and modesty which reign throughout the Æneis are indeed admirable. Was it possible for any body to have used fewer words than Virgil has done, on the cave where Æneas and Dido consummated their marriage? His Bucolics are not so modest; he there relates very criminal passions, but that is no proof that he was tainted with them. The passion for boys was not less common in the remark, and an opportunity of refuting an observation, which we find in the Anti-Baillet

Pagan

Pagan times than that for girls, so that a writer of Eclogues might make his shepherds talk according to this curled fashion, as we at present make the heroes and heroines of Romances speak; that is to say, without its being a sign that he related his own adventures, or approved the passions he mentioned. Our best French Romances have been composed for a long time by maids or married women. Would it be reasonable to say that they write the History of their own amours, or that they approve their heroines suffering themselves to be so sensibly affected with the passion of love (11)? Is it not certain that they may write these books only to discover their wit, and their art of painting the passions, and representing characters? We may suppose the same thing in favour of Virgil, since on other accounts we have reason to believe that he was endowed with a great share of virtue. I own that there went several stories not much to his reputation; but those who relate them represent them only as rumors (12), whilst they assure us as a certain truth that his modesty and probity were extraordinary. Besides the stories already related, we are told (13) that Varus the tragic Poet married a very learned woman, who lay with Virgil, and to whom he gave a tragedy of his composition, which she made her husband believe was her own, and that Varus recited it as his own performance. It is farther added that Virgil obscurely hints this adventure in three verses of his third Eclogue:

An mihi cantando victus non redderet ille,
Quem mea carminibus meruisset fida, caprum?
Si nescis, meus ille caper fuit.

An honest man may freely take his own;
The goat was mine, by singing fairly won.
A solemn match was made, he lost the prize:
Ask Damon, ask, if he the debt denies.

DRYDEN.

But Servius rejects this as a thing which no author had mentioned, and which was repugnant to the nature of pastoral Poetry. Superfluum voluit esse allegoriam, dicentes rem nusquam lectam de Virgilio. Melius simpliciter accipimus: refutandæ enim sunt allegorie in bucolico certamine: nisi, ut supra diximus, ex aliqua agrorum perditorum necessitate descendunt (14). And it plainly enough appears to be a vain imagination of some perverse genius, who hunt after allegories and mysteries every where, and are never pleased with any thing which is natural. The most forcible objection against Virgil would be to represent him as the author of some Priapeia. But that reason alone is of no great weight against his manners; for as there are men of honour and virtue, who read obscene books without any ill design, so there are such who may compose lascivious verses without corrupting their mind. It is reported that St Chrysostom frequently read Aristophanes, and it is certain that St Jerom often read Plautus. See the remark [B] in the article LONGUS, and the Epistle Dedicator to Scippius's notes in Priapeia. Will any one presume to rank Joseph Scaliger, Janus Douza, Daniel Heinsius, and the President Mainard amongst the debauchees, and urge as reasons for it that the first wrote notes on the Priapeia and Catullus; that the second very curiously commented on Petronius (15); that the third published some lascivious verses; and that the fourth wrote a Priapeia (16)? When we believe it impossible for another to touch upon such things without being infected, we too plainly discover the weak efforts which we find ourselves capable of making against the like objects. 'In iis, quæ turpicula & lasciviuscula sunt, ille qui, ut ait Aristoteles, bonâ institutione præmunitus est, offendere nequit. Adeo ut, molliculos istos, qui vel una tali & altera lectione verberantur, & ad nequitiam abducuntur, sua sibi culpa & in Venerem putredine, perire videas. Haud secus, ac si terribili objecta re timidus expavescat, fortis non adficiatur' (17).

(16) Menagiana, p. 32, of the first Dutch edition.

(17) Scippius, Ep. Dedicat. cap. 3.

these effeminate creatures who are struck and hurried on to lewdness by reading one or two things of this kind, perish, as you see, through their own fault and lascivious disposition: just like a coward who is frightened out of his senses at the sight of a terrible object, while a brave man is not at all moved. This makes me remember a thought of Moliere. His Tартuffe, being just ready to hear a young woman speak, pulls out a handkerchief, and says;

. . . Ah! mon Dieu, je vous prie,
Avant que de parler, prenez-moy ce mouchoir.

Couvrez ce sein, que je ne saurois voir.
Par de pareils objets les âmes sont blessées,
Et cela fait venir de coupables pensées.

. . . Let me beseech you e'er you speak,
First take this handkerchief, and hide from me
That youthful bosom which I cannot see.
Such objects set the very soul on fire,
And raise in us a culpable desire.

But observe the young woman's answer:

Vous êtes donc bien tendre à la tentation;
Et la chair, sur vos sens, fait grande impression?
Certes, je ne fais pas quelle chaleur vous monte:
Mais à convoiter, moy, je ne suis point si prompte;
Et je vous verrois nû du haut jusques en bas, Que toute vostre peau ne me tenteroit pas (18).

Strongly your sense obeys the carnal lure,
And you are easy to be tempted sure.
The meaning of such heat I cannot find,
To which myself so little am inclin'd:
For I could view your naked skin all o'er,
Yet still remain unttempted as before.

(18) Moliere, in his Imposteur, Act. iii, Scene ii, Tom. iii, of the Amsterdam edition 1725.

There may be some Poets, Casuists, and Critics, hardened in the same manner against those dangerous objects, which others cannot read with impunity. Lipsius protests that the reading of Petronius affected only his mind, and left no more traces in his heart, than a boat does on a river. 'Vidistis' quidquam venustius, argutius (Petronio) post natus Mulas? Non ego: abesse tantum nuda illa nequitia; quâ tamen nihil offendor. joci me delectant, urbanitas capit: cetera nec in animo nec in moribus meis magis labem relinquunt, quam olim in flumine vestigium, cymba. Ut vina apposita vinorum movent; invinium, ut antiqui loquebantur, non movent: sic ista animum jam ante improbum fortasse incitent; casto & castigato non adherent (19). . . . Have you ever seen any thing from the birth of the Muses to this time more elegant and witty than Petronius? For my part I have not; excepting only his barefaced obscenity, which nevertheless does not shock me. I am delighted with his humour, charmed with his politeness; and as for the other things they leave no more any stain upon my mind or manners than a boat leaves a trace upon a river long after it has passed. For as wine transports the drunkard when it is set before him, but does not at all affect the sober man; so these things may possibly inflame a mind that was virtuous before, but they make no durable impression upon one that is chaste and well-disciplined. If this be true, I dare aver that he might have made verses or prose narratives according to the model of this Romance, and preserved his mind pure and untainted. Be pleased to apply this, positis ponendis, to the poetical amusements of Virgil, which served as an apology for Pliny the younger.

I ought not to forget the Bishop of Avranches's ingenious conjecture concerning the name of Parthenias given to Virgil. Having observed that this appellation was perhaps bestowed on him, because it was believed of him as well as of Homer, that he was born of a virgin, he adds, that it is more probable that the name of Virgilius was confounded with that of Virginius; that is, in effect to say that the inhabitant

6 G

Baillet [B]. Those who tell us that his Eclogues were admired by Cicero, are mistaken [C]. He was not envious of other men's glory, and discovered such a large share of good nature and bitants of Naples being neither acquainted with the Etymology, nor meaning of the word Virgilius, and very well knowing the import of Virginius, a word which that this Poet's name was Virginius, a word which answers to the Greek word Parthenias. Cur Virgilius Neapolitanis dictus sit Parthenias, causam hanc esse significari quis possit; non quod virginali esset modestia, ut vulgo fertur, sed quod virgine natus, perinde ut Homerum, credi voluerint. Probabile sane hoc est; sed ne quid dissimulem, longe est probabilius ac simillimum veri, esse dictum esse à Græcis, pro eo quod Romana lingua appellatum eum putabant Virginium, non Virgilium, cum ignorarent nominis huius significationem & originem, à virgulis, hoc est, ramis seu furculis, petitam; unde & virgeta Ciceronis dicuntur arborum seminaria; prioris vero nominis vim notionemque probe callerint (20).

(20) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Alnetan. Quest. lib. ii, cap. 15. pag. 239, Edit. Lips. 1692.

(21) Of whom mention is made above, in the article RAMUS, at the end of the remark [O].

(22) Menage, Anti-Baillet, Part. i, Art. lxi.

Mr Des Maizeaux (21) hath been pleased to communicate to me some observations on the article of Virgil, amongst which there are some wherein he confutes this whole passage of Huetius, and gives a contrary account of the surname Parthenias. I had willingly made use of his conjectures, if I had not thought that I ought to stay for the new observations, which I know he hath sent me, and I have not yet received.

[B] An opportunity of refuting an observation which you find in the Anti-Baillet.] Mr Menage pretends that there are numerous obscenities in Virgil. 'His Eclogues,' saith he (22), are full of unnatural love.

Novimus & qui te, transversa tuentibus hircis, &c.
Formosum Pastor Corydon ardebat Alexin.

*We know who did your business . . .
And what the goats observ'd with leering eyes, &c.
Young Corydon, th' unhappy shepherd swain
The fair Alexia lov'd . . .*

DRYDEN.

'He loved this Alexis, as Apuleius informs us in the following passage of his apology: "Quanto modestius tandem Mantuanus Poeta, qui iudem ut ego, puerum amici Pollionis Bucolico ludico laudans, & abstinens nominum, sese quidem Corydonem, puerum vero Alexin vocat. . . . How much greater is the modesty of Virgil, who writing in the strain that I do, and praising his friend Pollio's minion in one of his pastorals, forbears to mention their true names, but calls himself Corydon and the boy Alexis. But Apuleius mistook when he said that Alexis was Pollio's minion: he was Mecænas's darling, as we are informed from the fifty-sixth epigram of the eighth book of Martial." Mr Menage had no reason to infer from this passage of Apuleius that Virgil was in love with Alexis; for, on the contrary, from thence I shall prove that he was not, and that so much of his Eclogue as relates to this particular was a meer piece of wit. Apuleius's accusers besides other crimes objected against him several amorous verses on boys, whom he disguised under feigned names. He replies (23) that it was customary with the Poets to alter the name of the beloved object: which he proves by several examples, and dislikes the conduct of Lucilius, who did not make use of that disguise (24). To this conduct he opposes Virgil's modesty, who, says he, praising, as I have done, his friend's minion, made use of fictitious names, &c. If he had pretended that this Eclogue of Virgil expressed the real amorous sentiments of its author, he had directly owned that he was guilty of the same crime, and instead of refuting his accusers, would have acknowledged the justice of their accusation. But nothing can be more absurd than to suppose him guilty of this blunder. Let us then say that he declares that this Eclogue of Virgil was only a witty amusement, in which his affections were not in the least engaged. And it is what he says with respect to the Poems for which he was prosecuted. He is surprized that any person should presume to summon him before the Judges on this occasion. Making verses, says he, by way of diversion, is no indication of manners. The guilty do not usually boast of their crimes; but those who publish

(23) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. m. 279.

(24) C. Lucilius, quamquam sit Iambicus, tamen improbari, quod Gentium & Macedonem pueros directis nominibus carmine suo profutuerit. d. ibid.

Amours, are not engaged in them, otherwise than by way of sport; they are only poetical fictions. 'Sed summe ego ineptus, qui hæc etiam in iudicio? an vos potius calumnioli, qui etiam hæc in accusatione? quasi ullum specimen morum sit, veribus ludere.' Catullum ita respondentem malevolis non legitis?

Nam castum esse decet pium poetam
Ipsam, vericulos nihil necesse est.

Divus Hadrianus, cum Voconii amici sui poetæ tumulum verbis muneraretur, ita scripsit:

Lascivus versu, mente pudicus eras.

'Quod nunquam ita dixisset, si forent lepidiora carmina argumentum impudicitiae habenda. . . . Cum (Platonis) versus, quos nunc percensui, tanto sanctiores sunt quanto apertiores: tanto pudicior compositi, quanto simplicius professi. Namque hæc & id genus omnia dissimulare & occultare, peccantis: proferri & promulgare, ludentis est. Quippe natura, vox innocentiae, silentium maleficio distributa (25). . . . But is it not foolish in me to take notice of such things before a court of judicature? Or rather are not you slanderers for mentioning them in the indictment? As if forsooth writing verses for diversion were any indication of one's morals. Have you not read the answer which Catullus made to his malicious detractors.

*The Poet in his morals should be chaste,
But in his verse he need not . . .*

'The Emperor Hadrian, when he composed an epitaph for his friend Voconius the Poet, made use of this expression;

Chast in your mind, but wanton in your verse.

'He never would have said so, if merry and jocose verses were to be looked upon as an argument of unchastity. . . . Plato's verses, which I have just mentioned, are so much the more virtuous and pure for their being extremely plain; and the greater simplicity is which they express the more chaste is the composition. For to hide and dissemble things of this kind is the mark of an offender; but to profess and publish them is an argument of a sporting mind; since nature in her distributions gives speech to innocence and silence to villany.' These maxims of Apuleius are disputable, and it may reasonably be said, that he ought to have restrained them, and that they are very liable to exception; but what I assert against the author of the Anti-Baillet, that Apuleius's words clearly signify that Virgil did not find his own amours, is beyond contradiction.

[C] Those who tell us that his Eclogues were admired by Cicero, are mistaken.] Donatus's words are (26): 'Bucolica eo successu edidit, ut in scena quoque per cantores crebra pronuntiatione recitarentur. At cum Cicero quosdam versus audisset, & statim acriter iudicio intellexisset non communi vena editos, iussit ab initio totam eclogam recitari: quam cum accurate pernotasset, in fine ait: Magnæ spes altera Romæ, quasi ipse linguæ Latinæ spes prima fuisset, & Maro futurus esset secunda. Quæ verba postea Æneidi ipse inseruit. . . . His pastorals were so well received by the public, that they were frequently sung on the stage. Now when Cicero had heard some of the verses, presently discovering by his acute penetration, that the author was no ordinary genius, he ordered the whole Eclogue to be rehearsed from the beginning: which having strictly attended to, he said at the conclusion: The other hope of mighty Rome; as if he himself were the first hope of the Latin tongue, and Virgil would be the second. These words were afterwards inserted in the Æneid. Here is an error in Chronology; for it is certain that Virgil did not write his Eclogues, till after the Triumvirate of Octavianus, Marc Antony, and Lepidus, during which, as it is well known, Cicero was cruelly massacred. I do and civility, that the other Poets, who continually envied one another, almost unanimously agreed in their great value and love for him [D]. Those who say that a secret jealousy was the reason that he never mentioned Homer, and preferred a less known Poet before him, are guilty of a great absurdity [E]. He was none of those authors who are easily do not claim this discovery as mine; Father Vavasseur long since refuted the compilers of Virgil's life on this head (27). He also refuted Servius, who tells us that the sixth Eclogue being recited by the author himself was received with great applause, and afterwards sung on the stage by the Courtesan Cytheris or Lycoris, and that Cicero one of the audience was surprised to a very great degree, and asked who was the author of it, &c. (28).

(26) I say this without pretending to depart from the opinion of those who declare that Donatus is the true author of Virgil's life that goes by his name.

(27) Vavasseur, de Jodica Dictione, pag. 172, & seq.

(28) Servius, in Eclogam, VI, ver. 11.

(29) Instituted in Auctores pene omnes, antiquos potissimum, censio.

(30) Tacit. de Orator. cap. xliii.

(31) In libro quem contra obstrictores Virgili scriptit. Donat. in Vita Virgili.

(32) Donat. ubi supra.

Claudius du Verdier took notice of this fault of Servius, in a book (29) which he published in the year 1586. Peter Ramus had before confuted the same error, which Father Vavasseur confutes. 'Hoc Donatus affirmat, sed chronologia repugnat: quatuor enim aut quinque annis antea jam Cicero triumvirali proscriptione perierat. . . . This Donatus affirms, but it is repugnant to Chronology: for Cicero had lost his life four or five years before that by the proscription of the 'Triumviri.' These are Peter Ramus's words in his life of Virgil, before his Lectiones on the Bucolics. To which words he very properly adds a passage of a dialogue ascribed to Tacitus; which shews that all the people rose up, at the recital of some verses of our Virgil on the theatre, and that this excellent Poet being accidentally there was saluted and honoured like the Emperor himself: 'Malo securum & secretum VIRGILII secessum, in quo tamen neque apud divum Augustum gratia caruit, neque apud populum Romanum notitia. Testes Augusti epistolæ, testis ipse populus, qui auditus in theatro verbis Virgilii, surrexit universus, & forte præsentem spectantemque Virgilium veneratus est, sic quasi Augustum (30). . . . I prefer the private and safe retirement of Virgil, in which notwithstanding he neither wanted a share in the favour of Augustus, nor in the esteem of the Roman people. Witness the letters of Augustus, witness the people themselves, who having heard some verses of Virgil recited on the stage, rose up, &c.

[D] The other Poets . . . almost unanimously agreed in their great value and love for him.] This is a great eulogy, which commands my admiration for Virgil more than the beauty of his works, or the excellency of his Muse. He exceeded all the Poets, and yet they loved him. Certainly nothing can be more extraordinary than this; and if the author who relates it had not prepared the way by describing Virgil's amiable character, he never could have prevailed on us to believe it. He represents him endowed with a great deal of goodness, he says that he was extremely careful to cultivate the acquaintance of honest and learned men, and to acknowledge their merit, without either envying or blaming any person. All he had was at the service of his friends: a fine thought in the writings of other men pleased him as much as if he had been the author of it; and he was never concerned at being robbed of the glory of his performances, or that another claimed them for his, and reaped the advantage of them. This is his picture drawn by Alconius Pedianus. Refert etiam Pedianus (31) benignum, cultoremque omnium bonorum atque eruditum fuisse, & usque adeo invidiæ expertem, ut si quid eruditum dictum inspiceret alterius, non minus gauderet, ac si suum fuisset: neminem vituperare, laudare bonos: ea humanitate esse, ut, nisi perversus maxime, quisque illum non diligere modo, sed amaret. Nihil proprii habere videbatur. Ejus bibliotheca non minus aliis doctis patebat, ac sibi: illudque Euripidis antiquum sæpe usurpabat, τὰ τῶν φίλων κοινὰ, hoc est, communia amicorum esse omnia. . . . Gloria vero adeo contentor fuit: cum quidam versus quosdam sibi adscriberent, eaque re docti haberentur, non modo ægrè non ferebat, immo voluptuosum id illi erat (32). Does not this prepare us to find a great probability in the following words of the same author: 'Quare cœvos omnes Poetas ita adjunctos habuit, ut cum inter se plurimum invidia arderent, illum una omnes colebant? . . . For which reason he lived so well with all his contemporary Poets, that whilst they burnt with envy at one another, they all unanimously agreed in their great value and love for him.' Perhaps it may be asked why the text of this remark is not conform to those Latin words; I having inserted the exception almost, which is not in the Latin. To this I answer that I had just reason to make use of that limitation, since immediately after I find in my author, that the Poets Anser and Cornificius were Virgil's enemies. It is he then who is to be blamed for having twice successively said omnes, . . . all, instead of ferè omnes, . . . almost all. And he is the more blameable, since he could not but know that Virgil had more than two enemies. Bavius and Mævius hated him, so that here are four Poets against him.

Qui Bavius non odit amet tua carmina Mævi (33).

Who hates not living Bavius, let him be (Dead Mævius) damn'd to love thy works and thee.

DRYDEN.

An anonymous author is said to have censured his Eclogues (34), and Carbillus Picior his Æneis; besides we are told that one Herennius collected his faults, and Perilius Faustinus his Plagiarisms (35). And it ought indeed to be owned that this great Poet was exposed to the Criticisms of his contemporaries, since Alconius Pedianus wrote a book in his defence (36). And if he had not been thus exposed, it ought to be registered amongst the greatest wonders that ever were: Urit enim fulgore suo qui, &c. (37).

[E] Those who say that a secret jealousy was the reason that he never mentioned Homer . . . are guilty of a great absurdity.] Virgil supposes, in his description of Æneas's descent into Hell, that the Sibyl desirous to know where Anchises was, enquired of Mufæus, the most illustrious of all the Poets, and of all the choice men, who had an apartment in the retreat of the blessed.

Hic manus, ob patriam pugnando vulnera passi;
Quique sacerdotes casti, dum vita manebat,
Quique pii vates, & Phœbo digna locuti,
Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes,
Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo:
Omnibus his niveâ cinguntur tempora vittâ.
Quos circumfusus sic est effata Sibylla:
(Mufæm ante omnes: medium nam plurima turba Hunc habet, atque humeris exstantem suspicit altis.)
Dicite felices animæ, tuque optime vates, Quæ regio Anchisen, quis habet locus (38)?

Which Mr Dryden renders thus:

Here patriots live, who for their country's good,
In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
Priests of unblemish'd lives here make abode;
And Poets worthy their inspiring God:
And searching wits of more mechanic parts,
Who grac'd their age with new invented arts.
Those who to worth their bounty did extend;
And those who knew that bounty to commend;
The heads of those with holy fillets bound;
And all their temples were with garlands crown'd.
To these the Sibyl thus her speech address'd:
And first to him surrounded by the rest;
Tow'ring 'his height, and ample was his breast;
Say happy souls, divine Mufæus say,
Where lives Anchises, and where lies our way
To find the Heroes

DRYDEN.

The French translator of Virgil makes the following judicious remark: 'Some Commentators ask why Virgil does Mufæus the honour to place him in the Elysian fields, and to address the Sibyl's words to him, rather than to Homer. I once saw a company of very learned men, almost unanimously agree, that Virgil ought indeed to have bestowed this honour on Homer, but that his jealousy of him prevented it. I did not at that time reflect on it, and yet nothing

(33) See Servius upon the ninth verse of the third Eclogue.

(34) Proletis Bucolicis innotatus quidam rescriptit Antiballica, duas modo eclogas, sed infinitissime tam parvas. Donatus, ubi supra.

(35) Id. ibid.

(36) Id. ibid.

(37) Horat. Epist. i, lib. ii, ver. 13.

(38) Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 660.

easily pleased with their own productions; he polished and revised his verses with an extreme severity [F]; and we are told that his Æneis, which we look upon as a finished piece, was very short of perfection in his opinion, and that he earnestly desired it might be burnt, because he had not been able to put the last hand to it [G]. He designed to bestow a retirement of three years in polishing it (c); after which he intended to apply the remainder of his life solely to Philosophical studies; but he died in the mean while at Brundisium on the 22d of September 734 [H]. His corps pursuant to his order was transported to Naples (d). The Emperor was infinitely pleased with his poems is more ridiculous than this, and the answer to this objection is obvious; which is, that Virgil would have been guilty of a horrible fault in giving this commission to Homer in Æneas's life-time, since he was not born till a long time after. Wherefore to answer the Sibyl, this wife Poet has chosen Musæus who being Orpheus's disciple was much antienter than Homer, for he lived about the time of the Trojan war itself. It is scarce credible that Scaliger the Father should be so much mistaken as he is, when he takes Musæus, the author of the small poem of Leander and Hero, who, as many learned men believe, was later than Virgil himself, for this antient Musæus; and that he should alledge, to shew how much this Poet was superior to Homer, that it was for that reason that Virgil preferred him to Homer in the honour which he did him in the Elysian fields, without ever thinking how impertinent it would have been to place Homer in hell before the death of Æneas, Ulysses, and so many heroes, whose adventures and exploits he sung. If Homer had lived during the Trojan war, he had never chosen it for the subject of his poem; and he must have dispatched his Iliad and Odyssey very hastily in seven years, in order to be ready to hold this dialogue with the Sibyl. But it is plainly proved that he did not live till long after; and as no reason obliged Virgil to be guilty of this error in Chronology, and it being impossible for him to be ignorant of it, he therefore avoided such a gross fault: which would be, in a word, to make Homer die before he was born. I believe, on the contrary, that if he could handsomely have mentioned him, he would very willingly have done him that honour, nothing appearing in his character, as I have observed in my Preface, unworthy of a generous mind (39).

(c) Donatus, ubi supra.

(d) Id. ibid.

(39) Segrais, remarks upon the sixth book of the Æneis, p. 164, & seq. Amst. 1700.

(40) Turneb. Adversar. lib. xxviii, cap. xxxvi, pag. m. 631, col. i.

(41) Donat. ubi supra.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) Aulus Gellius, lib. xvii, cap. x, pag. m. 459.

she-bear brings forth her young; for as that beast is delivered of a shapeless cub, which she afterwards reduces into a proper form by licking, so the productions of his mind as their first appearance had a rude and unfinished aspect; and that it was an after-polishing which gave them their true lineaments and features. Experience itself shews that there was a great deal of candour and truth in the confession of this exquisite judge; since those things, to which he gave the finishing stroke, are set off and enriched with all the beauties of poetry; whereas those that he left to be revised afterwards, and which he could not finish, because death prevented him, are by no means worthy of the name and judgment of a man who is deservedly esteemed the most elegant of all Poets.

[G] We are told . . . that he earnestly desired his Æneis might be burnt, because he had not been able to put the last hand to it. This is affirmed in his life ascribed to Donatus. See below remark [L] (44). This life contains a great many fallacies, wherefore it would be very excusable to call this a lie (45), if other authors had not mentioned it also; but since Pliny, Aulus Gellius, and Macrobius have said it, we may safely allow the fact, without any danger of passing for too credulous. Pliny's words are: 'Divus Augustus carmina Virgilii cremari contra testamenti ejus verendum vetuit: majusque ita vati testimonium contigit quam si ipse sua probavisset (46). - - - The Emperor Augustus forbade that the poems of Virgil should be burnt, as he had out of modesty ordered in his last will; which is a higher commendation to the Poet than if he himself had approved of his own works.' Aulus Gellius immediately after the words, cited in the preceding remark, goes on thus: 'Itaque cum morbo oppressus adventare mortem videret; petivit oravitque à suis amicis impense, ut Æneida, quam nondum satis elimasset, adolerent (47). - - - There fore when the violence of his distemper increased, and he foresaw that death was near, he earnestly besought his most intimate friends, that they would burn the Æneis, because he had not sufficiently polished it.' See Macrobius in the twenty-fourth chapter of the first book of his Saturnalia.

[H] He died . . . at Brundisium on the twenty-second of September 734. Father la Rue saith it was in the year 735, and that he was born in 684. I have followed their chronology, who have placed his birth in 683, and his death in 734. They agree with Father la Rue in the consulships of Virgil's birth and death, but not in the years of those consulships. The like variations run through almost all parts of the antient Consular Fasti. This diversity is of no great consequence here. They all make Virgil live the same number of years. The following variation is of another nature. Pliny seems to have placed his death in the year 740. 'Hæc, saith he (48), Virgilii vatis ætate incognita à cuius obitu XC aguntur anni. - - - These things were unknown in the time of Virgil, who died ninety years ago.' When Pliny wrote the Epistle Dedicatory to his work, Titus had been but six times Consul; he therefore wrote it before the year 832, which was that of the seventh Consulship of Titus (49); and it is very probable that he wrote it in 830, under the sixth Consulship of this son of Vespasian, and that having revised his work, he inferred that date throughout. Now he reckons but ninety years from the death of Virgil, which therefore should be placed in the year 740. Observe, that on such occasions, he generally aims at an exact supputation, not contenting himself with an even number. Notwithstanding which I believe that in this place he made use of an even number, or rather that he compiled the fourteenth book of his Natural History in the year 825 (50), when, in a literal sense, it was ninety years since Virgil's death. In revising his work he proposed to reduce all the particular dates which he had used to that of the year 735.

(45) I suppose here that the year in which Virgil died, is not the 734th, as I have put it in the text of this article, but his poems (c). Nothing is more ridiculous than the stories of his Magic, and the pretended wonders which he shewed the Neapolitans [I]. The versions of, and the commentaries his revival, but probably forgot to alter the date of the fourteenth book, and left the number XC. Those who have corrected their own writings will bear witness, that notwithstanding all their attention several things have escaped them, which obstruct the perfect uniformity of a large book (51).

(c) See the remark [L], numb. IV.

(51) See, above, the remark [K], of the article Tacitus, towards the middle.

But tho' we should suppose that there were really but ninety years betwixt the death of Virgil and Titus's sixth consulate; and that those who fix his death in the year of Rome 735, ought to stand corrected by this passage of Pliny, where it is determined to the year 740, we could not help discovering a gross error in Trifan's commentaries. This Antiquarian imagines (52) that at the time of Caius Cæsar's expedition against the Parthians, Virgil intimates that he finished his Georgicks; for it is our Caius Cæsar, whom he certainly mentions in these verses towards the end of the last book of that work, (52) Trifan, Comment. Hist. Tom. i, pag. 137.

Hæc super arborum cultu, pecorumque canebam,
Et super arboribus : Cæsar dum magnus ad altum
Fulminat Euphratem bello, victorque volentes Per populos dat jura, viamque afficit Olympo.

Thus have I sung of fields, and flocks, and trees,
And of the waxen work of lab'ring bees;
While mighty Cæsar thundering from afar,
Seeks on Euphrates banks the spoils of war:
With conqu'ring arms asserts his country's cause,
With arts of peace the willing people draws:
On the glad earth the golden age renews,
And his great father's path to Heaven pursues.

DRYDEN.

and not Augustus, as it hath been hitherto thought: for it ought to be considered, that Augustus was not in this war, but Caius his nephew (53), and adopted son, who forced Phraates, King of the Parthians, to resign Armenia to the Romans. If this author had been at the trouble of looking into chronological tables, he would have found that the consulate under which Virgil's death is placed, is too far distant from the time of Caius Cæsar's expedition, to countenance any supposition that this great Poet was composing his Georgics during the said Caius Cæsar's war with the Parthians. His expedition happened in, or about, the year of Rome 752. If after that Virgil had wrote his Æneis, he must then have lived at least till the year 763. This doth not want a refutation. I shall only say that Father Noris alledges the common opinion concerning Virgil's dying in 735, against Trifan (54).

(53) Trifan should have said his grand-son. He did not consider that the word nepos spoken of Caius with respect to Augustus, does not signify nephew.

(54) Noris Cœnotaph. Pisân. pag. 249.

(55) See the preface to the Apologia des grans Hommes accusés de Magie.

(56) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, cb. xxi, pag. 607, Paris 1625, in 8vo.

[I] The stories of his Magic, and the pretended wonders which he shewed the Neapolitans. I think it was in the year 1625, that a book was published under the title of, A new Judgment concerning what hath been said and written for and against the book of the curious doctrine of the wits of this age. Virgil is there accused of having been a celebrated enchanter, and necromancer, as well as having performed innumerable wonders by the assistance of his Magic (55). This was transcribed verbatim from the book which the Sieur de Lancre published against the disbelief of Sorcery. This induced Mr Naudé to write an apology for all those great personages, who were falsely suspected of Magic. He upbraids Bodin and de Lancre, who put Virgil into the number of Magicians, with the unreasonableness of their copying this falsity from the most scandalous and dirty writings of certain authors, who were the very sink and sediment of the most barbarous writers (56). . . . This phoenix of Latin poetry, continues he, is not accused of that Magic and poetical fury, which, by the perfection of his works, charmed all the polite wits . . . but of the superstitions and criminal Magic, of which this ornament of Par-nassus would never have been suspected, by a less degree of impudence than that unbounded one of these mustrooms and fabulists, for which I cannot tell whether they or the two modern authors, and some others, quos fama obscura recondit, are more blameable; since those last are so ridiculously credulous as to admit such cheats as legal evidences of a calumny, which turns much more to their prejudice than to that of Virgil. . . . There is indeed reason to wonder at those, who at present make use of the lies and fabulous inventions of seven or eight slaves to barbarism, and the opinions of the populace, in order to draw this Poet's name in their catalogue of Magicians, and relate a thousand stories, which, if true, would only cause him to be esteemed one of the most expert that ever was in that art (57). After which he retracts what he had said (58), that we were beholden for all these fables to Helinandus the Monk. He took it on Gefner's authority, that this Monk flourished in the year 1069: but being convinced that he lived about the year 1209 (59), I am, adds he (60), obliged to confess ingenuously that I was mistaken, and that the first author of all these idle fancies, was, in my opinion, that Gervasius, who, as Theodoric à Niem + faith, was Chancellor to the Emperor Otto III (61), to whom he presented his book, intitled, Ocia Imperatoris, which is really so stuffed with absurdities and fables, as I remember to have already observed, that I can hardly persuade myself that he was in his senses when he wrote it. This author relates (62);

VOL. V.

That Virgil made a copper fly, which, for the space of eighty years, remained on one of the gates of Naples, to which he had fixed it, and prevented any fly entering the city; where he also built shambles, in which flesh never stank or putrified; that on one of the gates of the said city he placed two large stone statues, one of which he called merry and beautiful, and the other melancholy and hideous; that these statues were of that virtue, that any person entering the town by the side where the first stood, was blessed with a happy success in all his affairs, whilst he who came in on the side of the gate where the other was fixed, found himself unfortunate, and that every thing crossed his intention; that he caused a brass statue with a trumpet in its mouth to be erected on a high mountain near the city of Naples, which sounded so loud when the north wind blew, that the fire and smoke of Vulcan's forges, which are at present to be seen near Pozzuolo, were driven towards the sea, without doing any damage to the inhabitants; that it was he who caused the baths of Calatura di petra bagno & adusto di l'omo, to be made, with the beautiful inscriptions in gold letters, which were after broken and defaced by the Physicians of Salerno, who were displeased that by them the people were instructed what disease each bath would cure; that he prevented any person being injured in the wonderful grotto cut out in mount Paupillippo to serve as a way to Naples; and lastly that he made a public fire, at which every person was free to warm himself, near which he placed a brass archer with his arrow fixed, and his bow bent, and this inscription, whoever strikes me, I let fly my arrow; that it afterwards happened that a madman struck the archer, who did not fail to shoot his arrow directly into the fire, which immediately went out. Let us now take a view of the transcribers and improvers of these ridiculous fables. All these absurdities were first transcribed from this author by Helinandus a Monk of Frefmont, in his Universal Chronicle +, and afterwards by Alexander Neckam an English Benedictin Monk, who relates some of the fore-mentioned stories in his book of the nature and property of things; besides which, he adds, that Naples being afflicted with an infinite number of contagious horse-leeches, was delivered from that plague instantly, upon Virgil's throwing a golden horse-leech into a well; and that he had encompassed his house and garden, in which it never rained, with an immoveable air, that served instead of a wall, and that he there built a bridge of brass, by means of which he transported himself whether he pleased; that he also built a miraculous Belfry, which, though of stone, moved in just proportion to the vibrations of the inclosed bell; that he made the statues, called the Salvation of Rome, which were watched night and day by the Priests, because as soon as any nation designed to revolt, and to take up arms against the Roman Empire, the statue which by its mark represented that nation, and was adored by it, immediately moved itself, and thereby rung a small bell which hung about its neck, and pointed with its finger to the rebellious

6 H

(57) Id. ibid. pag. 609.

(58) In the first chapter, pag. 27.

(59) He says, pag. 611, that he has read in the lives of the Virtuous Monks of Cîteaux, that Vincentius Bel-lucentis, in his Speculum, makes him live in 1209.

(60) Naudé, ib. pag. 611.

(61) Lib. 2. de schismate, cap. 19, 20.

(62) It should be Otto IV.

(63) Naudé, ib. & pag. 59.

+ Lib. 16.

on, his works are numberless (d). Those who have disguised them in burlesque verse [K], have

(d) See the list of them prefixed to the Commentary which the Abbot de Marolles added to his translation of Virgil. Mr de Segrais, who died in 1701, had promised a translation of the Georgics, which was expected with great impatience; as his performance upon the Aeneis, had been very much esteemed. It is a version in verse with a very fine Preface, and very curious Notes. A second edition of it, corrected by the author, and printed in Holland, came out in the year 1700.

† Cap. 103.

• Lib. de claris Medicine Scriptorib. tract. 2.

nation, so that its name might be seen written, which the Priest carried to the Emperor, who immediately prepared an army in order to subdue and reduce it to reason. This is likewise taken notice of by an anonymous author, who above one hundred and twenty years ago, collected the lives of the Philosophers and Poets; for when he comes to Virgil, he positively tells us, † Hic Philosophia naturali præditus etiam Necromanticus fuit, & mira quadam arte hæc fecisse narratur: - - - He was an adept in Natural Philosophy, and likewise a Necromancer; for he is said to have performed all these things by some wonderful art. After which, he recites the above-mentioned stories, which were afterwards copied verbatim from the Latin of this anonymous writer, by Symphorian Champier*, and Albert of Eib, who was so weak as to insert them in the second part of his Margarita Poetica, under the title of sentences and authorities excerpted from Diogenes Laertius, and yet not content with this, hath enlarged them with the story of a Roman Courtesan, who having hung up Virgil in a basket in the middle of a tower; he in revenge so extinguished all the fires in Rome, that it was impossible to light any of them, any otherwise than by kindling them at the privy parts of this female derider; and besides the fire being so incommunicable, that no one could light at another's fire, every person was obliged to see and visit her: and this fine story was scarce published but one Gratian du Pont thought it worthy of being inserted in his controversies betwixt the female and male sexes, printed at Toulouse in the year 1534, as a very manifest proof of the malice and malignity of women: his verses shall conclude this long deduction of follies.

Que dirons nous du bon homme Virgile,
Que tu pendis si vray que l'Evangile,
Dans ta corbeille jadis en ta fenestre,
Donc tant marry fut qu'estoit possible estre.
A luy qui estoit homme de grand honneur,
Ne fis tu pas un tres-grand deshonneur?
Helas si feis, car c'estoit dedans Rome,
Que là pendu demeura le pauvre homme,
Par ta cautelle & ta deception,
Un jour qu'on fit grosse procession
Parmy la ville, donc dudit personnage,
Qui ne s'en rit ne fut estimé sage (63).

(63) Naudé, ubi
supra, ch. xxi,
pag. 614, & seq.

What shall we say of Virgil, who Was in a basket hung by you,
And pendant from your window seen,
Which gave the best man the spleen.
Did you not foul dishonour fix
On this great Poet by your tricks?
Most certainly you did, since he Was by your fraud constrain'd to be A hanging spectacle in Rome Unto the gazing vulgar, come
To see a huge procession pass,
Where he that laugh'd not was esteem'd an ass.

Naudé doth not trouble himself with refuting these fooleries, but takes some notice that in the life of Virgil, ascribed to Tiberius Donatus, St Jerom's master, it is said that this great Poet's father was first servant, and then son-in-law to a certain Magus (64). He answers, that according to Delrio and La Cerda, this life such as we now have it, was not written by that ancient Donatus. What we find there concerning Virgil's father, adds he (65), is sufficient to shew that the piece is supposititious. This is a strange blunder; for it is taking the word Magus, which the best Critics correct by Magius or Majus, for a Magician. The authority of Johannes Sariberienus, who mentions this

(64) Ibid. pag.
621.

(65) Ibid. pag.
622.

brazen fly which drove all the flies out of Naples, does not seem of any great weight. Toftatus †† who places Virgil amongst the practitioners of Necromancy, is in error. D. Hieron. ad Paulinum. †† Commens. in epist. D. Hieron. ad Paulinum. (66) Naudé, ubi supra, pag. 614. of Virgil's Magic, are so numerous, that it is impossible to treat of them particularly one after another, without losing a great deal of time, and admitting abundance of tautologies, I ought to imitate the Civilians, who take authorities per futuram, and making but one article of all the rest, to shew, that though Le Loyer †† mentions his echo ††, †† Liv. 1. Paracelsus his magical images and figures , Hel- des Spectra ch. 6. moldus his representation of the city of Naples †† Tom. 1. que- tract. de imagi- nibus cap. 11. which he shut up in a glass bottle, Sibyllus † and the author of the book intitled, The image of the world, the head which he made in order to be informed of future events †; Petrarch and Theodorice † Lib. 4. Hist. à Niem † the Grotto at Naples which he caused to be cut out at the request of Augustus; † Vigenere † Peregrin. his alphabet; †† Trithemius his book of tables and † quest. decise 3. calculations, to discover the genius of all persons, † c. 4. questionibus 3. and lastly, those who have visited the Duke of Florence's cabinet, a mirror said to be that which this great Poet made use of in Catoptromancy: yet all these authorities are too modern, absurd, or ill grounded, to turn the scale against the silence of all the authors who lived during the space of a thousand years, and who would be greatly to blame, † Pag. 170. f. not to have mentioned or observed any of all those †† Anselm. wonders, if there had really been any such, since † c. 1. cap. 3. they have taken notice of a great many particulars of less moment. I pass by some reasons which he alleges, and what he observes as a fable, That all the Sodamites in the world died on the night of JESUS CHRIST's nativity, and that as the famous Civilian is, lib. de Ex- salm. lect. 2. Salicetus assures us, Virgil was one of them (67). †† Salicetus assures us, Virgil was one of them (67). c. 4. mem. 12. But I ought not to omit what follows. As for the preceding authorities, it ought not to be imagined †† Naudé, ubi supra, pag. 614. that Petrarch, Theodorice à Niem, Vigenere, and Trithemius, were so foolish, as scandalously to prostitute their credit and reputation to the censure of those that are not easily imposed on by such fables; for it is certain that whatever they have said, was in order to refute them, and give us to understand that they were not so easy and credulous as the other authors, whom I have cited, who can never atone for the fault which they have committed, in suffering themselves to be misled by the scandalous and weak influences of hear-says, street-ballads, and the vulgar opinion of the inhabitants of Naples, and the circumjacent places, who always ascribed every thing to Virgil's Magic, which seemed somewhat extraordinary or surprising, and for which they could not find another cause; as it is very easy to judge from the wonderful grotto hewn out of the mountain Paullippo near the city of Naples, which Strabo (who according to Athenæus, lived in the time of Scipio, and the taking of Carthage, or, according to Patricius, in Augustus's and Tiberius's time) mentions as very ancient; notwithstanding which, the peasants thereabouts affirm, that it was hewn out by Virgil at the pressing instances of Augustus, because the top of the mountain under which it is cut, was so pestered with serpents and dragons, that he must be a very bold man who ventured to cross it (68). In fine, He inquires (69) (68) Ibid. into the first cause of this suspicion, and believes he hath found it in the mathematical learning which Virgil acquired. This is what confirmed all the weak and credulous in this erroneous opinion, which they had already entertained of him by reason of his Pharmaceutria, - - - the Sorceries, or eighth Eclogue, where, says Apuleius, he hath learnedly represented, Vitas molles & verbenas pingues, & thura mascula, & licia discolora, - - - The soft fillets, the fat vervains, the male incense, and threads of different colours, and whatever belongs to Magic; so that he could not avoid being suspected of the practice of it, by those who were hindered by their ignorance have raised the choler of some learned men; and it must be confessed that it is not altogether without reason. The commentary in usum Delphini, by Father de la Rue, the Jesuit, is a very good one. There is prefixed to it a life of this Poet, digested according to the order of the consulships, and adorned with very judicious remarks. I shall censure some faults in Mr Moreri [L]. I have avoided mentioning a certain poplar, called Virgil's tree; which, according to the custom of the country, was planted when his ignorance and the barbarity of their age, from knowing that it was translated verbatim from Theocritus (70).

(70) Ibid.

Gaffarel endeavours to defend the authority of Gervasius Tilberienfis, and to answer Naudæus (71); but his endeavours are very ridiculous.

(71) Gaffarel, Curiositez inouïes, ch. viii, num 13, pag. m. 169, & seq.

[K] Those who have disguised them in burlesque verse. Scarron hath succeeded herein much better than all the rest; but the majesty of this Poem deserves more respect than to be so daringly prophaned. Vavassor the Jesuit complained of it, and observed that Italy first made way for this liberty: 'Vide, Balzaci, de istorum hominum consiliis, & instituta ratione quid sentiam, quidve primum venerit in mentem, cum personatos aliquot ejusmodi, & e mentitis Virgilios, neque enim hanc ab uno duntaxat contumeliam passus est, in manus lapsi. Mihi visi sunt, qui nobilissimum & clarissimum poetam foeditate interpretationis suæ turpârunt, eodem illum modo tractare voluisse, quo Didonem tractavit prius, adeoque vices innocentis & calamitose reginæ ulcisci. Ut is enim Didonem Æneæ turpiter indigneque profuit, neque ullam rationem habuit vel temporis, cum ab Æneæ Dido distaret ipsi trecentis annis; vel famæ & exclamationis publicæ, quod eadem omnes ætatis suæ feminas pudicitia laude anteiret: ita isti nulla ingenii artis præstantia, nulla principis poetæ dignitate deterriti sunt, quo minus puram & castam poemam, corruptam & adulteratam extruderent in publicum, diffamarent malis dictis suis, eique quantum possent, petulantur illuderent (72). . . . Quamquam hic ego nostris hominibus non habeo quid præcipue succenseam, cum nihil in isto genere per se ac primi, sed exemplo & imitatione peccarint. Sicut nec ipsi præter ceteros succensere mihi debent, si commune factum, & aliorum potius, quam Gallorum, reprehendo. Fecerunt videlicet flagitium antea & Joannes Baptista Lallius, cujus Æneis travestita mihi casu super occurrit, & alii, ut audio, recentes Itali scriptores (73). . . . Hear, Balzac, what my sentiments are concerning the designs and proceedings, of these men, and what my first reflexions were on seeing some false and counterfeit Virgils of this kind; for he has suffered the like indignity from more than one person. It appeared to me that they who had disgraced this noble and renowned Poet by their vile contrivances, had resolved to treat him in the same manner as he himself treated Dido, and thus to revenge the quarrel of that innocent and unfortunate Queen. For as Virgil prostituted Dido to Æneas in a base and unworthy manner, without having the least regard either to the distance of time betwixt them which was three hundred years, or to her fame and character in the world, which allowed her to have been the most virtuous woman of her age; so these men were neither deterred by the noble excellency of the art, nor by the dignity of the Prince of Poets, from corrupting and adulterating, and, in that manner, publishing to the world his pure and chaste Poetry, from disgracing him with their scandalous expressions, and from putting the highest affront upon him, which it was possible for them to do. . . . Though I have no reason to be chiefly offended at my countrymen, since they were not the first to transgress, but were led into it by imitating the example of others. Neither have they any reason to be particularly angry with me, since I only find fault with a general offence, which concerns other nations more than it does them. The crime was committed before by John Baptista Lallius, whose Æneis burlesqued, I accidentally saw not long ago, and by some other late Italian authors, as I am informed.

(72) Franc. Vavassor. De ludicra Dictione, pag. 180.

(73) Id. ibid. pag. 182.

[L] I shall censure some faults in Mr Moreri. I. His manner of placing his words in this sentence, the two first words were written in favour of Mæcenas and Pollio, would make one believe, that his Bucolics were composed in favour of Mæcenas, and his Georgics in favour of Pollio. But he either designed, or ought to have said the contrary. And if he had postponed Mæcenas to Pollio, he had yet been guilty of expressing himself wrong; for a person who should say that Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics were written in favour of Pollio and Mæcenas, would speak illogically (74), and contrary to the laws of our Grammar. This sentence signifies that each of those pieces was written for Pollio and Mæcenas. But that is false. In the Dutch editions this passage is altered thus: The two first works are full of the praises of Mæcenas and Pollio. But this doth not mend the two faults which I have noted, and introduces a third, since it is certain that Mæcenas is not praised in the Eclogues, and that he is mentioned in very few places of the Georgics, and always very succinctly, and sometimes without any praise. Nevertheless it might be said, that this Poem was composed in his favour, because it is dedicated to him; and it is to him that the author addresses himself in the first and last book, and in several other places. I do not deny but that Pollio is praised in the Eclogues; but as several others have a good share in the commendations, what Donatus distributes amongst four persons (75), should not have been bestowed upon one; and I should rather have said, as he doth, that they were composed by the encouragement of Pollio (76). I said in my first edition of this book, that Donatus making Virgil to be twelve years in compiling the Æneis, Mr Moreri should not have said eleven years: but at this time I renounce my former censure, for several editions have

(74) Logic teaches us that in all compounded and copulative propositions, all the attributes ought to agree with the subject. See the Art of Thinking, Part. ii, ch. ix, where they have neglected to set forth such an example as this.

it annis undecim, and not annis duodecim as mine hath, which is the Virgil Variorum printed at Leyden in 1680 (77). II. Virgil did not die going to meet Augustus as he returned from his eastern journey. He went into Greece and Asia in search of a retirement, in order to be at leisure to polish his Æneis; and in this journey, he met Augustus at Athens; Augustus, who was returning from the east. This determined him to return into Italy with the Emperor: but the disease which seized him in a journey, which out of curiosity he undertook to Megara, increasing upon him in his passage, he arrived at Brundisium in such an ill state of health that he died in a few days. Thus the story is told in his life. III. Since according to Moreri, he was born in the year of Rome 684, and died in 735, he could not possibly live fifty-two years. This fault of Moreri is also in the life of Virgil. The day, and the consulships of his birth and death are noted in it. Those two intervals do not quite make up fifty-one years, and Donatus nevertheless supposes that Virgil went into Greece at the age of fifty-two years. IV. These words: As he was dying, he ordered that his Æneis should be burned, but Augustus preserved that admirable Poem, and commanded Tucca and Varius to correct it, are very fallacious, and it is very necessary they should be rectified. The fact is thus. Virgil finding that his distemper increased, earnestly asked for his manuscripts in order to commit his Æneis to the flames; and because no body was so complaisant as to bring them, he ordered by his last will, that they should be burned as an imperfect work. Tucca and Varius represented to him, that Augustus would not permit it. Whereupon Virgil bequeathed his writings to them on condition that they should add nothing to them, and should, if they found any unfinished verses, leave them in the same condition. Cum gravari morbo sese sentiret, scripserat sepe & magna instantia petiit, crematurus Æneida: quibus negatis, testamento comburi jussit, ut rem in emendatam imperfectamque. Verum Tucca & Varius monuerunt, id Augustum non permittiturum. Tunc eidem Varius, ac simul Tucca, scripta sub ea conditione legavit, ne quid adderent quod a se editum non esset, & versas etiam imperfectas, si qui erant, relinquerent (78). So that Augustus was no farther the cause of the preserving of this Poem, than that the author desisted from his resolution, being told, that this Prince would not suffer the execution of it. It redounds to the glory of

(75) Cum res Romanas inchoasset, offensus, materia & nominum asperitate, ad Bucolicam transiit; maxime ut Asinium Polionem, Alphenum, Varium, & Cornelium Gallum celebraret; quia in distributione agrorum, qui post Philippensem victoriam veteranis, triumviro rum jussu, trans Padum dividebantur, indemnem se præstitit. . . . Wien be had begun to treat of the Roman History, he was so displeased with the subject and the barbarity of the names that he laid aside that design, and took to writing Pastorals; chiefly that he might have an opportunity of praising Asinius Pollio, Alphenus, Varius, and Cornelius Gallus; because in the distribution of the lands on the other side of the Po, which were shared among the veterans, judicium by the command of the triumviri, after the victory at Philippi, they had saved his lands. Donatus, ubi supra.

(76) Bucolica triennio Asinii Polionis iussu perfectæ. . . . He completed his Pastorals in the space of three years, by the advice of Asinius Pollio. Id. ib.

(77) Duodecim is to be found in several other editions.

(78) Donat. ubi supra.

his mother was delivered of him, and was observed to grow so fast, that in a few years it equalled poplars much older. Such women as were with child or newly brought to bed made it an object of religion (f).

Among Caligula's follies, we may undoubtedly reckon his contempt and hatred of Virgil; whose writings and effigies he endeavoured to remove out of all libraries (g). He had the confidence to say that Virgil had neither wit nor learning (b). The Emperor Alexander Severus judged quite otherwise; he called him the Plato of the Poets, and placed his picture with that of Cicero in the Temple, in which he had placed Achilles and other great men (i). Cæcilius the Grammarian was the first who read lectures on the poems of Virgil, whose cotemporary he was (k).

(f) Sueton. in Calig. cap. xxxiv. Severo, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 936.

(b) Nullius ingenii minimæque doctrinæ. Id. ibid. (g) Sueton. de Illust. Gramm. cap. xvi.

(i) Lampadius, in Alex.

(f) Accessit aliud præfagium: siquidem virga populeæ, more regionis in puerperis eodem statim loco depacta, ita brevi coaluit, ut multo antea fatis populos adquerit. Quæ arbor Virgili ex eo dicta atque con-secrata est; fama gravidam & fecundam religionis, fulgentium ibi & solventium vota. Donatus, ubi supra, initio.

(79) Nihil igitur auctore Augusto Varius addidit, quod & Maro præceperat, sed summam emendavit, ut qui versum etiam imperfectum, si qui erant, reliquerit. Id. ibid.

(80) It is in the Life of Virgil.

(81) Id. ibid.

(82) In the first article OCTAVIA, remark [C].

(83) Donatus, ubi supra.

(84) See Pliny, Epist. xv, lib. iii.

(85) Martial. lib. i, Epig. xxxix.

Quem recitas meus est, ô Fidentine, libellus;
Sed male cum recitas, incipit esse tuus (85).

The book thou read'st was, Fidentinus, mine,
But when thou read'st it ill, then mak'st it thine.

When an author reads his Play to the Actors to whom he is about to sell it, we be to him, if he doth not read it well. This is what Mr Chappuzeau observes in his French Theatre. Virgil was therefore very happy, having the talent both of making charming verses, and of reading them well. Mr Corneille resembled him but in one of these excellencies (86). I return to Moreri. His Vth fault is his saying that Augustus ordered, that whatever was superfluous in the Æneis, should be struck out without adding any thing to it. Is this rightly to understand Donatus's summatim emendavit? To correct a book in some places, and with respect to some things, doth it signify only to strike out of it what is superfluous? May it not signify that some words are inserted in the place of others? VI. Moreri's Virgil, a Roman, and a comic Poet, is a sign that he was a blind transcriber. He had read in Vossius, Trojani temporibus fuit Virgilius Romanus, Poeta Comicus (87), and mistrusting nothing he imagined this to be the real name of this Poet; but if he had consulted the originals, he would have found that Pliny, the younger, cited by Vossius, speaks of one Verginius or Virginius, and not of one Virgilius. Besides, Romanus ought not to be translated as an epithet denoting his country, but as the name of his family. Huettius hath observed this mistake of Vossius in Gyrardus, and Glandorp: Hæc autem nomina duo sæpe confundi indicat Virgini Romani Poetæ Comici Plinio in Epistolis memorati nomen, qui à Lilio Giraldo, Glandorpio, & Vossio Virgilius appellatur (88). Mr Cousin mistakes this passage of the Bishop of Avranches. We ought not to be surprized, saith he (89), that these two names have been confounded, since several learned men of these last ages have called a certain comic Poet, Virginius Romanus, whom Pliny calls Virgilius Romanus in his Epistles. I cannot conclude without observing, that when Pliny the younger is commending Virginius Romanus, he informs us that the same disease was observable at Rome, which reigns amongst our modern wits; for he declares that he was none of those who despised the present time, and admired only the Antients. 'Sum ex iis, qui mirer antiquos: non tamen, ut quidam, temporum nostrorum ingenia despicio. Neque enim quasi lassæ & effæta natura, ut nihil jam laudabile pariat. Atque adeo nuper audii Verginium Romanum paucis legentem comœdiam, ad exemplar verteris comœdiæ scriptam, tam bene, ut esse quodamque possit exemplar (90). - I am one of those who admire the antients, but without despising the moderns, as some people do. For nature is not so weary and worn out, but that she can still produce something praise-worthy. As a proof of this I lately heard Verginius Romanus reading a Comedy to some few persons, which is written after the manner of the Antients, and so well done that it might serve for a pattern.'

The passage above quoted (91) concerning the reading of the Georgics to Augustus, wants some correction. That Prince after the battle of Actium, in the year of Rome 724 returned into Italy, and met the Senate at Brundisium, where he staid twenty-seven days according to Suetonius, or thirty according to Dion Cassius, and then went into Asia, where he spent all the winter in making preparations for his expedition to Egypt. It is not then true, that at his return from the war of Actium, our Poet's Georgics were read to him at Atella (92). If he heard them read at this place, it was after the Egyptian war, and not when he returned to Italy, after the battle of Actium (93). I borrow this remark from Father la Rue. I could alledge another reason, which is, that Virgil observes at the end of his Georgics, that he composed this work during Augustus's Oriental war; but it may be objected against me, that this Poem having cost Virgil seven years labour (94), nothing hinders but part of it might be read to Augustus before he went to attack his enemy on the banks of the Nile.

VIRGIL.

(12) Blanc, Hist.
de Baviere,
Tom. i, pag.
323.

those of our times, and if that be true, how many they fortify historical Pyrrhonism, which daily lies are we obliged to believe? and how strongly do they create (13)?

(13) I have just now read two Dissertations of Father Daniel, wherein most of the things that are related of the Kings of France before Clovis, are said to be false.

VIRGIL, or VERGIL (POLYDORÉ) was born at Urbino in Italy in the XVth century. He did not want either parts or learning. I take his first book to be a collection of proverbs which he published in the year 1498: before which time none of the Moderns published any thing of that nature; wherefore he boasted of having preceded Erasmus, whom he reproached in a very unhandsome manner [A]. His second work, which treats of the Inventors of Things, was published in the year 1499 [B]. He was sent to England in the beginning of the XVIth century (a), to collect the Papal tribute, called Peter-Pence. He recommended himself so well there, and liked the country to such a degree, that having obtained the dignity of Archdeacon of the cathedral church of Wells (b), he resolved to pass the remainder of his life in England, and quitted his office of collector of the Peter-Pence. He undertook a great task, in the performance of which he laboured several years. It was the History of England. He dedicated it to Henry VIII, in the year 1533. This book is not much valued by the English [C]. He put his last hand to his treatise of Prodigies in the year 1526 [D]. He was no very rigid

Papist

(a) See the remark [I].

(b) See the remark [E].

[A] He boasted of having preceded Erasmus, whom he reproached in a very unhandsome manner. I find in the Epistle Dedicatory to his treatise of Inventoribus Rerum, that he declares, that both with respect to that subject, as well as to the Proverbs, he had beaten the path for all other authors. Non inficior

(1) Polyd. Virgilius, Epist. Dedic. Libri de Inventoribus Rerum. It is dated from Urbino, the fifth of August, 1499. libellum proximo anno Guidoni Principi, Urbini Duci in scriptum, copiosius tradere. Verum quicunque hoc vel illud posthac ingreditur iter, quia nos primi stadium currimus, ita fortasse nostris vestigia sequi non gravabitur (1). If you read Erasmus's epistles, you will there be informed that Polydore Virgil had said several harsh things to him in the Preface to a new edition of his Proverbs: he accused him of vanity and envy (2); he called him a Plagiary (3), and took it very ill that his book was not mentioned in the Preface to Erasmus's first edition. He charged him with attempting to rob him of his due honour. Ubi nam est ista veritas quam in præfatione scribis procul eminere? quæque fretus boni consulis quod ego callidus dissimulatore conatus sum in gloria tuâ possessionem irrepere (4)? Erasmus justified himself very well in a letter he wrote to him in December 1521 (5). See also his twelfth letter of the first book, page 50. He did an action too glorious to be omitted, and so exemplary, that it ought to be proposed to the imitation of all authors. The Bookseller at Basil designing to reprint Polydore Virgil's book, resolved to suppress the Preface, because it reflected on Erasmus. But this great man would not consent to it, but ordered him not to leave out any part of it, whatever the import of it was: Vel hinc colligas licet, quàm non fuerimus iniqui tuo libro. Frobenium, ut dictum est, abhorrentem ab editione perpulsi. Præfationem tuam, quâ me fugillas, ad me miserant, velut execrandam. Remissi justique, ut bonâ fide, sicut abs te fuerat descripta, excuderetur: deleverunt mentionem Lei, quam tu de illo sanè quam honorificam facis. Jussi ut reponerent. Utrum hæc sunt faventis an non (6)? Two years after he advised the author himself to correct it, that there might be no appearance of any jealousy betwixt them. Mibi videris consule salutaris, si primam illam præfationem totam retexas. Primum faciet hoc ad operis commendationem ob novitatem. Deinde faciet ad opinionem utriusque nostrum, quod insunt in illa priore quædam, quibus ego quidem non offendor, sed tamen suspensionem præbent eruditi alicujus inter nos æmulationis (7). In my edition of this treatise of Proverbs there is nothing against Erasmus (8). This trifling quarrel did not break off their friendship. See Erasmus's letter to him in the year 1526 (9). Observe that Polydore Virgil had formerly made him a present to buy a horse (10). As also that he dedicated to him his translation of a piece of St Chrysostom in the year 1528 (11).

(2) Inclementius est etiam quod hujus argumenti primum apud Latinos tractati laudem sic tibi vendicas, ut mihi coneris cenodoxias simul & livoris suspicionem impingere. Erasmus, Epist. iii. lib. xvi. pag. 748. We shall see in the remark [L], the very words of Polydore Virgil.

(3) Priusquam hac præfatione infirmulæ . . . livoris simul & plagii. Id. ibid. pag. 749.

(4) Id. ibid. (5) That which I have just now quoted.

(6) Erasmus ubi supra.

(7) Idem, Epist. xlv. lib. xx. pag. 1007.

(8) It is of Basil, 1541, in 8vo, from the fourth revival of the author.

(9) It is the xvth of the xxi. book.

(10) Idem, Epist. xxv. lib. xxi. pag. 1093.

(11) Idem opusculum (Chrysostomi in Monachum) in Angliâ verit. Virgilius Polydorus satis feliciter, mihi dicatum. Excusum est autem Lutetie. Idem, Epist. xlv. lib. xxv. pag. 1354.

(12) Vossius, de Hist. Latinis, pag. 678.

(13) That Epistle Dedicatory is dated at London the 5th of December 1517.

to John Matthew Virgil, his brother, professor of Philosophy at Padua. So that Sir Thomas-Pope Blount is mistaken when he saith that these eight books were printed at Straßburgh in 4to, in the year 1509 (14). Mr Moreri hath committed the same error as Vossius.

[C] This book is not much esteemed by the English. Sir Henry Savil says of it; 'Polydorus, ut homo Italianus, & in rebus nostris Hospes, & (quod caput est) neque in Republicâ versatus, nec magni alioqui, vel judicii, vel ingenii; pauca ex multis delibans, & falsa plerumque pro veris amplexus, Historiam nobis reliquit, cum cætera mendosam, tum exiliter sanè, & jejune conscriptam (15). - - Polydore, as being an Italian, and a stranger to our affairs, and (which is the chief thing) being neither acquainted with public business, nor otherwise a man of any great parts or judgment, touches upon a few things among many, and, generally speaking, embraces falsehoods for truths. By this means he hath left us a history which, besides being faulty in every other respect, is written in a manner that is both dry and barren.' Another English writer calls him a malicious detractor: 'Nominis Britannici gloriam non solum obfuscare, sed etiam Britannos ipsos mendacissimis suis calumniis infamare totis viribus conatur (16). - - He hath endeavoured, as much as possible, not only to diminish the glory of the British, but also to defame the Britons themselves by his lying reproaches.' But there is a complaint against him of a different nature: Paul Jovius observes that the French and Scots charged Polydore Virgil with flattering the English to an excessive degree, 'Conscriptis Historias rerum Britannicarum, ea fide ut Scotis, & Gallis sæpe reclamantibus, alieno potius arbitrio, quam suo intexuisse multa in gratiam gentis exitimetur, quod in recensendis minorum Ducum nominibus, tanquam gloriæ avidis plurimum indulerit (17). - - He wrote the History of England with such particularity, that the Scotch and French pretend, he has inserted many things in favour of the English nation, more to please others than in compliance with his own judgment. They alledge, as a proof of this, the great pains he takes in reckoning up the names of inconsiderable captains, as if they had been very desirous of glory.' John Leland hath censured several faults of Polydore Virgil, as Vossius observes (18).

[D] His treatise of Prodigies. It is composed of several dialogues, wherein he strongly opposes the art of Divining. A small part of the preface, dated at London 1526, runs thus: 'Cujus (Christi) ipsi quoque doctrina instructus confidenter veni in certamen cum ariolis, auguribus, haruspiciibus, vatibus, fortilegis, quos partim divinis, partim naturalibus debilitatos imo atque adeo devictos rationibus, jacere cum suis pestiferis artibus, videre jam licebit (19). - - Armed with the doctrine of CHRIST, I have confidently entered the lists with the sooth-sayers, wizards, and fortune-tellers; whom, together with their pernicious arts, you may now see weakened, or rather entirely destroyed, by reasons partly natural and partly theological.' This is therefore a work of a very different nature from that of Julius Obsequens, which was enlarged by Lycothenes. We are told of

(14) Pope Blount, Conf. Author. p. 434.

(15) Henrius Savilius, Prefat. ad Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, apud Pope Blount, Conf. Author. pag. 431.

(16) Homford, Libry, in Descriptione Angliæ, apud Pope Blount, ibid. pag. 431.

(17) Paulus Jovius, Europ. cap. cxxxv. pag. 279.

(18) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 679.

(19) Polyd. Virgilius, Prefat. ad Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, apud Pope Blount, ibid. pag. 431.

Papist in all particulars [E]; he was not at all disgusted at England on account of the change of religion which was brought about in the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI. He did not desire to leave that kingdom in the year 1550, on any other account than that his age required a warmer and more southern climate. He obtained leave to depart, and was permitted to receive the revenue of his benefices during

(20) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 678.

(21) De Patientia & ejus fructu Libri II; de Vita perfecta Liber I, de Veritate & Mendacio Lib. I.

(22) In the margin of the text of this article.

(23) These words of Paul Jovius, ubi supra, Is 26 Henrico Rege fortunis adactus flammæ Londini creatus, are fallacious; they seem to imply that he was Canon of London.

(24) Joan. Baleus, de Scriptur. Britann. Centur. XIII, apud Pope Blount, ubi supra, pag. 451.

(25) See the Index librorum prohib. & expurg. pag. 850, & seq. Edit. 1667, in folio.

(26) Polyd. Virgilus de Inventor. Rerum, lib. iv, cap. xiii, pag. m. 190.

an edition at London, in 1526 (20): but Gefner knew nothing of it; for he mentions only that of Basil, printed by Bebelius, in 1531. I have the Basil edition in 1545, 8vo, per Mich. Isingrinum. To it are prefixed three other tracts of Polydore Virgil (21); the Epistle Dedicatory, written by him, is dated at London in 1543.

[E] He was not very rigid Papist in all particulars.] He approved the marriage of the Clergy, and condemned image-worship. I shall here cite at large what John Bale saith of him; it furnishes me with a proof which I promised (22).

Ob insignem in omni bonarum literarum genere eruditionem, Wellensius Ecclesiæ Archidiaconus (23) postmodum factus, prioris officio Pontifici resignato, constituit Romam non petere, sed deinceps in nostrâ permanere Insulâ. Et licet in plerisque scriptis suis veræ Religionis superstitionem præterierit, piæ nihilominus Christianorum Ministrorum conjugia defendebat, piæque statuarum cultum damnabat, cum quibusdam aliis Romanensium Rabbinarum imposturis. Quod antiquitati Britannicæ in Anglorum Historiâ, quam par est, iniquior sit, ex veterum illius Gentis Chronicorum & Historiarum ignorance provenit. Quod præterea Reges aliquot ab impietate pios, & alios è diverso ab ipsâ æquitate iniquos etiam promulgaverit, communi ante agnitam veritatem per Dei verbum, erroris ac cæcitatibus imputandum esse judico. . . . Erat certe Polydorus ob erudita illa de Rerum Inventoribus, Sacrorum Ritibus & Prodigis Opuscula, ab ipsis etiam piis suspiciendus (24). . . . Being made Archdeacon of Wells, on account of his remarkable skill in all the different kinds of learning, he resigned his former benefice to the Pope, and resolved not to return any more to Rome, but to pass the remainder of his life in our island. And tho' in most of his writings, he preferred superstition to the true religion, he nevertheless piously stood for the marriage of Christian ministers, and zealously condemned the worship of images, together with some other impostures of the Romish Rabbies. . . . to his being somewhat injurious to the antiquity of Britain, in his History of England, it proceeded from his not knowing the ancient chronicles and histories of that nation. And as to his calling some kings pious from their impious conduct, and others again unjust from their equitable actions, I think it should be imputed to the general error and blindness which prevailed before truth came to be discovered by the word G O D Certain it is that Polydore deserves to be admired even by good and religious men, for his learned works, de Rerum Inventoribus, Sacrorum Ritibus & Prodigis.

The treatise de Inventoribus Rerum contains several things which the Inquisition disliked; wherefore it approved of no edition but that which Gregory XIII caused to be printed at Rome in the year 1576, which was purged of all those passages which displeased the inquisitors. And as for the other editions, they ordered the blotting out of several passages (25). The Spanish Index expressly commands the expunging of Polydore Virgil's reflexion on St Peter's not permitting the Centurion to kiss his feet. And indeed it contains a very sharp censure on the pride of the Ecclesiastics; the words are: 'Pater mansuetudinis plenus id fieri non est passus, qui elevans eum sibi ad pedes jacentem, dixit: Surge, & ego ipse homo sum. O vocem memorabilem, atque salutarem, si bene multi hodie sese quoque homines tantum esse perpenderent, qui propterea quoddam sacerdotio præditi sint, planè se reliquorum mortalium, longè post hominum memoriam imperiosissimos dominos præbent, non communis patres, uti fieri deberet (26). . . . St Peter, full of meekness, would not suffer the Centurion to do it, but raising him up while he lay at his feet; Rise, said he, for I myself am a man. O how remarkable an expression is this, and how full of wholesome morality, if it was now a-days duly attended to by those who, forgetting that they are men, do, because they are invested with the priestly office, behave like the most imperious of all masters, and not like common fathers, as they ought to be.' But this author did not take the same liberty with respect to the Popes; for, on the contrary, he justifies and commends the custom of kissing their feet. And yet some writers cite him as disapproving it. 'Non possum, quin ad dam, quæ hac de re occurrunt apud Polydorum Virgilium, hominem Papistam, de Rerum Invent. lib. IV. cap. 13. Romani Pontifices, inquit, deosculandos pedes exhibendi morem à Christo se accepisse contendunt. At Christus non Magdalene osculandos pedes obtulit; sed sponte peccata fatentem, & suam misericordiam non solo amplexu genuum, ut ethnici, sed etiam osculo pedum implorantem, ejus consolandæ causâ admisit: hoc ipsum honoris genus alioquin non minus repudiaturus, etsi sibi re verâ debitum, quam appellationem Magistris boni. Sic quoque Petrus Cornelium centurionem ad genua procidentem manu sua sublevavit, SURGE, inquit, HOMINI SIMILIS: tantum absuit ut osculandos pedes exhibuerit. Decipimur specie recti, & sæpe cum Caligula pedes protendimus, dum Christi humilitatem vel spernimus, vel fucato conservandæ Apostolicæ autoritatis titulo exornare laboramus (27). (27) Anton.

I cannot help adding what we find upon this subject in Polydore Virgil, tho' a Papish writer. He says, in his book de Rerum Invent. that the Popes pretend to derive from CHRIST the custom of presenting their feet to be kissed. But CHRIST, says he, did not offer his feet to Mary Magdalen in order that she should kiss them; but while she made a voluntary confession of her sins, and implored his mercy, not only by embracing his knees after the manner of the Heathens, but also by kissing his feet, he suffered it for her consolation: in any other case he would have been no less for rejecting this kind of honour than he was for refusing the title of Good Master. Thus also did Peter take up the Centurion, when he fell at his feet: Stand up, said he, for I myself am a man: so far was he from offering him his feet to kiss. We are cheated by the appearance of right, and we often stretch out our feet with Caligula, while we either despise the humility of CHRIST, or study to set it off with the specious pretence of keeping up the Apostolical authority. It is a Remonstrant Minister who cites Polydore Virgil's words in this manner, and that too after having assured us in his preface, that excepting only twice or thrice, he hath always examined the passages which he cites. This passage of Polydore Virgil must then be one of the two or three which he has not examined, for there is an enormous difference betwixt what he really says, and what this minister ascribes to him. Consult Mr Crenius (28), who hath very smartly set forth this mistake, and compared the two places together, that just now cited, and as it really is in Polydore Virgil in the Strafsburgh edition, printed in 1606, in 8vo. I have consulted my edition which is that of Lyons apud hæredes Seb. Gryphii 1558, in 8vo, and I find that the words exactly agree with those alledged by Mr Crenius. I have also consulted the French version of Polydore Virgil, published by Francis de Belleforest at Paris in 1582, and I find that he made use of an original which was exactly the same with my Latin one. I cannot therefore be sufficiently surprized at the prodigious depravations which are crept into the quotations of this passage.

I shall quote an author who assures us that Polydore Virgil died in the year 1562, and that, in Lippomanus's judgment, the treatise de Inventoribus Rerum is a wretched book. 'Mors etiam Polydori Virgilii contigit Suæviæ †, ubi natus erat. Multa scripsit, sed non omnes docti ea existimant. Imperitissimum vocat eum & vanitatis redarguit doctissimus Lindanus †, atque hominis hujus scripto, quod de rerum inventoribus finxit, nihil extare nostrâ ætate in lucem editum, pluribus, quod scateat magis, aut futilibus perfluat conjecturis (29). . . . Polydore Virgil died at Urbino, where he was born. He wrote a great deal; but his writings are not all esteemed by the learned. Lindanus calls him a most ignorant author, and accuses him

† It is the town of Urbino in the Marca d'Ancona.

† Panop. Evangelic. c. 98.

(29) Petrus à Sancto Romualdo, in Continuacione Chronici Ademari, pag. 326.

(c) Thevet, Elog. des Hommes illustres, Tom. vii, pag. 309, 310. See the remark [E], towards the end.

during his absence [F]. It is said he died at Urbino (c) in the year 1555. He is accused of having burnt several manuscripts in order to prevent the discovery of the faults of his history of England [G]. It was printed several times [H], which shews that the world was more easily imposed on in that age than they are at present, or else more addicted to study; since an impression of the best Historians in folio will hardly go off at this time.

Since the second edition of this Dictionary, I have been informed of the following particulars. Polydore Virgil was so successful in his first essay, which was his collection of proverbs, that there were three or four impressions of it in a very short time. This good fortune encouraged him to set about a more difficult enterprise, which was to write a treatise upon the Inventors of Things. I have said before that he published it in the year 1499. After that he was sent into England by Pope Alexander VI, and being desired by Henry VII to compose a history of that country, he set his hand to it in the year 1505 [I]. He himself gives an account of these things in an Epistle Dedicatory which

'him likewise of vanity. He says, that in our time no thing has been published which abounds more in trifling conjectures than his treatise de Inventoribus Rerum.' It is certain that he did not please the bigots.

[F] He did not desire to leave that kingdom in the year 1550, on any other account than that of his age. . . . He obtained leave to depart.] This I take from the History of the Reformation of England: 'Polydore Virgil, after having lived almost forty years in England, asked leave to go and end his days, a little nearer the sun, he being very old. Which was granted him, on the second of June, and in consideration of the services, which it was thought he had done to the public, by his history, he was allowed, during his absence, to hold the Archdeaconry of Wells and the Prebend of Nonninton (30).' Mr de

(30) Burnet, History of the Reformation of England, Part. ii, book i, ad ann. 1550, pag. 374.

(31) De Larrey, Hist. d'Angleterre, Tom. i, pag. 682, ad ann. 1550.

(32) In an English book against Dr Burnet's History of the Reformation.

(33) De Larrey, ibid. pag. 683.

(34) In the remark [I].

(35) Job. Caius, de Antiquitatibus Cantab. lib. i, pag. 52, apud Pope Blount, ubi supra, pag. 451, 452.

(36) He was not sent for out of Italy by Henry VIII, but the Pope sent him into England to collect what went by the name of Peter-Pence.

'work he caused all those to be burnt which by the king's authority and the assistance of his friends he could possibly come at) than for the stile, truth, care, or judiciousness of his performance. Our Frenchmen tell us the same thing of P. Æmilii, his neighbour and co-temporary, and of several others, who, greedy of equal fame with Plato and Aristotle, burnt, as they did, several books after having extracted the quintessence of them, in order to make up books, which they afterwards published under their own names (37).'

[H] It was printed several times.] I have already said that the date of the Epistle Dedicatory is of the year 1533 (38). And I doubt not but the edition mentioned by Gesner, I mean that printed at Basil by the Bebelius, in 1534, in folio, is the first edition. The month of August author revised his work, and corrected several places. In the second edition, which was in 1536. I make use of that of Basil apud Mich. Isingrinum, in 1556, in folio, which contains but twenty-six books. But

I find in the epitome of Gesner (39), that this history in twenty-seven books ab auctore recogniti ad amicum expoliti, was printed by Isingrinus, and afterward by Thomas Guerin in folio, in 1570. I wish the year of Isingrinus's edition had been mentioned, and I cannot believe that it contains twenty-seven books, since that which Thyfius published at Leyden in 1649 (40) contains no more than twenty-six; and doubtless Thyfius followed the best and most complete of all the foregoing editions. However it be, the twenty-six books of this History ended with the death of Henry VII.

Therefore I cannot well understand the author who accuses our Virgil of having falsified the relation of affairs concerning the reign of Henry VIII, in order to insinuate himself into the favour of Queen Mary, when it is certain that he left England before there was any probability that Mary would come to the crown. It is also certain that his History, printed at Basil (41) a year after his death, contains but twenty-six books, which reach no farther than the death of Henry VII. And therefore the following passage is somewhat obscure to me. 'Maxime erravit Polydorus in describendis temporibus Henrici VIII.

Nam præter quod linguæ nostratæ profus ignarus, plurima eorum temporum nescire habuit necesse: plurima etiam, ut Mariæ Reginæ gratiam promptius demereri posset, scripsisse, non sine causa perhibetur.

Priorum verò temporum, eadem non est suspicio (42). Polydore has chiefly mistaken in describing the reign of Henry VIII. For besides that, he was an entire stranger to our language, there were many particulars relating to those times of which he must have been ignorant. It is likewise not without cause reported that he writ many things with a view to insinuate himself into Queen Mary's favour. But in the preceding reigns there is no room for this suspicion. Besides it is probable that Polydore Virgil did not stay so long at London, being during that time employed in preparing his History of England without learning English. At the worst it was less difficult for him to be acquainted with the reign of Henry VIII, than with those of the preceding kings. For what reason therefore do they suppose that he knew less of this reign than of the others?

[I] After that he was sent into England by Pope Alexander VI, and being desired by Henry VII to compose a history of that country, he set his hand to it in the year 1505.] All these facts are related, with divers particulars, in the following words. 'Placuit (Commentarius)

'into Queen Mary's favour. But in the preceding reigns there is no room for this suspicion. Besides it is probable that Polydore Virgil did not stay so long at London, being during that time employed in preparing his History of England without learning English. At the worst it was less difficult for him to be acquainted with the reign of Henry VIII, than with those of the preceding kings. For what reason therefore do they suppose that he knew less of this reign than of the others?

[I] After that he was sent into England by Pope Alexander VI, and being desired by Henry VII to compose a history of that country, he set his hand to it in the year 1505.] All these facts are related, with divers particulars, in the following words. 'Placuit (Commentarius)

'into Queen Mary's favour. But in the preceding reigns there is no room for this suspicion. Besides it is probable that Polydore Virgil did not stay so long at London, being during that time employed in preparing his History of England without learning English. At the worst it was less difficult for him to be acquainted with the reign of Henry VIII, than with those of the preceding kings. For what reason therefore do they suppose that he knew less of this reign than of the others?

he writes to JOHN MATTHEW VERGIL, his brother [K]. He likewise says there that ANTONY VERGIL, his great grand-father, was very well versed in Physic and Astrology, and had taught Philosophy at Paris. For the rest, as the reproachful things he said of Erasmus are contained in an Epistle Dedicatory which has been left out of most of the editions, I shall quote them below [L].

(43) Polyd. Vergilius, Epist. Dedicat. Librorum de Inventoribus Rerum, ad Joan. Mattheum fratrem, Edit. Basil. 1521 in folio.

riolus de Proverbiis sua præsertim novitate usque adeo, delectavit usque adeo, ut brevi mox terque quaterque (sicuti Poëta ait) fuerit formis excusul. Hac levi aura (fateor ingenue) evectus, tum majus aggressus opus, de rerum inventoribus, negotium suscepi, naviterque minus mensibus novem, confeci. Sic Polydorus ego primus apud Latinos, utriusque rei argumentum attentavi, id quod in præfationibus unius & alterius operis assatim docuimus. Veni posthæc missu Alexandri sexti Romani pontificis in Britanniam quæ nunc Anglia est, ut quæsturam pontificiam apud Anglos gererem. Ubi ne bonum otium tererem, rogatu Henrici ejus appellationis septimi Regis præstantissimi, res ejus populi geitas scripsi, in historiæque stilum redegei. Quod hercle opus duodecim annos sub literaria incude laboratum, obstant fæto, nondum absolvere licuit (43).

--- This little book of Proverbs was so well liked, particularly for the newness of the thing, that it presently underwent three or four editions. I freely own that I was encouraged by this slight success to undertake a work of a more difficult nature, I mean my treatise on the Inventors of Things, which I finished, with great application, in less than nine months. Thus I Polydore was the first among the Latin writers, who ventured to write upon both these subjects, as I have shewed at large in my preface to each. I was afterwards sent into England by Pope Alexander VI, to collect the Papal tribute in that country. That I might not be idle, I undertook, at the desire of Henry VII, to write the History of England. But though I have been twelve years employed about this work, I have not yet been able to finish it. This passage is found prefixed to his book de Inventoribus Rerum, printed at Basil in the year 1521, in folio, and it is in this manner that the author speaks to his brother. His letter is dated from London on the fifth of December 1517, and is to be seen at the beginning of the fourth book of the same treatise in several other editions; but the passage I have quoted is wanting, which is one of my reasons for inserting it here. It will likewise be the more acceptable, as it affords a proof, that if Polydore Virgil staid in England till the year 1550, or 1551, he was there in all near fifty years (44).

(44) Correct therefore what has been quoted in the remark [F].

(45) Polyd. Vergilius, ubi supra.

[K] JOHN MATTHEW VERGIL, his brother.] He was a learned man both in Greek and Latin. He practised Physic in Ferrara, there taught Logic publicly, and after that was Professor of Philosophy in the university of Padua (45). Before the age of thirty, he was a good Philosopher, a good Physician, and a good Orator, and was besides a man of the strictest probity. It is his brother who gives him this character in the Epistle Dedicatory which I have already mentioned: Tibi negotium damus & juvandi tuo labore studiosi, & nomini familie nostræ consulendi, cui propè uni seculi nostri contigit ante sextum ætatis lustrum, cum tanta morum probitate, esse philosopho, medico, ac oratori perfectio. Ex qua doctrinarum scintilla, tota jam Italia lucem maximam maturissime erupturam auguratur (46). These words are wanting in most of the editions.

[L] The reproachful things he said of Erasmus . . . I shall quote them below.] They are in the Epistle Dedicatory of his treatise upon Proverbs, printed at Basil for John Froben in the year 1521, in folio. This Epistle is inscribed to a Secretary of Henry VIII, and dated at London on the fifth of June 1519. 'Ita Polydorus tuus apud Latinos primus hujusce rei argumentum attentavit: & quicquid id laudis fuit, jam pridem citra cujuscunque injuriam, jure sibi optimo vindicavit. At post aliquot annos quàm ita de proverbiis commentariolum ædideram, ecce tibi, suc-

cessorem habui nostrum Erasmus, id quod ob singularem hominis doctrinam pergratum fuit, & si ille ceu ejusmodi commentarioli nostri minime sciens, utrumque decus, inventæ scilicet rei atque auctæ ad se trahere est conatus, quem tamen vix potuit ignorare, si unquam suum ipsius Adagiorum opus Argenterati, quod est sæ Germaniæ oppidum, apud Matthiam Schurerium formulis excusum vidit: vidit haut dubio procul, cum illud postmodum bis terve adauxerit. Quippe in ejus operis fronte Matthias attestatur se paulo ante nostra adagia in apertum protulisse. Ipsi etiam eum cum aliquando apud nos pranderet per jocum, nostri hujus instituti æmulatorem appellavimus. Ita ille rei sæ intentus nuper in novissima præmiarum suarum editione, est palam professus, primum se apud Latinos id genus argumenti attentasse, ut cui tum non venit in mentem nostri libelli imaginis. Etenim penè incredibile est Erasmus tot titulis redundantem, velle cuiquam tam modicæ inventionis gloriolam invidere. Quancum sunt nonnulli sagaciores, qui adfirmant eum idcirco illud dissimulasse, ut qui præter adagiorum multitudinem nihilo plus præstiterat, ne videretur esse imitatus, atque sic primas ferret partes. Ego tamen (quia veritas procul eminet) totum istud æqui bonique faciens, tantum apud te, qui utriusque nostrum es ex æquo amantissimus, testatum esse volui quo nihil ex eo offensionis posthac esse habiturus. Nam (ut Martialis ait) qui velit ingenio cedere, rarus erit. Ceterum sum gavisus (uti dixi) tali successore (47). --- Thus your Polydore was the first among the Latin authors who attempted to write upon this subject: and whatever praise was due from such an undertaking, he has long ago secured it to himself, without wronging any man. But a few years after I had published my small treatise on Proverbs, a successor appeared: and who should that be but our friend Erasmus? This was very agreeable to me, on account of his singular learning, notwithstanding that he claimed the honour both of the invention and improvements that were made upon it, as if he had known nothing at all of my treatise: which is nevertheless scarce possible, if he ever saw his own book of Proverbs, printed at Strasburg in Germany for Matthew Schurerius: and that he saw it is certain since he enlarged it twice or thrice afterwards. For in his advertisement prefixed to that book, the said Matthew declares, that he had published my Proverbs a little before. Likewise at a certain time when Erasmus did me the favour to dine with me, I told him, by way of joke, that he was my rival in this undertaking. But he was so intent upon the affair, that when he published the last edition of his Proverbs not long ago, he openly pretended to be the first Latin writer who had treated on that subject. In all likelihood he had no thought nor remembrance of my little book at that time: for it is scarce credible that Erasmus, who has so many things to value himself upon, would envy another person the small glory of such an ordinary invention: altho' some very judicious men affirm that he dissembled his knowledge of it for this reason, lest he should seem to have imitated another, and not to have deserved the first praise, as he was sensible that he had done nothing more than collected a multitude of Proverbs. But I (because the truth is very well known) taking all this in good part, thought fit only to protest to you, who are alike a friend to us both, that it shall never give me any trouble for the time to come. For, as Martial says, The man who yields the prize of wit is rare. But, as I said before, I was pleased with such a worthy successor. Compare with this what has been quoted in the remark [A].

(47) Id. ibid. Epist. Libri Adagiorum ad Ricardum Patrum.

VITELLIO, or VITELLO, author of a treatise of Optics, which is pretty much esteemed, lived after the middle of the XIIIth century [A]. Some authors say that

[A] He lived after the middle of the XIIIth century.] William de Morbeta, who wrote a treatise of Geomancy in the year 1269. This date was expressed by the

VOL. V.

6 K

(a) Vitellio Opticam edi curavit, Norimb. An. 1535. König. Bibl. pag. 850.

(1) Fredericus Riferus, Prefat. in Vitellio Opticam, pag. m. 163. Prefationis Epitoli. & Oratorum Petri Rami.

(2) In Epistolâ Opticis Vitellio præpositâ.

(3) See Riferus ubi supra, pag. 162.

(4) Ibid.

(5) See Riferus, ibid. pag. 163.

(6) Id. ibid.

(a) Monconys, Voiage, Part. i, pag. 130, ad ann. 1646, Lyons, 1665.

(b) He had composed eight books on this subject. The propositions contained in them were collected by Pappus. But of these books there remained only the first four. Fontenelle, ubi infra, citat. (f).

(c) Nevertheless the eighth book was entirely wanting.

that he was born in Germany, but others make him a Polander [B]. It is very probable that he composed his book in Italy [C]. The edition which Frederic Riferus procured in the year 1572, is incomparably better than that of Nuremberg in 1535. We shall see below the praises which he bestowed on the labours of Vitellio [D]. Mr König knew of no other edition than that of Nuremberg, which he believed to be published by the author himself (a).

the author himself, as Frederic Riferus, who had read that treatise in manuscript, informs us (1). Whence we ought to conclude that Tanstetter (2) mistook in placing Vitellio in the Xth century. Erasmus Reinhold, Gauric, Peucer, Blancanus, Vossius, &c. agree in placing him after the middle of the XIIIth.

[B] Some authors say that he was born in Germany . . . others make him a Polander.] The last opinion is the most eligible, for in the seventy-fourth theorem of the tenth book of Vitellio we find these words: In nostra terra, scilicet Polonia habitabili, &c. (3). . . . In our country, viz. Poland, &c. In the title of his book, the surname of filius Polonorum & Thuringorum, is given to him; which, according to Riferus (4) signifies, that his father was a Polander, or a Thuringian, or that his mother was a Thuringian, or a Polander. Regiomontanus, in his Preface to Alphanagoræ expresses himself thus, Vitellio autem noster Thuringus (5), which is intimating that Thuringia was Vitellio's country.

[C] It is very probable that he composed his book in Italy.] See the proofs of this fact which Riferus hath collected. Quædam sunt in Opticis notæ Vitellionem in Italiam venisse, Italique bibliothecis adjutum fuisse. Etenim Vitello ipse de se testis est lib. 10. theor. 42. se primum omnium in Italia Cubalum (qui locus est inter Paduam & Vincentiam) contemplatione aquæ tenuissimæ ac limpidissimæ ad Opticas artes incensum atque inflammatum esse: harum enim formarum intuitu (ait) & mirabili transmutatione primum nos amor hujus studii allexit: & lib. 10. theor. 67. ubi scribit ex Iride, quàm in aqua è scopulo Viterbio proximo vehementius præcipitata sæpenuero vidisset, pleraque iridis affectiones & proprietates sibi animadvertas & observatas esse: illud (inquit) nobis principium cogitationis fuit, ut præsentis negotio studium applicarem. At quod Vitello in Italia, quod Romæ tum cæteris liberalibus honestisque studiis, tum verò Opticis operam navavit, majus fortasse argumentum videatur, quod Guilielmo de Morbeta (qui tum Romani Pontificis penitentiarius, ut appellant, Romæ agebat) suafore & hortatore, ut ipse in proœmio testatur, optica primum conscribenda suscepit, eidemque absoluta postea nuncupavit (6). . . . There are some things in Vitellio's Optics, which seem to denote that he went to Italy, and was assisted by the libraries of that country. For he says concerning himself, that he was first of all inflamed with a desire of studying Optics, by seeing at Cubalo in Italy (which is a place situate between Padua and Vicenza) some water that was extremely thin and clear; for, says he, by viewing the form of it, and the wonderful changes it underwent, I first conceived a strong inclination for that study: and elsewhere in the same book he says, that he had observed and collected most of the properties of the rainbow, from that rainbow which he had often seen formed in the water falling impetuously down from a rock hard by Viterbe; that, says he, made me first think of pursuing the present study. As to Vitellio's having applied himself in Italy, and at Rome, to the liberal arts, and particularly to the study of Optics, what he himself says in his preface may perhaps seem a stronger proof of this. He there acquaints us that it was by the advice and earnest exhortation of William de Morbeta (who was then the Pope's penitentiary at Rome) that he first undertook to write his Optics, and afterwards dedicated them to him, when they were finished.

[D] The praises which Riferus bestowed on the labours of Vitellio.] The passage which I am about to transcribe informs us that Vitello wrote other books besides his Optics: Quid & quantum viribus ingenii perfecit, præclara ejus monumenta sempiterno testimonio erunt: non solum in Physiologicis, quæ citat lib. 5. theor. 18. & lib. 10. theor. 80. in libris de ordine entium: de elementatis conclusionibus, qui nominantur in præfatione, & lib. 1. theor. 28. in libris de scientia motuum celestium, quæ allegat lib. 10. theor. 53. sed multò maxime in decem libris Opticis: quos ut ex Alhazeno imprimis, deinde è Græcorum auctorum fontibus hauserit, ceterè mirandis accessionibus amplificavit. Alhazeni, Euclidis, Ptolemæi axiomata, hypothesæ, theoremata omnia collegit; id laboris infiniti fuit. Sed ex Apollonio, Theodosio, Menelao, Theone, Pappo, Proclo, & aliis firmamenta permultarum demonstrationum singulari judicio repetivit: singulari ordine maxime naturali per sua genera, speciesque Opticam, Catoptricam, Meoptricam disposuit, atque totam mirabiliter absolvit. Quid plura? Si artis opifex atque author habendus sit, qui arti formam, animamque dedit: Vitello jure optimo Opticæ artis autor habeatur (7). . . . What and how much he has been able to accomplish by the strength of his genius will appear by these eternal monuments which he has left behind him, not only in Physiological matters, but above all in his ten books of Optics, which as he took first from Alhazenus, and then from the Greek authors, so hath he enlarged them with wonderful additions of his own. He collected all the axioms, hypotheses, and theorems of Alhazenus, Euclid, and Ptolemy; which was a work of infinite labour. He likewise, with great judgment, borrowed the grounds of many demonstrations from Apollonius, Theodosius, Menelæus, Theon, Pappus, Proclus, and others: he has ranged Optics, Catoptrics, and Meoptrics, in a singular and most natural method, according to the different kind and species of each. In short, he has given an admirable system of the whole art. What need is there for any more words? If the man who gives life and form to an art is to be looked upon as the author and finisher of that art, then Vitellio ought justly to be esteemed the author of Optics. It appears by this that Vitellio's glory was not that of invention, but that of digesting borrowed matters.

VIVIANI (VINCENTIO) a noble Florentine, disciple of Galileo, and a great Mathematician, who in the year 1659 published a book in folio intitled, De maximis & minimis Geometrica Divinatio in quantum Conicorum Apollonii Pergæi. His opinions in point of religion were very bad; for he believed the necessity of all things, the nullity of evil, and the participation of the universal soul, as he owned to Mr Monconys (a).

Consult the Italia regnante of Mr Leti, page 411 of the third part.

The first work he undertook was his Divination upon Aristeus, the Cotemporary of Euclid, and author of five books of problems de locis solidis, the bare propositions of which were collected by Pappus of Alexandria. These books are entirely lost. Mr Viviani interrupting his Divination upon Aristeus, set himself to restore the fifth book of the Conic sections of Apollonius (b). While he laboured at this, the famous Borelli found in the library of the Great Duke of Tuscany, an Arabian manuscript with a Latin inscription which signified that they were the eight books (c) of Apollonius's Conic sections He carried this manuscript to Rome, to translate it with the assistance of a famous professor of the Eastern Languages (d). Mr Viviani being not willing to lose lose the fruit of his labour demanded a certificate that he knew nothing at all of the Arabic tongue, and that he was an utter stranger to that manuscript. He would not even suffer Borelli to write any thing to him which concerned his book. At last he finished it, and it appeared that he had more than divined or conjectured, and that he was superior to Apollonius himself. He was obliged to interrupt his labours for the service of his prince in an affair of very great importance [A]. He had a pension given him by the King of France, and thereupon he resolved to finish his Divination upon Aristeus, which he proposed to dedicate to that Prince. He was honoured by Ferdinand II, Great Duke of Tuscany with the title of first Mathematician to his highness a title so much the more glorious for him as it had been conferred on Galileo. He gave the solution of three Geometrical problems, which had been proposed to all the Mathematicians of Europe, and dedicated that piece to the memory of Mr Chapellain under the title of Enodatio Problematum, &c. He himself proposed the problem of the squarable arch, which Mr Leibniz and the Marquis de l'Hospital solved by the differential method. He was chosen in the year 1699 to fill a place among the eight foreigners who are fellows of the royal Academy of Sciences. This new favour re-animated his zeal; and he published three books of his Divination on Aristeus (e) [B], which he dedicated to the King of France. He laid out the fortune he had acquired by the bounties of that Prince in building a bouse at Florence which for a private person may be called magnificent. There he gave an honourable place to the bust of Galileo, to which he added several inscriptions to the glory of that great Mathematician, striving by all possible means to signalize his gratitude towards his illustrious master: and in this he may be said to have followed the inclination of his heart, which was naturally full of goodness. He died in the month of September 1703, aged fourcore and one years (f).

(d) See the remark [B], of the article APOLLONIUS Pergæus, and the remark [D], of the article ECHENESE.

(e) See the Mémoires de Trevoux, February 1703, pag. 142, of the Amsterdam edition.

(f) Taken from Mr de Fontenelle, in the Elogy of Mr Viviani, Extracts of which are to be found in the Mémoires de Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1007 & seq. of the edition of France.

[A] He was obliged to interrupt his works for the service of his Prince in an affair of very great importance. To prevent the inundations of the Tyber it was a long time . . . since they thought of diverting the course of one of those rivers which fall into it, particularly the river Chiana (called by the Latins Clanis) as being that which contributes most towards these inundations. They were ready to execute this design under Tiberius, when the neighbouring colonies being heard upon that affair, the Florentines represented that by turning the course of that river into the Arno both their city and their country would be laid under water. Regard was had to these remonstrances . . . and in order to put a stop to these floods they contented themselves with building a wall, in which there was an opening, so calculated that it would receive no more than a certain quantity of water which could not do any damage. There are still some traces of this work to be seen. Under Alexander VII, the contest was renewed between the Romans and the Florentines, touching the project that was in hand for diverting the course of the river Chiana. Deputies were appointed on each side. His Holiness pitched upon Cardinal Carpegna with Mr Cassini, and the Great Duke nominated Michelozzi the Senator, with Mr Viviani. While these two gentlemen, Cassini and Viviani, were jointly employed in the affair that was committed to them, they had an opportunity of making several observations upon Natural History, and among other things upon the insects which prick the oak, and thereby produce what goes under the name of a gall-nut. The plans which they drew up for preventing the floods, occasioned by the sudden overflowings of the Chiana, were not executed, as it generally happens in all those things which are undertaken for the public service (1).

[B] He published three books of his Divination on Aristeus. This book was printed at Florence in the year 1701. It contains 128 pages, in folio, and is intitled, De locis salubris secunda Divinatio Geometrica in quinque Libris injuria temporum amissis Aristae senioris Geometrae. This is a second edition enlarged: the first edition was printed at Florence in the year 1673 (2).

(1) Taken from the Mémoires de Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 1010, 1011, in the Extracts of the Elogy which Mr de Fontenelle made on Mr Viviani, before an assembly of the Royal Academy of Sciences, on the 11th of April 1704.

(2) See the Journal des Savans, of the 12th of March 1703, pag. 162, of the Paris edition, and the Mémoires de Trevoux, Febr. 1703, pag. 142, of the Amsterdam edition.

ULEFELD, or ULFELD (JAMES) a Danish gentleman, and a senator of that kingdom, was sent ambassador to the court of Muscovy in the year 1578, by Frederic II, King of Denmark. He wrote a relation of his voyage, and gave it to a Bookseller at Leyden to print, who so neglected it, that it fell into the hands of a Grocer, and would have undoubtedly served to wrap up sugar, &c. if Goldast had not bought it. He caused it to be printed at Francfort in the year 1608, with the title of Hodeporicum Rutbenicum Jacobi, Nobilis Dani, and in 1627, with the same title and the addition of Ulfeldii, after Jacobi [A]. This James Ulfeld published (a) a Danish translation of David Chytræus's treatise of the four last things, Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell. He also wrote the history of some of the kings of Denmark, but it was never printed (b). Goldast acknowledges (c) that he was not very elegant, but he faith that he judged of things with great prudence.

(a) At Copenhagen, in the year 1591, and in the year 1593.

(b) Taken from Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Albertum Bartholinum Bartholinum de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 255, 256.

(c) In Epist. Dedicat. apud Mollerum, ibid. pag. 255.

[A] With the same title, and the addition of Ulfeldii after Jacobi. He did not know the author's name, till after the first edition, when Claudius Christopher Lyfchander, a Danish Divine, acquainted him that the author of this voyage to Muscovy was of the noble family of Ulfeld; that he was very learned, rich, and a Senator of the kingdom; but that he fell into disgrace for treating of some affairs without the King's consent; that his two sons MAONUS and JAMES were in a flourishing condition, and that James, who was a Senator, was ambassador at the Hague in the year 1608 (1). I believe this is the same who was promoted to the dignity of Chancellor of Denmark, in the year 1610, and died on the twenty-fifth of June 1630 (2). I also believe that the Count Ulfeld, of whom I speak in the following article, was the son of this Chancellor. Observe that the same Lyfchander in another letter (3) informs Goldast, that the two sons of the author of the Hodeporicum Rutbenicum had seen the book. Whence I conclude that the author was not then alive.

Observe, that Mr Konig is much in the wrong concerning our James Ulfeld. He makes him the author of an embassy to Poland, written in the year 1627 (4). Here are no less than two mistakes; for James was dead at the time of the publication of the first edition in 1608, and his book is not a relation of an embassy to Poland. But as he on one hand ascribes a relation to him which he did not write, on the other he robs him of the Hodeporicum Rutbenicum, to bestow it on an imaginary person called James Danus (5). I mean, that Mr Konig mistakes Danus, a Dan, which here is

(3) It is the sixth of the above mentioned collection.

(4) Konig, Bibl. pag. 851.

(5) Konig, ibid. pag. 855.

(1) Taken from the sixteenth letter of the collection of Letters written to Goldast, and printed in the year 1682.

(2) See Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Alb. Barthol. de Script. Dan. pag. 255.

is a national epithet given to the writer of this Hodeporicum by Goldast, for the surname of an author. | Mr Mollerus hath noted almost all these mistakes of (6) Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 255.

ULEFELD, or ULFELD (CORNIFIDS, or CORFITS) grand-son to the foregoing (a), was one of the greatest genius's of the XVIIth century; and if he had not tarnished his reputation by the want of fidelity to his sovereign, he might justly have been reckoned amongst the greatest men. Christian IV, King of Denmark, made him Viceroy of Norway, High-Steward of his realms, and beaped on him all the marks of kindness that a favourite could hope for (b) [A]. He chose him for his son-in-law, by marrying him to Eleanor his natural daughter [B]. This son-in-law of the king was his Ambassador-Extraordinary in France in the year 1647. Frederic III, the son and successor of Christian IV, could not bear the spirit and conduct of Count Ulfeld; he observed too much ambition in him, and it was scarce possible for the king to avoid resenting the vigorous zeal of the Count for maintaining the privileges of the nobility at his accession to the throne [C]. However that be, the High-Steward was sent Ambassador to Holland in the year 1649, in order to make a treaty there concerning the passage of the Sound (c); and his negotiation not happening to please at home, he grew disgusted, and kept his chamber above six months on pretence of sickness [D]. He was accused in the year 1651 of having attempted to poison the king (d) [E]; but the woman who

(a) Observe that I do not affirm it; I only believe it.

(b) Sorbiere's Relation of England, pag. 147.

(c) Sorbiere, ibid. pag. 149.

(d) Parival's Hist. du Siecle de Fer, Tom. 1, pag. 490.

[A] Christian IV . . . beaped on him all the marks of kindness that a favourite could hope for.] The Historical Novel which I shall hereafter cite, informs me that he became the favourite of Christian IV, not only on account of his own merit, but likewise by the interest of his father, who was Great Chancellor, and governed the kingdom. This High-Chancellor was descended from one of the first and most ancient families of the realm, and the only one that was honoured with the dignity of Count by a grant from the Emperor. Cornif Ulfeld was the tenth son: the manner how he came to be known by his father, who thought for a long time that he was lost, is romantic. See the Historical Novel. I cannot tell whether it is possible to reconcile what has been just now said concerning the dignity of Count, with a little Latin book (1) which says, that Cornif Ulfeld, flying for refuge to Christina Queen of Sweden, and having lent her great sums of money, acquired her protection and favour, and the title of Count.

(1) It is intitled Machinatum Cornifici Ulfeldi fucincta Narratio.

[B] . . . And married him to Eleanor, his natural daughter.] 'The King after the death of the Queen fell in love with a beautiful lady, whose name was Christina, of the ancient family of Monch, and not being able to obtain any favour from her, married her with all the formalities requisite to a lawful marriage, in the presence of the court and Senate; but one clause of the contract was, that the children which should proceed from this marriage should not be Princes, but obliged to content themselves with the quality of Counts of Sleswic and Holstein, of which dignity they should bear the name and arms (2).' This Prince attempted to divorce her for certain things she had done out of jealousy: the cause lay before the Senate. Annibal Seestled pleaded the King's cause; and the Count of Ulfeld pleaded for the Queen, and carried the cause (3). The Latin book which I have cited says that she was actually divorced, and that the King afterwards grew in love with the bed-chamber lady (4) to his divorced Queen (5), and had a son and a daughter by her. The son called Ulricus Christian Guldenleew bore arms under the King of Spain, and did wonders at Copenhagen when it was besieged by the Swedes. The daughter was married to Claudius Alfeld, a gentleman of Holstein. The same book informs us that the reason why the King hated his wife, and loved her bed-chamber lady, was because she discovered to him that the Queen designed to poison him: which was revenged on this accuser after her death; for Count Ulfeld would not permit the celebration of her funeral, but sent her out of town at night to be buried in the burying place of the poor. She survived the King but few days, dying with melancholy (6), as it is reported.

(2) An Historical Novel, intitled Le Comte d'Ulfeld, Printed at Paris in 1677.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Her name was Wibicha.

(5) Fuit hæc Christiane cuius supra meminimus à cubiculo; quæque Regi revelasset ipsi à Domina sua venenum parari, Rex illam, re-pudiata Christiana ejus loco amavit.

(6) Ex Machinatum, fucinctâ Narrat.

(7) Sorbiere, Relation d'Angleterre, pag. m. 149.

[C] For maintaining the privileges of the nobility.] An author whom I have cited (7) saith, that the mildness of Christian IV, and the charms of peace, made the nobility and the people neglect many privileges which they propoed to re-establish in full force, when they elected Frederic III, and that then the High-Steward was obliged by his post . . . to stand up for the nobility of the kingdom; for he represented them, and had a negative voice in council: so that as nothing could pass without his consent, the file of the placards ran, and the ordinances were notified as made by the King and the High-Steward. He adds (8) as a consequence, that besides the interest, which Count Ulfeld had in supporting the privileges of that body, he also considered those of his own family, and the enmity betwixt the children of the royal family, by reason of the inequality of their rank, and of the jealousy which the late King's passion for the Countess Eleanor had sown. The author of the Historical Novel, notwithstanding the part of a Panegyrist and Apologist which he all along acts, still owns, that the Count, at his wife's persuasion, had some thoughts of causing himself to be elected King after the death of Christian IV, and that he made some attempts that way: but finding his measures broken, he desperately turned the course of affairs, and promoted the election of Prince Frederic on such conditions as allowed him to share the authority with him, under pretext of preserving the privileges of the nobility, of which, as High-Steward, he was chief.

[D] He kept his chamber above six months, on pretence of sickness.] Sorbiere calls this a blunder; for at court, saith he (9), no man ought ever to quit an advantageous post, nor retire on any pretext whatsover; he ought not to lose the train of affairs, nor use people to go on without him, much less give them the advantage of his absence. But his blaming this conduct, did not hinder him from taking his part so zealously, that his Danish Majesty's Ambassador complained of it at the court of France: the consequence of which was that Sorbiere was banished to Nantes. This author had formerly dedicated a book (10) to Count Ulfeld, for which he had doubtless received a good reward; which engaged him to insert in his voyage an episode in justification of this Lord. He was not well informed of all the particulars of this cause; the detention of the Count in the island of Bornholm, and the liberty granted him to go and live in the isle of Funen, were unknown to Sorbiere.

[E] He was accused of having attempted to poison the King.] The author of the Historical Novel, pretends that a woman, named Diana, was suborned to declare that the Count and Countess of Ulfeld had solicited her to poison the King, the Queen, and all the royal family; and that the Count so judiciously defended himself in full council, that Diana and Captain Weller, who had introduced her, were fully convicted of bearing false witness, and condemned, she to be beheaded, and he to perpetual banishment; which sentences were executed. If this relation be compared with that of a modern Historian (11), who tells us, That one Colonel Valter was also suspected, who having defended his innocence, caused the said Count Ulfeld to be summoned; but instead of appearing before his Majesty, he privately retired with his wife, and went into Holland, and from thence afterwards into Sweden: If, I say, such a comparison be made, it will appear that the Historian gives a very indistinct account of the affair. He seems to affirm, that the Count and the

(8) Ibid. pag. 150.

(9) Ibid. pag. 151.

(10) The French translation of Hobbes's treatise de Cives, in 1649.

(11) Parival, Tom. 1, p. 492.

accused him [F] not being able to make good her accusation, was beheaded. That did not hinder his secretly retiring with his wife and children out of the kingdom, and going to Sweden, where he was extraordinary well received by Queen Christina [G]. He discovered a great deal of zeal for the service of Sweden, which would not have been criminal, if he had not endeavoured to serve it to the prejudice of his country. His counsels were wonderfully advantageous to Charles Gustavus [H]; and it is inexpressible how effectually the politic intrigues which he carried on, advanced that prince's conquests in Denmark. He was one of his commissioners at the treaty of Rotschild, as he would have been afterwards at Copenhagen, if the French Ambassador had not entreated that king to name another [I]. At last he fell into disgrace with the Swedes [K]; who imprisoned him: He

Colonel were both suspected of the same crime; but that is not true. The Historical Novel doth not say that the Count first retired into Holland; it says that he would have gone into Poland, but that being informed at Dantzic that the King of Poland refused him his leave, he went into Sweden. The Latin book makes him first retire to Amsterdam, and afterwards to Sweden, and adds, that at Stralsund, he published an apology for his conduct; and that after the abdication of Christina, he went to live in Pomerania.

[F] The woman who accused him. Her name was Dina; she was a beautiful woman, and by profession a lady of pleasure, for she declared before the Judges, that she had had a child by Count Ulefeld. The little Latin tract relates these particulars, not as Parival does, but in the following manner. Dina used to wait on the Count by means of a private stair-case, and lay with him unknown to the Countess. Early one morning the Countess entered her husband's chamber, and shewed him a poison which Sperlingius, a Physician, had prepared. 'In quam confilio Ottonis Sperlingii, Med. D. in perneciem Regis Danie Friderici III, tentati veneficii suspitionem Corfitz Ulfeld, Magister Palatii Regii quoque venit, de quo Relatio Hafniensis Anno 1651, publicata videri potest, nec non ejusdem (Ulfeldi) Apologia Relationi opposita, Annoque sequenti 1652 Stralsundie in 12mo edita, cui causas subjungit quæ necessitatem sibi imposuerunt & adegnerunt, ut ad tempus Dania excederet (12).

(12) Putschius de novis inventis, pag. 424.

--- Which suspicion, viz. of having attempted to poison Frederic III, King of Denmark, by the advice and aid of Otto Sperlingius, Doctor of Physic, did likewise fall upon Corfitz Ulfeld, High-Steward: concerning which, see the account published at Copenhagen in the year 1651; as also the apology of the said Ulfeld in answer to that relation. It was published in the following year, 1652, at Stralsund, in 12mo; and to this apology he subjoins the reasons which obliged him to leave Denmark for a time. They mutually concerted the means to give it to the King. Dina heard all this discourse, being hid very close in the bed, in order to avoid being surprized by the Countess. She imparted this story to a Colonel (13), on whom she bestowed her favours. This Colonel made his court with it to the King, his master, who caused Dina to be brought before him, from whom he heard all the particulars. The Judges examined her, before whom she owned the same thing, and particularly confessed that she had a child by the Count; but when the thing came before the Council of state, where the Count defended his own cause, Dina retracted all she had said, was declared guilty of calumny, and condemned to lose her head; which was afterwards placed upon a pole without the city (14). It is highly probable that she was suborned; for must not the Count have been excessively stupid, to have talked of such a dangerous affair when he knew it was in the hearing of a whore? This is indeed the prerogative of sovereigns: they give serious attention to the depositions of a whore, when their lives are concerned; and it is even true, that these sort of creatures have sometimes revealed conspiracies (15). It is just that monarchs should enjoy this prerogative, for the public good is preferable to the observance of formalities; and consequently we ought not to be shocked at the sight of twenty or thirty conspirators cut into quarters on the evidence of their accomplices, tho' the accusers loaded with riches and rewards, are sometimes greater criminals than the accused, and have, by numerous artifices, engaged the latter in the conspiracy. The whore, say some, ought to be punished, but the bawd who informed against her ought to have some share in her punishment. I answer, that this maxim should not be extended to (13) George Walker.

(14) Ex Machinat. succincta Relat.

(15) Fulvia, for instance, who discovered that of Catiline, apud Sallustium. See the article FULVIA, remark [D].

privileged cases, such as the punishing of state crimes. 'Salus Populi suprema Lex esto. -- Let the safety of the people be the supreme law.'

[G] He was extraordinarily well received by Queen Christina.] To this purpose Mr de Wicquefort relates two remarkable stories. I shall content myself with mentioning one of them: it is an artifice by which that Queen so far imposed on the Danish Ambassador, as to gain an opportunity for Ulefeld to say all that he could for his justification in his presence (16); but the other story I shall relate without curtailing it. The Danish ambassador, to prove that Ulefeld was unworthy of Christina's protection, one day told that Queen that the High-Steward had converted to his own use the sum of five and twenty thousand crowns, which the King, his master, had ordered to be remitted to him, that he might therewith supply the King of England in his necessity. The Queen said, that if the High-Steward assured her, that he of the Historical bad caused that sum to be paid to the King of England, she would believe it; and that if the latter denied it, she would say he lied; and that if a dozen of such kings as he should affirm it, she would say they all twelve lied. And since the King of Denmark would not re-establish the High-Steward in the possession of his estate, she would give him so much that he should not repent his loss in Denmark. The Danish Ambassador boldly replied, that her Majesty might, if she pleased, give him the half of her realm without the King his master's saying any thing against it; but that would not hinder his taking Ulefeld for the most infamous and perfidious of all men. This happened in the year 1654 (17). Mr de Wicquefort doth not cite his author; but I find he took this from Mr Chanut's Memoirs, where these two stories are told with more circumstances necessary to be known, than in Mr de Wicquefort's book. We are informed of several other particulars relating to Count Ulefeld in those Memoirs (18).

(16) De l'Ambassadeur & de ses Fonctions, Tom. ii, pag. 147. See Chanut's Memoirs, Tom. iii, from pag. 342, to pag. 349, Dutch edition. The author of the Historical Novel, relates this quite otherwise, and to the Ambassador's confusion.

(17) Wicquefort, ibid, pag. 171. See Chanut's Memoirs, Tom. iii, from pag. 292, to pag. 295.

(18) See Tom. iii, pag. 74, 97, 98, 100, 240, 364.

[H] His counsels were wonderfully advantageous to Charles Gustavus.] See pag. 98, 99. of the Chevalier de Terlon's Memoirs; see also pag. 151, where you will find these remarkable words. 'Count Ulefeld, who knew the humour of the nation, advised the King of Sweden religiously to preserve the people of Schonen in the privileges which they enjoyed under the King of Denmark. This was a good advice, and perhaps if it had been followed this fecond war had been more successful.' Terlon had before told us, that the King of Sweden was very angry when he heard that these privileges were violated: 'But that the displeasure which he shewed did him no service at Copenhagen, where it was only taken for a bait to induce them to surrender that city.'

[I] If the French Ambassador had not entreated that King to name another.] The relation of this story, with a few more circumstances, will not be disagreeable. The Marshal and Duke of Grammont, and Mr de Lyonne, who were then at Francfort, your Majesty's Ambassadors Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiaries for the election of the Emperor, wrote to me to dissuade the King of Sweden from nominating Count Ulefeld for the negotiations of Copenhagen, as he had been for those of Rotschild: to which this prince was pleased to consent, when I spoke to him of it, and would not give the King of Denmark the uneasiness of seeing one of his disaffected subjects treat for his enemies in the very city of his residence, and brave his sovereign in his misfortune; what I de Terlon, pag. 112. said to the King of Sweden engaged him to substitute the Sieur Coyet instead of the Count (19).

[K] At last he fell into disgrace with the Swedes.] Some authors report (20), That the Swedes, to rid themselves of Count Ulefeld, whose great abilities they feared

(19) Mémoires de Terlon, pag. 206, but it should be pag. 210.

(c) Mémoires du Chevalier de Terlon, pag. 301, Dutch edition. See the remark [K].

(f) Mémoires de Terlon, ibid.

(g) That letter is dated the 27th of October, 1661, and is to be found entire in Parival, Tom. iii, pag. 580.

(b) Sorbierre, ubi supra, pag. 153.

He would have recovered his liberty in a glorious manner, if he had not been so impatient, and given credit to some reports that the Swedes designed to bring him to his tryal (e). These were false reports; for they had given their word to the French Ambassador that he should be set at liberty. The Ambassador had written about it, because the King of Denmark demanded that Count, as being included in the treaty (f). The impressions which this false report wrought on the mind of the prisoner, made him try several expedients to deceive his guards, in which he succeeded [L]; for he escaped out of the prison of Malmoe, and went to Copenhagen, without having obtained the remission of all that he had done against his prince. His Countess came thither some time after, when Frederic III, who had very cunningly dissembled his design of securing their persons, caused them both to be arrested, and sent them to the isle of Bornholm; but out of his clemency, he permitted them to live in the island of Funen, after the receipt of a letter which the Count wrote to him (g). In it he acknowledged his crimes, and only implored the mercy of his sovereign, to whom for the future he promised absolute submission. Some time after he was permitted to travel out of the kingdom; he went to the Spaw-waters (b), from thence to Paris incognito, and afterwards to Bruges, where he resolved to winter with his family; but he was obliged secretly to quit that place. His son killed Colonel Wolf [M]: his wife, who retired to London, and quitted that city privately, was seized at fear'd, and without being able to recompense his good services, accus'd him of treason, in order to seize his great riches. The author, who speaks thus, had been saying that the Swedes had condemn'd this Count to a perpetual imprisonment; and therefore he must needs have been ignorant of his being included in the treaty of peace; see the text of this article. Now amongst the things taken from him by the King of Sweden, we must not forget the library which formerly belonged to Sepheldt, a Danish Senator (21). The King of Sweden found it in the castle of Reinstedt, of which this Senator, who was Count Ulfeld's mortal enemy, was governor, and presented it to the Count, who at the entreaty of the Chevalier de Terlon, was willing to restore it to the Senator for six thousand crowns. The Senator would not give that sum, tho' his library was valued at fifty thousand crowns, on account of the great number of very rare manuscripts and curiosities which it contained. On his refusal, Count Ulfeld caused it to be removed to Schonen, and after his confinement it was seized by the King of Sweden and transported to Stockholm.

A LIBRARY seized upon.

(21) Mémoires du Chev. de Terlon, pag. 105, 106.

(22) Mémoires du Chevalier de Terlon, pag. 303. He had said pag. 99, that the Count had a vast estate, a great interest with the nobility, and above all had an infinite deal of wit, and that he was one of the ablest men in the kingdom.

(23) Her speech may be seen in the Historical Novel.

[L] In which he succeeded.] The circumstances of this fact being very singular, I shall be particular in the relation of it. Count Ulfeld was a man of great abilities, and very much considered in Denmark, and he was very sensible of it, since he ventured to go to Copenhagen, without knowing beforehand whether his sovereign would be pleas'd with it. The prisoner, from the day of his confinement, so naturally acted the mute, and seem'd so insensible of all the injuries done him, that it was impossible to draw one word from him, when they question'd him in order to bring him to his trial; and the methods he took to deceive his guards, who were always near the bed in which he pretended to be sick, are almost incredible. And yet he himself made the cloaths in which he escap'd to Copenhagen, which was his ruin; for if, pursuant to what I caus'd to be said to him, he had relied on the goodness of the King of Sweden for his liberty, he had avoided the disgrace which fell on him; and his estate in Sweden had not been confiscated, as well as that which belonged to him in Denmark 'was afterwards (22).' The Historical Novel assures us; 1. That by the treaty of Rotchild, the Count obtained a general amnesty, and was to be re-inflated in his places and estate. 2. That the King of Sweden having granted him leave to defend himself publicly before the Senate at Malmoe, and his indisposition not permitting him to appear, his Countess Eleonora pleaded for him so strenuously, and with so much eloquence (23), that the Judges pronounced sentence of absolution. 3. That the King of Sweden confirm'd this sentence, and that Annibal Seefeld, the Count's ferret enemy, made him afraid of a more close confinement, and advis'd him to endeavour by all means to escape. I ought not to omit that according to the small Latin book, the Count's disgrace happened after the death of Charles Gustavus. It was after that King's death that the Count, with some Senators of Malmoe, endeavour'd to restore Schonen to the Danes. The same book also faith, that he feign'd himself af-fect'd with a palsy in the tongue during his confinement. In custodiam traditus est in qua quamdiu fuit, hemiplexia morbum & vitiatam loquelam raro patientie exemplo simulasse dicitur (24). This confirms what the (24) Machin. Chevalier de Terlon relates, and what follows concerning. Name. 'in eo fuit (Ulfeldius) intercedente apud Regem Sueciæ Christianissimi Regis legato, si unicum tantum ostiduum diutius in custodia se continuisset, ut liberati restitueretur. Quin literæ quarum beneficio dimittendus esset à Regina matre Hedviga Eleonora filii tu-trice ac proceribus regni subscriptæ eodem quo evaserat momento, & hinc paulo serius allatæ circumferantur (25). - - The affairs of Ulfeld were already (25) Ibid. p. 30. at such a pass through the intercession of the French Ambassador with the King of Sweden, that if he had but staid eight days longer in prison, he would have been set at liberty. Nay the very letter upon which he was to be released, was signed by the Queen-mother Hedviga Eleonora, as guardian to her son, and by the Peers of the realm, at the same hour in which he made his escape; so that it was but a little too late in coming.

I shall clear this up as much as possible by Mr Puffendorf's account of the affair. He informs us that the stratagem which Annibal Seefeld made use of to prevent the Count's re-establishment in Sweden, and enjoyment of his estate, was to persuade the King of Denmark, his master, who was sending him into Sweden, to give him orders to recommend the Count's case to the Senators. He imagin'd that such a thing would render him the more suspected, because he was accus'd of a traitorous plot in favour of the King of Denmark; so that no better means could have been thought of to make him appear guilty, than the intercession of that King. This stratagem of Seefeld fell to the ground. The Swedes took no notice of it, and as they were not willing to examine things rigorously after the war was ended, and after the King's death, they declared Ulfeld acquitted. Then his enemy had recourse to another stratagem; he went to Count Brahe, and desired that the Senate's sentence of absolution might not be published, but put into his hands in order to endear himself to his brother-in-law (26). But as soon as he had the sentence in his possession, he made the Chevalier de Terlon (27) and Mr Sidney (28) believe, that the Senate of Sweden had condemn'd Ulfeld, and entreated them to give him immediately notice of it, that he might think of some means to make his escape. The letters which they wrote to him produc'd the effect that Seefeld expected. The prisoner escap'd and went to Copenhagen, where he lost that liberty which he had just recovered (29). Mr Seefeld seems to me to have run a bold rîque; for if these two Ambassadors, whom he deceived, had mentioned what he told them, the Swedish Senators would have known his malicious frauds, and made a noise about it: and consequently he would have lost his reputation. Observe, that it is impossible to reconcile the relations of the Chevalier de Terlon and Mr Puffendorf: one of them is certainly false.

[M] Colonel Wolf.] A modern Historian (30), whom I have already cited, faith, that Colonel Wolf being

(26) Count Ulfeld.

(27) The French Ambassador.

(28) The English Ambassador.

(29) Taken from Puffendorf, in the life of Charles Gustavus, lib. vi. num. 32. See the Acta Eractorum, 1697, pag. 190.

(30) Parival, Tom. iii, pag. 584.

at Dover, and carried to Copenhagen, where they pretended to have discovered a horrible conspiracy, which he had formed against his prince [N]. And accordingly sentence passed against him at Copenhagen, on the twenty-fourth of July 1663, by which, as convicted of high treason, he was condemned to death. The sentence was executed in effigie. They made a waxen figure representing him, which was carried on a sledge to the public place; where the executioner cut off his hand and his head, and divided the body into four quarters, which were carried to the four corners of the city (i). The Count received notice of this at Bruges, and departed the next day for Basil [O], where he lived four or five months unknown, and almost always sick (k). He left that place, being informed that search was made after him in order to take him; and tho' very ill, at night he went into a small bark on the Rhine, in order to go to Brisac; but had scarce advanced two leagues before the piercing cold killed him. He was sixty years of age or thereabouts, and left three sons, the eldest of whom turned Roman Catholic, and lived with the Queen of Sweden. The second was a Knight of Malta; and the third, who was one of the handsomest and most learned gentlemen in Europe, lived in England. I have extracted the account of these last facts from an historical novel, intituled, Le Comte d'Ulfeld, printed at Paris in the year 1677, and dedicated to the Duke of Montausier, by an author who calls himself Rouffeau de la Valette. I might have extracted a thousand curious things from it; but I was afraid of confounding history with romance [P]. I have nevertheless made use of that book in my remarks. For the rest, this Count is frequently mentioned in Charles Ogier's travels [Q].

(i) Parival, Tom. iii.

(k) See the book cited at the end of this article.

The

being in a coach with his wife, Count Ulfeld's son came up to him, and saluted him very courteously, and stabbed him to the heart with a dagger at the instant that he was telling his wife, who it was that had accosted them. The assassin was so fortunate as to escape. The Colonel being governor of the isle of Bornholm, had not so strictly guarded Count Ulfeld, but he found an opportunity to get away; but he was seized just as he was embarking, and closely confined to a prison, very much below a man of his quality (31); and no compassionate regard was had to him, for fear he should once more escape. This was the cause of the hatred which the Count and his family had conceived against the Colonel.

(31) The Historical Novel gives a dismal description of the count's ill treatment, even before he had attempted to make his escape.

[N] A horrid conspiracy . . . against his Prince. It has been said that the Elector of Brandenburg acquainted King Frederic III, that Count Ulfeld had wrote to him, That if he would lend him a vigorous assisting hand, he would dethrone the King and his heirs, and cause the crown to devolve on his head. For, said he, I have so many of the Clergy and Laity, who will declare on my side, that it will render this enterprise easy (32). The sentence of death pronounced against him, mentions their having proofs of this; but this Elector is not therein named.

(32) Pariv. ubi supra.

[O] Departed for Basil. According to the small Latin tract, he there pretended to be governor to three Dutch gentlemen, and was not known till one of his sons had a quarrel with a Captain of Zurich. He had his three sons and a daughter with him. His lady was in prison at Copenhagen. When he found himself discovered he embarked on the Rhine alone, and died in the boat in February 1664, not far from Newburg. The watermen carried him to a convent near that place, whither his sons came with the utmost expedition, in order to save the jewels he had about him, and caused him to be buried under a tree in the middle of a field.

[P] Of confounding History with Romance. Though the author of the Historical Novel assures us, That all there is very true, and that he hath written nothing but what he had from the information of the most able and disinterested persons of that country. I cannot help believing that there are some romantic embellishments in that work. The Countess Eleonora owned that the account of her life favoured very much of a romance (33): He who heard her say this, having related something of that History, adds, that this, with some episodes, might be a very fit subject for a romance (34). Doubtless, the author of the Historical Novel wrote according to that idea. I will not thoroughly examine the facts, which this author always turns to the advantage of his hero, and sometimes so severely against the person of King Frederic (35), that he, a thousand times more than Sorbiere, deserved the complaints of the Danish Ambassador at the court of France: but I may probably be allowed to take for a romantic thought, that severity sufficient to make the boldest man tremble, with which the Count was looked on when he made his first declaration of love to the Countess Eleonora, to whom, faith the author, the name of love appeared so shocking, that she formed a dismal idea of it. I do not make the same judgment of the Count's exclamation, when, born down with misfortune, he cried out, O GOD! when wilt thou cease to afflict me? Nature is too visible here, this looks like a true History, whilst the other looks like invention only. The proposal of an under-match, or of a dishonourable love, might have occasioned this terrible menacing severity; but the Count, a person richly endowed with all the perfections of body and mind, and one of the best matches the Countess could ever hope for, courted her with a view to marriage. Whence then could proceed this thundering severity which our author mentions but from a romantic humour? where, and where only, a declaration of love is followed by an immediate resentment, which appears by our blushes (it is thus that Moliere makes a precise lady speak) and which, for a time, banishes the lover from our presence. But at last he finds means to pacify us, and insensibly enures us to the discourse of his tender passion, and extorts from us the consent which we have much ado to give (36).

(33) Relat. de Sorbiere, p. 146.

(34) Ibid. pag. 153.

(35) In the Memoirs of the Chevalier de Terlon, some encomiums are bestowed upon that Prince, which are directly contrary to the flanders of the Historical Novel.

[Q] The Count is frequently mentioned in Charles Ogier's travels. Charles Ogier, the worthy brother of that great preacher Francis Ogier, travelled to Denmark and Sweden with the Count d'Avaux, Ambassador from Lewis XIII. They left Paris on the eleventh of July in 1634. The relation of this voyage is very curious, and well written. Among other things we find in it that Count Ulfeld being contracted to the daughter of the King, his master, and being afflicted with an ulcer in his thigh, made a very great scruple of approaching a lady of the blood-royal before he was cured. Wherefore he took a journey into France in order to put himself into the hands of an able Chirurgeon, to whom Mr d'Avaux recommended him. Ulfeldius crure laborabat insanabiliter, ex sententia scilicet omnium suæ nationis Medicorum, qui tamen anno postea, cum se ex consilio Legati nostri Lutetiam contulisset, ab eximio Chirurgo P. Judæo sanatus est. Alter mihi videbatur ille Philoſtates, adeo acutis interdum doloribus cruciatur; alioquin, cum per benigniorum temporum intervalla, vis mali paululum recederat, innitebatur baculo. Cæterum tanta hominis virtus ac dignitas fuit, ut dilectissimam illi Rex Daniæ Filiam Leonoram desponderit: at ille tam eximie puellæ thalamis cruce putridum inferre reveritus, antequam nuptiæ celebrarentur, operæ pretium duxit, si se laboriose curationis carnificinæ, ac periculis devoveret (37). . . . Ulfeld had an ulcer in his thigh, which was deemed incurable by all the Physicians of his country. Nevertheless as he went next year to Paris by the advice of our Ambassador, he was there cured by that excellent Chirurgeon P. Judæus. Such was the acuteness of the pains which he now and then suffered, that he seemed to me like another Philoſtates: at other times

(36) Moliere, in his Précieuses ridicules, Act. I, Sc. iv.

(37) Carol. Ogierius, in Itinere Danico, pag. 679 Edit. Paris. 1656, in 8vo.

(k) Taken from Sebastian Kortholt,
pag. 2.
de Puellis Poetriis,
Edit. 1700.

The Countess, his widow, died on the sixteenth of March 1698. She could make verses, and she has left a piece, which perhaps will be printed. It is the life of some illustrious women (l).

* times when the violence of the distemper abated, and
* he felt some intervals of ease, he used to walk about * with the help of a stick. But so great was the virtue * and merit of the man, that the King of Denmark con* tracted his well-beloved daughter Eleonora to him:
* nevertheless he was ashamed to carry a sore leg to such
* a fine lady's bed, and for that reason before the mar* riage was celebrated, he thought proper to submit him* self to all the painful and dangerous operations of a dif* ficult cure.* This was very well done.

ULYSSES, one of the most celebrated Generals of the Grecian army at the siege of Troy. Dr Drelincourt (a) hath imparted to me so many excellent memoirs concerning this hero of the Odyssey [A], that I am extremely sorry I cannot here give them that extensive place which they deserve. And it being better to say nothing on great subjects, than to speak of them by halves (b), I have deferred this article to another time, and am sorry this learned man himself could not enrich the public with this excellent portraiture of Ulysses, as he hath already obliged the world with that of Achilles, of which we have seen three editions.

(a) Professor of Physic at Leyden.

(b) De Carthagine flere me-lius puto quam parum dicere.
Sallustius, de Bello Jugurthino.

[A] So many excellent Memoirs concerning this hero of the Odyssey. He hath collected whatever hath been said for or against the Prince of Ithaca, and hath very methodically digested it. It is a mixture of erudition and criticisms, which would surprize even those who are best versed in the antient Greek and Latin authors. Copiousness and exactness, sagacity and method, memory and judgment, shine so brightly in this work, that it is impossible to determine which of these excellencies appear in the greatest lustre.

U L M, in Latin Ulma, an Imperial city, and the capital of the Circle of Suabia, is situated upon the Danube, where it begins to be navigable for boats. That name was given to it because of the vast number of elms which grow in its neighbourhood. It is a rich, populous, and trading city, regularly fortified, and embellished with a great many fountains: it's stone bridge over the Danube is extremely beautiful. . . . It was formerly no more than a market-town, which Charlemagne had given to the abbey of Reichenaw, and which Lotharius II afterwards entirely demolished. But the inhabitants of the country settling there again, redeemed at last from the abbey of Reichenaw, by paying a very considerable sum of money, their liberty and their independence, and caused themselves to be matriculated among the Imperial cities (a). . . . The Roman Catholics there are not very numerous, and have only two churches, the Protestants having taken possession of all the rest. The senate is composed of forty-one persons, of whom the two elders, together with the five first, make the Privy-Council, into which the Roman Catholics are not admitted (b). The Elector of Bavaria surprized this town on the eighth of September 1702, by a stratagem that was admirably well executed (c). The citizens having put themselves under arms, and being divided into eighteen companies of two hundred men each, marched on with their colours, and the very women of the city run there like so many priestesses of Bacchus, making weapons of every thing that came in their way; but notwithstanding all this the Bavarian troops still maintained the posts they had taken (d). The Imperialists under the command of General Thungen besieged that place in the month of September 1704. The garrison, after a short and very feeble resistance, capitulated on the eleventh of the said month, and obtained terms that were in all respects favourable and glorious to them. The Dutch Gazeteers, deceived by the news-mongers of the Imperial cities, who generally upon all occasions are very great liars, gave out that after the garrison was come forth in an honourable manner, they were made prisoners of war, and that by way of reprisals for what had been done some weeks before by the Duke of Vendome to the garrison of Verceil in Italy. The falsity of this piece of news came soon to be known; and in truth the two cases were not parallel, since the garrison of Verceil was treated, not contrary to the tenor of the capitulation as the same Gazeteers published, though they afterwards retracted it (e), but precisely according to the articles of the capitulation as it was signed by both parties.

(a) Heiss, History of the Empire, Tom. ii, pag. m. 456.

(b) Id. ibid. See also the Mercure Galant, of September 1702, pag. 392, in the Extraît of a letter from an officer in the army of the Elector of Bavaria.

(c) See the letter which is in the same volume of the Mercure Galant, pag. 395, & seq.

(d) Ibid. pag. 402.

(e) See the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, for the month of August 1704, pag. 150, & seq. & pag. 163, & seq.

VOLKELIUS (JOHN) a Socinian Minister (a) born at Grimma in Misnia, was one of the most learned men of that sect. Some letters which Socinus wrote to him are published, the first of which is dated the third of April 1593 (b). He wrote one to him in the year 1596, upon Volkeli's intimating that he did not think Socinus had fully refuted Francis David's arguments (c). He published in the year 1613 an answer (d), and a reply (e), to Smiglecius; but his principal work is that De vera Religione, of which a great many copies were burnt at Amsterdam by order of the magistrates, on the twentieth of January 1642 [A]. I have something to offer concerning this fact, which is not exactly represented

(a) Ecclesius Philippovienfis, post Smiglenfis Pastor. Bibl. Antitrinit. p. 96.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Hoornbeek, Apparatu ad Controuers. Socinian. pag. 65.

(d) Inuicem, Nodii Gordii à Martino Smiglecio neci Dissolutio.

(e) Inuicem Relpocilio ad rem refutationem dis-solutionis Nob representat Gordii.

[A] That De Vera Religione, of which a great number of copies were burnt . . . in 1642. It was printed at Racovia in the year 1630, after the author's death. The sect judging it proper that this book should contain a complete system of the Socinian doctrine, and finding it defective in some particulars, appointed Crellius to add as a supplement, a treatise of God and of the Divine Attributes. Crellius executed this commission; what he wrote made the first part of the work, and is the first of the six books which compose it. Several are of opinion that Socinianism hath not produced any thing more dangerous than this volume, and for that reason doubtless it was, that being reprinted at Amsterdam it was thought very necessary represented in the book intitled La Religion des Hollandois.

- (1) In 1200 Gilders.
- (2) Steph. Curcellæus Epistola ad Ruarum. It is the last will of the first century of Ruarus' letters, p. 407.
- (3) See the sixteenth letter of the first century of Ruarus' letters, pag. 408, 409.
- (4) Ita illo contenti casu (Cæsi, that is, the Sieurs Blæw) ut non facile posthac ejusmodi sint libros excuturi. Idem, pag. 409.
- (5) Ibid. pag. 408.
- (6) Of whom mention is made above, in citat. (31), of the article VIRGIL. See also the Nouvel de la Rep. des Lettres, for August 1701, pag. 151, & seq.
- (7) The Italian translator of Mr Stoupp's book has committed here a great fault by suppressing the words, which import that the author had only a suspicion. A forza di suppicche, says he, dello stesso Guglielmo Blæw.
- (8) Stoupp, Religion des Hollandois, letter iv, dated the 13th of May 1673.
- (9) Jean Brun, Apologie pour la Religion des Hollandois, pag. 216, & seq.
- (10) Id. ibid. pag. 218.

necessary to use it with all the severity of the law. The Scout of Amsterdam seized 450 copies which he found in the Bookseller's hands; and prevailed with the Judges to confiscate them, and fine the Book-feller (1); eight days after which they were publicly burnt (2). Curcellæus having written this news to Ruarus on the eighth of February 1642, informed him on the twelfth of April following, that the new Schepens had annulled the sentence of their predecessors (3), and ordered it to be taken out of the registers; inasmuch, that the Bookfeller who had not yet paid his fine, came off with the loss of his books only. Notwithstanding this, he was so terrified thereby, that it was thought he would not easily be induced to publish any book of that nature again (4). Curcellæus passionately desired that some able person would write against these proceedings of the Schepens of Amsterdam. 'Utinam vestrum aliquis præcepit Scabinorum notrorum judicium vellet expendere, & illos librorum incendiarios peccati sui coarguere. Si quem noveris ei rei idoneum, urge ut aggrediatur (5). - - - I wish that some one among you would strictly examine the rash judgment of our Schepens, and censure those burners of books for the fault they have committed. If you know any person fit for that task, press him to undertake it.'

The two letters of this Remonstrant minister, written openly and in confidence to Ruarus, shew the falsity of Mr Stoupp's conjecture. Read what follows, I cite it from the copy which Mr Des Maizeaux (6) has been pleased to send me, and not as it was in my first edition, where I inserted this passage exactly as Mr Arnauld published it in the forty-sixth page of the second part of his Apology for the Catholics. He hath curtailed and altered several places, and yet makes use of the Italic character, without taking notice of any deficiency: this is not like an exact author. 'The Socinian books were very scarce till a few years past. Those which were published, were printed in very distant places, and in small numbers, so that they could not be got but at a very dear rate, and most of them were not to be come at on any terms. The States-General by their goodness and special favour, and a very particular tenderness of confidence, remedied this inconvenience. To satisfy the Socinians, and those who were willing to embrace their opinions, they gave leave that they should print at Amsterdam, four of their principal authors, viz. Socinus, Crellius, Slichtingius, and Wozogenius. This collection of Socinian writers in eight volumes in folio, is at present publicly sold at Amsterdam for a hundred gilders. It is but a very few years since an inconsiderable part of these books would have cost two hundred pistoles, whereas all of them may be had at present for less than ten. It is indeed true that some time since a Socinian book was burnt at Amsterdam, doubtless (7) at the request of Blæu himself who printed it. A few days after this execution he publicly exposed the same book to sale; and to recommend it to the buyer, and enhance the price, inserted in the title page, that it was the same book which by order of the States, had been burnt by the hands of the common executioner (8).'

Several particulars of this passage deserve to be considered. In the first place, Mr Stoupp ought to have known that the States-General do not meddle with the government of Amsterdam; it does not belong to them to permit or prohibit any thing to the Bookfellers in the province of Holland. II. It is not true either that the States-General, or the States of Holland, permitted the printing of Socinian books. The works of the four principal Divines, whereof Mr Stoupp speaks, were privately printed; of which see the particulars in the Apology for the religion of the Dutch (9). III. It is utterly false that William Blæu solicited the burning of this Socinian book: Curcellæus's two letters clearly prove that the Sieurs Blæw were very sorry for the burning of Volkelius's book; I shall borrow some fresh evidences of this truth, from the author who refuted Mr Stoupp. (10) 'It was not William, but John Blæu who printed it. But how impertinent it is to conjecture that this Blæu entreated the magistrates to burn this book? If only a dozen copies had been burnt, it might be said, that your narrow suspicious soul had some excusable pretext for this malicious conjecture: but you ought to know that the officer who had orders to burn this book, seized Mr Blæu at a friend's house, where he then was, and caused him to be guarded by some of his men, whilst he went directly to the ware-house, where he found all the copies, and caused them to be immediately burnt (11). Half a day was entirely spent only in throwing the books into the fire, till the flames had consumed the whole number, which redounded to the great damage of Mr Blæu, besides, he was fined two thousand gilders (12). By this you may judge if it was Blæu who solicited the burning of this book, and whether he could have any great advantage by it.' IV. It is false, that a few days, or any time after this public execution, the same Bookfeller publicly sold this book of Volkelius, and that he inserted in the title, that it was the same book which had been condemned publicly to be burnt by the hands of the common executioner. The person that furnished Mr Stoupp with memoirs confounded the fact, and the whole foundation of this fable was; Volkelius's book was printed in Dutch at Rotterdam in the year 1649, and it was mentioned in the title that the Schepens had ordered it to be burnt in Holland in 1642 (13). The apology for the religion of the Dutch observes that one Colom, and not the Sieurs Blæu, put this in the title; but that this translation was likewise prohibited by the States (14). Marefius observes, that this additional clause in the title was a bait which the secret emissaries of the Socinians laid, to promote the sale of the book: Quantum prædii in eo reponant clancularii terrime hæreses emissarii & promotores, palam fecerunt ante biennium, illo in Belgicum idioma translato, & quod ad ejus lectionem magis invitarentur homines præposterè curiosi, quibus solenne niti in vetitum semper cupereque negata, præfixo hoc Elogio, quod opus illud esset, in Hollant by Schepen vonnisse gedoemp, openbaerlijck geexecuteert, en met vyer verbrant anno 1642, in Januario (15). The Synods of Holland did not forget this addition to the title, in the remonstrance which I have mentioned in another place (16): they complained that several books were translated into Dutch; and in the last place they quoted Volkelius. 'Denique Crellius de Deo & ejus attributis & Volkelii quinque libri de vera religione: & ad irridendum zelum piorum judicium pro Deo, perver- & solque homines eo magis alliciendum, in frontispicio posuerunt in Hollandia sententia Scabinorum eum librum damnatum & publice combustum esse anno 1642, mense Januario. - - - Lastly, Crellius's book de Deo & ejus Attributis, and Volkelius's five books de Vera Religione: and to ridicule the zeal of pious judges in the cause of GOD, and thereby to entice the more men of perverse dispositions, they took care to have it inserted in the title page, that by the sentence of the Schepen in Holland the said book had been publicly condemned and burnt in the month of January in the year 1642.'

VOL. V.

It is certain that this book of Volkelius was never printed by itself in Latin, after the burning it in the year 1642. But it was printed entire in the Hydra Socinianismi expugnata, published at Groningen by Samuel Marefius (17). This orthodox professor intending to refute the Socinian system, was resolved to leave no room to suspect that he had weakened his adversary's arguments. Therefore he published them at large without any omission, and subjoined his refutation in the same pages. By this means his readers had a fair opportunity of comparing Heresy and Orthodoxy, without there being any room left to complain that Heresy was not there expressed in full force and vigour. It must be owned this is the most frank and ingenuous way of answering an adversary. It shews that the author relies on the goodness of his cause, and the strength of his pen: it prevents all suspicions of artifice; and we indeed have reason to be suspicious on this head in many thousands of cases; for it happens but too often that an author unfairly represents the arguments which he designs to confute. He makes as if he had not perceived what he thinks he is not able to refute; and when he cannot avoid mentioning some particulars, he omits some essential terms. In a word, suppose as long as you please that a controversialist acts fairly, you will never be able to persuade the world, that loose passages which he cites out of the piece he refutes, are an impartial representation

6 M

(11) Curcellæus says there was an interval of eight days.

(12) Curcellæus says only 1200.

(13) Bibl. Antitrit. pag. 96.

(14) Jean Brun ubi supra, pag. 219.

(15) Samuel Marefius, Præfat. Hydre Socinianismi expugnatae, Tim. i, printed at Groningen in 1651.

(16) In the article SOCINUS (FAUSTUS) remark [L].

(17) The first Tome was published in 1651, the second, in 1654, and the third, which is the last, in 1663.

unfair Stoupp represents

tation of the strength of the work, which commonly consists in the connexion of it's parts. Wherefore Marefius took the most proper measures in the world by inserting in his answer the whole book which was burned. He silenced the heretical boasters, and deprived them for the pretext of reproaching the true Church with mean shifts, or insulting the orthodox, as men who not daring to look their enemies in the face, and knowing themselves unable to make head against them, implored the assistance of the secular power, to burn by a sentence of the magistrates a book whose objections they could not overthrow. Some satirical wits have ventured to say, that this Professor took this method only in compliance to the Book-feller, who positively insisted upon it, from an opinion that the text of Volkelius would make any refutation whatsoever fell. This is a malicious falsity. And it is infinitely more reasonable to acquiesce in the reasons which the author himself alleges. 'Mihi autem, scilicet be (18), vitio verti non debet quod textum integrum libri nefarii curarum recedendum. Cum enim supprimi per hominum curiositatem & malitiam nequeat, nec in eo voti sui compos existerit Amplif. Magistratus Amstelodamensis, malui illum integrum sistere Lectori, ne crederet suffragari velle victoriam, quod nolebat Alexander, & data opera delumbare atque extenuare Adversarii mei argumenta; Ubi Lector ipsam Bestiam sua verba respondentem audierit, (ut hic adhibeam dictum Aeschini de oratione Demosthenis in re habita, relatum Hieronymo Epist. ad Paul. de lib. Divino cap. 2.) & simul nostras ad illam censuras & Annotationes ἀντιμαχίας expendit, facilius de totius Cause natura & merito iudicabit. Opposita sibi mutuo apposita magis eluceant. Et sicut vinum dulcius est quod prope mandragoras crescit, & suavius olent lilia & rosæ quæ juxta cæpas & allia carpuntur, sic ex hac antithesi plus accedet suaveolentia illi veritatis Cause quam suscepi propugnandam. Ita videntur Lectores nihil nos meture nobis ab istorum hominum strophis & cavillationibus, quandoquidem eas integras, omnibusque suis vestitis coloribus, proponimus & expendimus, consiliu bonitati nostræ causæ, & quod eorum Sententias prodidisse superasse est, ut loquitur Hieronymus ad Ctesiph. --- It ought not to be charged upon me as a fault that I have taken care to publish the entire text of a wicked book. For as it could not be suppressed, by reason of the curiosity or malice of mankind, and since the magistrates of Amsterdam could not succeed in that design, I rather chose to present it entire to the reader; that it might not seem as if I desired to steal a victory (which Alexander scorned to do), or took pains to weaken and extenuate my adversary's arguments. But when the reader shall hear the beast himself bellowing out his own words, (if I may be allowed to apply here what Aeschines said touching a speech which Demosthenes had pronounced against him, as the thing is related by St Jerom) and shall at the same time weigh the censures that we pass upon him and our wholesome remarks, he will be the better able to judge of the merit and nature of the whole cause. Opposite things are the more clearly discerned for being set by one another. For as that wine is sweeter which grows near mandrakes, and as those lilies and roses have a more fragrant smell which are gathered in the neighbourhood of onions and garlic, so this opposition will give an additional flavour to the cause of truth, which I have undertaken to defend. Thus the reader will perceive that we are not in the least afraid of the quirks and cavils of those men, since we represent and consider them entire and dressed in their own colours; trusting to the goodness of our cause, and for that, as St Jerom says to Ctesiphon, in order to confute their opinions, it is sufficient to shew them as they are.' He adds, that he herein imitated Francis Junius (19), Sibrandus Lubbertus (20), Paul Tarnovius (21), John Junius (22), Alstedius (23), and Bitterfeldius, son-in-law to Alstedius (24). He represents in his Preface to the second tome, that he would not be sorry if the magistrates should make use of an answer different from his, that is, burn the Socinian system. And as he praises the pious zeal of the English, who condemned the Catechism of this sect to the flames (25); so he complains of the toleration which Cromwell allowed these Heretics. He bewails with tears of blood the confusion of England, which was become their metropolis (26), and that a Catechism, containing all their blasphemies, was suffered to be printed at London. Maref. Pref. 'Modo enim ex Anglia allatus est Anglicæ linguæ confcriptus Catechismus duplex, major & minor, Londini publice excusus hoc anno 1654, apud J. Cottrel pro Rich. Moore, ad insignem septem stellarum, in Cæmeterio Paulino, auctore Johanne Beddle, five Biddello, Magistro Artium Oxoniensi, editus, ut præ se fert, in eorum gratiam qui merè Christiani nullique sectæ addicti esse volunt. (quamvis nequeant se tales profiteri, quin eo ipso sectam specialem ab aliis omnibus discretam constituent,) & omnes Socinianismi impietates ac blasphemias continet, erudat, propugnat (27). --- There are just come from England two Catechisms, viz. a larger and a smaller one, written in the English language, and publicly printed at London this very year 1654, by James Cottrel for Richard Moore, at the seven Stars in Paul's Church-yard. The author is one John Biddle, a Master of Arts, of the university of Oxford. He pretends that they are composed for their sakes, who would be mere Christians, and not of this or that sect (although they cannot profess themselves to be such, without setting up a particular sect of their own, distinct from all others). These Catechisms contain, propagate, and defend, all the impieties and blasphemies of the Socinians. Having answered Volkelius's book paragraph by paragraph, he might have laughed at those sectaries, if they had alledged against him the reflexions which Arnobius made on the request of the idolaters, that the Senate would prohibit some books of Cicero (28), in which the vanity of their false gods was demonstrated. Re-fute them, saith Arnobius, if they contain any impieties, for to forbid the reading of them, is not to maintain the cause of the gods, but to be afraid of the evidence of truth. 'Cum sciam esse non paucos qui verentur & fugiant libros de hoc ejus, (Ciceronis) nec in aurim velint admittere lectionem opinionum suarum præsumpta vincentem? cumque alios audiam mustitare indignanter, & dicere: oportere statui per Senatum, aboleantur ut hæc scripta, quibus Christiana religio comprobetur, & vetustatis opprimatur auctoritas? Quinimo si fidiis exploratum vos dicere quicquam de Diis vestris, erroris convincite Ciceronem, temeraria & impia distat resellite, redarguite, comprobate. Nam interciperi scripta, & publicatam velle submergere lectionem, non est Deus defendere, sed veritatis testimonium timere. (29). It is certain that Socinus took advantage of his adversaries forbidding the reading of his writings (30).

It must not be forgot that the English complained of Marefius's accusing their nation, of favouring Socinianism, and of their country's becoming it's metropolis. Read the following passage of John Owen, Doctor of Divinity and Vice-Chancellor of the university of Oxford: 'Ille (Marefius) universam gentem nostram, ejusque Gubernatores Socinianismi accusat, & qui viri mos est, horrendos clamores excitat, affirmans hæresin ibi sedem Metropolitancam fixisse, &c. De temeritate hujus censuræ & de impendia ejus ignorantia in statu rerum apud nos gestarum, quas tamen referre, judicare, & condemnare præsumit, scripsi ad ipsum epistolam (31). --- This Marefius accuses our whole nation, and those who govern it, of Socinianism, and, as the manner of the man is, he raises a horrid clamour, affirming that Heresy has fixed her metropolitan seat here. But I have written a letter, wherein I represent to him the rashness of this censure, and his stupid ignorance of our affairs, which he nevertheless presumes to relate, judge of, & condemn.' Mr Daille made use of this complaint of Dr Owen, when he writ against Marefius. Marefius answered, that he never received this doctor's letter, and that he was very well pleased to hear that things were not in that state in England that they had been (32). This he tells us in a Preface written in April 1658. But it is to be observed, that the Preface to the second tome of the Anti-Volkelius is dated the 12th of August 1654.

V O L S I U S (PAUL) Abbot of the monastery of Haugshofen (a), of the order of the Benedictines near Schlestadt in Alsatia, lived in the XVth century. He had a great deal of merit, and was highly praised by Erasmus (b) who dedicated to him in the year 1518 the new edition of his Enchiridion Militis Christiani. At length he accomplished his (18) Marefius, Prefat. Vol. i. Hydræ Socinianismi expugnator, fol. 2.

(19) In his De-fensio Catholica.

(20) In the refutation of Faust Socinus's book De Christo Secutore.

(21) In the refutation of the same Socinus's book contra Bullarum & Wickham.

(22) In the refutation of the same Socinus's Praelectiones.

(23) In the refutation of the Catechism of Raccovia.

(24) In the refutation of Crelius's book de uno Deo & patre.

(a) Erasmus expresses this word in Latin by Hugonis Curia.

(b) See the seventh letter of the first book of Erasmus, p. 81.

(c) See the xxiid letter of xiiith book of Erasmus, and the xliid of the xviith.

his design of throwing aside the Monkish habit, and renouncing Popery (c). He embraced the sect of the Anabaptists; but being converted by Calvin about the year 1539, he was Minister of the Church of Straßburg to the day of his death (d).

(d) Beza, Preface to the Commentary of Calvin upon Joshua, pag. m. 11.

VORSTIUS (CONRAD) was born at Cologne on the nineteenth of July 1569. His father who was a Dyer, had not yet left the Church of Rome; wherefore he caused him to be baptized at his parish church. Soon after he privately joined with the Protestant Church, to which he brought over his wife. They had ten children, and designed this Conrad for a scholar. He learned Grammar, and a little Rhetoric at the village of Bedberdyk, where he staid five years, after which he went to Düsseldorf in the year 1583, where he continued his school studies, till 1586. He spent the following year at Cologne in Saint Laurence's College, where he learned several things. Two reasons prevented his taking the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy [A], and interrupted his studies. The poverty of the family induced them to breed him a merchant. He spent two years in learning what might be useful to him in trade, as Arithmetic and Italian languages. Afterwards he returned to his studies, and was sent to Herborn in the year 1589. Where Piscator had read Divinity three years. Vorstius studied under him with great success, and applied himself to the instruction of some children of quality. With some of these he went to Heidelberg in March 1593, where he was created Doctor of Divinity in July 1594. A year after he went to visit the academies of Swisserland [B], and that of Geneva. He read Theological lectures in the latter, at the instigation of Theodore Beza, and acquitted himself so well that he was offered a professor's chair there; which he would not accept, some reasons inducing him to return home, for he was offered to be Divinity Professor at Steinfurt (a). The letter of invitation was delivered to him at Geneva in February 1596. He accepted that preferment, and discharged the functions of it in a manner which made him very famous, and courted by other academies [C]. In the year 1605, besides his professorship, he was made Minister of Steinfurt: and as if those two places had not been sufficient to employ him, he had other preferments bestowed on him, whereby, as it was but reasonable, his salary was increased (b). He was invited to Leyden to succeed Arminius in the year 1610, and after a year's consideration

Synodus & visitationibus Ecclesiarum. In quorum onerum solutium extraordinarium ei stipendium constitutum. - - - He had likewise other places conferred upon him by the generous Count of Bentheim. For he together with two counsellors and a court minister was appointed to preside at the trial and decision of matrimonial causes and disputes, and at the examination of young clergymen, and lastly, in synods, and at the visitation of churches. And as a recompence for these painful employments, he was allowed an extraordinary salary. Marcus Gualter, ubi infra, citat. (c).

(a) At that time the Count of Bentheim founded an illustrious school in that town.

(b) Aliis quoque muneribus a generoso Dn. Comite (Bentheim) auctus est. Cum duobus enim Confilariis & Ministro aulico cognitioni ac iudiciis causarum & questionum matrimonialium praefectus est; tum examini novitiorum Ministrorum, denique

[A] Two reasons prevented his taking the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy. One was, that he would not betray his conscience, by swearing that he would submit to the decisions of the Council of Trent, the other was, that they designed to withdraw him from his studies in order to breed him a Merchant, by reason of the ill posture of the affairs of his family. Instabat tempus promotionis ejusdem ad Baccalaureatum, & magistrum philosophiae, sed quae fieri non poterat nisi pro more solemmiter juraret in decreta Concilii Tridentini: itaque honorem illum licet ejus potiri posset & forte vellet, tamen cum & conscientia propter illud juramentum obstarat, & jam parvum res magis ac magis inclinarent, repudiavit, & deliberatum est de studiis ipsius abruptendis, ipsoque mercaturae addicendo (1).

(1) Marcus Gualtherus in Oratione de vita & obitu Conradi Vorstii.

(2) See Marcus Gualtherus, ibid. I cannot note the pages; for the Printer has not numbered them.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 13.

[B] He went to visit the academies of Swisserland. He twice maintained public theses at Basil (2); 1. De Sacramentis. 2. De Causis salutis. He was preparing a third disputation against Socinus, de Christo Salvatore; but hastening his journey he did not finish this piece. He left the original with Grynaeus, and received it back again when he returned by Basil. The first work ascribed to him is a collection of these sort of theses containing above twenty, defended at several times, beginning with the year 1594. He places first in this collection, his thesis de Sancta Trinitate, hoc est, de Deo Patre, Filio, & Spiritu sancto, and the thesis de Persona & Officio Christi; which he some time after made use of as an apology against those who accused him of Socinianism in these two points; for to stop the mouth of calumniators, he reprinted these two theses apart in 1612. Quas postmodum Apologiae vicem esse voluit, cum maligne quidam Tribunitii sententiae ipsam traducere inciperent, quasi haeretice de duobus illis capitibus sententiam aut docerent. Ideoque anno 1612 denuo & seorsim excudi curavit, ad os calumniae obturandum (3). We shall find by the following remarks that he was soon suspected of that Heresy.

[C] He discharged his functions in a manner which made him courted by other Academies. Mr du Pleffis Mornai, and the Church of Samur, wrote to him in July 1602, and desired him to accept the Theological professor's chair in the Academy which they had newly erected in that place. Vorstius gave no positive answer: but the Count of Bentheim being resolved at any rate to keep him, answered Mr du Pleffis, and the affair stopped there. In the year 1606, Maurice Landgrave of Hesse offered Vorstius the place of Divinity professor at Marburg (4); and after having several times written to him, he sent a coach and a trumpet for him, that the Professor might make his journey in a manner that should be both convenient and honourable. Missa praeter diversas literas singularis honoris causa tubicines & rheda qua illuc veheretur (5). The Count of Bentheim would not give leave for his departure; Vorstius's relations desired him not to remove; so that this invitation proved as ineffectual as that of Saul mur. If the call to Leyden had succeeded no better, it is very probable that Vorstius had died with an orthodox character; for it ought to be observed that the suspicions raised against him before the year 1599, were sufficiently quashed by his conduct in the Palatinate. And, in effect, Mr du Pleffis Mornai would not have desired to have him at Saumur, if he had not been thoroughly convinced of his innocence: nor could he be ignorant of what was done at Heidelberg. The Count of Bentheim being informed that his Divinity was suspected, desired to have that affair cleared up; and therefore he ordered Vorstius to go immediately and purge himself of that accusation at the university which had created him doctor, and convince them of his orthodoxy. Vorstius accordingly went to Heidelberg, where he gave an account of his faith, and returned home perfectly justified (6). The faculty of Divinity admitted him ad osculum pacis, - - - to the kiss of peace, and gave him testamentum hospitalitatis, - - - the token of hospitality, having told him that he was to blame for advancing certain assertions which favoured the Socinians, and having made him promise, that for the future he would abstain from the use of any suspicious expressions. He was also obliged to protest that he abhorred Socinus's opinions, and that he was very sorry that the heat of youth had drawn him into expressions which seemed to favour that Heretic, and shock the doctrine of the Reformed Churches. Testetur etiam sibi dolere quod impetu juvenili abreptus nonnulla scripserit & sparserit quae Socini erroribus favere, doctrinaeque Ecclesiarum reformatarum, in quam juravit in sua promotione ad Doctoratum, adversari videbantur (7). This happened on the twenty-sixth of September 1599. The instrument drawn up on that occasion is to be found in the life of David Pareus: where you will find likewise the following relation, which will not be disagreeable to those who are fond of being acquainted with a great many particulars concerning

(4) Ibid. pag. E 3.

(5) Ib. verso.

(6) See Vorstius's letter to the Divines of Heidelberg, among those of the Arminians, p. 46, of the edition in folio.

(7) Vide David. Parei Vitam. pag. m. 59.

consideration he accepted that employment [D], and with his family removed to Leyden, carrying with him the most authentic testimonials of orthodoxy [E], and of a good as well as prudent conduct; but he met with insurmountable difficulties. The ministers who maintained the old doctrine of Calvin in opposition to the Arminians, were persuaded that if Vorstius, who was not of their opinion, should be professor of Divinity at Leyden, he would do an irreparable injury to their cause. Wherefore they warmly represented the concerning the lives of learned men. 'Non ita pridem supremos in S. Theologia honores, five Doctorum Facultas Theologica contulerat Viro Clarissimo Domino CONRADO VORSTIO Colonienſi, qui poſtea à D. PAREO ob fingularem eruditionem, diſputandi acumen, & docendi ſapientiam, commendatus fuit ad Profeſſionem Theologicam in nova Schola Steinfurtenſi, Illuſtri & Generoſo Comiti D. ARNOLDO, Comiti in Bentheim, &c. In qua cum aliquandiu Orthodoxam doctrinam cum magna laude propoſuiſſet, abreptus tandem ingenii εγχειρίδια, aut καὶνοδοξία docendi, animum applicuit ad lectionem nefarii libri FAUSTI SOCINI de Servatore: immo & authoris amicitiam affectavit ac coluit. Hinc cothurnos corrumpendi receptam doctrinam, de lytro & ſatisfactione JESU-CHRISTI, ſubdole excogitavit, quos & Diſputationibus tam publicis quam privatis in Schola habitis addebat, tanquam ὕψιστον venenum nonnunquam inſperſit, ac juventutem non parum turbavit. Sed fraus diu latere non potuit ſagaciores Theologos, qui fermentum illud odorati, magno conatu & zelo hominem monuerunt, ut reſpiceret: juxta illud: Retundat me juſtus: benignitas erit: & corripiat me: unguentum erit præſantiſſimum. Quin & ipſe Generoſus Dn. Comes, admonitus à viris gravibus, Doctorem ſuum ſerio hortatus fuit, ut in gratiam rediret cum Eccleſiis & fratribus, quos ſua καὶνοδοξία magno totius Eccleſiæ ſcandalo non ceſſaret offendere: nec ante ad munus docendi in ſua ſchola rediret, quàm Teſtimonium Ὁρθοδοξίας auferret, ab iſi præſertim, qui publicam docendi facultatem in Academiis ei fuiſſent largiti (8). - - - Not long before the faculty of Divinity had conferred the higheſt honours, viz. the degree of Doctor on the famous CONRAD VORSTIUS of Cologne. He was afterwards on account of his ſingular erudition, acuteness in diſputing, and perſpicuity in teaching, recommended by DAVID PAREWS to that noble Lord ARNOLD Count of Bentheim, in order that he ſhould make him Profeſſor of Divinity in the illuſtrious ſchool newly erected at Steinfurt. For ſome time that he taught there he was in high reputation for his orthodoxy, but at laſt being hurried away by the ſubtlety of his genius, or by a deſire of teaching a new doctrine, he ſell a reading that impious book of FAUSTUS SOCINUS de Servatore: nay he did more, for he courted and cultivated the author's friendſhip. From that time he cunningly beſought himſelf of the means to corrupt the received doctrine concerning the propitiatory ſatiſfaction of JESUS CHRIST, and both in his private and public diſputations he did now and then mix the hidden poiſon, and not a little corrupt the youthful ſtudents. This fraud could not long eſcape the notice of judicious Divines, who diſcovering the leaven did with great zeal and earneſtneſs admoniſh him to repent: according to that ſaying; Let the righteous man ſmite me; it ſhall be a kindneſs: let him reprove me; it ſhall be as a moſt precious ointment. Nay the noble Count abovementioned, being informed of it by ſome conſiderable perſons, did ſeriously adviſe his Divine to return into favour with the churches and his brethren, whom he did not ceaſe to offend with his new opinions to the great ſcandal of the whole church. He likewiſe exhorted him not to reſume his office of teaching till ſuch time as he had obtained a teſtimonial of orthodoxy, particularly from thoſe perſons who had conferred on him the privilege of teaching publicly in academies.'

[D] After one year's conſideration he accepted that employment. Nothing was wanting in this invitation: it had been approved by the States of Holland, and by Prince Maurice, who alſo ordered the deputies, one of which was his own miniſter, to preſs Vorſtius to the utmoſt, to come and ſerve the univerſity of Leyden. Adeo quidem benigne, ut illuſtriſſi Principi reverendum virum D. Joannem Wienbogaardum (it was his miniſter) una cum viro clariff. Dn. Nicolao Zeſſio Synodice Leydenſi, cum mandatis mitteret, ut hortaretur quantum poſſet Dominum Vorſtium, ne petitionem ac vocationem hanc Ordinum & Curatorum fruſtraneam eſſe vellet (9). But I believe without the earneſt and preſſing ſolicitations of the Arminians, Vorſtius had never embarked in that boiſterous ſea. He was beloved and honoured at Steinfurt, he there enjoyed a perfect eaſe, and had a very great reputation, and as the ſtate of the controverſies betwixt Arminius and Gomarus then was, he doubtleſs foreſaw the many oppoſitions which he was like to meet with in Holland. They tempted him, if I am not miſtaken, with the glory of ſupporting a party, which the death of Arminius had weakened. To this were added the motives drawn from conſcience: it was repreſented to him that he would one day be obliged to anſwer for the ill uſe of his talents, if the love of eaſe made him loſe ſuch a favourable opportunity of eſtabliſhing the truth where it had already taken root. However that be, it was his ill ſtars made him leave the county of Bentheim, and remove to Holland, where being toſſed betwixt a thouſand ſhoals and rocks, he at laſt was miſerably ſhipwrecked, and loſt both his reputation and fortune, being branded with diſhonour both by the ſecular and eccleſiaſtical tribunals. This was a good argument againſt Arminianiſm; this was what would oblige one to acknowledge the fatality of events. His panegyriſt affords me this thought. 'Vir optimus, ſaith he (10), jam litium Theologicarum quæ in Belgio inter Eccleſiaſticos exortæ erant, gnarus & ob eas non temere tam duram provinciam capiendæ ratus, non quidem prorſus quod offerebatur repudiavit, fed toto nihilominus pene anno aſſenſum ſuſpendit. Idque eo magis quod tenſo ac tenaci quodam germaniſimæ benevolentie vinculo alligatus à ſuis ægerime avelli poſſet, certatim contra adnitentibus omnibus ut decus illud ſcholæ novellæ retineretur: ſed currebant jam propinqua viri FATA, quæ ipſum quoque communi & immeritæ cladi involvendum DESTINAVERANT.' If Vorſtius had continued quiet at Steinfurt, the errors of his treatiſe de Deo had not ſignified much, and he had eaſily recovered that falſe ſtep: but the queſtion being whether he ſhould teach Theology at Leyden or not, that is, whether one growing party ſhould ſupplant the other, nothing was pardoned in him; his treatiſe de Deo grew worſe than the Alcoran. This parallel is not of my invention; I find it in the author juſt now cited. 'Reipſa comperimus, ſaith he (11), vehementius & acerbius librum iſtum opugnante quam unquam quiſquam Chriſtianorum Mahumedis Alcoranum, aut recutitorum Talmudica deliria invaſit. Neque unquam Lucianus, Porphyrius, Julianus, Libanius aut quiſquis ſimili in Chriſtianos maledicentia fuit, tam crude & barbære exceptus à veteribus ſcriptoribus, qui tamen etiam habebant acetum in pectore, atque hic Noſter ab infrunitis adverſariis ſuis male multatus ob ſerium & ſolidum illud ſcriptum. - - - In effect, we found that this book was more violently attacked than ever the Alcoran of Mahomet, or the nonſenſical notions in the Jewiſh Talmud had been by any Chriſtian. Nor were Lucian, Porphyry, Julian, Libanius, and the like ſcurrilous writers againſt Chriſtianity, ſo cruelly and barbarouſly handled by the Fathers, who by the by did not want their own ſhare of gall, as this Vorſtius has been ill treated by his injudicious adverſaries, on account of that grave and ſolid performance.' We ſhall ſee in the remark [O] the prejudice which the Arminians did their cauſe by calling in Vorſtius.

[E] The moſt authentic teſtimonials of orthodoxy. In his Hiſtory we have the teſtimonial which the Counts of Bentheim gave him, and that with which the illuſtrious ſchool of Steinfurt preſented him. I ſhall only cite a very ſmall part of the elogies which thoſe teſtimonials beſtow upon him (12). 'Poſt exceſſum nominati pientiffimi Domini parentis noſtri hæctenus fidelem ipſius operam, vitam irreprehenſibilem, Chriſtianam & puram doctrinam atque institutionem, & inde conſecutam propagationem & ædificationem Eccleſiæ & Scholæ reipſa experti ſumus. - - - After the

(8) Philippi. Pareus, in Vita David. Parei, pag. m. 55. 56.

Arminian's fate & destiny

(11) Ibid. fol. M. 2.

(12) Ibid. fol. P.

tius (14) But if this en, wretched Vorin stius should deny or use any equi-

the States, earnestly exhorting them to banish that man, though at the same time he should deny the errors laid to his charge; for if he owned, and was convicted of them, his Majesty did not doubt in the least, but that he ought to be burnt (14). He declares, that if vigorous attempts are not made in order to extirpate this growing Atheism, he will publicly protest against those abominations, and separate himself from the union of such false and heretical churches, and as defender of the Faith, he will exhort all other Reformed Churches to take a general resolution, in order to extinguish, and send back to hell those abominable heresies lately sprung up, and particularly he will forbid any of his subjects to frequent such an infectious place as the university of Leyden.

den. Vorlius was intalled at Leyden before the letter of King James was delivered to the States. Wherefore the English Envoy, when he presented it, made a very vehement speech against his installation, and threatened the United-Provinces with the enmity of the King, his master, if they tolerated Vorlius. He was answered, that this Professor had received orders to desist from the exercise of his function, till he had answered the accusations against him: and that this affair would be examined before the States of Holland in February next. The Ambassador very little satisfied with this answer, made another speech to protest against those proceedings, and threatened the States not only with the enmity, but also with the pen of King James (15). He was answered as before, and told that the States were certain that his Majesty would be content with the proceedings of the States of Holland. Notwithstanding this answer that Prince published a book, in which he gave the world an account of his conduct, and the reasons of it, and very zealously argued against Vorlius; Vorlius published a short answer to the extracts which that monarch had communicated to the States out of the book de Deo. This he dedicated to the States, on the fifteenth of December 1611. It is written with all due deference and respect to King James.

(15) He will make it appear by the manifesto he intends to publish how much he abhors and detests the Atheism and Heresies of Vortius, and all those who maintain them. In the Mercur François, ibid. pag. 468.

(17) See the remark [K].

the famous conference of the Hague (18) propofed their grievances againſt Vorſtius on the twenty-ninth of April 1611. They accuſed him of ſeveral Socinian doctrines, and maintained that his book de Deo, favoured more of an Atheiſt than of a Divine. The States ordered them to make good their accusations againſt Vorſtius to his face in their preſence, and Vorſtius to defend his own cauſe. This was done in preſence of fix Miniſters whom each party had deputed, and of the Curators of the univerſity of Leyden: and after Vorſtius had been heard, the States determined that there was no reaſon why his call to the Profeſſorſhip ſhould not take place in it's full extent (19). So that though the Contra remonſtrant-Miniſters rejected his

(18) Compoſed of fix Calviniſts, and as many Arminian miniſters.

(19) See the hypoſtenuſed, Pacificatorum diſſecti Belgii, per Solomonem Theodorum, pag. 614 & ſeq.

6 N

answers.

in order to expect elsewhere a definitive sentence concerning this dispute. He retired to Tergou about May 1612, where he lived quiet [H] till the year 1619, when he was forced to leave Holland: for the Synod of Dort having declared him unworthy of the Professor's chair [I], the States of the Province deprived him of that employment, and condemned him to a perpetual banishment. I do not certainly know where he went; but answers, Vorstius had triumphed, if an unhappy accident had not come in the way: this is the second thing the Historian ought to have related. Some of Vorstius's disciples published, in Friesland, a small tract de officio Christiani hominis, containing several Antitrinitarian doctrines. This tract was publickly burnt: Some of those who caused it to be printed were discovered, and some letters were found upon them which were published, containing a great many encomiums on Vorstius, and several suspicious things relating to several other Divines. Those who published these letters added a warning to all Reformed Churches to give them an alarm. They canvassed all Vorstius's books, what he had dictated, and his manuscripts, in order to find matter to charge him with. The States of Friesland informed those of Holland and the Curators of the university of Leyden of all this. It was therefore necessary that Vorstius should solemnly clear himself, and declare, that though he had wrote sometimes to the Polish Socinians, he was very far from being of their opinion; and that whatever he did was only to inform himself better of their opinions, and that he did the same thing with respect to the Jesuits, to whom he never scrupled to write. He delivered the profession of his faith signed by himself, concerning the mystery of the Trinity, and the divinity of CHRIST; and on the twenty-second of May 1612, he pronounced an apologetical oration before the States of Holland (20). We shall see, below, that all this engaged him to publish several books.

[H] He lived quiet at Tergou.] This appears by the testimonial of the magistrates of that city, dated on the 20th of July 1619, which certifies, that for the space of seven years and three months that he lived there, he behaved himself like an honest and good man (21). His Historian producing this certificate, observes, that the magistrates who gave it, were of the modern establishment, that is, very averse to the Arminians. Let us here observe two faults of which Paul Freherus is guilty. He saith (22), that Vorstius being removed to Holland, and finding the troubles there increase every day, gave over acting as Professor, and retired to Steinfurt, till the magistrates decided the difference. This is his first error; for Tergou, and not Steinfurt, was the place of retreat which he chose. Freherus adds, that because Vorstius succeeded Arminius, he had great disputes with Gomarus. This is another mistake; for it implies, that besides, and after the differences which obliged Vorstius to retire, he had some particular quarrels with Gomarus. But this is false in two respects: for he had no difference with Gomarus, who retired into Zeland, because he would not have him for his colleague (23); and if there had been any disputes betwixt them, they must doubtless have been the same which forced him to retire to Tergou.

[I] The Synod of Dort having declared him unworthy of the Professor's chair.] His Historian odiously exaggerates this circumstance; he tells us, that they condemned Vorstius without any regard to his petition to be heard, before he was sentenced. And there is so much rancour and ill language in this part of his history, that I am not willing to soil my paper with it; and shall cite only what is a meer narrative, or what is so closely connected with it, that to omit it would make all the rest obscure. And if I cite any disagreeable expressions, they shall be those which have the least harshness. 'Procurante . . . Bogermanno effectum est ut Vorstius absens inauditusque condemnatus & professoris titulo ac honore indignus declaratus sit . . . ut cujus doctrina in Ecclesiis & Scholis reformatis nequaquam toleranda, sed cum detestatione penitus eliminanda atque extirpanda esset. Non obstant quod tam serio rogatu per literas ambierit ut Synodus ipsum audire, errorum ac hæresum (quas clamabant) legitimè ac liquè ex verbo Dei convincere, & Christiana lenitate rectora docere vellet. Cuius equidem iudicii ac sententiæ damnatoris, quam nihil aliud quam crassa invidia confavit, & Vorstii ad ceterum istum epistolæ satis serie

& proluxæ, si vel minimam adhuc honesti sanguinis guttam habent, sacro sancti scilicet Concilii illius togatos patres æternum pudere debet. Maxime cum tam probas colloqui conditiones, itemque alia pro veritate adversus hæreticos præstanda offerret. Sed viri hujus linguam ac legitimam cum eo disputationem pejus isti lucifugæ formidabant, quam fullo ululam. . . . As the solicitation . . . of Bogermannus, Vorstius being absent and unheard was condemned, and declared unworthy of the title and dignity of Professor . . . as a man whose doctrine was by no means to be tolerated in the Reformed churches and schools, but deserved to be rooted up and cast out with abhorrence. This was done to him notwithstanding his having earnestly begged in his letters that the Synod would bear him, correct him of those errors and heresies, which they raised such a clamour about, fairly and clearly from the word of GOD, and set him right with such meekness as became Christians. If they have the least spark of honesty left, the reverend Fathers of that most holy Council ought ever to blush when they reflect upon their judgment and sentence of condemnation, proceeding from nothing else but rank envy, and upon the long and serious epistles which Vorstius sent to their assembly: especially since he offered such reasonable conditions for a conference, and to come into other measures that were necessary for the support of truth against Heretics. But these sons of darkness feared this man's tongue, and the having a fair dispute with him, more than an owl dreads the light.' Thus Vorstius's friends accounted it a glorious thing for him that the Synod would not hear his defence: they pretended that the Synod was terribly afraid of his great ability, of the force of his eloquence, and of the weight of his reasons; in short, that they feared to be overcome in a dispute. But now let us see what this Historian saith concerning the sentence of the States of the Province. 'Post hunc sacri fulminis fragorem, alia Vorstium & immitior tempestas, quod necessum erat, excepit. Mox enim à promulgata Flaminum sententia in suffragium eunt Senatus populi Belgarum, & de capite innoxii Vorstii statuunt in hunc modum. 'Juxta sententiam venerande Synodi Dordracenæ Vorstius functionibus suis in Academia Leydensi movetur, salariumque suum deinceps ibidem ei procedere vetatur. Præterea Hollandia & Westfrisia ei interdicitur, illaque infra sex septimanas excedere jubetur, & in eam non redire sub pæna arbitraria illi, ut perturbatori publicæ pacis, irroganda. Scilicet quia judicatum est ejus in isto tractu commorationem Reip. damnosam esse. . . . After the violent crack of this sacred thunderbolt, another and a more severe storm must necessarily fall upon Vorstius. For immediately after the sentence of the worthy Clergy was published, the States of Holland came to a resolution, and passed judgment upon the innocent Vorstius in the following manner: According to the sentence of the venerable Synod of Dort, Vorstius is removed from his office in the university of Leyden, and thenceforward deprived of his salary. He is likewise banished out of Holland and West-Friesland, and ordered to depart from the former within six weeks, and not to return to it under the penalty of undergoing, as a disturber of the public peace, what punishment shall be thought proper to be inflicted upon him; and that because his further stay in this country is judged detrimental to the Commonwealth.'

Some persons having told me, that I ought to cite the express terms of the synodical condemnation of Vorstius, I shall here insert part of it. 'The High and Mighty States-General, having by their noble and honourable Deputies, enjoined this Synod to declare summarily their opinion concerning the Theology or Doctrine contained in the writings of Conrad Vorstius, Doctor of Divinity; and likewise whether it may be safely taught, to the edification and advantage of the Reformed Churches, or whether the toleration of it can consist with true piety: this venerable Synod, after having, in the fear of God, well and duly considered and examined all things, hath, and doth unanimously by these presents

(20) Ex eodem Pacificatorio Belgii diffusi, pag. 64, & seq.

(21) Sæpe in omni conversatione & actionibus gesserit honeste, probe, modeste, & ad exemplum, nec quicquam nisi aliud quod ad mores & vitam ejus attinet observaverimus. Apud Marcum Gualtherum.

(22) Theatr. Virorum illustrium, pag. 163.

(23) See the Life of Gomarus among those of the Professors of Groningen, pag. 77.

but he continued concealed for the space of two years, and his life was more than once in danger [K], there being several persons who, transported by a furious zeal, thought that a man of his character ought not to be suffered to live. At last a Duke of Holstein having received the scattered remnants of the Arminians, and assigned them a place in his dominions, in order to build a town, Vorstius found some security and repose: for he retired into that country in June 1622. But he fell sick shortly after, and died at Tonningen on the twenty-ninth of September following. He discovered very signal marks of a pious resignation to the Divine will in his last moments; and we are told that he was always very devout, and very fervent in prayer (c) [L]. His corps was carried to Friderichstadt,

(c) Taken from the Oratio de Vita & obitu Conradi Vorstii, pronounced at Friderichstadt by Mark Gualtherus, and printed in 1624, in 4to.

(24) Acts of the Synod of Dort, Session clii, pag. 388, translated by Richard John de Neve, printed at Leyden, 1624, in 4to.

prefers declare, that the said Conrad Vorstius, in his last writings, namely in that concerning God and his Attributes, besides defending the errors of the five articles of the Remonstrants, which are rejected by this Synod, hath partly called in question not only one or two articles of the Christian and Reformed religion, but also doubts of several of the principal of them, for example, the following; that of the Trinity (24) . . . and that he partly affirms and lays down several assertions, which are wholly and diametrically opposite to the truth which God hath revealed to us in the Holy Scriptures, and to the confessions of all the Reformed Churches. . . . Besides, in several places he has dangerously enervated and weakened the chief and strongest arguments, which the venerable Fathers, as well as the modern Divines of the Reformed Church, have justly drawn from the word of God, and made use of to establish and maintain the orthodox doctrine, especially of the eternal Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, without either producing or substituting any others in their room to prove more powerfully, and support the doctrine which he opposes. That he industriously advances, and to the utmost of his power several sophisms, and vain arguments, which intangle and obscure truth, without ever endeavouring to resolve them, but leaves them as they are, that they may the more easily be fixed in the minds of the readers; whence clearly appears his subtle design of preparing the way, and clandestinely opening a gate, in order to infiltrate the wicked and impious Heresies of Socinus and others; and consequently to seduce and deceive the world, under the specious pretext of a search after truth. That in vain, and to no effect, he has hitherto disguised and varnished his opinions, with several impertinent distinctions, frivolous excuses, miserable subterfuges, deceitful and fraudulent dissimulations and glosses. Wherefore the preposterous and inordinate liberty which he makes use of to dispute and question the most important articles of the Christian religion; and the wavering, dubious, and uncertain way of instruction which he practises, are very dangerous and pernicious to the Church, and by no means fitting and agreeable to such sacred and sublime subjects, and consequently unworthy of an orthodox Professor (25) . . . And declares the said Conrad Vorstius . . . utterly unworthy of the employment and title of Professor or Doctor in the Reformed Churches. Finally, this synodical assembly seriously and earnestly petitions the High and Mighty States-General, that, by virtue of their sovereign authority, they would be pleased to remove from the Reformed Churches, that scandalous and common stumbling-block, and to take care for the future, that the Churches of the Low-Countries may not be polluted and defiled with such pernicious principles, heresies, and blasphemies, and to that end use all necessary prudence and caution entirely to suppress all the writings of the said Vorstius, and of those who are tainted with the same leaven (26). Vorstius wrote a very well turned answer to this synodical sentence: It is printed at large in the book which I cite (27).

(25) Ibid. pag. 589.

(26) Ibid. pag. 590.

(27) Epistole Ecclesiasticae & Theologicae praestantium ac eruditum Virorum, pag. 588. 6^a 7^a Edit. 1684. It is the same book which I call sometimes barely the Letters of the Arminians.

words, which are: Ut ut quietem & securitatem aliquam in isto suo latibulo speraret, tamen fieri non potuit quin singulis pens diebus & noctibus centenis mortibus encaretur, cum turpissimi proditores (genus hominum publico exitio repertum) jugem operam darent uti virum latitantem investigare, extrahere, in manus persecutorum tradere, & nefario indicii premio exhiberari possent. Quoties istic domum mutasse, quoties noctes in somnes ex metu jamjam irruentium duxisse, quoties scalas fenestris suis applicatas ad subitum effugium habuisse putatis? Quoties in extrema conseruatione arbitramini constitutum fuisse, cum non raro omnes cum domibus suis recipere negarent periculi timore? Cum Ibrajones martii & anticam & posticam cum schopetis oneratis observarent adium quibus tegi putaretur? In tantis angustiis biennium circiter assumpsit (28). It was then that he had much reason to wish for the epitaph, which a Poet that was one of his friends, uli supra, p. N. supplied that he desired several years before.

At vos posteritas tumulto hæc inscribite verba,
Posthuma fortunæ signa futura meæ.
Nulla Reformatæ mihi pars dilectior unquam, Nulla Reformatæ pars minus æqua mihi (29).

The Protestants above all sects I lov'd,
No sect to me less equitable prov'd.
This epitaph let after-ages see Inscrib'd upon my tomb, for it shall be
A sign to them, when I shall be no more,
Of what my fortune was

We may make a remarkable observation on the ill effects of a religious zeal, viz. It takes away all remorse of crimes, and disables a man from making use of the sole way of obtaining pardon of God for his sins, which is only to be effected by repentance. Those who designed to beat, rob, or assassinate Vorstius, to throw him into a dungeon, or load him with invectives, thought they did a very good action, and an acceptable service to God: they were not therefore touched with any remorse, and thereby induced to apply to the Divine Mercy; and consequently died in their impenitence. This is a precipice which ought to be fully considered by every one who makes it his business to inflame the minds of the populace against erroneous Divines.

[L] And very fervent in prayer.] His Panegyrist says very surprizing things concerning his patience, in the midst of the invectives, which were showered on his head. 'Possem, auditores, ad singulas istas patientiæ seu species seu proprietates viva exempla proferre, maxime ad devoratas cum patientia nulli linguæ dicenda osorum, zelotarum, hostium insolentias, distentia, scommata, convicia, calumnias quas à prima vigore ἀμύν faci furoris Corybantum in Belgio aliquot annis libenter & bono ex assuetudine stomacho concocit, propter conscientiam & celestem veritatem, tam à devotis illis religiosi ordinis capitibus, quam à promiscua populi fece, & quibusdam thrafonibus qui se Martii pullos & Bellonæ filios, festivo, Hercules, elogio ornare solent, possem, inquam, hujus rei viva & vera & admiranda exempla vobis referre, nisi me tempus, &c (30). . . . I could, my hearers, (30) Gualtherus, alludge lively examples to illustrate all the different kinds and qualities of his patience, particularly as to his bearing, with unspeakable temper, the insolence of his bigotted

(29) These few verses are the conclusion of an Epigram containing eight Distichs at the end of an Elogy upon Vorstius, in the book intitled, Illustrium Hollandiæ & West-Frisiæ Ordinum alma Academia Leidensis, printed at Leyden in the year 1614. The six foregoing verses are:

Nunc fratrum in me verba cohors, & prodiga scilicet
Æmula civili prælia Marte gerit.
Nec calemio stant bella virum: depositur ipsa
Victima, & infantis supplicium fidei.
Sed mediis erecta malis mens conscia rebus,
Freta Deo, nulli succubat invidia.

My brethren now my persecutors are,
And zealously promote a civil war;
Nor yet contented with a paper strife,
They for my guiltless faith, demand my life.
But be, that his own innocence knows,
Still rests untroubled in the midst of woes,
In God his pious confidence doth place,
And neither yields to envy nor disgrace.

act horse
with

Friderichstadt, the new city of the Arminians, where he had an honourable burial. He had published several books [M], as well against the Roman Catholics as against his Protestant adversaries. The disputes raised against him, were doubtless intermixed with a great deal of passion; but after all, those who suspected him to be strongly inclined to Socinianism, were not much in the wrong [N]; and perhaps he had made a public profession of that doctrine, if he had not followed the maxim which the Roman Catholics alledge

'biggotted enemies, their reproaches, taunts, railings, and calumnies, which, proceeding from the fresh and holy fury of the mad Priests in Holland, he has, for some years, been accustomed to digest, for the sake of truth and a good conscience; being treated in this manner not only by these devout ringleaders of the Clergy, but also by the promiscuous rabble, and by certain bullies, who are used with a mighty pretty sort of vanity, forsooth, to stile themselves the sons of Mars and Bellona: I say, I could alledge lively, true, and wonderful examples of all this, if it were not that the time, &c.' He adds, that he was often found on his knees in the exercise of prayer. Quam multos esse eos putatis qui illum inter precandum humi in genua abiectionem, & in conclavi alicubi solum de improvviso non semel oppræsserunt? There is no Christian virtue, in which he is not represented to excel; but above all we are told he made a pious end: to which purpose consult not only our Gualtherus, but also a letter which the author of Vorstius's funeral oration (31), wrote to one of his friends, which is amongst those of the Arminians, pag. 684, of the edition in folio.

(31) This Oration was made in Dutch by John Grevius. See the Letters of the Arminians, pag. 684.

(32) Printed at Steinfurt, in 1610.

[M] He had published several books. Of these I have already mentioned two, one of which is a collection of several Theological theses, and the other the famous and pernicious tract, de Deo, seu disputationes decem de natura & attributis Dei, diverso tempore Steinfurti publicè habitæ (32). Before this book appeared, he published his Idea seu brevis Synopsis totius sacre Theologie: A book of prayers in the German language: his disputationes de causis deferendi Romani Papatus: his Index Errorum Ecclesie Romanæ, subiecto cuique capiti Antidoto: his German treatise of Indulgences: his Tessaradecas Anti-Pistoriana, seu Responsi ad Librum Johannis Pistorii de quatuordecim articulis in Religione controversis: his Apology pro Ecclesiâ orthodoxis contra Jesuitas, and his Antapodixes de tribus primis fidei articulis, sive contrariæ Demonstrationes tres quibus totidem Jesuiticæ Apodixes à B. D. adversus Apologiam emissæ confutantur. In the year 1610 came out his Anti-Bellarminus contractus, seu brevis Refutatio quatuor tomorum Bellarmini. His other works were written after his removal to Holland, and relate to the Arminian disputes, or rather to his book de Deo. Many writers appeared against him, whom he opposed, as well as he could for some time: but he was at last forced to give way to number, and he grew weary of continually repeating the same things. The Frieslanders were his most violent enemies, as Bogerman, Minister of Leeuwarden, and Sibrandus Lubbertus, Divinity Professor at Franeker. Against the latter he wrote Catalogus Errorum Sibrandi: Prænesti ad Sibrandum: & Scholia alexicaca ad Commentarios Sibrandi. I do not mention his Exegesis Apologetica pro Tractatu de eodem, which he published in 1611; nor his Prodromus adversus criminationes quorundam fratrum; nor the Pleuius Responsum ad easdem illas criminationes: but I shall say something of his dispute with Piscator. It contains, 1. Paraservæ ad amicam Collationem cum Joanne Piscatore, super notis hujus ad loca quedam ex illius Tractatu de Deo & Exegesi apologetica pridem excerpta. 2. Amica Collatio cum eodem Piscatore. 3. Amica Duplicatio una cum Appendice sive Paralipomenis ad tripartitam Responsonem apologeticam Piscatoris. 4. Examen Tractatus Piscatoris de divina Prædestinatione. He did not make any answer to Sopingius a Friesland Minister, nor to Brokerus, a Minister in North-Holland; but he took other measures with Matthew Slade, an Englishman, who fell upon him with a terrible fury. He printed an answer to him at Tergou, in the year 1615. This Slade was Rector of the public school at Amsterdam, and took pen in hand in defence of his sovereign the King of England, who desired the States to banish Vorstius. It was impossible for any book to be written more angrily, one only excepted, which indeed was more outrageous, and published by another of that Prince's subjects; I mean George Eglishem, a Scotch

Physician who lived at the Hague, and wrote Crissi & Hypocrisis Vorstiani Responsi, where, in a juridical manner, he accused him to the States of Atheism, Paganism, Judaism, Turcism, Heresy, Schism, and Ignorance (33). He sent him several challenges to appear and defend himself; and addressing himself to the States, he tells them that he requests and expects a strict examination to be made, and that either Vorstius or his accusers should be punished (34). This was to come close to the point, and nothing can be more just, than such an alternative: and nevertheless nothing is more rare than to see calumniators on the score of Heresy and impiety, brought to condign punishment. It is thought sufficient to absolve the innocent, and instead of punishing the accuser according to Lex Talionis, he is sometimes thanked for his great zeal, or at most admonished that he ought not to have gone so fast. However, this Physician made very fair proposals, but he was sure that he ran no risk, how absurd and contradictory soever his accusation might be found: for King James's menaces to the Republic of the United-Provinces, if they protected Vorstius, entirely rid his accusers of all manner of fear. It is not therefore surprizing that Vorstius suffered the challenges of this Scotchman to fall to the ground; he might easily have confounded him in three words. It had been sufficient for him to have barely said, You accuse me of Atheism; but according to your own words my doctrine is Judaical, Mahometan, and Heretical; and the light itself is not more clear, than it is that the Jews, Mahometans, and Heretics, are not Atheists; whence it plainly follows, by the express terms of your accusation, that I am innocent of Atheism; and if you make good your charge of Heresy, I ought to be deprived of the professor's chair, but the Lex Talionis directs that you should be put to death. But the Scotchman would have laughed at an answer of this nature, and without being ashamed of his calumnies, have relied on his impunity, and consequently would have fully triumphed if they had only convicted his adversary of Heresy. There are several posthumous works of Vorstius, some commentaries on the scripture, &c. See the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (35).

[N] Those who suspected him to be very strongly inclined to Socinianism were not much in the wrong. The Socinians offered him a professorship of Divinity in the year 1601, and deputed Jerom Moscorovius to treat with him on that affair (36). This I own is no convincing proof of his Socinianism, and his apology on this point may be seen in a letter to Uytenbogaard (37). But what can be alledged against Sandius, who assures us (38), that having for some time been in doubt whether he should rank Vorstius among the Unitarians, he was no longer in suspense after he had seen the confession signed by Vorstius on his death-bed: 'In qua, sait he, haud obscure prodit quæ ejus de Deo ac Christo Domino fuerit sententia. . . . In which he plainly enough discovers his opinion concerning God and the Lord CHRIST.' He adds, that when Vorstius published the treatise of Faustus Socinus de Autoritate Sacre Scripturæ, he prefixed to it a preface of his own, and he ascribes to him the book intitled Compendium Doctrinæ Socinianorum, which Cloppenburg refuted, and ascribed to Ostorodius and Voldovius. But none of these evidences are of any force except his own confession of faith, written and signed by himself on his death-bed.

It must indeed be owned that a writing of this nature very strongly confirms the suspicions which had so long prevailed concerning him: but yet this doth not deprive us of the liberty of conjecturing, that the oppositions and disgraces which he suffered, might complot what a too inquisitive and innovating genius had began. I mean, that perhaps the accusing him of being a Socinian, and treating him ill on that account, made him turn one in good earnest; and that he would have been cured of these particular whims, if he had found an honourable repose in the Reformed Church.

(31) See de Pœdicatorem Belgici diffidit, p. 74.

(34) Super his alijsq. ita Oratio effatur: Rigidissimum etiam rursus expecto de expetito. Aut enim Vorstius à me aliq. que pene omnibus Atheismi accusatus plectendus est, aut accusers tum penam temere litigationem, tum calumniarum multam passuri, aut penam de decore afflicti. See the same book pag. 71.

(35) Pag. 98, 99. See also the remark (P), of the article SOCINUS (PAR. 1701).

(36) Sandius, in Biblioth. Antitrinitariorum, pag. 98. Says that the Polis brethren rejected in the year 1600. in Synodo Lubberti, exco. Vorstium ad synodum Lugdunensem repudium.

(37) It is the preface to the folio edition of the letters of the Arminians, pag. 917.

(38) Bibl. Antitrinitariorum, p. 94.

alledge against the Reformers; viz. That when we are convinced the Church wants reforming, we ought to continue in the communion of it, the more successfully to eradicate its errors. He very much prejudiced the Arminian party (d) [O]. The English deputies at the Synod of Dort were the principal promoters of the proscription of this professor [P].

Their

(d) See his letter to Pareus, among those of the Arminians, pag. 302, Edit. in folio.

Suspicion marks of in point (39) Seneca, Epist. iii. become in mind

Church. For nothing in the world so naturally disguises a man against orthodoxy, as being persecuted by orthodox men. And I am of opinion that what but too commonly happens in cases of friendship and fidelity, is also very frequent in the case of Heresy. We teach people to be false when we suspect them to be so. Fidelem si putaveris facies. Nam multi fallere docuerunt dum timent falli, & alius jus peccandi fupicando fecerunt (39). -- Esteem a man faithful and you shall make him so. For many have taught others to deceive while they were afraid of being deceived, and have given them a right to transgress by suspecting them. A jealous husband often draws on himself the disgrace which he might have prevented by a conduct free from suspicion. And thus it fares with clamorous people, who when any difficulties are proposed to them, or any person happens to differ from the common opinion, cannot see it without raising virulent suspicions against that person, and endeavouring to render him suspected by the whole world; and thus they are the cause of his becoming what indeed he never was. Several causes produce this change: it would be more advantageous and less scandalous not to proceed to a rupture. Yet there are some junctures wherein clamours against suspected persons prove very serviceable to a cause. It is when under the specious disguise of friendship, and assisted by a great reputation, they endeavour to pervert every body. How difficult is it to lay down good rules, when the very same conduct proves sometimes pernicious, and sometimes advantageous!

[O] He very much prejudiced the Arminian party.]

The obtaining of Vorstius to succeed Arminius in the Professor's chair, at Leyden, was believed to be a master-stroke of that party, and yet, on the contrary, nothing redounded more to the advantage of the enemies of the Remonstrants. Vorstius gave them such a handle by his new way of dogmatizing on the Divine Attributes, and made it so easy to raise public suspicions against him, that his adversaries were not at much trouble to render him odious. After this it was not difficult for persons who wanted neither zeal, nor tongues, nor pens, to cast on the whole Arminian party, all the odium raised against the new Professor; for that end, they had no more to do but urge the pressing instances made by Arminius's friends to get this man to Leyden. Thus Divine Providence is daily pleased to confound human prudence: what we toil at the most indefatigably, as the most substantial of all our hopes, most frequently proves our ruin. We ought to observe, that when Arminius's friends cast their eyes on the Professor of Steinfurt, they believed him entirely clear of the Socinian Heresy (40); but was it easy to convince prepossessed persons, or to hinder the very same people from urging the contrary? I am of opinion that what I have several times heard repeated is probable enough; to wit, that Arminius and the Divines of his opinion would have done a great service to their cause, if they had kept a profound silence. Their five articles are of an insinuating nature; and the Calvinists as well as the Lutherans would insensibly have grown Arminians, if nature only had been left to work. The ancient Church was not of St Augustin's opinion. That Father was the occasion of its embracing that doctrine, which is at present called Calvinism; but it insensibly returned to its pristine state. And if the doctrine of Predestination and its consequences are vigorously maintained by those of the Reformed party, it is because disputes have occasioned two factions, and a schism which is yet in being. The Church of England, which looked upon her self as a separate body, and disengaged from that wherein this schism was formed, was not prepossessed with the flaming zeal raised by this dispute in the minds of the Contra-remonstrants; whence it is that by slow degrees they have inclined to mitigated hypotheses, which are very different from Calvinism: the same would have happened in Holland, if Arminius had not formed a party. This is what I have frequently heard from very judicious men; I do not pretend to examine whether they are in the right or not.

I shall only observe, that it would be a great mistake to assert that the Arminian disputes have not raised several troubles among the English Divines; for the time hath been, when those who were suspected to be of that side suffered persecution in that kingdom (41). Mr Des Maizeaux (42) has communicated to me several curious particulars on this head, which he has extracted from some English books, and perhaps I shall publish them in the Supplement to this Dictionary. We ought not then to imagine that the Church of England hath been exempt from contests on the subject of Grace; no, she hath had her share in that controversy, and even before the Synod of Dort. But two things must indeed be owned, one of which is, that before that time the English Divines enjoyed a greater liberty of rejecting Calvin's hypothesis concerning Predestination, and the extinction of Free-will, than those of other countries: the other is, that since the re-establishment of Episcopacy, under Charles II, the controversies on these points have made little noise in Great Britain; nor were there any great quarrels concerning them, and it is to the favourable opportunity which this calm afforded, that the growing and spreading of Arminius's hypothesis is to be ascribed. Those who relished his opinions, did not disturb others, and this sort of moderation lessened their zeal for the Synod of Dort. The following citation will confirm the former of these observations, and inform us what was said at Oxford on a solemn occasion, by a Professor of Divinity in the presence of a numerous assembly: 'Quæ sit in Anglia Calvinianæ auctoritatis, dicam. Anno 1608 Mense Julio, in publicis comitiis, ut vocant, quæ quotannis semel in florissimum istius regni Academiis, quibus nescio an in toto terrarum orbe possint esse antiquiores, & Collegiorum numero, amplitudine, & structura magnificentia præstantiores, habentur, ac tum solennis in omnibus facultatibus promotio celebratur, quæ res ibi maxime visu digna est: Oxoniæ, Doctor Olandus, Theologus, & Promotor tum designatus, hoc de Calvino judicium testimoniumque ex altâ cathedrali, in mille hominum præsentia, proferebat: Calvinus vir fuit doctus, sed non scriptis in omnibus Catholicis: item paulo post: Calvinianæ sententiæ de Deo peccati auctore neque defendi, neque excusari potest: quia ille aperte Catholicorum nudam permissionem deridet, & efficacis Dei voluntatis cum peccato concursum introducit (43). -- I shall shew what authority Calvin has in England. In the month of July 1608, at a public assembly, which is held once every year in the universities of this flourishing kingdom, (and I know not whether any other universities in the world can be said to surpass these, either for their antiquity, or for the number, largeness, and stately structure of their colleges) on which occasion there is a solemn promotion made in all the Faculties, which is a thing that greatly deserves to be seen. Dr Holland, an Oxford Divine, who at that time was named to the office of Proctor, pronounced the following censure upon Calvin from the chair in the presence of a thousand hearers. Calvin was a learned man, but he did not in all his writings preserve the spirit of an orthodox Catholic: and a little after: Calvin's notion of God, as being the author of sin, is neither to be defended nor excused; because he openly derides the bare permission of the Catholics, and introduces the effectual will of God as concurring with sin.'

[P] The English deputies at the Synod of Dort, were the principal promoters of the proscription of Vorstius.] Here are some particulars on this subject. A report being spread that this Professor would be summoned to appear before the Synod, one of the English deputies immediately wrote to King James's Ambassador at the Hague, and earnestly pressed him to make use of his interest with the Prince of Orange, and Count William, that this proceeding might not retard the proscription of Vorstius. He suggested to him the expedient that was to be made use of to that purpose, (41) See, above, the remark [D] of the article FORBES (WILLIAM).

(42) Of whom mention is made above, in the article RAMUS, near the end of the remark [O], and in the article VIRGIL, citat. (21).

(43) Petrus Cod. senius de despecta Calvinianæ Causâ, pag. 125, 126.

(40) This appears from the letter which Uytenbogaard wrote to him on the 24th of June 1611. See the sixteenth letter of the Arminians in the edition of 1684.

Their master's glory and the reputation of his learning were concerned in it.

pose, which was to advise those two Princes not to suffer the Synod to engage in the discussion of any points with that Divine, or receive any explications of his opinions from him. This would have occasioned the loss of too much time. The English Deputies wished that the assembly would declare that all the members of it had read Vorstius's book, and condemned it, and that nothing remained for him but to retract his opinions, and ask pardon of God and his Church there assembled. He also farther advised, that in case Vorstius retracted, and asked such a pardon, he should be acknowledged for a brother; but otherwise the Synodical assembly should punish him at pleasure. This Deputy also wished that the Synod would publicly excommunicate Vorstius; and all those particulars he recommended to King James's Ambassador. Having but imperfectly expressed the contents of the letter, I shall subjoin the express words of the book which serves me for an original. Spargitur hic rumor de Vorstio citando, & Festus Hommius beatus vespera mihi dixit, se ea de re tecum fuisse loquutum. Si citatur, tua apud Principem Aragonensem & Comitem Gulielmum gratia nobis in ejus causa opus erit, aliqui non minus diu, quam Remonstrantes, Synodum detineret. Spero te, Vir Illustris, illis hoc consilium daturum; si Vorstius tempus petiti tradendi apologiam ac elucidationem de duris loquendi modis in ipsius libro de Deo, ac velis rationibus convinci, suorumque argumentorum confutationem, quod brevi fieri non poterit, ne Synodus de iis rebus cum illo loquatur: sed ut plane dicat, omnes, qui sunt in Synodo, legisse ipsius librum, ac multa in eo invenisse, quæ proxime ad blasphemiam accedunt, & sine dubio Ecclesiam Reformatam valde offendunt: explicationem rerum, quas nemo in questionem vocat, non esse satisfactionem: itaque se omnino cupere, ut illas retractet & palinodiam canat, Deumque veniam roget, & Ecclesiam Dei ibi congregatam, cui eo libro scandalum dederat. Si hoc facit, eum nostrum fecimus; sin minus, Synodus hominem pro libito castiget. Velim eum aliis in exemplum palam à Synodo excommunicari. Harum aliarumque rerum curam tibi potissimum committimus, ut rite dirigantur (44). The president of the Synod having asked the English Deputies whether they approved that Vorstius should be cited to appear in the assembly, and what the King of England's pleasure was in that point; they answered that they must consult his Ambassador, and that they thought it would look very ill to condemn a man without hearing him: they added that, to avoid delays, Vorstius ought not to be permitted to defend himself, or explain his blasphemous propositions; and that he ought not to be answered any otherwise than by yes or no, nor asked any question but whether he was ready to abjure (45). Afterwards when the opinions were asked concerning the sentence to be passed upon Vorstius, they declared him unworthy of the name and office of an orthodox Professor, desired that his book de Deo should be burnt, and read the decree which condemned that work to the flames in England. Se itaque non modo ipsum Vorstium Orthodoxi Professoris munere ac nomine indignum judicare, sed etiam persuadere, ne hujusmodi ejus libri in bibliopoliis proflare permittantur: Denique rogare, ut in exemplum, & in sancti, Dei causa, tali testimonium, Vorstii de Deo tractatus summi Magistratus jussu, aut Synodi decreto eadem munito, palam solenniterque flammis absumatur: simulque hujusmodi infamis holocausti specimen, à Britannis coram Synodo legitur authenticum, Procellarii Cantabrigiensi sigillo munitum, decretum XXI Septembris MDCLXI. Cujus vi, etiam Serenissimi Regis nostri judicio præeunte, publice flammis ultricibus expurgatus est liber prædictus: ejusdemque decreti Cantabrigiensi exemplar inter Synodi acta lectum (46). From this and several other places the continual correspondence betwixt the Synod and the court plainly appears. The Arminians loudly complained of this sympathy betwixt the two empires, the Civil and Ecclesiastical, and of this concord betwixt the Royalty and the Priesthood, against which they frequently say that as large a book might be written as that of Mr de Marca (47). But how can it be helped? Such is the condition of human affairs, that without the concurrence of the two powers, it is scarce possible to succeed in such matters (48). This redounds to the advantage of a good cause in certain countries, and prejudices it in others. No help for it!

(44) G. Balcenquallus Epist. ad Dudleium Carletonum. It is the ecclesiastical Epistola Ecclesiastica & Theologica Printed at Amsterdam, in folio, in the year 1684, pag. 560.

VORSTIUS (WILLIAM-HENRY) son to the foregoing, was minister of the Arminian congregation at Warmond in Holland. He wrote some books which have been printed (a) [A]. Mr Chevreau cites him on a very curious particular (b).

(a) Ex Biblioth. Anticrit. pag. 143.

[A] He wrote some books which have been printed. The following account is given of them in the Bibliotheca Anticritica. Disceptatio de Verbo vel Sermonis Dei, cujus creberrima fit mentio apud Paraphrasas Chaldaeos, Jonathan, Onkelos, & Targum Hierosolymitanum. Irenopoli apud heredes Jacobi Laringhii, 1643, 8vo. Idem Belgicæ. a. 1649, 4to. Transfuit & Notis illustravit Maimonidis constitutiones de Fundamentis Legis. Editæ ex sunt Amstel. apud Blavius, a. 1638, 4to. Item Chronologiam sacram profanam Rab. David Ganz. & Pirke seu capitula R. Eliezer. Editæ hæc sunt Lugd. Bat. 1644, 4to (1).

(1) Bibl. Anticrit. pag. 143.

I take the book intituled Bilibra veritatis, which was printed in 1700, to be written by our William Henry Vorstius. In the Leipzig Journal (2) it is ascribed to him, and it is observed that was refuted by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and more fully still by Mr Edzard Professor at Hamburg. See the remark [A] of the article RITTANGELIUS, and Mr Bernard's Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (3).

(3) For the month of August 1699, pag. 214, and for September 1699, pag. 314. See the Journal de Trevoux, for the month of March 1704, pag. 33, of the edition of Trevoux, where it is said that the 14th letter of Mr Nye is against the Bilibra of William Vorstius.

VOSSIUS. The learned men of this name, afford me such an ample field of matter, that the few sheets which I have left, will not allow me room to digest it. Wherefore I refer it to another time, together with the memoir communicated to me, which contains a confutation of what is said against Isaac Vossius in Moreri's Dictionary.

URCEUS (ANTONY CODRUS) one of the most learned, and most unfortunate men of the XVth century, was an Italian [A]. He was so sensibly afflicted with the loss of his manuscripts, that he not only uttered execrable blasphemies, but also like a savage retired to the woods, and all human society became insupportable to him [B]. It is reported that [A] He was an Italian. Of Ravenna, if we may believe Pierius Valerianus (1); but Gesner (2) citing Bartholomew of Bologna, says he was born in the year 1446, at Herberia a little town in the territory of Reggio, seven miles distant from Modena.

[B] He uttered execrable blasphemies . . . he retired . . . and all human society became insupportable to him. He lost what he had prepared for the Pre in the following manner. He lived at Forlì, in an apartment of the palace. His chamber was so dark as to require a candle at noon-day. And happening to go out and leave it burning, his papers took fire, and his library was reduced to ashes. As soon as he heard this ill news he ran in a distracted manner to the palace, and stopping at his chamber door cried out, JESUS CHRIST, What great crime have I been guilty

(45) Non permissum Vorstio, ut vel de fide, vel ex ipso blasphemus blasphemum, sed respectandum ipse per illi vel non; regulamque, an parum sit heterodoxia abjurare. Idem ad cardem, Epist. cccxviii, ubi in praef. pag. 560, col. 2.

(46) Idem ad cardem, Epist. cccxviii, ubi in praef. pag. 575, col. 2.

(47) Mr de Marca coram auctoritate Concilii Imperii & Imperatoris.

(48) Alterum de Altera potestatem non habet, ut operemur & consilium amittit. Hic aut de An. Pict. cor. 410.

(b) In Tom. II. of the Cheremonia, pag. 106, of the Dutch edition.

(1) I shall cite his words in the remark [D].

(2) Gesner, in Biblioth. fol. 55, verso.

in his last moments he acknowledged his sin, and devoutly implored the mercy of God [C]. Some say that he was killed by assassins [D]. His works, printed at Basil in 1540, consist of orations, letters, and poems. His life is to be seen there written by Bartholomew Blanchinus of Bologna. He had entertained doubts concerning the immortality of the soul [E].

According to Leander Albertus (a), he died at Bologna, when he was seventy years of age, and was buried there in the cloyster di Santo Salvatore in the tomb which he had caused to be prepared for himself with this short epitaph, Codrus eram; --- I was Codrus. Now since he was born in the year 1446 (b), we must conclude that he died in the year 1516.

(a) Leand. Albert. Definit. d'Italia, fol. m. 364, verso.

(b) See the remark [A].

guilty of? Which of your followers have I ever offended, that you treat me so cruelly? Mind well what I am going to say, I speak deliberately and with a composed mind. If by chance I address myself to you when at the point of death, do not hear me, for I have resolved to pass my eternity in hell. Quodnam ego tantum scelus concepi Christe, quem ego tuorum unquam lesi, ut ita inexpiabili in me odio debaccheris? Audi ea (pergebat ad quoddam conversum simulachrum) quæ Tibi mentis compos & ex animo dicam. Si forte cum ad ultimum vitæ finem pervenero supplicem accedam ad Te opem oratum, neve audias neve inter tuos accipias oro; cum infernis diis in eternum vitam agere decrevis. (3). Those who heard these blasphemies endeavoured to comfort him, but in vain: he left the town and run to a forest. Adeo insuper ira & indignatio hominem oppresserat, ut extra portam urbis egressus, amientie frenos non ante imposuerit, quam in vastum sese nemus proripuisse, ingentique cum molestia ibi lotos dies transieisset. (4).

(3) Spizellius, in Felice Literato, pag. 12. Hecite Barthol. Bono-nienis in Vita Codri.

(4) Idem, Spizellius, ibid. pag. 13.

(5) Id. Ibid.

(6) Id. Ibid.

[C] It is reported . . . that he devoutly implored the mercy of GOD. The author whom I cite mentions our Urceus's prayer. 'Ultima tandem aliquando appropinquante horâ miser ille oculis ac manibus ad cælum sublevis; Qui cælum incolis, (exclamavit) ser quæso opem peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in sinum confugio supplicem rejicere. Si unquam peccantem hominem voti reum fecisti, sic mihi extrema oranti dextram ab alto porrigas oro' (5). --- This unhappy man when his last hour drew near, lifted up his eyes and his hands to heaven, crying out; O thou who dwellest in heaven, help a sinner, I beseech thee, and do not reject me while I thus fly in a suppliant manner to thy bosom. If ever thou didst hear a miserable sinner, stretch out, I beseech thee, thy right hand to me from on high, now that I am making my last prayer. After having uttered these words, he saw a tall man, with a torch in each hand, and trembling all over his body. Astonished at this vision he sprung out of his bed, and asked the apparition what he did there at such an unseasonable hour, and conjured him not to do him any mischief. 'Ad hunc modum se animamque suam Deo commendans, quendam conspexit ingentis staturæ virum, capite raso, barba ad terram usque promissa, ardentibus oculis, facies utraque gestantem manu, ac toto corpore tremebundum, quo viso in hæc à pavore dictata verba erupit: Quisnam tu es, qui solus furiali habitu ea noctis parte, quâ mortales somno premuntur, deambulas, noli ad me qui DEI amicus sum infestus accedere, effare quid queras, quo ire pergas? Hæc cum dixisset, è strato prostravit, quasi illum in se irruentem vitaturus (6). --- Whilst Urceus was in this manner recommending himself to GOD, he beheld a man of a huge stature, with his head shaven, his beard reaching down to the ground, his eyes flaming, holding a torch in either hand, and trembling all over his body. Upon the sight of this apparition, he broke forth into the following expressions. Whoever thou art, who thus walkest alone in such a dreadful shape, and at this midnight time when mortals are oppressed with sleep, do not approach to hurt me who am the friend of GOD. Speak what thou wantest, and whether thou wouldst go?

'Having said this, he sprung out of his bed, as if he would avoid the spectre which was rushing upon him.' My author breaks off here; he did not know whether Urceus perished upon this occasion or not (7). This makes me suspect that he as well as myself wanted the book of Bartholomew of Bologna, and only quoted several scraps of it which others had quoted before him; for it is not at all probable that our Codrus's historian should leave his reader in suspense concerning the consequences of this accident. But be it as it will, Spizellius swayed by a charitable principle judges very favourably of the state of this learned man's soul, in consideration of his last exhortation to his disciples. He recites it, and it speaks a man who had a true sense of the fear of GOD, and of the vanity of the world.

[D] Some say that he was killed by assassins. Pierius Valerianus who hath not forgot him in his catalogue of unfortunate learned men, expresses himself thus concerning him: 'Codrus autem Urceus Rave-nas multa, varique doctrinæ vir, eruditissimis ple-risque scriptis, quæ nunc edita sunt, omnibus in-notuit. Is quoque sanguinarum peremptus est morte, ab adversæ factionis latronibus sceleratissime trucidatus' (8). --- Urceus Codrus was a man of great and various erudition, as appeared to all the world by his many learned performances which are now published. He too was killed in a base and bloody manner by the assassins of the contrary faction.

[E] He had entertained doubts concerning the immortality of the soul. His friends asked him what he thought of it, he replied that he did not know what would become of him after death, or whether the soul exists after this life or not. But he was not in doubt concerning the doctrines commonly asserted about hell, but positively affirmed that they were meer tales invented to terrify mankind. Spizellius mentions also this particular. 'Cum ejusdem, scilicet be (9), de animæ mortalitate opinionis pestilens, fidus olim infelicem illum Codrum Urceum [cujus tragediam supra memoravimus] afflisset, parum ab-fuit, quin & ipse in atheismi voraginem fuerit præ-cipitatus. Rogantibus enim amicis, quid de im-mortalitate animæ sentiret? nescire se respondebat, quid post mortem de se futurum esset, viveretne ani-mus, five anima, an interiret una cum corpore, quæ-que de inferis homines prædicarent, anilia quædam tericulamenta esse dicebat: hinc ipsi amarissimo epigrammate post fata etiam fuit exprobratum, quod non rectè de Christo, inferis, animarumque immor-talitate sentiendò, latentis atheismi sui haud obscura documenta dedisset. --- The pestilential influence of that same opinion concerning the mortality of the soul had infected the miserable Codrus Urceus [whose tragical end we have mentioned above] to such a degree that he wanted but little of falling into the gulf of Atheism. For when his friends asked him what he thought of the immortality of the soul, he answered, &c. . . . This gave occasion to a most bitter epigram being written upon him after his death, wherein it was reproachfully insinuated, as if by his erroneous opinions concerning CHRIST, Hell, and the Immortality of the Soul, he had given manifest proofs of his lurking Atheism.'

(7) Utrum extremum hoc e-valet periculum, & post tantam tempestatem in perpetuæ felicitatis portum sit delatus, dicere non habemus, Id. ibid. p. 14.

(8) Pierius Va-lerianus de Li-teratorum Infel-icitate, lib. 1, pag. 21, 22.

(9) Spizellius, ubi supra, pag. 174, 175. Hecite Barth. Bono-nienis in Codri Urcei Vita.

URGULANIA, a Roman lady, favourite of the Empress Livia. Her interest with that Empress rendered her extremely insolent, inasmuch that she refused to appear before the Senate in order to give evidence (a): The Prætor waited on her to interrogate her, and a greater deference was paid to her than to the Vestal Virgins [A], who were obliged

(a) Tacitus, Annal. lib. ii, cap. xxxiv.

[A] A greater deference was paid to her than to the Vestal Virgins. I shall quote Tacitus, 'Urgulanæ potentia adeo nimia civitati erat, ut testis in causa quadam quæ apud Senatum tractabatur, ve-obliged to come to the bar, when they gave testimony. But Urgulania's great interest and haughty demeanor did not prevent Lucius Piso's suing her for debt in the year of Rome 769, she refused to appear, and retired to the Emperor's Palace. But Piso could not be persuaded to stop his proceedings by the remonstrances of his relations, nor by all the complaints of Livia, that it was a violation of the respect due to her; and Tiberius would no farther interpose in this process, than by promising his mother to solicit the judges in favour of Urgulania, so that the suit was no otherwise ended than by Livia's causing Piso to be paid the sum which Urgulania owed him. She was still living in the year 777, when her grand-son Plautius Silvanus the Prætor was accused of the murder of his wife; for we find in Tacitus (b) that there being no hopes that the criminal should escape condemnation, she sent him a dagger, which being unable to use, he caused his veins to be opened.

(b) Iidem, lib. iv, cap. xxii.

nire dedignaretur; missus est prætor qui domi interrogaret, cum Virgines Vestales in foro & judicio audiri, quotiens testimonium dicerent, vetus mos fuerit (1). - - - The power of Urgulania was grown so excessive, that being summoned to appear as a witness in a cause depending before the senate, she scornfully refused to come. Upon this a Prætor was sent to examine her at home, whereas by an old custom even the Vestal Virgins were obliged to appear in the Forum, and in the courts of judicature, when they had any evidence to give in. Mr du Boulay had no reason to take Urgulania for a Vestal. The Vestal Urgulania, says he, did a thing unprecedented by desisting the summons of the senate, to give evidence in a cause depending before them; and that court was obliged to send the Prætor to her house to examine her. As Cornelius Tacitus (whose words are worth reciting) informs us lib. 2 (2). He afterwards cites the passage which I have quoted above: if he had read it with due attention, he would have been satisfied that Urgulania

(1) Tacit. Annal, lib. ii, cap. xxxiv.

URGULANIA, falsely taken for a Vestal Virgin by du Boulay.

(2) Du Boulay, Théor. des Antiquités Romaines, p. 316.

was no Vestal; he would, I say, have been convinced of it without having any occasion to consult the other passage of Tacitus, which shews that she was the grandmother of a Roman Prætor, who was accused of killing his second wife. This supposes an old age worthy that Historian's observation, (for the very earliest time that a Vestal Virgin was permitted to marry was at the age of thirty-seven) and doth not very well agree with Mr du Boulay's observation that few Vestals married after thirty years observance of their vow, and those that did proved very unhappy (3). A favourite, who had as great an interest as Urgulania, who should have been married after having been a Vestal, would have been an illustrious instance of good fortune. I can easily believe that this author never saw the passage of Tacitus any where else than in Traquellus's commentaries on Alexander ad Alexandro (4), where being separated from the thread of the narration it may make one believe that Urgulania was a Vestal Virgin.

(3) Du Boulay, ibid. pag. 308.

(4) In Lib. V. Genial. Dier. cap. xii, pag. 109, Edit. Lugd. Batavor. 1673, where instead of Cornelius Tacitus, there is Cornel. Celsus.

(a) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. xxi.

URGULANILLA, grand-daughter of the preceding lady [A], was married to the Emperor Claudius before he became Emperor (a). He had two children by her [B], and divorced her because she had made herself infamous by her leudness, and was also suspected of murder (b).

(b) Ob. Hædemon probra & homicidii suspiciones. Id. ibid.

[A] Grand-daughter of the preceding lady.] This is the opinion of Reinesius, a person who studied the Roman families better than any man in the world. He saith that Urgulania, Livia's favourite, was the wife of Marcus Plautius, the son of Aulus Plautius, who was tribune of the people in the year of Rome 698. That Marcus Plautius Silvanus the son of Marcus Plautius and Urgulania was consul in the year 752, and honoured with the triumphal ornaments in 762. That Plautius Silvanus the son of that consul was Prætor of Rome in the year 777, and that he had a sister who was our Urgulanilla, and two brothers, viz. Publius Plautius Pulcher, and Titus Plautius Silvanus Ælianus, who was consul in 799, and afterwards again in Vespasian's time (1). There is yet extant a very long inscription (2) expressing the offices and actions of this Titus Plautius, and particularly his consulship in Vespasian's reign: notwithstanding which Lippius (3) has been so inadvertent as to apply this inscription to that Plautius Silvanus who killed himself in the year of Rome 777, and was Urgulania's grandson. It is observable that in my edition of Lippius's Tacitus (4), the text hath it Urgulania, and it is Virgulanilla in the commentary, and the commentator observes that the surname Virgulanias was appropriated to the Plautian family, which he proves by an inscription, and by Suetonius's authority, who, saith he, calls one of the Emperor Claudius's wives Plautia Virgulanilla. But all the authors who produce this inscription, express the name to be Urgulanius: whence then can it proceed that Lippius alledges it to prove his Virgulanus? I believe I may venture to say that the Printers are entirely innocent of this blunder, and that Lippius not perfectly remembering the word Urgulania thought that Tacitus said Virgulanilla, and continued this first error throughout. He had done much better, not to have written proper

(1) Reinesius, Epist. xxvii ad Rupertum, pag. 206.

(2) It is to be found in Glan-dorp. Onom. pag. 683; and in Rijk in Tacitum, pag. 440.

(3) Lipp. in Tacit. Annal. lib. iv, pag. m. 200.

(4) That of Geneva, 1619, in 8vo.

names without book, but to have kept the original before his eyes. And if we who are authors would always be so prudent as to distrust our memory, and only rely on an exact view, our writings would be more accurate.

Our Urgulanilla perhaps owed her name to its being a diminutive of that of Urgulania her grandmother.

[B] He had two children by her.] A son and a daughter. The son was named Drusus, and died before the age of fourteen, by a very odd accident: for throwing up a pear into the air in order to catch it in his mouth, it fell in and choaked him. He was contracted to one of Sejanus's daughters, notwithstanding which the same Sejanus was reported to have caused him to be killed (5). So true it is that many more crimes are imputed to favourites than they are really guilty of. Suetonius rejects this impertinent accusation (6). Claudia, the daughter of Claudius and Urgulanilla, was born before the expiration of five months after her mother's divorce: and the late husband acknowledged her at first, but not long after his mind altered, and he caused her to be exposed naked at her mother's door: on pretence that Botes his freed-man was the true father of this child. Mr Chevreau mistook Suetonius's words, quamvis ante quintum mensem divortii natam, in believing they signified though she was born five months before their divorce (7). He seems to intend a criticism on Reinesius, for saying that Plautia Virgulanilla was Claudius's first wife (8), but indeed here is no room for censure; for Lepida and Medullina were only contracted, but not married to Claudius. Wherefore Mr Chevreau deserves to be blamed for not observing Suetonius's distinction. He bestows six wives on that Emperor, whereas Suetonius allows him but four, and two contracted ladies, quatuor uxores & duas sponsas (9).

(5) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. xxi.

(6) Quo magis miror fuisse qui tradiderant fratri à Seiano necatum. Id. ibid.

(7) Chevreau, Hist. du Moede, tom. ii, pag. 170, Dutch Edit. 1687, & pag. 203, 205, Dutch Edit. 1698.

(8) Reines. ubi supra, pag. 109.

(9) Sueton. ubi supra, cap. xxi.

URRACA,

U R R A C A, daughter and heiress of Alfonso VI King of Leon and Castile was first married to Raymund of Burgundy whose widow she became in the year 1100 (a). She was afterwards married to Don Alfonso King of Arragon and Navarre in the year 1106 (b). This marriage proved the cause of the re-union of almost all the Christian kingdoms of Spain under one sovereign; for after the death (c) of Don Alfonso VI, King of Leon, Castile, and Toledo, &c. these realms fell into the hands of Don Alfonso King of Arragon and Navarre; they devolved on him I say by virtue of his marrying Urraca. The Lords of Castile had been against that marriage; wherefore the King did not go to claim his Queen's succession, without a good number of troops in order to reduce the Castilians to reason in case of necessity (d). The preparatives for his journey and other things retarded his taking possession; but in the interim he increased the splendor and magnificence of his court, and connived at the scandalous conduct of Urraca [A]. He went along with her to Castile, and met with no manner of resistance (e); nevertheless he acted like a man who very well knew how to provide against all events [B], and was soon obliged to remedy the ill effects of his Queen's ambition, who would have ruined a great lord as a punishment for having given the title of King of Castile to her husband (f). She grew so dissolute that he was forced to confine her to the fortress of Castellor; from whence she finding ways to escape, retired into Castile, and endeavoured to annul her marriage. The Archbishop of Toledo, and several other prelates assisted her in that attempt, for which they were severely punished by the King. The great Lords and the States of Castile opposed this divorce, and by submissive means brought Urraca to the King her husband in Arragon, who graciously received her; but as she continued her vicious course of life, and daily more and more forgot her own honour and the honour of her house, he at last caused her to be conveyed to Soria, and banished her for ever from his company (g). It was then that her adherents applied more vigorously than ever to dissolve the marriage. She alledged not only the common excuse on the like occasions, that she was married against her consent, but that her near relation to Don Alfonso rendered her marriage with him unlawful (h). Application was made to the Pope, who committed this affair to Don Diego Gelmirio, Bishop of Compostella (i). It terminated in a dissolution of the marriage. Some Historians praise Alfonso for that having put away Urraca, he at the same time renounced all authority over the kingdom of Castile; but they plainly contradict themselves [C], by relating several facts, which make it appear that he did his utmost to keep that authority.

[A] He increased the splendor and magnificence of his court, and connived at the scandalous conduct of Urraca. Both these things were natural consequences of the inheritance which this Princess brought with her. Two or three kingdoms left her by her father were very well worth the concealing a resentment at her ill deportment. Mariana's words plainly signify that the tide of Urraca's lewdness run very high. 'Præterea varia Aragonii regni negotia distinebant (Alfonsum) ne novam & amplissimam cerneret hereditatem. Cuncta tamen ad novi imperii decorem composita, dilatae voluptates, dissimulatæ Reginæ libidines: quæ non sine sigillatione majestatis nimium in levitatem atque turpitudinem incubuerat (1). . . . Besides various affairs relating to the kingdom of Arragon hindered Alfonso from taking possession of this new and ample inheritance. Nevertheless every thing was ordered in such a manner as became the dignity of a new kingdom. Alfonso postponed his pleasures, and winked at the unchastity of his Queen, who to the shame of Majesty shewed too great an inclination for levity and lewdness.'

[B] He acted like a man who very well knew how to provide against all events. As soon as ever he had set foot in Castile he began to consider what might happen, if his Queen should die without issue by him; wherefore he put the principal places and strongest forts into the hands of Navarrese and Aragonian Governors and Captains, to the end that if he should be obliged to quit the kingdoms of Castile, Leon, Toledo, and their dependencies, he might in some measure keep those people in awe, and evacuate them on honourable and advantageous terms: this practice somewhat disgusted the Castilian Lords. He also knew his wife Urraca to be proud, ungrateful, inconstant, and libidinous; wherefore like a considerate man he fortified himself against whatever events time might produce. This woman, on a trivial occasion, conceived a most inveterate hatred against the Count D. Pedro Ansures, Lord of Valladolid, who had educated her, as well as preserved and protected her dominions after the death of her father; it was only because in the letters he wrote to the King her husband, and to her, desiring them to come and take possession of their heritage, he gave her husband the title of King of Castile. For this reason she undertook to deprive him of his estate at Valladolid and other places; but the King immediately re-established him, and the better to secure him from the rage of this woman, he sent him to Arragon, with Donna Elo his wife, intrusting to them the government of the young Count of Urgel his nephew (2).

[C] Some Historians praise Alfonso for that having put away Urraca, he at the same time renounced . . . but they plainly contradict themselves. These two contradictory assertions follow one another in the History of Mayerne. Don Alfonso, saith he (3), 'banished Urraca for ever from his conversation: notwithstanding which he retained several strong places in Castile, without being much desirous of the government or administration of that kingdom. It is certain that this King's spirit was very great, and he plainly shewed that he put a higher value on virtue and honour, than on worldly goods, by giving up such ample territories as those of Castile, Leon, Toledo, and others which Urraca brought him.' This Historian in the same page begins to relate Don Alfonso's repentment against those who had restored to Urraca the towns and fortresses which he had in Castile. This repentment we find in the same History to be one of the motives, which engaged him to make war against the Castilians. It appears from Mayerne's words, that Urraca's lewdness is assigned as another cause of the war: 'From that time Donna Urraca continued her immoralities; for re-assuming her former design of a divorce, she obtained it by the authority of Pope Paschal. . . . So that finding herself without any check, and no restraint laid upon her lust, she loosely indulged it to an exorbitant degree. She gave up herself to a familiar and unchaste conversation with Count Gomez de Candepina, who formerly pretended to be her husband, and had by her a son, of whom she was delivered clandestinely, whence he was named Don Fernando Hurtado, or a clandestine child; from whom the house of the Hurtado's, an illustrious family in Spain is said to be descended. Though some doubt the truth of this, yet it is certain that the Count Don Gomez, in a short time had the sole government of the kingdom, and entirely disposed of the affairs of war and peace at his arbitrary will and pleasure, and enjoyed

(1) Mariana de Rebus Hispanie, lib. x, cap. viii, pag. m. 419.

(a) Mayerne Turquet, Hist. d'Espagne, liv. viii, pag. m. 331.

(b) Mariana de Rebus Hisp. lib. x, cap. viii, pag. m. 418.

(c) In the year 1103.

(d) Mariana, ubi supra, cap. viii, pag. 419.

(e) Mayerne, ubi supra, lib. ix, pag. 335.

(f) See the remark [B].

(g) Taken from Mayerne, ubi supra, pag. 340.

(h) Id. ibid.

(i) Id. ibid. pag. 341.

(2) Mayerne Turquet, Hist. d'Espagne, liv. ix, pag. 336.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 340.

authority. He fought battles to maintain it, and his enemies were obliged to force him to restore the places which he detained (k), even after the Castilians had elected Alphonso Raymund of Burgundy, Urraca's son by her first husband, for their king in the year 1122 (l). They made this choice when they found that the Queen continued to give up her self to the most scandalous amours, and also countenanced the tyrannical government of her favourite (m). Her own son was obliged to declare war against her, and to besiege her in the Castle of Leon; out of which difficulties she no otherwise extricated herself than by a promise to renounce her dominions, and reduce her self to a private life with a pension suitable to her dignity (n). The year of her death is not certainly known; some say that she died about the year 1125 (o), in child-bed lying-in of a bastard; others tell us that her death was the punishment of a sacrilegious crime [D]. She had a sister who might very well have disputed with her the pre-eminence in lewdness [E], and brought a (k) See the remark [C].

(l) Mayerne, ubi supra, pag. 342.

(m) Id. ibid.

(n) Id. ibid. pag. 344.

(o) Septimo decimo circiter anno à morte patris, Mariana, ubi supra, cap. viii, pag. 425. But ch. xiv, p. 413, he affirms that she died in the year 1126.

the same privacies with the Queen, as if he had really been her husband; notwithstanding which Don Pedro de Lara another gallant . . . so far insinuated himself into the Queen's favour, that he soon became one of her darling minions, of whom Count Gomez proved very jealous. The dissolute and lascivious deportment of Donna Urraca, was so universally and publicly known, that King Alfonso excited by a just indignation, as well on that account as by reason of the above-mentioned divorce, resolved to enter Castile with a great army, and put all to fire and sword that he met in his way, being irritated as well by the lewdness of the Queen as by the base pusillanimity of the Castilians, who tamely obeyed her: he bore them a grudge, because they had restored to her the places which he had intrusted to their keeping. The Queen's two amorous darlings Don Gomez and Don Pedro took the field against him with the forces of Castile and Leon, and meeting the royal army, composed of Navarrese and Arragonians, they came to a close engagement near Candespina, not far from Sepulveda.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 341.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 344.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 345.

Don Pedro who led the van was first attacked (4), and immediately fled and retired to the Queen at Burgos, carrying the news of the defeat which he was not at leisure to see (5). Don Gomez her other paramour was killed in the field of battle. The victorious Alfonso penetrated as far as Galicia, making a merciless slaughter and devastation wherever his army passed (6). He obtained a second victory betwixt the towns of Leon and Astorga, and forced Alfonso Raimund, Urraca's son, to save himself by flight into Portugal. The Queen being deposed, the King her son resolved to recover the Castilian fortresses, which his father-in-law Don Alfonso King of Navarre kept from him (7). Accordingly he raised a great army: Alfonso did the like, and entered the kingdom of Castile, when the Prelates of both kingdoms foreseeing the great calamities which were inevitable, if these two potent Princes should once make war, earnestly endeavoured to negotiate a peace betwixt them; and their attempts were so successful as to engage the new King of Castile, to address himself by way of request to the King of Navarre and Arragon, in order to obtain his cities and castles (8). By this means he obtained part of his demands; but Alfonso would not restore the countries situated betwixt Villorodo and Calaterra, nor the provinces of Guipuzcoa and Alava: &c. Pretending that they ought to be re-united to Navarre, and that they were usurped by Don Alfonso VI King of Castile.

Does it become an Historian who relates all these particulars to assert that Urraca's husband would not detain the patrimony of the wife he had divorced? Does not a man confuse himself when he writes in this manner? What follows is another error of the like nature. An author whom I here cite, blames Don Alfonso for divorcing Urraca, 'and by that means depriving himself of the possession of three kingdoms. For though the history of Spain praises him for having preferred his honour to those three great realms, I cannot help thinking that if on one side this be taken for a generous action, on the other it must pass for very weak and impolitic, as was that of Lewis VII King of France, who lived at the same time, and who by divorcing his wife Eleonora, sowed the seeds of a perpetual war in his kingdom (9).' This comparison betwixt Don Alfonso and Lewis VII is not just; for the French King entirely dispossessed himself of the territories of his divorced Queen, and exactly followed Marcus Aure-lius's maxims (10): but Don Alfonso did not at all follow the same rule, and is on that account censured by one of the best Spanish Historians (11): 'Alfonso Aragonius eo nuncio (12) percussus repudio facto, Reginam Soria dimittit, in cujus urbis arce custodiaturus mancipata erat: imperandi tamen dulcedine illectus, dotalem ditionem non deponit. Id iniquum esse omnibus videbatur. . . . Struck with that news, Alfonso King of Arragon, divorced his Queen, and sent her away from Soria, the castle of which town had been a second prison to her. Nevertheless he was so charmed with the sweets of empire that he would not resign the dominions which she brought him. This to posterity every body seemed an unjust action.'

(9) Campion, Hommes illustres, Tom. i, pag. 129, 130. Edit. of Rouen 1657.

[D] Some say that she died . . . in child-bed lying-in of a bastard; others tell us that her death was the punishment of a sacrilegious crime.] She took up her residence in St Vincent's church, being very strictly guarded: notwithstanding which it is reported that she one day went to the church, dedicated to St Isidore of Leon, in order to seize the treasures, which her father and grand-father had given to that place, and that as she was carrying off her prey, being just going out, and having advanced one foot out of the church, her intrails burst out: a just punishment for the adulteries of which she had been guilty, and the murders which they occasioned, to the injury and dishonour of the royal families, and all the Christian part of Spain, as well as for her sacrilege. Others say that she died in the castle of Saldania in the delivery of a clandestine child (13). Mariana mentions both these opinions, and owns that this Queen will be the eternal ignominy of Spain: Pudicitiam sane dum vixit baud satis honeste habuit. in Saldania arce ex parte extinctam ferunt. æternum Hispaniæ dedecus. alii Legione affirmant, cum thesauros D. Isidori expulisset, quos auferre nefas erat, in ipso templi limine ruptis visceribus, manifesta numinis vindicta expirasse (14).

[E] She had a sister who might have disputed with her the pre-eminence in lewdness.] It was Theresia the bastard daughter of Don Alfonso VI, who married her to a French lord in acknowledgment of the services he had done him in his wars against the Moors. This lord according to some writers was Henry of Lorrain, but others call him Henry of Burgundy. And the latter are divided whether he was descended from the Dukes or the Earls of Burgundy. Some say that (15) he was son to Henry Duke of Burgundy, and grand-son to Robert of France, the first of that name Duke of Burgundy, and that he was consequently a Prince of the royal blood of France; and others say that he was (16) the Earl of Burgundy's son, and brother to Pope Calixtus II. However it was, this valiant lord rendered himself so considerable, that Don Alfonso VI King of Castile marrying him to his daughter Theresia, gave him those parts of Portugal which he had conquered from the Moors, with the title of Hereditary Count, for him and his legitimate successors, proceeding from this marriage and also promised to add to those lordships the conquests which he should for the future make on the Moors, with the same successive and hereditary right . . . on condition that he and his heirs should acknowledge the Kings of Leon for their sovereign lords, and hold the said lands of them in fealty and homage (17). Theresia was a widow in the year 1112, and mother of three children, one son and two daughters (18). Soon after she married for her second husband . . . Bermund Pasz de Transtamara (19), and after she had lived some time with him, she left him, excited thereto by a prevailing lust, or some other

(10) See, above, the remark [A], of the article LEWIS VII.

(11) Mariana, ubi supra, pag. 421.

(12) Viz. that Alphonsus Raimund, son of Urraca had been crowned as Com-paignon.

(13) Mayerne, ubi supra, pag. 427. Campion, ubi supra, pag. 136, 137, has transcribed this almost word for word.

(14) Mariana, ubi supra, pag. 423.

(15) See Feiler Anselmo, Hist. de la Maison Royale, pag. 454, 483, 484, and the citations (16), (17), in this remark.

(16) See Louis Gallart's Mémoires Historiques de la Franche Comté, pag. 305, 306.

(17) Mayerne, ubi supra, lib. viii, pag. 322.

(18) Idem, ibid. ex, pag. 337.

(19) Id. ibid. damnable load of evils on Portugal. After this, I am surprized that the name of Urraca should ever be given to the Infanta's of Castile, and I do not wonder that the French Ambassadors, who were sent to bring into France one of the daughters of Don Alfonso IX, whom he had promised to their master, chose the less beautiful, whose name was Blanche, and could not bear the very mention of her sister, because named Urraca (p). They undoubtedly looked on that name

as

(p) La Mothe le Vayer, letter xxxiii, pag. 265, of Vol. x. He quotes Ant. Herrera, Tom. ii, lib. xvi, cap. xvi. See the Penates diversas sur les Cometes, num. 32.

(20) Campion, ubi supra, pag. 134, expresses it thus: who (Bermund Paiz), not satisfying her according to her mind, that mad and leud woman left him to marry his brother Ferdinando Paiz de Tranlamara. damnable occasion (20), and married Don Fernando Paiz de Tranlamara, brother to the husband the left. On the other side, Don Bermund being thus left, as if he designed to emulate his countess's incest, married her eldest daughter Donna Theresa Henriquez, sister to Don Alfonso Henriquez. These scandalous inter-marriages were contracted between Christians, in the infant house of Portugal. . . . But the young Earl Alfonso Henriquez being extremely afflicted at these exorbitances, and besides finding himself despised, rejected, and disgraced, and that the adulterous and incestuous Don Fernand assumed the title of Count of Portugal, on account of his wife, he raised an army against him (21). . . . Pursuing him as a tyrant and incestuous adulterer; and their forces engaged near Guimaranes, where Alfonso was beaten, by his falling too rashly on the enemy. . . . Having afterwards recruited, and rallied their forces, they fought a second battle, which proved more successful to Don Alfonso: for Don Fernando's army was utterly routed, he and the Countess, Don Alfonso's mother, were taken and confined to a strong prison: . . . And this was the fruit which these two leud sisters, daughters of King Alfonso VI, reaped in reward of their lust, and almost at the same time (22). Theresa was treated very severely by Count Alfonso Henriquez her son. 'She found a way to discover her sufferings to Don Alfonso Raimund King of Castile, her nephew, and desired him to espouse her cause, and deliver her from her harsh confinement, in reward of which she offered to settle the county of Portugal on him. King Alfonso desirous to re-unite that country to his territories, came in person with an army, in order to deliver this lady, perfectly forgetting that the Earl had assisted him in his wars, against his mother Donna Urraca, Queen of Castile and Leon (23); but he was beaten and wounded in the foot. After he was cured, he re-entered Portugal, and besieged the city of Guimaranes, in which Count Alfonso Henriquez had shut himself up. 'This siege proved very tedious, and if the attacks were brisk on one side, the defence was brave on the other; inasmuch that they were grown weary of it, when Egas Nunnez came out of the town, having first obtained a safe conduct, and made proposals of peace which was concluded on condition that the Count of Portugal should be obliged to come into Alfonso's kingdom and take an oath of allegiance to him as his sovereign. Thus the king drew off his army, and marched back to Toledo, without remembering his aunt's interest, on whose account he undertook the expedition, either being struck with horror at her detestable course of life, or having perhaps engaged in this enterprise by ambition only (24).'

(21) Mayerne, ubi supra. parallel that could be found for her, would be that of her sister Theresa. They were both very leud; the tyranny which both their paramours exercised, was owing to them, as well as a thousand civil and foreign hostilities thereby occasioned, and they were both degraded and poisoned by their own fons. II. This confirms what I have already said of the disorders which those countries are exposed to, where the Salique Law doth not take place, and concerning the pernicious consequences of the leud inclinations of a female sovereign (26). Urraca could not bear that her subjects should acknowledge her husband's authority: that she had her gallants was obvious to the whole world: the husband was obliged to put a stop to this inordinate licentiousness; this he could not do without making room for factions, and this occasioned a war. The Castilians disgusted at him and their Urraca's gallant, turned to the rising-sun, and stirred up the son to dethrone his own mother; and he readily complied with their inclination. This shews of what importance it is for a Queen to avoid at least all public impurities; for if she once grows shameless, no bounds can restrain her. She will place her affection on despicable objects; she will not have any regard to merit in her choice, nor value any thing besides the beauty and vigour of a young giddy-headed fellow, who will abuse her credit, and occasion a hundred pretexts for a civil war; and besides, become so insolent as to use his mistress ill, and render his assassination necessary (27). She will not consider the regular example which she owes to her children, when a premature or untimely succession may raise them to the throne. In one word, it is a chain of ignominy and confusion.

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 343. III. It is an aggravation of Urraca's crimes, that she not only took no care to save appearances, but also that she was married to an illustrious Monarch. He was first named El Bataillador, - - - the Battle-Fighter (28), because he had fought twenty-nine battles, and been victorious in all of them, two only excepted. He was King of Arragon and Navarre, by a right independant of Urraca, which rendered his condition equal to that of this Queen. Notwithstanding all this he did not escape the matrimonial disgrace. So true it is that the personal bravery of a husband is not sufficient to avert that storm (29).

(23) Id. ibid. pag. 347. IV. Lastly, I observe that Don Alfonso Raimund, King of Castile, who had dethroned his mother Urraca, and kept her in prison, did nevertheless engage in a war in favour of his aunt the Countess of Portugal, who was treated in the same manner by Don Alfonso Henriquez her son. This aunt promised the King of Castile to declare him her heir to the prejudice of her son. 'Doloris illa impatentia Alfonso Castellæ Regem eo nomine septimum, ut propinquæ, miseræ & captivæ matri opem ferat, per litteras obtestatur adversus impios filii conatus. Navatæ operæ mercedem, Portugaliz principatum pollicetur Alfonso filio, pro eo ac par erat, abdicato. Annuit ille five ambitione dominandi corruptus, five materteræ calamitatem miseratus: validoque exercitu conflato in Portugaliz fines irruit (30). - - - Being not able to bear her grief, she wrote a letter to Alfonso VII King of Castile, beseeching him that he would succour his miserable relation, and deliver a captive mother from the wicked attempts of her own son. She promised him as a reward the principality of Portugal, by excluding her son Alfonso as he deserved. The King of Castile consented to it, either from an ambitious desire of extending his dominions, or out of pity to his aunt's distress; and having raised a great army he invaded Portugal.' This was sufficient to invite him into Portugal with sword in hand, and it is very probable, that amongst other pretexts, he urged that of his aunt being dispossessed and oppressed by an unnatural son: for where are the men who are ashamed to condemn in another what they do themselves? Don Alfonso Henriquez might very justly have vindicated himself by an argument

(24) Campion, ubi supra, pag. 135, 136. This might be the subject of many reflexions; but I shall offer only a few. The first is,

I. That most authors who write lives, chose for their subjects only illustrious persons; and if some of them intermix ill men with the good, it is because they are resolved to give a perfect history of an entire order or class of men. I know no author who has attempted to write the lives of great criminals only. There is no want of encomiums on illustrious women; libraries swarm with them; but I question whether there ever yet appeared a particular collection of those women who were a scandal to their sex and country. It is a copious subject which deserves an author's pains, and it might be handled in Plutarch's manner: I mean, that as this famous writer chose the most illustrious Romans and the most illustrious Grecians in order to parallel them; in like manner the queens and princesses of different nations might be compared together. I have mentioned in another place (25), the comparison which the English made betwixt Mary Stuart Queen of Scots, and Joan Queen of Naples. Many such parallels might easily be made. Our Urraca might be compared to the heiress of Guienne, or Margaret de Valois, wife of Henry IV. But the most exact

(26) See, remark [G], of the article NA-PLES, (JOAN II, Queen of).

(27) See the remark [X], of the article ELIZABETH.

(28) Gollut, Mémoires de la Franche-Comté, pag. 341.

(29) See, above, the remark [B], of the article BAUTRU (WILLIAM).

(30) Mariana, ubi supra, pag. 433.

(25) In the remark [K], of the article NA-PLES, (JOAN J, Queen of).

as a scandalous and most unfavourable one, after the vicious life of the Queen who is the subject of this article.

(51) See the article LAMECH, remark [E].

(12) Lequien de la Neuville, Hist. Générale de Portugal, Tom. i, pag. 84, Edit. of Paris, 700.

a) This name is a translation of the German word Bear, which was the name of his family, and is the same as the Latin word Ursus.

(b) Freherus says the 29th of June, tho' he follows the same author as I do. Bucholcer says also the 29th of June.

(c) Ibi statim Ursinus Sacramentarius à Demagogis proclamatus, & adversarius expertus est quos prius amicos & fautores habuerat. Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theol. pag. 531.

(1) It is 529th of the volume containing the Lives of the German Divines.

[A] He was sent to Wittemberg in the year 1550, Melchior Adam is guilty of two contradictions in the same page (1). The first is, that Ursinus was sent to the university of Wittemberg at the age of sixteen; the second, that he entered Wittemberg on the first of May 1552. One of these particulars must necessarily be false, since the same author informs us, that Ursinus was born on the eighteenth of July in 1534. I reject the second, tho' the author hath not expressed the year 1552 in numbers, but in words at length. Ingressus est Wittembergam anno quinquagesimo secundo, Kalendis Maii. The reason why I reject it, is because he tells us also in the same page, that Ursinus having studied above two years at Wittemberg, left it on account of the Plague, and went first to Torga whither Melanchthon was then retired, and afterwards to Breslaw, carrying with him an advantageous testimonial from Melanchthon. Melchior Adam cites at large this testimonial dated on St James's day in the year 1552. He also mentions another, wherein the same Melanchthon on the first of October 1557, positively saith that Ursinus had been about seven years at Wittemberg. I have therefore reason to place his going thither in the year 1550, and to have more regard to the evidences that Melchior Adam hath furnished me with against himself than to his own text. We may very well infer from hence, that he did not much examine what he compiled. He hath confounded Ursinus's second journey with the first; and Freherus, without either examining or rectifying any thing, barely saith that Princes (33). He places himself among those who did not believe her to be a bastard (34), and saith that Theodorus Godefroy evidently proves, that Don Henry her husband, was great-grandson to Robert the devout, King of France (35). Father Anselme, who espouses the same opinion, refers us to Godefroy's tract concerning the original of the Kings of Portugal, printed in the year 1624. I have not this edition, but if it affords no stronger proofs than that printed in 1612, which I have just now examined, I dare venture to say, that learned Historiographer doth not evidently prove this genealogical assertion.

URSINUS (a) (ZACHARY) one of the most celebrated Reformed Divines of the XVIth century, was born at Breslaw, the capital city of Silesia, on the eighteenth of July (b) 1534. He had already made a considerable progress for his age, when he was sent to Wittemberg in the year 1550 [A]. There he studied seven years; and his father not being rich, he was assisted by public and private gratuities, and he had also recourse to tutorship. He so closely followed his studies, that at Wittemberg he acquired a great knowledge, as well in Poetry [B] and the languages, as in Philosophy and Divinity. Melanchthon, the ornament of that university, conceived a very particular esteem and affection for him. Ursinus accompanied him in the year 1557, to the conference of Worms, from whence he went to Geneva, and afterwards to Paris, where he stayed some time in order to learn French, and perfect himself in the Hebrew under the learned John Mercerus. He had scarce returned to Melanchthon at Wittemberg, when he received letters from the magistrates of Breslaw in September 1558, containing an offer of the Mastership of their school. He accepted it, and so worthily acquitted himself in that post, that he might have continued in it as long as he pleased, if it had not been for the persecution which the ministers raised against him, as soon as they discovered that he was not a perfect Lutheran. In effect, when he explained Melanchthon's book De examine ordinandorum ad Ministerium, he treated the subject de Cena Domini in such a manner, that he gave occasion to the Demagogues (so the author of his life calls them (c)) to term him Sacramentarian. He justified himself by writing down his sentiments concerning Baptism and the Lord's Supper: but this attempt for the restoration of peace proving ineffectual, Ursinus who hated quarrels of this sort, chose rather to go away than to be embroiled in them; accordingly he obtained an honourable dismissal of the magistrates, and it being impossible for him to retire to his dear master Melanchthon, who had been lately dead in April 1560, he went to Zurich, where Martyr, Bullinger, Simler, Gesner, and several other great men received him with the greatest kindness. He was soon drawn from thence by the university of Heidelberg, which then wanted a learned man. He reached that city in September 1561, and was settled in the Collegium Sapientiae, to instruct the students who had their education there. He also attempted to preach [C], but finding himself scarce fit for the exercise of that function, he quitted all thoughts of it. The want of that talent, was fully made up by his Ursinus went to Wittemberg in 1552. He cites the epitaph wrong, the year LXXXII is inserted instead of LXXXIII, and the XIth of March instead of the VIth. At this rate how can one rely upon the printed copies of inscriptions?

[B] He acquired a great knowledge . . . in Poetry. Ursinus, in his younger years, must needs have distinguished himself in that particular; for I observe, that Melanchthon in his two testimonials, seems chiefly to value him on that head; and to confirm the praises which he bestows on him in the first, he calls in as an evidence his Greek and Latin verses that were published. Cum extent Latina & Græca Carmina Zacharie Ursini Uratislaviensis eruditè scripta, prudentes & docti viri lectis illis suo judicio probant ingenium, studia, & voluntatem ejus, &c. (2) Ursinus was then but eighteen years of age. He published, in 1560, a collection of epigrams, which he dedicated to John Frisius, in whose house he lodged at Zurich.

[C] He also attempted to preach. Thuanus was misinformed when he said that the Protestants of the diocese of Cologne, assembled in the year 1582, to hear Zachary Ursinus, a preacher whom Prince John Casimir had sent them (3). Ursinus gave over preaching after a few essays, with which he himself was not pleased. Nor did he stir from Neustadt after he was established there: besides which, he was so broken and infirm in 1582, that he was by no means capable of exercising that function. It was John Sibelius who his qualifications for a professor; for he had a lively genius, a rich stock of knowledge, and a happy dexterity in clearing up matters. Wherefore keeping the preferment he had already, he was, besides, made Professor of the Common-places. In order to this the statutes of the university rendered it necessary for him to commence Doctor of Divinity; which he did solemnly on the twenty-fifth of August in the year 1562, and continued in the discharge of this post till 1568. He composed the Chatechism of the Palatinate, and by order of the Elector Palatine Frederic III, wrote an apology for it against the clamours which Flacius Illyricus, Heshufius, and some other rigid Lutherans published in 1563, on account of that work. The Elector finding himself not only exposed to the complaints of the Lutheran Divines, but also to those of some Princes, as if he had established a doctrine concerning the Eucharist, condemned by the Augsborg Confession, was for that reason obliged to order an exposition of the true doctrine concerning the sacraments to be printed: this piece was written by our Ursinus, who, the following year (d), assisted at the conference at Maulbrun, where he vigorously opposed the doctrine of Ubiquity. He afterwards wrote on that subject, and against several other Lutheran opinions. The plan and the statutes which he drew up for that Elector in order to the establishment of some schools, and several other services, raised him so high in his esteem, that seeing him resolved to accept of the Divinity professor's chair at Lausanne in the year 1571, he wrote a long letter to him with his own hand, urging several reasons to dissuade him from it. The death of that Prince happening in 1577, occasioned a great revolution in the Palatinate; for Prince Lewis, his eldest son, who succeeded him, would not suffer any minister there that was not a Lutheran. Ursinus, and the students whom he educated in the Collegium Sapientia, were obliged to depart (e). He retired to Neustadt, to be professor of Divinity in the illustrious school which Prince Casimir the son of Frederic III, erected there at that time. He began his lectures there on the twenty-sixth of May 1578. He also taught Logic in his chamber, published some books; and was preparing for the composition of several others, when his health, which had been impaired by several great indispositions arising from his incredible application to study, at last entirely sunk under the weight of a tedious distemper, of which he died at Neustadt on the sixth of March 1583, in the forty-ninth year of his age. His works were collected after his death, as well by the care of his only son, who was a minister, as by the care of David Pareus and Quirinus Reuterus, his disciples. To the last of these we owe their publication in three volumes. Ursinus was laborious [D], modest, passionate (f). As for readiness in answering objections, he did not think he ought to aim at it; but he so contrived the matter, that if an explanation of any thing was ever demanded of him, it was done in writing at the end of his lecture, and he answered it the next day (g).

We have elsewhere (b) seen how fatiguing he found the direction of a college.

who went to the diocese of Cologne with Prince John Casimir, as his Minister. Philip Pareus, his nephew (4), has observed this mistake of Thuanus, and informs us at the same time, that this John Stibelius was afterwards Chaplain to the court of Heidelberg, and Counsellor to the Prince, and that he died in the year 1595, being the first Minister at Creutz-nac. It was probably the authority of Thuanus, which moved John Lætus, to represent Ursinus as one of the reformers of the Electorate of Cologne (5). Hofman following Lætus, makes him labour in this part of the Lord's vineyard. I say, following Lætus; for besides, that he refers to him, he could not herein have been misled by Moreri, who hath not said any thing of Ursinus, (misplaced under the name of Zachary,) unless that he was a Silesian, and a Professor at Heidelberg, who left behind him a great many books. He cites Gefner's Bibliothèque, which faith nothing of this author. He ought to have quoted the Epitome of that Bibliothèque. Several authors have committed the same mistake.

[D] Ursinus was laborious. To be convinced of this we need only consider the inscription which he had put upon the door of his study: it runs thus:

Amice, quisquis huc venit Aut agito paucis, aut abi,
Aut me laborantem adjuva (6).

(6) Melch.
Adam, ubi supra.

Friend, whosoever you be
That come to visit me
Make quick dispatch, and go away,
Or labour with me if you stay.

This was the reason that he passed for an ill-conditioned man (7).

Note, that Aldus Manutius, before him made use of a like inscription. 'Nothing was more uneasy to him than unprofitable visits, which obliged him to lose his time . . . to secure himself from which, in a civil manner, he caused to be writ over his closet door the following words: 'Quisquis es, rogat te Aldus etiam atque etiam, ut si quid est quod a se velis, perpaucis agas, deinde actutum abeas, nisi tanquam Hercules veneris suppositurus humeros: semper enim erit quod & tu agas, & quotquot huc attulerint pedes. - - - Whosoever you are, Aldus earnestly begs of you that if you have any business with him, you would dispatch it in a few words, and then leave him immediately, unless you come to his assistance, like Hercules to relieve Atlas: for there will always be work enough for you, and for as many as shall enter here.' These words that learned Greek Professor, and afterwards Printer at Basil, John Oporinus, borrowed from him, and put them also on the door of his study (8).

(d) That is in the year 1564.

(e) See, above, the text of the article PAREUS (DAVID), after the citation (d).

(f) Fuit tamen cōsolator, ut fit in ejusmodi ingenis. Melch. Adam, ubi supra, p. 531.

(g) Taken from Melchior Adam, who wrote Ursinus's life from the Funeral Oration, which Francis Junius, Professor of Divinity at Neustadt, spoke there, and from another Oration of Quirinus Reuterus.

(b) In the remark [D], of the article PAREUS (DAVID).

(7) See what Junius says concerning this in Ursinus's Funeral Oration.

(8) Chevallier, Origine de l'imprimerie de Paris, pag. 234, He quotes James Zwinger, in the Theatrum Vitæ humane, at Basel, 1604, pag. 3713.

URSI NUS (JOHN) a French Physician, who flourished in the XVIth century, wrote some Medicinal tracts in Latin verse [A], and a Commentary on Cato's distichs (a).

[A] He wrote several Medicinal tracts in Latin verse. He therefore deserves, what he hath not, a place in the catalogue of poetical Physicians, published by Bartholinus. His Protopopæia Animalium aliquot, is a poem in hexameter and pentameter verse, in which he mentions several particulars, concerning the nature and quality of animals, more especially as they belong to Physic. This book was printed at Vienne in Dauphiné,

(a) See the remark [B].

He is highly extolled by Stephen Roybosius Tulinus [B].

Dauphiné, in the year 1541, in 4to, with the Scholæ of James Olivier, a Physician. And in the same city and year was printed his Elegie de Peste eaque medicina parte quæ in vitiis ratione confistit (1).

(1) Epit. Bibl. Geineri, p. 509.

[B] He is highly extolled by Stephen Roybosius Tulinus. His words cited by Reinesius, run thus: 'Is est enim, quo cum si congressus fueris, nihil ignotum homini esse putes. Mirus Poeta, eximius & bene fortunatus Medicus, Philosophus summus, Orator facundus. Quorum documentum locupletissimum præstant quæ de re medica carmine scripsit, eruditissima

Comm. in Catonis libellum, ethologus elegans de moribus & alia plura quæ sub ejus nomine circumferuntur (2). - - - He is such a man, that if you were to converse with him, you would think he knew every thing. He is an admirable Poet, an excellent and successful Physician, a Philosopher of the first rank, and an eloquent Orator. All this fully appears from his learned dissertations upon Physic, in verse, his Commentary upon Cato's Distichs, his elegant treatise of Morality, and several other pieces which are published under his name.' (2) Reinesius, Epist. xli ad Daumium, pag. 118.

(a) Part of the Duchy of Holstein.

(b) Justus Burgius, Engineer to Philip and Maurice, Landgraves of Hesse, taught him Mathematics and Astronomy.

URSUS (NICOLAS RAIMARUS) author of some Astronomical tracts, was born at Hensted in Dithmarsen (a). He was a Swineherd in his youth, and did not begin to learn to read before the age of eighteen, when he diligently spent all his spare hours from keeping the hogs, in learning to read and write. After which, he applied himself to the study of the learned languages; and being endowed with a strong genius, soon made a considerable progress in the Latin and Greek tongues. He also learned French, the Mathematics, Astronomy (b), and the other parts of Philosophy, most of them without the assistance of any master [A]. Afterwards, leaving his own country, he gained his subsistence by the instruction of youth: it was the business he followed in Denmark, in the year 1584, and on the frontiers of Pomerania and Poland in 1585. In this last place, he invented a new Astronomical system, not very different from that of Tycho Brahe. He communicated it in the following year to the Landgrave of Hesse, whence there arose a violent contest betwixt him and Tycho Brahe [B], in which our Raimarus discovered that he still retained the manners of his primitive occupation; for he fell into such a brutish passion against Tycho, that he exposed himself to a criminal process [C]. He read private Mathematical lectures at Strasbourg in the year 1588, and in 1589, and also

(1) De Systemate mundano.

(2) Mollerus, Isagoge ad Historiam Chersonesi Cimbricæ, pag. 629.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Gassendus, in Vita Tycho. lib. ii, pag. m. 411, ad ann. 1584. See also lib. iii, pag. 428.

[A] He learned . . . without the assistance of any master. It was his good luck to make but one leap from the plough to the Republic of Letters, and he was not like others, obliged to serve an apprenticeship in the schools. Aliaque scientias Philosophicas, brevis, & persæque quidem αὐτοδιδάκτου, sibi reddidit familiaris. Scholas enim, ut ipse in Libro (1) paulo ante laudato, Rusticum se vocans Dithmarsum, testatur, uti sus hortum percurrit, & vix à limine salutavit, sed à Stiva illico, singulari quodam fato ac genio, in Remp. literariam irruit (2). This is an undeniable proof of great parts. His works afford several marks of his hasty studies; and his learning was as ill digested as his stile was incorrect: 'Homo certe fuit admodum ingeniosus, & in Antiquorum etiam lectione versatus, sed doctrinæ indigestæ, Styli haud satis castigati, & vere, quod Nasonis de Ennio est Judicium, Ingenio maximus, Arte rudis (3). - - - He was without doubt a very ingenious man, and well versed in the Antients; but his learning was indigested, and his stile somewhat incorrect; and the character which Ovid gives Ennius might truly be applied to him,

'A noble genius unimprov'd by art.

[B] There arose a violent contest betwixt him and Tycho Brahe. Tycho Brahe accused him of Plagiarism. Ursus, said he, coming with his master into my study, saw the scheme of my system on a piece of paper, and not long after arrogated the invention to himself: Cum mense Septembri versaretur apud ipsum nobilis vir Ericus Langius, quidam illius famulus nomine Nicolaus Raimarus, Dithmarsus, delineatam typographis quapiam in charta obiter vidit, ac sibi quasi à se in angulo Poloniæ quodam excogitatum arrogans, illam ut suam biennio post apud Landgrævium vendidit; ubi & impudenter in Tychonem debiterans repressus à Rothmanno fuit (4). Upon this charge, Ursus, in a book he published at Prague de Astronomicis Hypothesibus, outrageously abused Tycho Brahe, who was touched to the quick with this ill usage. Gassendus gives us the particulars of this story. 'Quia superiore anno

Raimarus Ursus, ille Dithmarsus, Librum Pragæ ediderat de Astronomicis Hypothesibus, in quo Rothmannum quidem, & Roëlinum variis probris onerat, sed Tychonem innumeris, occasione eorum, quæ de se in Epistolis ejus legerat: ideò, cum ejusmodi Liber ad Tychonem manus recens pervenisset, illæ occasione ipsius literis inferuit, Vidisti proculdubio Plagiarium mei, impuri illius Ursi, maledicentissimum scriptum, in quo præter alia innumera convitia, mee, & meorum bonori non parciit. Ego quidem refutatione illum indignum censeo, cum omnes modestie limites, imò honestatis longè transgesserit: efficiam tamen, ut non impunè ferat (5). - - - Raimarus Ursus, (6) Gassendus, a native of Dithmarsen, had published the year before at Prague a book de Astronomicis Hypothesibus, in which he throws out various reproaches upon Rothmannus and Roëlinus, but chiefly upon Tycho Brahe, on account of what he had said of him in his letters. For that reason Tycho, soon after the book had come to his hands, took occasion to insert the following words in a letter. You have seen, no doubt, the scurrilous writing of my dirty Plagiary, Ursus, wherein, besides innumerable other reproaches, he does not even spare the honour of me and my family. I for my part do not think him worthy of a refutation, since he has far exceeded all the bounds of modesty, and even of honesty: I will nevertheless take care to make him suffer for it. These are Tycho's words in a letter to Longomontanus. But more on this head in the following remark.

[C] He exposed himself to a criminal process. In Tycho Brahe's Funeral Oration, we are told that a man of sense and learning, but utterly void of religion or virtue, was not content to arrogate the Astronomical inventions of this great man to himself, but also barbarously injured his reputation with black calumnies. The Orator adds, that if his death had not put a stop to the prosecution commenced against him upon that account, he had been severely punished. This is said of our Raimarus. Ante annos paucos, quidam ingeniosus, & doctus, sed absque religione, & virtute homo, tetricum, & famosum contra præstantissimum hunc Virum divulgavit scriptum, quale in hoc genere non vidit antiquitas, nec fortassis spectatura est unquam posteritas. Non sat fuerat infamatori illi plagium committere litterarum, & TYCHONIS Hypothesin, Uraniburgi repertam, falsari pro proprio invento venditare, nisi etiam Virum aviti generis, summe eruditionis, inculpabilissimæ vitæ, cum tota ipsius beneplacita familia, sexcentis contumeliis, & totidem mendaciis, apud alios, si non deformatum, suspensum saltem reddidisset. Et profecto jure actum cum hoc fuisset, velut etiam jam agi captum fuerat, nisi mors feram illam singulari beneficio affecisset, & pæne subduxisset commertissimæ (6). Gassendus quotes a fragment of a letter, by which it appears, that Tycho Brahe designed to prosecute his adversary. His own words, which inform us that Raimarus Ursus escaped from Prague, run thus: 'Ceterum de fera ista Dithmarica, nimis efferat, & brutat, ut aliqua subjungam, licet indigna sit, cujus recordetur, also published a book. After that he was called by his Imperial Majesty, to teach the Mathematics at Prague. But he silently retired from that town to avoid the presence of Tycho Brahe, in the year 1598, and died some time after (c). He was entirely unknown to Vossius: I shall set down the titles of his works [D].

(6) Joann. Id. senius, in Oratio. funebri Tycho. Brahe, quod Gassendus in Appendice Vita Tycho. pag. 423.

(c) Taken from John Mollerus's book, intitled, Ussoge ad Historiam Chersonesi Cimbrice, printed at Hamburg in the year 1691, p. 628, 629, Part. iv. He quotes for most of those things Ant. Heimreichius, in Catalogo Autorum Chronico Dithmarico præfixo.

(7) Tycho Brahe, Epist. ad Longomontanum, apud Gassend. in Vita Tychonis, lib. v, pag. 455.
 recordetur, scias istam ante aliquot septimanas, prout nuper rescivi, Pragâ se subduxisse, sive malè sibi conscia, & quòd iustas penas per leges formidaret; sive quid aliud sinu suo latenter more suo ruminans. Sed investiganda tamen suo tempore per otium, atque in jus pertrahenda, & punienda, quod etiam optimi quique Pragæ suadent (7). - - - As for this wild beast of Dithmarfen, who is indeed too savage and brutal, though he does not deserve to be mentioned, yet I would have you to know that, as I have been lately informed, he left Prague some weeks ago; being either disturbed by an evil conscience, and dreading the just vengeance of the law, or else hatching, as his manner is, some new projects in his head. But care shall be taken to find him out some time or other, that he may be brought to justice and condign punishment; for so the best people of Prague advise me to do. To make the character of this quondam swineherd better known, I add that he had raised a report, that Rothmannus was dead of a scandalous distemper (8). Rothmannus appeared very zealous for Tycho Brahe, when he saw that Ursus calumniated him at the court of Hesse: from that time they became utter enemies, and treated each other with the utmost violence. The following words were written by Rothmannus in the year 1586. Plura scriberem præsertim de impuro nebulone Nicolao Raymaro Ursio Dithmarico, qui superiori hyeme apud tuam Excellentiam typographicam literarum collectionem & ordinationem, ut opinor, exercuit (9). I should say more of that sorry fellow Nicolas Raimarus Ursus of Dithmarfen, who last winter, if I am not mistaken, followed the business of collecting and disposing the letters for the press at your Excellency's court. Fuerat ille quoque Rothmanno ea propter insensatus, quod Cassellus transiens & Tychonem convitiis proficiens repref-fus ab eo vehementer fuisset (10). (10) Id. ibid.

(8) Rumorem sparserat fuisse ipsum podendia nescio quibus morbis pridem infectum, & tandem confectum. Gassend. ibid.
 (9) Gassend. ibid.

 [D] I shall set down the titles of his works.] He published his fundamentum Astronomicum in the year 1589, at Straßburgh, at the expence of his pupils. His book de Astronomicis Hypothesibus seu de Systemate mundi was printed at Prague in the year 1597, as was also Astronomicarum Hypothesium à se inventarum Vindicatio & Defensio: item Problemata totius processus Astronomicæ observationis seu rationis observandi τὰ φαινόμενα (11). The Oxford catalogue mentions our Raimarus's Tetragonismus Circuli expeditiori structura productus per Pet. Crugerum, printed at Leipsic 1607 in 4to. Mr Konig (12) ascribes to him a book de Doctrina sinuum & triangulorum, printed in 1588. Mr Mollerus (13) says that he never saw the book de Civitatibus in Dithmarfia Hansaticis, printed at Leipsic in the year 1563, and ascribed to Raimarus Ursus by Albert Bartholinus and Lipenius. He doubts whether any such work was ever published, by reason that there is not one town in the whole province of Dithmarfen which ever engaged in the Hanseatic confederacy: 'Impositum illis esse à catalogis, quos frequenter excubunt, proletariis, conjecto (14). - - - I conjecture that they have been imposed upon by the catalogues which are often wretchedly drawn up and transcribed.' I do not know whether he carefully observed Bartholin's words, which run thus: Nicolaus Reimers. De Civitatibus Hansaticis in Dithmarfia, Gæodesia Rantzoviana, Leipsic 1583 in 4to (15). Who can certainly conclude from hence that he speaks of our Raimarus Ursus? Is it not more probable that he did not mean him? He was no Dane, nor author in Denmark; and therefore it is not probable that Bartholin should put him into his catalogue. Nor is it true that Bartholin says that this book was printed at Leipsic in the year 1563.

(11) Mollerus, ubi supra, Part. iv, pag. 628.
 (12) Bibliotheca vet. & nova, at the sword Ursus, He speaks of him as of another writer under the word Reimarus, and he mentions one Nicolas Reimarus, who wrote Theatrum temporis, in fol.
 (13) Ussoge, &c. pag. 517.
 (14) Ibid. pag. 628.
 (15) Alb. Bartholinus, de Scriptis Danorum, pag. 109.

USHER (HENRY) Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland in the beginning of the XVIIth century, spent a great deal of time in the composition of a book against Cardinal Bellarmine; but we are told that his wife forced the sheets from him, and threw them into the fire, on pretence that the match was not equal betwixt a man burdened with children, and domestic affairs, and a person disengaged from all worldly concerns. The author who relates this, and who may very well be suspected, adds that Todd Bishop of Down (a) being disgusted at his wife, and desirous to put her away, petitioned this Archbishop for a letter of divorce, but could not obtain it [A]. He conjectures that the sole reason of this prelate's refusal was the fear of displeasing his wife, who would have been very uneasy at any thing which tended to introduce the annulling of marriages, by reason the might her self at some time or other be in danger of falling under the like inconvenience. The reader may believe as much or as little of this as he pleases. I will not answer for the truth of it, and indeed I relate it for no other reason than to make way for the examination of a false suggestion of Father Garasse [B]. Observe

[A] The author who relates this, and who may very well be suspected, adds, &c. . . . Henry Fitz Simon, an Irish Jesuit, relates the matter thus: Toddus pseudo-Episcopus Dunensis in Ibernica, sue conjugis seu uxoris sortis peritus . . . eam voluit repudiare. Accessit primò symmiam suam (ut loquuntur) totius Ibernicae Primatem, Henricum Usherum; libellum ab eo repudii acriter efflagitans. Nimirum frustra, apud virum integerrimum scilicet, & apprime uxoris (quæ illi viribus suis quam tenuissimis impar onus exantlans, nempe multorum annorum elucubrations contra Bellarminum, extorsit, tradiditque Vulcano, quod iniqua futura esset, ut agebat, concertatio, inter hominem proliis & domesticis curis gravatum, & hominem omnis secularis sollicitudinis expertem) imperio, ac voluntati, obnoxium. Displicuisset autem matronæ gravi (abdominis centum pondio) divoritii Ministræ causaria prætextu, per quam ipsa sortis brevi, technis id generis Ministrælibus, conjugali toro discluderetur (1).

[B] For the examination of a false suggestion of Father Garasse.] That author's title is so well known that the burlesque expressions in the following quotation will not appear very surprising. 'The ministers

(saith he) as Humphredus tells us in the second part of his Jesuitism, accuse the Jesuits of Magic by reason of their learning. No wonder (say they) that the Jesuits are learned since they are all Magicians, and learn all they know by diabolical assistance (2). . . . Let them remember the story of an eminent Roman citizen, who was accused by his enemies that he made use of Sorcery to attract the fat and substance of the adjoining lands, by reason that he had always a much richer crop than any of his neighbours: a day being appointed, he brought before the court his oxen in good case, his ploughs in good repair, and his children well fed, and offered no other defence to the Judges than, Gentlemen, these are the charms I make use of, Hæc sunt veneficia mea. Quirites, nor can I further produce my sweats, my waking nights, and toilsome days. I say the same thing to the Calvinist and Lutheran ministers; the Jesuits are not embarrassed with the family cares of the ministers, they are not clogged with the long train of a wife and a whole nest of ministerial brats; their nocturnal rest is not broken with the cries of ten or a dozen chits, nor are they interrupted in the

(a) In the Province of Ulster.

(2) Garasse, Recherches des Recherches d'Étienne Pasquier, pag. 973, 974.

(b) The Cathedral of Dublin.

Observe that whilst this Henry Usher was only Archdeacon of Dublin, he was twice deputed to Queen Elizabeth, first on an affair relating to St Patrick's Church (b), and afterwards

the day-time with the cares of maintaining fifteen or sixteen craving famished children; any more than they are diverted by usury, luxury, and pleasures. Hec sunt eorum veneficia. These are their magical charms, of which I would willingly prepare an amulet to hang about the ministers' necks. I remember to have read in Constantine Bassus's Geoponics in the fourteenth book page 380, that an honest countryman wished to be informed of a charm to prevent the cats, rats, and snakes ever infesting his pigeon house, and was answered by an anonymous author, that he knew a very effectual one to keep out the cats and rats. I. Said he, carefully shut your pigeon-house door. II. Open the windows as little as you can. III. Keep your walls tight and whole. IV. Stop up the chinks of the door, and I will engage neither cat nor rat shall enter your pigeon house. Accordingly I can oblige the Calvinist ministers with a good charm, that they may be as learned as the Jesuits. 1. Let them discharge themselves of their wives, and the brawls of a family. 2. Let them spend less time in combing their hair, tricking themselves up, and setting their starched bands and ruffs. 3. Let them more seriously apply themselves to the study of the gospel than of Rabelais; which advice is particularly directed to the minister Du Moulin. 4. Let not Chamier, Pother, Bonnet, Bonvouloir, and other ministers fill themselves with such loads of wine and meat, in order to keep their minds more free and unclogged. . . . 5. If they take and make use of this amulet, and are endowed with as good capacities as the Jesuits, I promise that they will become as learned as they (3).

Before I make any reflexions on this passage, I shall look back to the original of the story of the Roman citizen, who was accused of fertilizing his land by Sorcery. It is related by Pliny. 'C. Furius Cresinus, says he (4), è servitute liberatus, cum in parvo admodum agello largiores multo fructus perciperet, quam ex amplissimis vicinitas, in invidia magna erat, cum fruges alienas pelliceret veneficiis. Quamobrem a Sp. Albino curuli die dicta, metuens damnationem, cum in suffragium tribus oporteret ire, infrumentum rusticum omne in forum attulit, & adduxit filiam validam, atque (ut ait Piso) bene curatam ac vestitam, ferraamenta egregie facta, graves ligones, vomeres ponderosos, boves saturos. Postea dixit: Veneficia mea, Quirites, hæc sunt: nec possum vobis ostendere, aut in forum adducere lucubrationes meas, vigiliæque, & sudores. Omnium sententia absolutus itaque est. . . . Caius Furius Cresinus having recovered his liberty, was much envied because he reaped far more plentiful crops from a small field than his neighbours did from very large ones, and it was given out that he attracted other peoples corn to himself by charms. Being therefore summoned to appear by the Edile Spurius Albinus, and doubting the issue of the trial, when the votes of the tribes were to be called, he produced all his instruments of husbandry in the Forum, and brought his daughter there in a vigorous state of health, and (as Piso says) well fed and clothed, likewise his iron-tools extremely well fashioned, his heavy spades, his ponderous ploughshares, and his oxen in good case. Afterwards addressing himself to the people, these, said he, are the charms I make use of; nor can I further produce and shew you my sweats, my waking nights, and my toilsome days. Upon this he was acquitted by the unanimous consent of the people.' He doth not mention the time when this happened; but in general we may guess at it, because it is very well known that Spurius Albinus here mentioned was Consul in the year of Rome 568.

(5) J. Vincencius Gravina, in Specimine præludii juris, pag. 53, Oportulorum, Editionis Romæ, 1696, in 12mo.

Take notice, by the by, that the ancient Romans were so fully persuaded that some Magic charms could remove the fruits of the earth from one place to another, that the laws of the twelve tables established a great punishment against those pretended enchanterers. Mr Gravina, who to his polite literature has added the knowledge of the law, very justly laughs at this childish error. 'Sequitur, says he (5), frugum incantatio: cum enim veteres illi omnium bonarum artium & disciplinarum rudes putarent fruges car-minibus magicis vel averti posse vel traduci (ut enim Tibullus ait, Carmen vicinis fruges traducit ab agris.)

ideo Decemviri pro sua puerili ac ridicula superstitione sanxerunt, ut qui fruges exantassit, five Carminibus magicis crescere prohibuerit, aut segetem alienam pellexerit, Cereri sacer esset. . . . Next follows the incantation of corn. The Antients, being very ignorant of the Arts and Sciences, imagined that corn might be either blasted or transported from one place to another by magical charms (for as Tibullus says, for this reason it was that the Decemvirs in their childish and ridiculous superstition made a law, that whosoever should enchant the corn, that is, hinder it from growing by magical charms, or remove it from his neighbour's field into his own, should be devoted to Ceres.

By charms the corn is from the neighbour's fields Mow'd and transplanted.)

The reflexions which I design to make on Garasse's words will not concern his calumnies or comical hyperboles; I leave them to himself, and fix only on that which may in general confirm the maxim or principle of the wife of Henry Usher, Primate of Ireland. That woman supposed that an author who had children was not able to hold up against a Monk. This maxim indeed appears somewhat probable in theory, but is false in practice; for it is easy to prove by numerous examples, that several persons who have been clogged with the cares of a family have been very great authors, whether we consider the quality or the quantity of their productions. If Garasse had writ judiciously, he would not have brought into play, Peter du Moulin and Daniel Chamier, two ministers who were very fit examples to overthrow what he designed to establish. They were both married and had children, and yet they wrote a great many good books, and gloriously disputed vis à vis, and in their writings, with the best controversialists of the Romish party. The examples of several other ministers might be added to these two. It may in general be affirmed that the maxim of the Primate's wife is so often contradicted and refuted by experience, that it ought by no means to pass into a rule. For whatever is liable to so many exceptions doth not deserve that name, and whoever would draw up a rule or aphorism upon such a point, must necessarily make use of this limitation, all other things being equal, an author disengaged from all domestic affairs will exceed one clogged with a wife and children. But who can suppose this equality, or where is it to be found? Compare an unmarried and a married writer together as long as you please, and if you find that the one hath not less wit, judgment or memory than the other, you will yet perceive that they are not perfectly alike in other particulars. The married man may prove more studious and robust, and thereby make up for the distractions and occasioned by a thousand petty domestic cares. He applies himself to study with more ardor after he hath dispatched the affairs of his family; the strength of his constitution and head allow him to study till midnight, and by that means to retrieve the lost hours of the day. He is obliged to go abroad twice or thrice in the morning, and as often in the afternoon, but he returns to his study as soon as he can, and studies with the greater ardency, because he knows that he hath been and shall be interrupted. Four or five hours of such a close study are very well worth seven or eight of the common languid and lifeless labours of those people, who have abundance of leisure. They study at their ease, without hurrying or fatiguing themselves, and rest from time to time; nor are they so solicitous to avoid the idle spending of some hours: besides, if they did not rest themselves, their way of proceeding on may aptly be compared to that of a messenger, who without ever halting continually moves on his dull pace, but doth not reach the inn where he puts up at night sooner than he, who after frequently stopping, mends his pace and sets up a afterwards for the foundation of the university of Dublin. In both these commissions he was successful (c).

WARRERS single men study better and write more good books than married men.

(c) Taken from the life of James Usher, in Collectione Bataviana, pag. 735.

The latter is a lively image of the studies of an active author, whose domestic cares frequently divert him from them.

Though some authors, who are free from avocations of this nature, study very hard, you will find on the other side that they want the natural endowments which others have, their frail constitution forcing them to stop. They find themselves exhausted, and are necessitated to keep from their studies till a long repose hath recruited their lost spirits. If they do not lie under this inconvenience, there are others which fall in their way, perhaps the want of books. A thousand real obstacles may be supposed which break in upon the equality, and compensate the disadvantage of interruptions: wherefore Garasse and Henry Usher's wife advanced a very uncertain maxim. It is nevertheless true, that it may be said of some authors, that they would have made a greater figure if they had lived single, or that they would not have published so many excellent books, if they had been embarrassed with a family. We may also assert, that several persons buried in obscurity had become very learned, if they had lived without a wife, mistress, children, law-suits, &c.

Observe that the Monks have not so much leisure as is imagined; the choir and breviary robs the studious of a great deal of time; and if any of them distinguishes himself by learning or piety, he is loaded with confessions. He cannot exempt himself from the direction of consciences, which frequently draws him from his study; he is obliged to give audience to a thousand devout women, whose scruples often are very ridiculous and very odd. Bellarmine had not so much time as the Archbishop of Armagh's lady imagined. I find in a tract published in the year 1625, that 'Cardinal Bellarmine, of pious memory, frequently said to the most illustrious Cardinal de la Roche-foucault, Mon-
'ignore veramente ci sono troppo Cristiani al mondo.
'I assure you that I am crowded with people and visits; and must own that I think there are too many Christians in the world (6).'

(6) Francis de Fontaine, (it is a fictitious name which the Jesuit Stephen Binct took. See Algernon, p. 426) preacher to the king, Response aux Demandes d'un grand Prelat touchant la Hierarchie de l'Eglise, & la juste Dénée des Privileges des Religieux, p. 204, 205.

USHER (JAMES), nephew to the former, and Archbishop of Armagh, was one of the most illustrious prelates of the XVIIIth century, as well with regard to his great piety and other virtues, as his profound learning. He was born at Dublin on the fourth of January 1580, and was taught to read by two aunts, though they were born blind: this is very particular. He made such an expeditious progress in the sciences, that at the age of eighteen he was able to dispute with a famous Jesuit, who, like a Goliath, challenged the Protestants [A]. He was ordained priest in the year 1601, though under the age prescribed by the canons. He was chosen Divinity Professor at Dublin about the year 1607, and exercised that employment for the space of thirteen years. He chose Bellarmine's controversies for the subject of his lectures. He was consecrated Bishop of Meath in the year 1620, and Archbishop of Armagh in 1624 (a). He very vigorously opposed the design of the Lord Falkland, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, to permit the taught by blind

Papists

[A] At the age of eighteen he was able to dispute with a famous Jesuit . . . who challenged the Protestants. This Jesuit was the same Henry-Fitz Simon, whom I have cited in the preceding article. He was kept prisoner in the castle of Dublin, but his confinement did not hinder his challenging all the Protestant Clergy to dispute with him, and his fiercely engaging to maintain what they took for the weakest part of the Romish religion, and to attack what they thought the strongest part of the Protestant doctrine. Donec ego, faith he (1), cause bonitate sustulit, defendere quicquid inter nos infirmum, vel impugnare quicquid inter ipsos tutissimum reputant, in me recipiam. James Usher, whilst yet beardless, had the courage to enter the lists with this old experienced stagger, and we are assured that he vanquished him. 'Cum Henrico Simonido Jesuita, pœcente sibi dari adversarios in castro Dublinensi de arce causæ suæ (scil. Antichristo) sæpius ita conflixit, imberbis juvenis cum veterano milite, ut & provocationis eum suæ pœneret, & satis antagonistarum in uno hoc octodenario tyrone experiretur. Ipsum audite Jesuitam in præfatione libri sui quem de Britannomachia ministrorum placuit inscribere. Prodiit quidem semel, (inquit) octodenarius præcoci sapientie juvenis, de abstrusissimis rebus Theologicis, cum ad hoc Philosophica studia non esset emensus, nec ephēbis egressus, disputandi avidus, &c. Quem postea cum adoleverat Acatolicorum doctissimum idem ille pronuntiabat, amplum sane & insolitum ex id genus ad-versarii ore testimonium (2). . . . When the Jesuit Henry-Fitz Simon demanded that his adversaries should meet him in the castle of Dublin, this beardless youth entering the lists with an old champion, had several disputes with him touching the main point of his cause, viz. Antichrist. The Jesuit was so handled that he heartily repented his challenge, and found antagonists enough in this one youth, who was only eighteen years of age. Hear what he himself owns in the Preface to his book which he has thought fit to intitule, de Britannomachia Ministrorum. Once, indeed, says he, there came forth a youth, not above eighteen years old, but of a forward understanding, who threw a great eagerness to dispute upon the most abstruse points of

'Divinity, tho' he has not as yet finished his Philosophical studies, nor was arrived at the age of a man, &c. When he was grown up, the same Jesuit declared him to be the most learned of all the Protestants, which was truly a high and uncommon testimony from the mouth of such an adversary.' Pray observe the at cetera at the end of the citation out of the Jesuit's Preface, and do not imagine that some words were omitted because they were foreign to the subject; for they were only suppressed because they are inconsistent with what was said just before. The whole passage of Fitz Simon runs thus: Sed neque in specula eminentem videre, neque in castris, claustrisque Stentoria ut agnoscent voce provocantem, exaudire voluerunt. Prodiit quidem semel in summa vocis vultusque trepidatione, octodenarius præcoci sapientie (non tamen malæ, ut videbatur indolis) juvenis, nescio an auræ popularis cupidior, saltem de abstrusissimis rebus Theologicis cum ad hoc philosophica studia non esset emensus, nec Ephēbis egressus, disputandi avidus. Hunc autem jussi suorum calculos adferre, quibus pugil seu agonista idoneus renunciaretur, & vel cum ipso disputationem me initurum. Sed sicut ipse cum minime tanto honore dignatus sunt, ita me vicissim sua deinceps præsentia dignatus ipse non fuit (3). The Jesuit assures us that he asked this scholar, who trembling came to dispute with him, Are you authorized by your superiors? and that he offered, if he was, to enter the lists with him; but the young man not being honoured with any such commission could produce no credentials, and never came again. Nevertheless it is assured in the life of Usher, which I have already cited, that he frequently disputed with this Jesuit, and got the better of him. We read in another life of this Archbishop, that he engaged in this disputation with the consent of the whole university, and that at the second conference he overthrew and so silenced his antagonist, that, after that time, he never was bold enough to engage again, tho' provoked to it: Communi Academiæ consensu placuit Usserium, qui tum non nisi Artium Baccalaureus 18 aut 19 ætatis annum agebat, cum ipso committere: qui ut ab initio ab antagonista suo fere pro pueris ac despectui haberetur, post unum tamen alterumque colloquium adeo præfidentiam ejus perdidit, ut ad incitatus se, certe ad sentium

(a) Taken from his life, in Collectione Bataviana.

(3) Fitz Simon, in Prefat. Britannom. pag. 140

(1) Henr. Fitz-Simon, Episc. Cædicat. Britannomach. Ministrorum.

(2) Vita Jacobi Usserii, in Collectione Bataviana, pag. 737.

(b) From pag. 219, to pag. 244, in the extract of Usher's letters, to which his life written by Mr. Parr, has been prefixed. Another life of Usher came out since, as you may see in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for January 1701, p. 77.

Papists the public exercise of their religion [B], provided they would pay the necessary sums for the subsistence of the forces. He went to England in the year 1640, and never returned to Ireland, being hindered by the civil wars, which reduced him to a melancholy condition. He died at Rygate in Surrey on the twenty-first of March 1655. His wife, the daughter of Luke Challoner, Doctor of Divinity, died eighteen months before him, having been married to him the space of forty years; he had one daughter who was married to Timothy Tyrrel Esq; Governor of Cardiff in Wales. This article would have been much longer, and would have contained more particulars concerning the merit and the works of this great man, if I had not known that there is in Moreri, and yet more at large in the second volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle (b), a good abridgment of his life.

(4) Acta Erudit. Lips. 1687, pag. 115, in the Extract of Usher's Life, written by Mr. Parr. Note that Saldenus de Libris, pag. 368, relying, as I think, upon this passage of the Acta Eruditum, does so far exaggerate the thing as to affirm that the Jesuit himself owned that he was nonplussed. Fastidiosam viri præfidentiam ita perdomuit, ut ad novum provocatus confitium, declinavit, cum non tantum sed & ad exequenda redactum se esse ipse confessus sit.

lentium redactum max agnosceret, nec ulterius configere, ne provocatus quidem auderet (4). Either the Jesuit's relation, or that of the author of Usher's life must of necessity contain some fallacies.

[B] He opposed the design of the Lord Falkland . . . to permit the Papists the public exercise of their religion.]

The Lord Falkland proposed this to the parliament of Ireland in the year 1626. Archbishop Usher, who knew how fatal this would be to Ireland, assembled all the Bishops of his province, and drew up a declaration, which they all signed. It imported, that considering the falsity of the doctrine and worship of the Papists, it would be a great sin to permit the exercise of such a religion. The writing which they signed was read in the pulpit, and put a stop to the toleration which the Lord Lieutenant designed to procure. All this is related in stronger terms, and more particularly, in this Latin passage: 'Reverendissimus Primas facile perspiciens ea res quam fatalis Hiberniæ futura esset, omnes ditionis suæ Episcopos convocavit, qui ejusmodi indulgentiæ impietatem, subcriptis nominibus, unanimi consensu in hanc fere sententiam testati sunt. Quod quum Papistarum religio superstitiosa esset ac idololatrica, fides erronea ac hæretica, Ecclesia utriusque respectu Apostolica, liberum iis religionis suæ exercitium liberamque fidei suæ ac doctrinæ professionem indulgere grave peccatum foret; tum quod hæc ratione omnium Papismi superstitutionum, idolatriarum, hæresium, ac uno verbo abominationum ejus omnium, quin & perditionis omnium, quotquot in istius apostoliæ diluvio perirent, culpa & reatu nos (alunt) involveret, tum vero etiam quoniam hoc facere pecuniæ gratia nil aliud foret quam religionem venum exponere, imo & animas pretio prodere quas saluator noster Jesus Christus precioso suo sanguine redimere non dubitavit. Deum propterea veritatis comprecantes, ut vellet omnes, qui cum imperio erant, zelo Dei gloriæ & veræ religionis propagandæ studio imbueri & contra Papismum, Superstitutionem, ac Idolatriam omnem fortes eos reddere, zelo affectos, & animo quam maxime obarmatos. Episcopi duodecim omnino erant qui huic protestationi subscriperunt; quam Downhamus Derriensis Episcopus, cum postea coram Falklandio & concilio prædicaret, media concione publice recitavit; quin & Reverendissimus Primas eandem proximo die Dominico coram eisdem inter concionandum comprobavit; una in-gens quam gravis ira Dei ob talem animorum pro-

pensionem ei genti impenderet. Unde tandem effectum est ut ad alia consilia deflecterent (5). . . . The (c) Batz. Vita most reverend Primate, easily perceiving how fatal such a thing would be to Ireland, assembled all his Suffragans, who, with an unanimous consent, drew up and signed a remonstrance, wherein they declared how impious it would be to grant an indulgence of that nature, in words to the following purpose. That whereas the religion of the Papists was superstitious and idolatrous, their faith erroneous and heretical, and their Church in both respects guilty of apostasy, it would be a great sin to indulge them in the free exercise of their religion, and in the free profession of their faith and doctrine; both because such a thing would (as they said) involve us in the guilt of all the superstitions, idolatries, heresies, and, in one word, abominations of Popery; nay, what is more,

make us accessory to the ruin of all such as should persevere in the flood of that apostasy, and likewise because to do this for the sake of money would be in effect selling religion to sale, and even betraying for hire the souls which our Saviour JESUS CHRIST has been pleased to redeem with his precious blood. Wherefore

they prayed the GOD of truth, that he would endow all such as were in power with a zeal for the glory of GOD and the propagation of religion, and that he would fortify them against all Popery, superstition and idolatry, inspiring them with zeal and resolution. There were twelve Bishops who subscribed this remonstrance, which Downham, Bishop of Londonderry, when some time after he preached before the Lord Falkland, and the Council, took occasion to read in the middle of his sermon;

nay, the reverend Archbishop himself did, the next Lord's day, preaching before the same persons, approve of the remonstrances, insinuating at the same time that the dreadful vengeance of GOD threatened that nation for entertaining such a design; whereby it came to pass that other resolutions were taken. It is observable that Archbishop Usher and his diocessans acted according to the most rigid principles of the enemies to Toleration;

for they did not, like moderate men of that party, ground their declaration on political reasons, but only on the nature of worship in the Romish communion, without so much as ever mentioning it's persecuting spirit, the sole reason urged by the very favourers of Toleration for not tolerating the Papists.

to be taken down, and carrying them off in their coaches, buried them with their own hands in St Martin's chapel under Montmartre: and this death of la Molle drew showers of tears from his mistress, who sighed and sung her passionate grief

for him under the name of Hyacinthus, notwithstanding the frequent and nocturnal consolations of Saint Luc, who afterwards came often incognito and disguised to Nerac, till Bully made her forget the loss, which has been made up to her, tho' he was reported to be more valiant and stout amongst the men than amongst the women (3), by reason of a sort of cholic, which generally seized him at midnight.

She being disguised, excited her appetite with variety of

(a) Hadr. Val-lesius, Notit.
Galliar. pag.
588.

(b) Baudrand, Geograph. Tom.
ii, pag. 363.

(1) In the remark [D] of the third article
NAVARRÉ.

(2) Divorce Sa-vatrique, pag. m.
191.

USSON, in Latin Ucio, or Uxo (a), a small town in Auvergne a league distant from the river Allier (b), and six leagues from Clermont, formerly depended on the county of Brive (c). The castle of Usson is very strong by reason of its situation on a high rock naturally cut into round pillars (d). Nothing hath made this place so famous as the long residence of Margaret de Valois wife of Henry IV. She lived there several years, not in order to do penance for her past leudness [A], but to plunge her self deeper and deeper

[A] For her past leudness. I have elsewhere (1) mentioned some part of her leud practices, taken from a book which introduces Henry IV, relating the ill conduct of his wife. The rest of the narrative runs thus: (2) Time . . . provided her with several servants; la Molle, one of them, had cause to repent it, for under pretence of being concerned in a conspiracy with which the Marshals de Montmorency and de Cossé were charged, he left his head at St Jean en Greve, in company with that of Coconas, where they did not grow musty, nor were long exposed to public view; for the night following, my good wife, and Madam de Nevers, her companion, Coconas's faithful mistress, caused them to be taken down, and carrying them off in their coaches, buried them with their own hands in St Martin's chapel under Montmartre: and this death of la Molle drew showers of tears from his mistress, who sighed and sung her passionate grief for him under the name of Hyacinthus, notwithstanding the frequent and nocturnal consolations of Saint Luc, who afterwards came often incognito and disguised to Nerac, till Bully made her forget the loss, which has been made up to her, tho' he was reported to be more valiant and stout amongst the men than amongst the women (3), by reason of a sort of cholic, which generally seized him at midnight. She being disguised, excited her appetite with variety of supra.

(c) Valid old

(d) Coconas, Riviera de France,
Part. i, pag.
265.

(3) Add this to the examples quoted above, in the remark [B] of the article
HENRY IV.

deeper in her impurities [B]. Notwithstanding which she hath met with some panegyrist, who compared this castle, considered as the place of her residence, to the mountain where JESUS CHRIST was transfigured. To the end that her consolation might be perfect, faith one of them (c), she desired to see the court of Henry the Great and to leave her dear Usson, which had kept her for the space of twenty years, during which time she rendered

(c) Hilarion de Coste, Elog. des Dames illustres, Tom. ii, pag. 306.

of sauces, and took up with Mr de Mayenne, a jolly bulky fellow, as voluptuous as herself; after which they remained very good friends on all occasions, tho' not without a quarrel, which lasted for some time on account of a letter written to Mrs Vitry, in which he promised to prefer the sun to the moon To her former lovers succeeded at several times, (for their great number will excuse my misplacing them) that good fellow the Viscount de Turenne, whom like the rest she soon dismissed, finding him disproportionate in some part or other: she compared him to empty clouds which have nothing but a bare superficial appearance. The melancholy lover being in despair, after a farewell, accompanied with many tears, was going to ruin himself in some distant region, if I, who knew the secret, and for the good of the churches, pretended ignorance of it, had not expressly enjoined my chaste wife to recal him: which she did very much against her will, proudly wishing that some block-head might break his neck on her account. But these fools are grown scarce since they are laughed at; for to eat one's hat-feather in a rage, like la Bole, and to throw an ink-bottle in a passion at the ladies eyes, as Clermont d'Amboise did, are silly frenzies and jealousies, which were but too common amongst us, and which I knew and clearly saw, consenting to my own dishonour, and giving them, by my patience, the courage and opportunity of offending. She knows it very well, as do several of you who have assisted her in her diversions; nor was I so blind in an affair so apparent as not to perceive, as well as others, that Clermont frequently kissed her in her petticoat only, at her chamber-door, when in the evening I either by playing or walking in the hall with my nobility, gave him an opportunity to get into her bed . . . (4) Her beauty drew to me crowds of gentlemen, and her good nature retained them: nor was there any well-born spark or handsome fellow, who once in his life had not been an humble servant to the Queen of Navarre, who never denied any, but like the poor box, received the offerings of all comers. Add to this the passage cited from the same book in the article of this

(4) Divorce Satyrique, p. 194.

(5) Citat. (76), of the third article N A V A R R E.

(6) Divorce Sat. pag. 198.

[B] To plunge herself deeper and deeper in her impurities.] The passages just cited or pointed at, carry our Margaret no farther than Auvergne. Let us go on and hear the author who introduces Henry IV speaking. (6) The King her brother hearing of her flight . . . said aloud in presence of all those who then saw him at dinner, the Gascon sparks being insufficient to satiate the Queen of Navarre, she is gone in quest of the mule-drivers and tinkers of Auvergne This profligate woman being arrived at Carlat, where she long continued, not only without canopy or bed of state, but even without a sufficient number of shifts for every day, began to cast her eyes about, and to consider to which of her domestics she should prostitute her honour; and not to be idle, she pitched upon her cook, being tired with waiting for Duras, whom she had sent to the King of Spain for money, tho' her confident fearing she might deprive her of her own lover, continually inculcated the constancy and merit of the absent gentleman. But her insatiable desire, like the ravenous appetite of a blood-hound, which enfeebles one that is not continually satisfied, could not bear this delay, nor that of Saint Vincent, who was gone home to avoid expences, she took up with the wretched Aubiac, as being the best tricked up of all her domestics, whom she raised from her stables to her chamber, and caused him to ride her, till her belly became plump and swelled like a football, and, in due time, disgorged a boy, by the help of a Midwife, whom this spark's mother, out of pure love to her son, brought thither, and by the assistance of du May, the Physician, who, besides the exercise of his profession in curing her of an imposthume in her backside, served her also in conveying this young prince Lyfander, wretchedly swaddled, to his nurse in the neighbouring village of Ekoubiac: this was done so soon after his birth, that the cold he endured by the way utterly prevented his ever hearing or speaking: these imperfections deprived him of the love and care of his own mother, who forgetting the pleasure of the conception, for a long time suffered him to keep geese in Gasconne, where Mrs d'Aubiac, his grandmother, (as long as she lived) kept him from starving, and after her, Gesilax de Firmaçon, her son-in-law, who at present shews this pledge of the crown, as a great rarity to all those who come to see him at Birac, where he keeps him for a pension of two hundred crowns, which Goute Raquette has for some time been employed to go to Usson and Paris in quest of . . .

(7) Aubiac, a forry groom, red haired, and more speckled than a trout, when he consulted his glafe, could never have promised himself to be one day found in bed with a daughter of France, as he was at Carlat, by Madam de Marie (8), who hit on this noble adventure by a too early good morning to the Queen according to her custom, which officious compliment the yet paid for with the death of her husband, whom this virtuous Princess, perfectly acquainted with the potions of her mother's country, caused to be poisoned in hopes that being delivered from this obstacle, and assisted by the soldiers whom Romes, d'Aubiac's cousin, had raised in Gasconne, she should make her self absolute mistress of the place, and ungratefully wrest it out of their hands who had generously received and protected her . . . (9). The guard being re-inforced, and her Gasconne auxiliaries discovered, she was familiarly advised to leave that place, and take another lodging: which (being thoroughly terrified) she did at that instant, departing with the same precipitancy and confusion, with which she came thither, and after travelling some days she reached Ivoi, the palace of the Queen, her mother; where she was scarce arrived, but by the King's command she was by the Marquis de Canillac, besieged, and taken with her paramour, who was found meanly hid under several ordures without either beard or hair, his mistress having so disguised him with her own scissars in order to save him . . . Canillac . . . (10) preferring a paltry pleasure to the faith which he owed to his master, danced after the pipe, and suffered himself to be carried away by the artifices of his prisoner, and forgetting his duty, as well as quitting all pretensions to the making of his fortune, he became enamoured of the Queen, and so very jealous that he sacrificed poor Aubiac to his suspicions, causing his indictment to be drawn up by Lugoly, and afterwards had him hanged at Aigueperie, at which time, instead of considering his salvation, and the state of his soul, he kissed a blue velvet muff which he had yet remaining of the benefactions of his lady . . . Canillac having rather executed his jealousy than my vengeance on this criminal, did not fail to cast glances at her, and the little gentleman began to grow extraordinary careful of his dress, inasmuch, that in a little time, from as great a sloven as my self, he was as nicely set out as an amorous country beau: but at length what did his dress avail him? His inconstant lack one, whose levity he proposed to keep under lock and key, enclosed within the impregnable fortresses of Usson, would become mistress, and indulge her appetite to the highest with its usual variety: to compass this, knowing by experience the power of voluptuous desires, she feigns to return love for love; and yields to the importunity of several addresses, after which she so wrought on, and influenced, her guardian, that at last by her artificial caresses she obtained her liberty, by endearing promises that the favours which hitherto she seemed to grant but sparingly, and by force, should be prodigally bestowed out of choice, when she came to

(7) Ibid. pag. 200.

(8) The author means the same keeper of the castle, whom he calls Muree, pag. 197.

(9) Divorce Satyrique, pag. 201, 202.

(10) Ibid. pag. 203.

rendered that strong castle of Auvergne a Tabor by her devotion, a Libanus by her solitude, an Olympus by her exercises, a Parnassus by her Muses, and a Caucasus on account of her afflictions. It would have favoured much less of calumny to have compared that place with the island of Caprea, Tiberius's retirement, than it favours of flattery to compare it to a place of devotion, and a Holy Temple of God, as another panegyrist does [C]. If this lady's leudnefs were only mentioned in the Divorce Satyrique, or in some other libel, we to be free and absolute mistress of Usson. She deluded her spark in that manner; for the garrison had scarce voided the place, before she filled it with her own creatures, whilst the easy Marquis retired to St Cirque to gather his apples; and she proved to be ungrateful to this servant of her's, that she could not endure even the bare naming of him: being heartened by several men sent to her from Orleans, and who soon after were like to treat her according to her wishes, she then resolved to follow her own will, and establish an empire of pleasure within this rock, where securely enclosed by three walls, and all the great gates being walled up, God, and all France know what delicious games were played and practised there for the space of twenty years. Aretin's Nanna and his holy woman are nothing to it.

It is indeed true that instead of the gallants, who formerly used to sweeten her life, she was obliged for want of better to make use of her domestics, Secretaries, Musicians, and mongrels of the nobility, whom she drew to her by presents, whose families and names unknown to their very neighbours, are unworthy of my remembrance, except only the famous Pominy, the son of a Tinker in Auvergne, who being taken from the cathedral church, where he was one of the singing boys, and being distinguished from his equals by a fine voice, was preferred to this Queen's Music, and at last from the chapel to the chamber, and from the chamber to the closet, becoming her Secretary . . . (11). It was upon his account that the bedsteads of her ladies at Usson, were raised so high, that she might see under them without stooping, and not be obliged to crawl on all four in search of him, as she was wont to do to the great prejudice of her back parts. It was he whom she often groped for behind the hangings, expecting to find him there, and it was in too eager quest of him that she frequently hurt her face, by running it against the walls and doors.

(11) Ibid. pag. 205.

(12) Ibid. pag. 210, & seq.

I omit whatever concerns the amours which the author pretends (12) she was engaged in at Paris, after she left Usson. But it will not be improper to see here a passage of Hilarion de Cotte, which, as to several facts, may serve for a confirmation of the narrative we find in the Divorce Satyrique. She left Agen in the habit of a plain citizen's wife, riding on horseback behind Lignerac, on whom she bestowed the name of Knight of the Fine Flower, and fled the whole night, enduring a fatigue which tried her courage at the peril of her health. De Marfès came to meet her on the frontiers, accompanied with one hundred gentlemen, and lodging her at his mansion-house of Carlat, returned to Agen in order to secure her jewels, and the scattered remains of her retinue: and after the expiration of eighteen months, his death occasioned her leaving that place, and taking up her station at Yboi, a palace belonging to the Queen, her mother, where she was arrested. The thunder of the King's rage, threatening her every where, spared the sacred lilies, which surrounded her head, but put one of her servants to an ignominious death at Aigueperfe. The Marquis de Canillac conveyed her to, and imprisoned her at, Usson; but soon after this nobly defended Lord became the captive of his prisoner: he thought he had triumphed over her, and the bare sight of her hands, whiter than ivory, vanquished him; after which he lived on nothing else but the favour of the victorious eyes of his charming captive. But the King's threats, the fear of death, the apprehension of destroying his fortune, and of the ruin of his house, made deeper impressions in his mind than any other consideration, and forced him to use rigorous and severe commands against her. The protection of God, her own prudence and address, together with the seasonable assistance of the Duke of Guise, so happily snatched her from the shadows of death, that at the very instant when she expected to die a captive, she found her self secure to reign free in that strong place, from whence she dislodged them, who had fixed her there, and convinced them that virtue and valour make no distinction of sexes (13). You may see that this Monk owns whatever he thinks he may own without being obliged to blame her.

[C] Compare the castle of Usson . . . to a holy temple of GOD, as another panegyrist does.] This author was John Darnalt, the King's Attorney in the prebend of Agen. Some parts of his elogy on this Queen run thus: 'It is very true, saith he (14), that her Majesty, since she is in that place (15), most strictly observes a very laudable custom. After having moderately recreated her self with the exercise of the Muses, she spends the greatest part of her time retired in her chapel, offering up zealous and fervent prayers to God, and communicating once or twice every week: is not this, stellis infudere & concilio Jovis? . . . To sit upon the stars, and in the council of Jove? Oh Phoenix! who by extending your wings, elevate the eyes of your understanding to the great bright celestial star, by the light of which you see, live, and revive in it. Phoenix! who are daily born again out of your own ashes, flaming and consuming your self in the Divine love. Great Princess and Queen, who have neither motion, life, nor light, but that which you receive from this primitive light. You live a life different from that of mankind. We read that the bright and noble souls of the Elysian fields, before they made their last flight

(13) Hilar. de Cotte, Elog. des Dames illust. Tom. ii. pag. 301, 302.

(14) John Darnalt, Antiquities d'Agen, chap. xxii. fol. 124, verso.

(15) That is, in Usson Castle.

Illuc, unde negant redire quemquam,

To that same place whence none returns, to the seat of perfect bliss, and eternal joy and light,

Fortunatorum nemorum, sedesque beatas,

The happy groves and mansions of the blest, were for a time purified in a clear air, and freed from all manner of corruption. So this most noble royal soul retired to the Elysian castle of Usson, and before her entrance into the glory of the heavens, was willing to make neighbouring approaches to them, and began to take her flight that way: having learned the exercise of the contemplative life, and how to separate her blessed soul, from her most perfect body, in order to die well. For according to Plato τὸ μελέτημα αὐτὸ τὸ ἐπὶ τῶν φιλοσόφων, λύσις καὶ χωρισμὸς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ τῆς σώματος. It is the study of a wise man to disentangle and separate the soul from the body. She is Jupiter's divine eagle, which contemplates and looks with a fixed eye, from an exalted place near the heavens, at the solar rays of the Divine goodness and providence . . . (16). Thou rock of Usson, the honour and wonder of Auvergne, whose snow melts by the eyes, or more properly by the rays of this almost adorable terrestrial deity! Rock, on which the light perpetually shines, where the day never fails, but the rays of the royal presence are perpetually resplendant, and illuminate that place and the circumjacent region! . . . (17) Fair star of Europe, which is fixed at, and never stirs from Usson! Usson the royal residence of the last race . . . of Valois . . . (18) Pious and religious habitation, thou holy temple of God, which serveest not as an inviolable sanctuary, or asyle of refuge, but like righteous Noah's ark, has afforded her Majesty a retreat from the inundations and ravages of France . . . (19) I cannot yet leave Usson, that mountain crowned with this royal castle, that holy hermitage, and devout monastery where her Majesty sequesters her self (16) Ibid. fol. 125, verso.

In Phaedrus

(17) Ibid. fol. 126.

(18) Ibid. verso.

(19) Ibid. fol. 127.

we might justly suspect the truth of it; but since celebrated Historians are not silent on this head [D], we ought to believe the truth of the fact. Scipio Du Pleix is the person that

'self to study and meditation which only tends to the end of ends, and the most perfect end. Thou rock art an evidence of the voluntary, most laudable and religious solitude of this prince; a place which for the transcendent harmony of its Music, and the melodious songs of the finest voices in France, seems the only terrestrial paradise, and here her Majesty tastes that contentment and ease of mind, which the blessed enjoy in the other world.'

Observe that Mr de Perfixe is in the wrong to say, that Margaret voluntarily shut up her self in the castle of Usson (20).

[D] Celebrated Historians are not silent on this head.]

I have mentioned in another place of this Dictionary (21) what d'Aubigné says, not in a satire, but in his Universal History, I have also quoted a passage out of Mezerai (22), and the reader has been told (23) that Varillas relates the same things. But I shall further quote a more credible Historian in this particular, by reason he was devoted to Catherine de Medicis, and consequently not at all inclined to excuse the conduct of the King of Navarre. I mean Davila, who acknowledges that this Prince did in a manner divorce his consort, by reason of her scandalous reputation of unchastity. And he also owns that in her retreat she led a loose life: 'Movevalo grandemente il rispetto della Reina Margherita sua moglie, perche havendola per la fama delle sue impudicitie, come repudiata, & essendosi lei ritirata in Overnia a certi suoi castelli a vivere con libertà molto licentiosa, vedeva necessariamente, o convenire riceverla di nuovo all' unione del suo matrimonio, o non poter mai stare in sincera amicitia, & in intera confidenza con la suocera, e col cognato (24). - - - The consideration of

Margaret, his Queen, had great weight with him, because having in a manner divorced her on account of her scandalous lewdness, and she being retired to some of her own castles in Auvergne, in order to live very licentiously, he saw that he should either be obliged to take her back again, or else that he never could maintain a sincere friendship, and an entire confidence with his mother and brother-in-law.' He repeats almost the same thing in another place of his book: 'La quale (Reina Margherita) havendo abbandonata se stessa a vita licentiosa per rispetto de' risentimenti del marito, si era fuggita da lui, ma pervenuta per ordine suo, e per commissione del Rè suo fratello, ella fu posta nel castello di Carlat in Overnia come prigioniera, e di là dopo qualche tempo trasferita ad Usson nella medesima Provincia sotto alla custodia del Marchese di Canillac; il quale come si diceva, fatto prigioniero della sua prigioniera l'aveva riposta in libertà, onde ella trattenendosi in alcune sue castella pur in Overnia, e continuando l'istesso modo di vite, era di grandissimo ostacolo alle convenzioni, che trà il marito, & il fratello potessero contrattarsi (25). - - - Queen Margaret having given her self up to a licentious life, and dreading her husband's resentment, had run away from him, but being arrived in Auvergne, she was by his order, and by a commission from the King, her brother, confined to the castle of Carlat, and from thence she was some time after transported to Usson in the same province, under the custody of the Marquis de Canillac. He, as it was reported, being captivated with the charms of his prisoner, set her at liberty; after which she lived in some of her own castles in Auvergne, and continuing the same course of life she was a very great obstacle to any agreement that might have been made between her husband and brother.'

There are some faults in this relation of Davila. I. It is not true that Queen Margaret retired to Auvergne in order to live licentiously. She lived every where in the same manner, and she would have found her account better at Agen from whence she fled, than in Auvergne whither she retired. The truth is, that the fear of being seized at Agen was the cause of her departure thence (26), and if she sheltered her self rather in Auvergne than in any other place, it was not owing to her free choice, but pure necessity. Lignerac, her conductor, had no other place proper for refuge (27). II. It is not true that she retired into some castles belonging to her. III. Nor is it true that she was imprisoned at Carlat by order of her husband, and by a commission from Henry III. Her conductor's brother, pursuant to her own desire, received her (28). It may be that afterwards the governor of the place received orders to be answerable for his guest, and secure her (29); but this doth not excuse Davila. IV. It is false, that being set at liberty by the Marquis de Canillac, she retired to one of her own seats. V. One of these passages of Davila is refuted by the other; for if she retired to her seat when she broke with her husband, as we are told in the first passage, what is affirmed in the second, that she did not retreat thither till after she was set at liberty by the Marquis de Canillac, is not true. Mr de Beauvais Nangis (30) hath censured only this last of Davila's errors, and hath given his approbation to all the rest. But these small mistakes are no just reasons against our believing this famous Historian, when he tells us that Henry III and Catherine de Medicis resolved to annul the King of Navarre's marriage, and abandon Margaret as unworthy of being acknowledged of their blood. 'Deliberarono finalmente, che non era da tener più conto della persona di Margherita, refasi da se stessa poco degna d'esser da loro riconosciuta, nè per sorella, nè per figliuola, e che, poiche la dispensa difettosa ottenuta dal Pontefice al tempo del suo matrimonio, porgeva causa, e pretesto a poterlo disciogliere, si douesse fare questo divorzio, e dar per moglie al Rè di Navarra Christiana figliuola del Duca di Loreno (31). - - - At last they concluded that no further regard was to be had to the person of Margaret, she having rendered herself unworthy to be acknowledged by them either as a sister or daughter; and that since there was a flaw in the dispensation obtained from the Pope at the time of her marriage, this divorce should be made, and the King of Navarre should marry Christian daughter to the Duke of Lorraine.' The Ambassador Bulbequius, whose authority is as good as that of an Historian, in a letter written from Paris to his Imperial Majesty, dated the twenty-seventh of August, in the year 1583, expresses himself thus: 'Rex foreorem suam, Reginam Navarra, palam multis audientibus graviter increpuit, quod vitam degeret turpem, & flagitiis contaminatam. Commemoravit memoriter moerorum introductiones, quibus illa consueverat. Etiam puerum sine marito opera natum objecit, eaque omnia suis temporibus, & reliquis rebus ita notata, ut ipse interfuisse videretur, & Reginam ea magis confiteri puderet, quam confutare posset. Finis orationis fuit, ut eam statim Lutetiam migrare juberet, urbemque suam contagione liberaret. Sic, illa, collectis raptim farcinis, die sequenti, non modò sine ullo prosequuntium officio, sed sine iusto etiam famulitio, Lutetiam excessit (32). - - - The King severely rebuked his sister, the Queen of Navarre, before a great deal of company, on account of her lewd and infamous way of life. He put her in mind of the intrigues which she had carried on with her adulterers. He likewise upbraided her with having had a boy by one of them. All these things he set forth in such a particular manner, both as to their times and circumstances, that he seemed to have been an eye-witness of them, and the Queen was rather ashamed to own than able to answer the charge. He concluded his discourse with ordering her to leave Paris immediately, and to rid the city of her infection. Upon this she packed up her things in a hurry, and the very next day went out of Paris, being not only destitute of all such attendance as follow out of respect and ceremony, but wanting even a proper number of servants.' You see here that Henry III not only particularized the circumstances of his sister's adulteries, but also charged her with being delivered of a bastard. This author adds, that after this reprimand, Chanvalon, a very handsome young gentleman, who passed for one of Margaret's favourite gallants (33) retired into Germany. He had lost the favour of the Duke of Anjou, on account of some letters which he wrote from Antwerp, but according to others for bragging of the favours of a great lady. Read Varillas's words: 'The Lord, who, above all others in the kingdom, made the most regular court to Queen Margaret, was James de Harley-Chanvalon, who had formerly followed the Duke of Anjou into Flanders, where

(28) Ibid.

(29) Consult Brantome, in his discourse on that Queen, pag. 421, Edit. 1699, & d'Aubigné, in Tom. iii. of his History, book v, chap. iv, pag. 641, where he seems to contradict what he advances in the Divorce Satyr.

(30) In his remarks upon Davila, pag. 144, 149.

(31) Davila, lib. viii, pag. 432, ad ann. 1586.

(32) Bulbequius, Epist. xxi ad Rudolphum II, Imperatorem, pag. m. 517.

(33) Chanvalonius juvenis est dubie nobilitatis, suavitatis morum, etatis flore, & forme venustate præfatus, habitus inter primos ejus Regine proco. Id. ibid. pag. 518.

(34) Id. ibid.

(20) Perfixe, Histoire d'Henri le Grand, ad ann. 1599, pag. m. 301.

(21) In the third article N. A. VARRE, citation (9). See also d'Aubigné, Tom. iii, pag. 641.

(22) Ibid. citation (47).

(23) Ibid. citation (48).

(24) Davila, lib. viii, pag. m. 379, ad ann. 1585.

(25) Idem, lib. viii, pag. m. 432, ad ann. 1586.

(26) Brant. Dames illustres. See his words in citation (74), of the third article NAVARRE.

(27) See citation (76), ibid. and citation (14), in the preceding page.

V O L . V .

6 S

that has given the most particular account of it [E]: for this he was blamed, and justified himself: I shall examine whether the Marshal de Bassompierre's anger is just [F]. However that be, we may say that the makers of elogies are much less to be excused, since he gave proofs of his valour on several occasions. This Duke frequently received him at his table: but he not being so discreet as he should have been, one day dropped some boasting expressions concerning the good fortune which his beauty and good mien had obtained from one of the greatest ladies of the court of France. The Duke of Anjou hearing him, banished him from his table, and even from the Low-Countries; and it was but one year since Chanvalon was returned from thence. Being not very welcome to the King, because the favourites did not look kindly upon those who had declared for the Duke of Anjou; he applied himself to the service of the Queen of Navarre, from which the favourites took occasion to publish that love was the sole cause of it: and as nothing could be said of the King's sister so scandalous but he believed it; he gave so much credit to this report that he banished Chanvalon from her, without taking care to cover this with some pretence, that it might not reflect upon her. It also appears that the King publicly complained to his sister of her way of living with Chanvalon (35). But now let us turn our eyes to the relation of Du Pleix the Historian: and we shall find amongst other particulars, that Queen Margaret had a child by Chanvalon.

[E] Scipio Du Pleix is the person that has given the most particular account of it. I shall collect together what this author hath dispersed in several places: and begin with these words, The King of Navarre . . . made love to the maids of Queen Margaret his wife, which she suffered the more patiently, by reason her husband did not controul her own actions: though she complains in her Memoirs, that her maids had done her ill offices with respect to him. But this she says in order to cover the sins which she had been guilty of against the laws of marriage. Written words cannot bluish; but I should blush whilst writing, if I should set down what I have heard her say seriously about it. She was certainly a Princess enriched with excellent and perfectly royal endowments; but she had also great weaknesses, as well as some ill habits. Perhaps I may speak of it more largely and more properly in the reign of Henry the Great, when my subject will oblige me more particularly to it, though with regret, having had the honour to belong to her household for six years, and to be always favourably treated by that illustrious Princess (36). What follows strikes with horror: 'Henry III . . . treated his sisters with fraternal tenderness, but at last hated Margaret Queen of Navarre, as well because she did not live well with her husband, as by reason she was a continual accomplice in all the conspiracies of the Duke of Alençon. Notwithstanding this he always shewed himself more indulgent to pardon than severe to punish them, till Margaret (either in jest or earnest) let fall an incestuous expression to Queen Louise his Majesty's wife. For this good King finding himself touched in a particular, which most sensibly affects generous souls, never after looked favourably on that brother, or that incorrigible sister. The perfectly chaste and virtuous Princess Louise hearing this infamous discourse of her sister-in-law, suddenly stopped her mouth, by very modestly saying, as though she did not take it seriously, pray, sister, rally more agreeably. But yet dreading the artifices of her malice, she related the immodesty of her sister to the King, which very sensibly incensed him against her and his brother, and he loved Louise the more tenderly for it' (37). When Du-Pleix tells the reasons which Henry IV, had to sue for a dissolution of his marriage, he expresses himself thus (38): 'The VI nullity was founded on the manners of Queen Margaret, which were equally insupportable and manifest to the whole world; yet he did not urge this in order to obtain her consent to the dissolution and annulling of their marriage. But the Pope and the sacred Consistory being sufficiently informed of it, did highly commend the goodness of the King, who being able to convict, and cause her justly to be punished, (as some of his council advised) chose rather to procure the liberty of a second marriage another way.' What follows is a very good supplement to the exposition of this sixth nullity: 'Henry the Great was twice married:

first to Margaret of France, a match which seemed very advantageous to the posture of his affairs, if it had been as agreeable to him as honourable. For he knew she had elsewhere fixed her amorous affection, and had no passion for him. . . . Notwithstanding this he loved her, and bore with those actions in her, which when known, are insupportable to all husbands. He had no issue by her; but during her elopement she had two sons: one by the Sieur de Chanvalon, who is yet alive, and is a Capuchin Fryer that goes by the name of Father Ange: the other, who is dead, she had by the Sieur d'Aubiac, I knew them both. The notoriety of the thing obliges me against my will to mention this: it is, besides, a shining proof of the goodness of this most illustrious monarch; who from hence could have drawn an invincible reason to have rid himself of her by the hands of justice, according to the advice of several of his council: but he chose rather to break the marriage without any effusion of blood, by the evident nullities above mentioned' (39).

I omit what he saith that she entertained a more than fraternal correspondence with the Duke of Alençon her brother (40).

[F] . . . For which he was blamed, and justified himself: we shall examine whether the Marshal de Bassompierre's anger is just. Du Pleix speaking of Queen Margaret's return to the court, doth not treat her in an obliging manner, and yet owns, that she was pleased that she should have the honour to be one of her servants in ordinary in quality of master of the request, with a handsome salary (41); and notwithstanding, he, that she was very much addicted to changing, always was very well with her: which being known to several persons, some were surprized that I spoke boldly of her irregularities in the reign of Henry III, as I shall do also in this I am now writing. But for my part, it is more surprizing to me that any man of judgment could not discern that what I have done was grounded upon just and proper considerations, without its being necessary for me to express them. I shall place her elogy after her death, and I shall with truth say some strange and surprizing things. He accordingly discharged his promise, when he came to mention the death of Margaret, under the year 1615. Some passages of his discourse run thus (42): 'All the world representing her as a goddess, the in a manner fancied her self to be so; and during her whole life was very much pleased with the name of Venus Urania, or the Celestial Venus, as well to intimate that she partook of the divinity as to distinguish her love from that of the vulgar. For in order to keep it up, she formed her self upon different rules from those common to other women: affecting above all to make it the exercise of her mind rather than of her body, and her common expression was: would you cease to love, possess the beloved object. I could from this compose a more excellent and surprizing romance than any written in former ages: but I am engaged in a more serious employment . . . The persecution and menaces of her brother (43); the terrible apprehensions she conceived, that her crimes would oblige her husband to attempt upon her life, and the solitude in which she lived for twenty years, so discomposed her mind, that she grew extremely mistrustful of every body: so that her continual vexations and fears made her hypochondriac. In the Divorce Satyrque Henry IV is brought in speaking thus: 'Though I pity her, I cannot sometimes forbear laughing at the extravagant jealousies, and mad transports that are told of her amours, which frequently prompt her to slight what she sees, and to believe what is false; looking sometimes for her rustians in every part of the house, though she knows they are somewhere else; and sometimes when she sees and hears them, she fancies they are other men in their shape, who design to deceive and do her mischief. . . . She has brought her self to that pass, that she cannot abide that any body should cough, laugh, or speak with a low voice in her presence: she is grown so suspicious and mistrustful, that she thinks every body speaks of her actions' (44). This weakness at first appeared only by certain things

(35) Varillas, Hist. de Henri III. liv. vii, p. m. 231, 232.

(36) Du Pleix, Hist. de Henri III, ad ann. 1578, pag. 70.

(37) Id. ibid. sub fin. pag. 202, 203.

(38) Id. Hist. de Henri IV, ad ann. 1599, pag. 264.

(39) Id. ibid.

ad ann. 1599, than fraternal correspondence with the Duke of Alençon pag. 411, 412.

(40) Id. Hist. de Henri III, pag. 23.

(41) Id. Hist. de Henri IV, ad ann. 1605, pag. 368.

(42) Id. Hist. de Louis XIII, pag. 53.

(43) That is, Henry III.

(44) Divorce Satyrque, pag. 203, 210.

since they have entirely suppressed the odious passages of the life of this Queen, in order to crown her with the most magnificent praises, that can be bestowed on the most illustrious things which fell under the cognizance of her domestics; but after her last journey to Court, it was but too much divulged, she herself discovering it to every body. . . . (45) She having as many amorous addresses made to her as he (46) made to other women, they agreed very ill. She hath endeavoured to throw all the infamy upon that great King in her memoirs, which are published, therefore I have been obliged to represent her as bearing her own share of it in this History. For I am not here writing Panegyrics on Princes and Princesses, but a true History, which ought to express their virtues, and not conceal their vices, to the end that their successors, by a fear of the like stain in their memory, may be excited to imitate their praise worthy actions, and avoid their faults. Besides, for political reasons it was requisite to observe, that her bastards were born during her divorce and separation from the King; because they might otherwise pass for legitimate: since his Majesty never would punish the Monk as an impostor, who for so long a time hath been, and is produced as Queen Margaret's son. I am necessitated to declare this for the satisfaction of those, who have charged this important story with 'detraction.' After this he sets forth several encomiums on this Queen.

(45) Du Pleix, ubi supra, p. 54.

(46) That is, the King of Navarre.

The Marshal de Bassompierre hath made the following observation on that passage, which charges her with having had two bastards: 'Infamous Viper, who by thy calumnies hast torn the entrails of her that gave thee life! Thou worm, which gnawest the same flesh that begot thee! Thou mad dog, who bitest thy own master, what moved thee to injure a poor Princess after her death, who cherished thee during her life? Is it the interest of the late King, who, to his own prejudice, chose rather to retard the dissolving his marriage with her, than utter one single word to her disadvantage, and tho' the good of the State hindred him from keeping her any longer as his wife, yet he always honoured her as Queen, loved her as his sister, bestowed large pensions on her, and made her immense presents? Is it truth which obliges thee to it, thou who hast given the title of a History to this book filled with fables, and stuffed with calumnies and scurrilities? What a scandal hast thou cast upon France, by publishing to the whole world, and leaving recorded to posterity, such infamous stories of one of the most noble Princesses of the royal blood, which perhaps are false, or, at most, were only known to very few? Is a private man allowed, under the name of an Historian, to publish the faults of another, to spot and defame the royal race, and defile the memory of the dead? If any attempt had been made to force thee, tho' but lightly to scandalize that poor Princess, (who kept thee from starving) thou shouldst rather have suffered martyrdom than yielded to it; whereas, on the contrary, without any constraint or the least invitation, thou hast hunted after, and advised even improper and unreasonable opportunities to say such execrable things of her, that no Christian can utter without sin, or hear without horror. No, no, there are wheels and executioners to punish thee severely in this world, and a divine justice in the other, to inflict eternal torments upon thee for thy infinite crimes (47). Laying aside abusive reflexions, we find scarce any thing else in this sentence of condemnation, but that Du Pleix ought not to have defamed a Princess, whose domestic he had been, nor published adventures, known to few, which dishonoured the royal family. It is perfectly unnecessary for me to examine the last of these objections. Du Pleix himself hath satisfactorily answered it in one of the passages which I have already cited; and it doth not appear that Bassompierre ever refuted that part of his defence. Wherefore let us only consider the first objection.

CONSIDERATIONS upon the duties of an Historian.

All that are acquainted with the laws of History, will agree, that every Historian, who designs faithfully to discharge his function, ought entirely to dispossess himself of the spirit of flattery and calumny, and put on as much as possible, such a Stoical temper, as is out of the reach of any disturbance from passion. Insensible to every thing else, he ought only to be concerned for the interest of truth, to which his duty obliges him to sacrifice the resentment of an injury, the remembrance of a favour, and even the love of his country. He ought to forget that he was born in a certain country, that he was bred up in the communion of a certain Church, that he is indebted for the making his fortune to such and such persons, and that such or such persons are his relations or friends. An Historian as such, like Melchisedec, is without father, without mother, and without pedigree. If he be asked, Of what country you are? He ought to answer, I am neither a Frenchman, nor a German, nor an Englishman, nor a Spaniard, &c. I am an inhabitant of the world, neither engaged in the service of the Emperor, nor of the King of France, but only in that of truth: she is my sole Queen, and I have taken no oath of allegiance to any besides her (48): I am her sworn knight, and the collar of the order which I wear, is the same ornament worn by the chief justice, and the high-priest of the Egyptians. 'Εχέει δὲ καὶ ἀγάλμα ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐκ σαρφείρου λίθου, καὶ ἐκαστοῦ ἀγάλμα Ἀληθείας. Circa collum imaginem ex sapphiro gemma consecratam gestabat: quæ vocabatur VERITAS (49). . . . He carried about his neck an image made of sapphire stone, and the image was called TRUTH. So far as he yields to the love of his country, so far does he deviate from the rules of history, and by how much he sheweth himself a good subject, by so much he becomes a bad Historian.

(48) Taus 6 regina quid optes Explorare labor, mihi iusta capere fas est. -- 'Tis yours. O Queen! to will the work which duty bids me to fulfil.

DRYDEN. Virgil. Æn. lib. i, ver. 76.

(49) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. xiv, cap. xxxiv.

(50) Sannazar. opus Jovium, Elog. cap. x, pag. m. 31.

Dum patriam laudat, damnat dum Poggius hostem;
Nec malus est civis, nec bonus historicus (50).

While Poggius doth his country-men extol,
And blame their enemies with all his soul;
He's no ill subject, that I must confess,
But he's a bad Historian ne'ertheless.

So that the cruel reproaches, which Mr de Bassompierre grounds on the salaries and posts which Du Pleix enjoyed under Queen Margaret, are unjust; for Du Pleix the Historiographer was not bound to discharge the obligations of Du Pleix this Queen's domestic. It was neither proper for him as an Historian, to acknowledge a good office, nor to revenge an injury: his sole obligation was to represent things as they really were, without misrepresenting them either in favour of his friends, or to the prejudice of his enemies. He had the same strict engagements to truth, as the Judges have to justice; and therefore since it would be highly unreasonable to reproach a Counsellor of parliament with ingratitude for having made his benefactor lose a bad cause, we should be equally in the wrong to complain of Du Pleix, on pretence that he hath published defamatory truths of a Princess under whom he was employed. It is to betray an ignorance of the true bounds of things, to maintain, that gratitude should extend even to the disposal of those things which are none of our own; I mean, that to acquit ourselves of our obligations, we may make use of what belongs to others. If you will acknowledge the good offices done you, do it at your own expence, and not at that of your neighbour. Such a one is the cause of your growing rich, that you enjoy the post of Master of the Requests, or President, &c. Assist him with your purse in his indigence, but be not an instrument to make him carry an unjust cause; for if you make him carry it, your gratitude is a downright robbery, and a violation of the most essential duties. You are the minister of justice, and nothing can permit your violation of it; you ought not, as a Judge, to acknowledge the benefits, which you formerly received as steward or tutor. The application of all this to an Historiographer, who is a public minister of truth, is not very difficult.

If during the prosecution of a criminal indictment against Margaret de Valois, Du Pleix had refused to give evidence against her, and had endured the torture rather than reveal the adulteries of this lady, whose domestic he was, he would have deserved high praise; and his silence in that case had been an hundred times more commendable than an ingenuous confession: but in writing the History of France, he was engaged illustrious princesses. She was thus praised by reason of her liberalities to the monasteries [G], the most sure and infallible means to cover a multitude of sins (f). For the rest, if she diverted her self very agreeably at the castle of Usson, she also suffered several troubles there. 'From the terrais of that castle, she saw her friends cut in pieces, and the Count de Randan, their chief, a lord of the house of Rochefoucaud killed on the same day

(f) See, above, the remark [f], of the article GREGORY I.

gaged from all domestic obligations, and might publicly declare what he ought not to have done to the commissioners appointed to draw up an indictment. I own that he defamed a Princess of the royal blood; but if out of fear of casting some scandal on the royal family, he had been obliged to silence, it must thence be concluded also, that an Historian ought never to mention any of the rebellions and conspiracies of the Princes of the royal blood; and for instance, the Spanish Historians ought never to have spoken of the combinations of Don Carlos, nor of the punishment which was the consequence of them. But as this is absurd, it follows that Mr de Bassompierre hath unjustly censured the conduct of Du Pleix. His other observations are much better; for it cannot be denied that he hath detected an almost infinite number of her ill actions. If I am answered, that the rebellions of Princes are notorious facts, and consequently ought not to be silently passed over by an Historian; I reply, that Queen Margaret's amours were, in their kind, as publicly known as the frequent relapses of the Duke of Orleans (51). All the court was perfectly informed of the reprimand which she received from the king her brother, who, amongst other things, charged her with having a bastard. All the Ambassadors knew it, and undoubtedly they wrote the news to their respective masters, as well as the Emperor's Ambassador did (52). All France was acquainted with the affront which the same king caused to be offered to Margaret in a public road; and the consequences of this affront were blazed abroad by the complaints of the King of Navarre. In a word, to say in an history what Du Pleix hath published concerning the intrigues of the Queen of Navarre, was not to reveal any secret practices. And you may, if you please, observe, that certain reasons of state, which he mentions (53), obliged him to speak of them: which is a good justification. I desire you would also observe that several have censured his inserting these events in his work, but have not affirmed, that they were meer lies. See the margin (54). On the contrary, they never ventured farther than to say that the veil of discretion ought to have been drawn over them. Wherefore since he had no occasion to justify himself on any other account than taking the liberty of publishing truths of this nature, and since after that justification, he left all these passages in his works, so that they were not only printed but re-printed with the royal licence; we may conclude, that these facts ought to pass as undoubted truths; for if they were calumnies, the author would have been obliged to retract and leave them out in the second edition.

We may say that he hath contributed more than any body else to fix the certainty of these facts. The Sieur d'Aubigné's fables did not amount to a sufficient and authentic evidence; but when they appear confirmed by the public attestation of an Historian, who was a domestic servant to this Queen, there is no longer any room for doubting. What defect can you suppose in them? The Historian lived at the time of the events, and was servant to this Princess: he hath not deprived her of the glory which she deserved on other accounts; he was not blamed for calumniating, but for not sparing her; and never retracted or suppressed, in a new edition, what he had said in the first. So that the silence of a thousand and a thousand authors, and the eulogies bestowed on her memory may, at pleasure, be alleged, but can never shake this matter of fact; for we ought to take notice that even her flatterers never presumed to affirm that she was an example of chastity, but contented themselves with silence on this head. If they had affirmed that she was always very chaste, they would have formed a sort of faction and schism in the historical world, and fomented in it that Pyrrhonism which is already but too general on other accounts: a disorder which chiefly owes its propagation to the different accounts of things at the very time of the events (55). A lie is supposed to be always posterior to the truth; but this is not certain with respect to relations; for it but too frequently happens that the false precede the true; and that the true and false start at the very same instant, and so run through future ages under the auspicious authority of traditions that are alike old. Observe what Tacitus saith on occasion of a very remarkable event, which at first was variously represented. 'Is finis fuit ulciscenda Germanici morte, non modo apud illos homines qui tum agebant, etiam secutis temporibus vario rumore jactata. adeo maxima quæque ambigua sunt, dum alii quoquo modo audita pro compertis habent, alii vera in contrarium vertunt. & gliscit utrumque posteritate (56). - - - (56) Tacit. Ann. This was the end of revenging the death of Germanicus, not only among those only who then lived and interested themselves in it, but likewise in following times, so dark and intricate are all the highest transactions; while some bold for certain facts the most precarious hearsays, others turn fact into falsehood, and both are swallowed and improved by the credulity of posterity.'

It was foretold, that truth would not be stifled by the artifices of mercenary pens and tongues. 'Those, who in hopes of her liberality, praise her in their sermons, dedicate books to, or write eulogies on her, do in vain bestow on her qualities to which she hath no pretence: for true tradition, which in spite of them shall be immemorially preserved from father to son, will plainly prove them liars, and as full of avarice and flattery, as she is an enemy to virtue (57).' This prediction is verified by the event, for which we are not a little indebted to Du Pleix.

[G] She was thus praised by reason of her liberalities to the monasteries. Hilarion de Coite, a Minime Friar, speaks thus of the charities of this Princess: 'At the four most solemn festivals, and on her birth-day, she gave, with her own hand, one hundred gold crowns, and as many loaves to an hundred poor people. She annually maintained one hundred and eleven persons, and forty English, Scotch, and Irish Priests, besides the alms she daily distributed at her palace, and going from mass, as well to strangers, as to the modest uncraving poor. She also contributed several sums to the building of divers churches and monasteries. She built and founded the Jesuits college at Agen, and the convent of the Reformed Augustines near her palace, in the suburbs of St Germain des Prez at Paris. There is no order of mendicant Friars that has not partaken of her annual bounty; amongst others, the Carmelites, Augustines, Franciscans, Jacobins, the Jesuits of St Lewis, the Ave-Maria Nuns, the Bernardines, the Capuchins, Recollects, and Minimes of Nigeon. In the latter years of her life, building all her hopes on God, she daily heard three masses, one high and two low (58); she communicated three times every week, on Thursday, Friday, and Sunday; every Saturday she visited the low chapel of our Lady in St Victor's church; and the hospitals in the holy week, and never gave less than three or four thousand blankets, besides frequently a considerable sum for the marriage of poor girls (58). Scipio Du Pleix relates the same (59), but he adds a reflexion which makes a vast difference betwixt his narrative and that of the Minime. If she, saith he (60), suffered herself to be drawn away by some sensuality in her youth, amongst so many pernicious opportunities as happen in the lives of princes, and the allurements of the court, yet having renounced them in order to return to God, and having redeemed her sins, by large charities, who can doubt but that the prayers of so many religious persons, and the blessings of the people have opened the heavens for her soul, and made way for her reception after her death amongst the blessed angels, considering withal that more especially towards the end of her days, she prepared and disposed herself for it with a truly Christian contrition and resolution.' The Minime took great care not to intermix his relations with any thing of this nature: we find nothing

(51) Brother to Lewis XIII.

(52) See, above, citation (34).

(53) See, above, citation (46).

(54) Bassompierre, pag. 149, of the Journal of his Life, says that, in 1606, Queen Margaret lost the Sieur Sullendat her lover, who had been killed by a gentleman called Charmond.

(55) See, below, my Dissertation concerning Desamatory Libels, paragraph viii.

(57) Divorce Sa- tyrique, p. 112.

(58) Hilarion de Coite, ubi supra, pag. 108, 109. See also Palquier, pag. m. 261, 2.

(59) Du Pleix, Hist. de Louis XIII, pag. 146.

(60) Id. ibid. pag. 155.

* day that the King her husband triumphed over his enemies at Yvry: and though this place fears nothing but Heaven, it being impossible for any thing but the sun to enter it by force, and its triple enclosure despises the efforts of the assailants, as a high rock contemns the billows and surges; yet want got into it and obliged her, in order to avoid its outrages, to pawn her jewels at Venice, to melt down her plate, and to have nothing free but the air, hoping but very little, and fearing every thing: for all round about her was in flame and confusion (g). I shall conclude with this passage of nothing there which tends to insinuate that Margaret had occasion to buy off the sins of her youth by so many alms; and omissions like this are indeed unsufferable. Generally speaking, we cannot complain of his placing her amongst the illustrious ladies; but his ranking her equally and without any distinction, with those whose virtue always remained untainted, is what cannot be excused. He ought at least to have divided his work into three classes, one for the ladies of perpetual and unspotted virtue, one for those unjustly slandered, and another for those whose good qualities compensated their vices, and who, in their wife old age, expiated the sins of their youth. No body would have been offended at seeing Margaret in this last class, nor have taken it amiss that the Monks out of gratitude for her alms, should make her shine amongst the illustrious penitents, and celebrate her wisdom, learning, and the rest of her good qualities. We ought to do justice to every body, and even to bestow those praises upon courtiers, which they deserve when they have distinguished themselves by some virtues, of which there are examples to be found (61). We are not ignorant of the nullity of her alms, by reason they were given at the expense of others and the ruin of her credit.

Brantome:

(g) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 302.

(61) See chap. xxxv, of book iii, Miscellaneum Observationum, written by Peter Petit, a Paris Physician, and printed at Utrecht in 1682.

(62) Divorce Satyrique, p. 213.

(63) Perefize, Histoire de Henry le Grand, ad ann. 1599, pag. m. 301.

(64) See, above, the remark [O], of the third article N. A. VARRÉ.

Have you ever observed any of her lovers, (Henry IV introduced speaking) a few excepted, grow rich by her liberality? But you see the prisons full of those whom she hath impoverished. . . . I know very well that at my expense she gives the tenth of all her rents and pensions quarterly to monasteries and convents: but then she withholds the salary of her domestics, (whose case I very much commiserate) and of those who for the whole year have furnished her with their provisions as well as their labour (62). If any one should scruple to give credit to this passage on pretext that it is taken out of a defamatory libel, he needs only consult the history of Henry the Great, written by Mr de Perefize, who died Archbishop of Paris. There he will find that the palace which Queen Margaret built near the Pre-aux-Clercs, was sold to pay her debts. . . . that she was liberal to prodigality, very pompous and magnificent; but knew not what it was to pay her debts. This is undoubtedly one of the greatest faults in a prince, by reason that nothing is so diametrically opposite to justice, of which he ought to be the protector and pattern (63). This testimony agrees with that of Mezerai (64), and yet one would be apt to excuse the panegyrist who have so extolled this Queen's alms, if like Duplex they had regulated the whole matter of fact; and one would not exact from them a rigorous search into the circumstances of her liberalities to the poor and the monasteries.

[(§x) It is the that is drawn in the following epigram, book iii. chap. 21 of Feneste:

Commune, qui te communis
Ainsi qu'en amours en hosties;
Qui communies tous les jours
En hosties comme en amours:
A quoi ces Dieux que tu consommes
Et en tous temps & en tous lieux?
Toi, qui ne t'es peu fouler d'hommes,
Te penes tu crever de Dieux?

Harlot, that hast an equal share
Of love and sacramental fare;
To whom each day a feast doth prove Both of the sacrament and love:
Say to what end do you devour
So many gods at every hour?
Is it that you, who never can Once get your belly-full of man,
Such is your appetite accurst,
Resolve with eating gods to burst?

VOL. V. REM. CRIT.]

I say again, that the Minime Hilarion de Coste ought to have observed in his book, what Robert d'Arbrissel did in his monasteries, one of which was appointed for women of good reputation, and the other for those who had quitted their ill courses (65). That mixture is very scandalous which in the same book presents us with the eulogies of Anne of Bretagne, and Isabella Clara Eugenia, together with those of Bona Sforza and our Margaret de Valois. I add that it is a medley which encourages those to give up themselves to vice, whom an ambition of being one day placed amongst the illustrious ladies, might, perhaps, keep in the right way. Nothing is more pernicious than equally to extol and honour loose and virtuous women (66). This Minime had been left to blame, if his praises had been reduced to the particular description of any single action; but he hath couched them so as to take in the historical series of the Queen's whole life. He mentioned whatever he found excellent, and forgot nothing but what was ill. I make this reflexion only to shew that I never pretended that all those, who have mentioned either the learning or charities of Queen Margaret, ought also to have taken notice of her faults. This never entered into my thoughts, nor do I in the least dislike Stephen Pasquier's contenting himself with hinting what he condemned in general (67), and particularly enlarging on what he admired in her; for he did not attempt a history or an historical eulogy. See what he saith of the meals of this Princess. 'Tho' dinners and suppers are chiefly designed for the nourishment of the body, yet she more highly valuing the aliment of the mind, has commonly four men near her, to whom she first proposes what proposition she pleases for their examination, frequently overthrowing their arguments and never relenting their criticisms, provided they be grounded on good and solid reasons. Thus she nourishes her mind and feeds her body with all sobriety, and after these learned men have ended their discourse, not to abate any part of her royalty, then follows a band of violins, after that a concert of vocal Music, and lastly of lutes, which play successively in emulation of each other (68).'

Give me leave to observe by the by that this Queen, and all other ladies who imitate her, perhaps do more harm to the world, by their frequent communions and extreme assiduity in convents and churches, than if they continued in their scandalous course, and grew old in impenitence. They are immortalized by an hundred artful eulogies, which never mention any of their former sins. Is not this to cause those who live in impurity to hope for an unspotted fame, and expect to be loaded with honour, provided in their decayed and deformed age they turned devout? And why should they not hope for this glory after so many examples before their eyes? For it is the common course of loose women to turn devout when no longer able to charm (69). They are then very constant at sermon and mass, and very liberal to convents; whence it is believed they shall open the gates of Paradise, which had been shut against them, and consequently young ladies may flatter themselves that their debaucheries will not deprive them either of human glory, which the applauses of Monks procure for the dead, or of eternal happiness. What is more pernicious than this security? What can possibly let loose the reins of corrupt nature to a greater degree? The ladies would be terrified at the apprehensions of an infamous character in future ages, and the torments of Hell, if they saw that all or almost all the women of pleasure continue hardened in their crimes till death. This fear would prove a bridle, and a powerful lesson of wisdom, and by this means the damnation of some few would prove a remedy against incontinence, and the means of the salvation of a great number. If in every age there were but one lewd woman, that turned devout in her old days, she alone would so more inspire

(65) See, above, citation (10), of the article FONTEVRAUD.

(66) See, above, the remark [M], of the article LEWIS XII.

(67) If I should tell you that this Queen has no faults, I should be a silly man; for tho' God has been pleased to make her a great Princess, she is made up of the same pieces as all of us are. And consequently we must not pretend that she should be perfect, which no man or woman can be; but we must only consider her lesser imperfections. Pasquier, Letters, tom. ii, pag. 739.

(68) Id. ibid. pag. 761, 762.

A CONSIDERATION upon the effect of many old devout women, who have been lewd in their youth.

(69) See, above, citation (25), of the article GUEBRIANT.

(b) Brantome, Mémoires des Dames illustres, pag. m. 241.

Brantome: the castle of Usson is a very strong or rather impregnable place, which that cunning and crafty King Lewis XI, partly made so on purpose to lodge his prisoners, and keep them much securer there than at Loches, Bois de Vincennes, or Laignan (b).

(70) Unus est ne desperes, solus est ne confidas, -- There is one, left you should despair, there is only one left you should be too confident, says a Father of the Church speaking of the good thief.

(71) I mean such women as are false or true converts.

a spirit of security, than the good thief (70), she could only remove despair. But when the number of these Magdalens (71) mounts high, they universally occasion confidence and boldness, so that one may say, that indirectly and contrary to their intention they are the firmest pillars of the Empire of Venus, even when they themselves are retired out of it. What glorious arms would they afford the preachers and confessors, if being become the laughing-stock and execration of the whole town, when grown grey under Venus's yoke, and following their old trade, with all the ridiculous imperfections which attend the conjunction of wrinkles and coquetry, they should at last die blaspheming or in despair; so that their rejection of the sacraments should cause their corpse to be dragged on a hurdle to lie unburied! Such a dismal spectacle would fill them with horror. Little Father Andrew would have frequently taken occasion from thence to cry out in his sermon, the same fate attends you.

A famous author, in a letter dated the twenty-third of June 1678, faith, that the disease of which Madam

M* died, had brought her to repentance, and that she was one of those mentioned in the Gospel, who were as well paid for the last hour, as those who engaged in the morning (72). Father Bourdaloue says (73), that this lady discovered a great share of Christian resolution at her death. This edifies the public, but yet lays a snare for sinners. Note, that we are taught by some that those have a greater interest in the favour of God, who extricate themselves out of great sins, than if they had never fallen into them. This is another snare. The Bishop of Meaux sets this in a proper light, after having observed (74) that when we see in the Gospel the lost sheep preferred by the good shepherd to those, all the rest of the flock, when we read of the happy return of the prodigal son, and the transports of a tender father, which rejoice the whole family; we are tempted to believe that repentance is preferred to innocence itself, and that the returning prodigal receives greater favours than the eldest son who never strayed from his father's house. See the remainder in the author himself.

(a) Olearius, in Abaco, apud Konig Biblioth. vet. & nova, pag. 467, 859.

UTINO (LEONARD DE) a Jacobin Monk, flourished in the XVth century, and was a great preacher. His sermons on the saints were one of the earliest productions of the press, being printed in the year 1446 (a) (α). His other works were printed before the end of the same century [A]. It was probably he, who complained that the confessions which the women made at the confession chair, were defective in some things [B].

[(α) It is generally agreed upon that printing was not used, in the manner that it now is, before the year 1457. Thus what is said here may very well be a mistake either in Olearius, or at least in Konig; and we have much more reason to affirm, with Mr le Duchat, in note 10, on chap. 19 of the first book of Rabelais, that first edition of Leonard de Utino's sermons is of Venice, 1473. REM. CRIT.]

[A] His other works were printed before the end of the same century. His treatise of common-places was printed at Ulm in the year 1478. His Lent and Dominical sermons were printed at Lyons in 1495. See the epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca, pag. 543.

[B] That the confessions, which the women made at the confession chair, were defective. James Olivier, Lieutenant of the Civil and Canon Law, says, that the learned de Utino observes that womens confessions 'are commonly deficient in three particulars, which they very seldom or never confess; the profuseness and vanity of cloaths, believing it to be due to their sex; leudness in thought or deed, according to the nature of the sin or its circumstances, either by shame or custom; and immoderate loquacity, which is not free from mortal or venial sin, of which an account must be given before God, even of idle words (1). I do not assert this for a truth, but only say that it is very probable that the author here cited is the Monk I am speaking of.

(a) The name of his family was Swert, which signifies a Smith, the trade of Vulcan according to the Poets.

(b) He was Bishop of Burgos.

(c) Taken from Meursius, Athenae Batavae, pag. 103, & seq.

VULCANIUS (α) (BONAVENTURA) was born at Bruges on the thirtieth of June 1538. He made such expeditious advances in polite literature, that at the age of twenty-one Cardinal Francis de Mendoza (b), chose him, by reason of his learning, to be his Secretary and Library-keeper, and gave him several authorities of the Greek Fathers to translate into Latin. He returned from Spain to the Low-Countries, after an absence of eleven years, and finding his country embroiled in confusions, he went to Cologne, and from thence to Basil and Geneva, publishing in each of these cities a book of his composition. Being returned home he was chosen Professor of the Greek tongue in the university of Leyden in the year 1578, and three years after began the exercise of that employment. He continued in it for the space of thirty-two years (c), and died at Leyden on the ninth of October 1614 [A], after having published several books (d), which discovered his erudition. He had promised an edition of all St Cyril's works [B].

(1) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 16a.

(2) Mr Drelin-court, a Physician at Leyden, and a worthy son of the Professor, has been pleased at my request to make several inquiries concerning the time of Vulcanius's death, and has found in the Records of the town-house that he was buried in St Peter's Church, October 23, 1614.

(3) Ghilini Teatro, Part. ii, pag. 49.

(4) Id. ibid, pag. 43.

[A] He died at Leyden on the 9th of October 1614. I am obliged to the Athenae Belgicae (1) for the particular day of this date, which I believe right (2), tho' the date of the year which follows it is false, for it is not true that Vulcanius died in 1610, as it is said there. Mr Konig adopts this error. Meursius, Valerius Andreas, and Moreri after them, are mistaken in placing the death of Vulcanius in 1615. Ghilini, who hath only paraphrased, and ill translated Swertius, hath exceeded the fault of his original, by making it 1600 instead of 1610, and yet he tells us, that Vulcanius, born, according to him, and according to truth, on the 30th of June in 1538, lived above seventy years (3). This is not the sole blunder he is guilty of. he tells us besides (4), that Cardinal Francis de Mendoza was Bishop of Bruges, and that Vulcanius having been professor of the Greek tongue in Flanders for three years, went to Lyons, and obtained the same employment in that university, which he exercised for thirty-two years, to the great satisfaction of the French (5). It is not necessary to tell the reader, that instead of Burgos, a city of Spain, he hath put Bruges, a city of Flanders; and that instead of Leyden, he hath clapt in Lyons, where there never was an university. He did not understand these words of Swertius: 'Lugduno Batavorum iter faceret, à Curatoribus Academiae Professor linguae Graecae designatus est anno Domini MDLXXXVIII. Triennio demum post Lugdunum venit, & Professionem suscepit (6). -- When he was going through Leyden, he was named by the Curators of the university to be professor of the Greek tongue, in the year 1578. He came to Leyden three years after, and accepted of that Professorship.' Since he is mistaken in such particulars as these, we ought to believe that on an hundred more dangerous occasions he hath corrupted the authors whom he paraphrased.

[B] He had promised an edition of all St Cyril's works. Of this Scultetus gives a curious account, speaking of the learned men he visited at Leyden, in the

(4) You will find the titles of some of them in Moreri, and all of them in Meursius, Ath. Belg. pag. 107, 108, or in Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 116, 117.

(5) Can inter additione de Francis. Ibid.

(6) Swert. ibi. supra, pag. 161.

His funeral Oration raised the murmurs of some Critics [C]. Ghilini hath committed a great many faults (e).

(e) See the remark [A].

(7) Abrah. Scultetus, Narrat. Hist. pag. 55.
the year 1612. 'Quem (Bonaventuram Vulcanium) senem admodum felice affixum, & manibus pedibusque captum inveni. Promiserat ille triginta quatuor annis antè, editionem omnium operum Græcorum Cyrilli hæcenus à multis desideratam: hanc cum frustra hæcenus singulis propemodum nundinis expectassem, & jam coram hominis ætatem valetudinemque perditam considerarem, petii ab eo, ut Cyrillum Græcum fidei meæ concrederet: me non solum operam daturum, ut ex ipsius voto ille in vulgus exiret, sed etiam de Codicis precio ipsi satisfacturum: At ille gratis pro officio actis, tantum adhuc virium sibi superesse ajebat, ut ipsemet promisso se exolvere possit; usque adeo verum est, Neminem esse tam senem, qui, non dico diem, sed annos supervivere se posse, speret. Quanquam erat non nemo in Angliâ, qui Bonaventuram de tanti thesauri possessione magnifice potius se jactasse, quam verè gloriatum fuisset, affirmaret (7). - - - I found the good old man, Bonaventura Vulcanius, confined to his chair, having neither the use of his hands nor feet. He had promised thirty years before an edition of all St Cyril's works, which has hitherto been wished for by many. I expected to see it published almost every fair. But finding myself disappointed hitherto, and considering the age and sickly condition of the man, I begged of him that he would trust me with the Greek copy; and that I not only would take care to have it published according to his mind, but likewise would satisfy him as to the price of the manuscript. He thanked me for the offer, but told me that he had still strength enough left to perform his promise himself; so true it is that there is no man so old who does not expect that he may live not only a day but years longer. It was nevertheless affirmed by somebody in England, that Vulcanius bragged of his possessing so great a treasure with more vanity than truth. Observe that Vulcanius began to translate St Cyril, to assist Cardinal de Mendoza, who was writing a tract de Naturali nostra per dignam Eucharistia sumptionem cum Christo unione (8).

(8) Meurf. A-thenz, Bat. pag. 103.

[C] His funeral oration raised the murmurs of some Critics. They found fault with Cunæus who made it, for not mentioning that the deceased, when dying, recommended himself to the merits of JESUS CHRIST, and such like things. Cunæus justified himself by declaring that he could not have said so without incurring the guilt of an officious lie. It is very well known, added he, that the good old man fell into a passion against those who exhorted him to prepare for death, and that he never was observed to comfort himself by the maxims of piety. I shall insert Cunæus's whole letter; it was never printed, and it will not be unacceptable to the reader. A friend of mine transcribed it from the original, and did me the favour to communicate his transcript to me. I know who hath the original.

* Amplissimo Viro Rumoldo Hogerbetio Petrus Cunæus S. D.

* Vir Amplissime. Ante dies aliquot rogatu Mag. Rectoris, & Senatus Academici laudavi Bonaventuram Vulcanium funebri oratione, in qua reprehendi quedam audio ab ineptis. Et jam perlatus Hagam rumor est. Ego non decrevi orationem publicare, neque enim tanti est. Sed tamen animi causa scripsi brevem disertationem quam legi à vobis cupio, uti intelligatis quam frigida & febriculosa sint, quæ illi culpare. Præcipue illud exagitat est de Lipfio & Erasmo. De Lipfio crimen fati folide: Erasmus autem ita defendi ut sub illius persona causam ipse meam egerim. Etiam illud culpare quod de Christi meritis locutus non sum. Sed multæ causæ fuere cur hæc & alia multa omiserim. Novimus nos, novere ceteri Vulcanium qui familiariter cum illo vixerunt. Sane quoties aliquis hominem extrema senectute ad mortis meditationem hortaretur, vehementer irascebatur ille. Sermones vero de Christo aut de pietate, adeo nunquam ex fene audivimus, ut sæpe mirati simus quibus ille cogitationibus festam ætatem solatus fuerit. Itaque laudo in funere ea quæ cunctis eruditis literatisque communia. Cætera omisi, ne viderer scenæ inservire. Sermones de Christo non sunt gladii Delphici qui omnibus aptari possunt. Et profecto qui hæc indignanter relegandi sunt ad D. Henfii orationes quibus nobiliss. Douzam & Scaligerum laudavit. Eadem enim illi obijci possunt atque etiam objecta fuerunt. Vale Amplissime Senator, Lugdun. Batav. Kal. Nov. CIO IDC XIV.

* Peter Cunæus, to the honourable Rumoldus Hogerbetius.

* Honourable Sir,

At the desire of the Rector, and the academical Senate, I pronounced, some days ago, a funeral oration in praise of Bonaventura Vulcanius. I hear that some things in it are censured by idle people, and the rumour is already got as far as the Hague. I never designed to publish the oration, nor do I think it worth while. But for my own amusement I have writ a short dissertation, which I should be glad you would read, that you may fully understand how groundless and insipid their exceptions are. They have chiefly dwelt upon what I said of Lipfius and Erasmus. As to Lipfius, they allow that the charge against him is answered with solidity enough; but they pretend that I have vindicated Erasmus in such a manner as to plead my own cause in his person. They likewise blamed me for not mentioning the merits of CHRIST. But there were many reasons for my omitting these and many other things. We knew Vulcanius very well, so did the rest of his familiar friends. Certain it is, that in his extreme old age, when any body exhorted him to prepare for death, he fell into a violent passion: and we were so far from ever bearing him discourse of CHRIST, or Religion, that we often wondered with what thoughts he comforted himself in his old age. For these reasons I praise him in the funeral oration for such things as are common to all learned men; passing over the rest, lest I should seem to have had nothing else in view, but to suit myself to a present occasion. Discourses about CHRIST are not Delphic words, which can be fitted up for any body. To conclude, those who are displeased with these things, should be advised to read the orations of Daniel Heinsius, wherein he praises Scaliger and Douza. For the same things may be and have been objected to him. Most noble Senator, adieu. Leyden, Nov. 1. 1614.

If any one objects that I ought not to have revealed this great fault of Vulcanius, he must be ignorant that the public hath long since been informed of it; to which purpose see what we find in the Scaligerana: Vulcanius's religion is that of dice and cards; he knows not what religion he is of, nor is he acquainted with the difference of religions. . . . Vulcanius pretends to be one of our communion, but he doth not know what religion is (9).

(9) Scaligerana, vo. 6 Vulcanius, pag. m. 255.

WART

W.

(a) At Poitiers.

(b) It is a book in 4to, of 230 pages.

ART (BERNARD) a Dominican Friar, Doctor and Professor of Divinity in the schools of Thomas Aquinas of Poitiers, published (a) in the year 1650 a book intituled The Heretic overcome and put into his grave (b). It is an answer to the Motives of Conversion published by Giles Goffart who had turned Huguenot. The Jacobin inserted them entire in his answer. Neither of these two books is of any value.

(a) There are only two faults in the errata of Francis Borana's (a Veronese) Commentary in priora resolutoria Aristotelis, printed by Wechel in folio, in the year 1539. See Chevillier, Origine de l'imprimerie, pag. 141, 142.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 296.

WECHEL (CHRISTIAN) a famous Printer at Paris before the middle of the XVth century. He was so correct in his editions, that the errata of a book in folio did not sometimes contain above two faults (a). Those who tell us that he first began to print in Greek in the year 1538, are mistaken [A]. There are some Hebrew books which he printed in the year 1533 (b). By the catalogue of the books which came from his press before the year 1548, it appears that he was a diligent man, and that he printed a great many. This catalogue is at the beginning of the thirteenth book of Gesner's Pandects, with a very obliging Epistle Dedicatory. I mean by this that Gesner dedicated his thirteenth book to him. He was prosecuted in the year 1534, for selling a book of Erasmus De usu interdicti carniū, which was censured by the Faculty of Divines (c). Some authors say that he became poor, by a particular curse of God, which fell on him, for printing an impious book [B]. ANDREW WECHEL, his son, was also a very skillful

[A] Those who tell us that he first began to print in Greek, in the year 1538, are mistaken. I had mentioned this epoch when I cited the 256th page of Mr Chevillier's tract of the origine of printing at Paris; but I have been informed by Mr Van Dale, that he has some Greek books printed at Paris, by Christian Wechel in the years 1530 and 1531. Of this number are Hermogenes περί εὐσεβείων τῶν τοι τίσσας in 4to, and Lucian's Dialogues of the Gods. These two books are in Greek only, and came out in the year 1530. Of this number are also the same Hermogenes περί μεθόδου διανοίας, & περί ἰδίων τῶν τοι δ' οὐ, printed in Greek alone in 1531. I here return thanks to Mr Van Dale for discovering to me Mr Chevillier's mistake.

[B] Some authors say that he became poor . . . for printing an impious book. Here is my evidence. 'In the year 1530, after the dismal and prodigious leudnesses related by our Historians, and Dr Cochleus, in several places, arose this abortive child of hell, who wrote a book against the Divine Justice, in favour of infants dying without Baptism, of which God be thanked, there is no more at present remaining than the bare title in Gesner's Bibliotheca; and several have wisely observed, that the ruin of Christian Wechel and his labours fell out as a punishment for his press and characters, being employed in such an infamous work. It was this wretched anonymous author, who under the borrowed name of Antony Cornelius, traced out the first lineaments of this Atheistical monster, which by little and little, like a venomous serpent, is grown up, and by intricate meanders hath crawled in amongst us (1). That the reader may know more exactly what this book was, I am obliged to recite what Father Garasse saith of it in another place of the same book. 'The second objection is not couched in such elegant terms as the first, but it is incomparably worse and more impious than that of Symmachus, and is taken out of that cursed anonymous author, who took the name of Antonius Cornelius, and composed a Latin discourse against the distributive justice of the Creator, espousing the cause of infants deceased before Baptism, and pleading pro and con, with texts and formal allegations of the law, of which he condemned the Divine Justice, and called it proceeding unjust, wicked, and inhuman . . . Time, the last and most incorruptible judge of our performances, hath discovered the impiety of this wretched book; for Christian Wechel who printed it, saw his riches moulder away before his eyes, without being able to stop the course of his ruin; and God be thanked, the book is so vanished, that there is not a single copy to be found in libraries, and at present, nothing but the title is left of that infamous and abominable work (2).'

Several things make me doubt of the principal parts of this story. I. Father Garasse cites no authority, and affirms a fact which is false, viz. That the title of this impious book is preserved in Gesner's Bibliotheca. It is certain that there is no such person mentioned there as Antony Cornelius, and that he whom we find in the epitome of that work of Gesner, is not mentioned as the author of the tract, of which I am speaking. II. If Christian Wechel had printed a book of this nature in 1530, had he been left undisturbed? Would he not have been more prosecuted for this attempt, than for selling a book of Erasmus, which had no greater blemish than that of being censured as a suspicious piece (3)? Would this Printer have been suffered to make any figure in Paris from the year 1530, to 1548 at least? I express my self with this restriction, because I have not been able to carry him farther than that year, in which I find that Conrad Gesner dedicated a book to him (4), and represents him as a most thriving Printer in the city of Paris. III. Andrew Wechel, his son, so distinguished himself amongst the Booksellers and Printers of Paris, that it is not at all probable that his father's estate was so miserably impaired. IV. Lastly, it is not perfectly agreed what that accursed book which ruined him was; for some say it was that de tribus impostoribus, a chimerical book which was never in being, if we may believe those who are best able to give an account of things of this kind (5). 'Christus Dominus . . . impostor atque adeo mendax & planus audiv non modo à Celso . . . sed etiam ab impio & immemorando homine, imo Dæmone corporato, cuius opus de tribus Magnis Impostoribus, Mose, Christo, Mahumete, exitiale fuisse Wechelo, insigni alias Typographo, sed ejus libri pestifero attacku funditus everto, referunt qui legerunt, digni fide testes. Mihi incestare oculos tam infandæ scriptiōis lectione, ad ingens scelus videtur pertinere (6). . . . The Lord Jesus Christ was called an impostor, and consequently a liar

(1) Garasse, Somme Theologique, pag. 19.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 298.

(3) Com libellum Erasmi de usu carniū, ab Academia Pacificali tanquam suspectum reprobatum, Christianus Wechel vendendum expositus. Clod. l'Imp, Orig. de l'Imprimerie, pag. 353.

(4) The 13th book of his Pandects.

(5) See the note ARETIN (PATER . . . remark [6]).

(6) Theophilus Raynaud Hystherica, Sect. 4, Ser. 11, cap. 11, pag. 230.

skilful Printer [C]. He retired from Paris to Francfort (d); some writers say, that it was

(d) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, sur les Imprimeurs. Art. xviii.

'a liar and cheat, not only by Celsus . . . but likewise by that wicked and infamous writer, or rather that devil incarnate whose book Of the three great impostors, Moses, Christ, and Mahomet, proved fatal to Wechel, who, being in other respects a famous Printer, was utterly ruined by meddling with that pestilential book, as it is affirmed by credible witnesses who have perused it. As for my part, I should look upon it as a very great crime to pollute my eyes with the reading of such an abominable performance.' By these four remarks I do not pretend to deny the whole narrative of Father Garasse; I only call in question Wechel's suffering such terrible effects of the Divine wrath, for having printed a book in the year 1530, and do not believe that the dissertation concerning the punishment of infants, was so impious as he represents it. As for the rest, I agree with him, that there was a book intitled, Querela infantum in limbo clausorum adversus divinum iudicium, ab Ant. Cornelio (7) J. U. Lic. If we rely upon the title, it was printed at Paris by Christian Wechel, in the year 1531, in 4to. There are two copies (8) of it in the Archbishop of Rheims's library. Without having read this tract, I conjecture that it is not impious, and that it is like that of Bartolus à Saxoferrato, and that of Jacobus de Ancharana. The first of these Civilians is author of a piece intitled, Processus Sathane contra D. Virginem eam Judice Jesu: and the other of a treatise called Processus Luciferi contra Jesum coram Judice Salomone. They introduce the devil entering an action, observing the formalities of the bar, and consequently urging all his reasons. Is it possible to represent him speaking without making him utter impieties? And yet these two books are not impious. Every thing ends in the confusion of the plaintiff.

(7) See Bibliotheca Telleriana, pag. 167. He is there called Cornelius, pag. 422, and in the Index.

(8) What Garasse affirms is not therefore true, that it is wholly lost.

(9) Mr Bourdelot did me the favour to send it me from Paris.

(10) Antonio Borg Jodici civilis apud Parisenses.

(11) Prefatus facit Confistorii illustriss. D. Lodovici Galliarum gubernatrix.

(12) Non quod dubitem pueros illos iusta pena condemnatos. Antonius Cornelius, in Pract.

A REFLECTION upon the complaints of some persons, against those who represent the objections of the Libertines with all their force.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary I have read the book in question (9). The entire title of it runs thus: Exatissima infantum in limbo clausorum Querela adversus divinum iudicium apud equum iudicem proposita. Apologia divini iudicii contra Querelam Infantum. Infantium ad Apologiam divini iudicii Responso. Equi iudicis super hac re Sententia. Auctore Antonio Cornelio Juris utriusque Licentiate Doctore. Lutetiae apud Christianum Wechelium in via Jacobea sub scuto Basilienf, anno MD XXXI. mense Januario. This tract, containing about seventy pages in 4to, was dedicated by the author to Antony du Bourg, Lieutenant-Civil at Paris (10), and President of the Council of Louise of Savoy, mother of Francis I (11). The Epistle Dedicatory is very short, and precedes a Preface which is a little longer, and dated at Paris on the second of January 1531. Antony Cornelius acknowledges his great obligations to the person to whom he dedicates his book, and that he undertook that performance at the request of one of his friends, who knew that he had dreamed that the infants detained in limbo, complain of being disinherited contrary to the disposition of the law Plautius, which enacts neminem ex facto alterius exheredari posse. . . . That no person can be disinherited for the fault of another. He declares that their complaints are ill-grounded (12). Where is then the impiety? Doth it consist in his citing some passages of the Scripture, and of the Civil and Canon-Laws which favour the infants cause? But does he not also alledge some that are contrary to them? and at last, after their reply, doth he not bring in the following definitive sentence? 'Penitatis diligentissime in utramque partem legibus, cenfeo infantes iniuste de divino iudicio queri per tex. in c. regenerante de consec. dist. iiii fallit dicit lex. & fallitur qui parvulos non baptizatos praedicat in condemnatione non futuros, cum dicat Apostolus ob unius delictum omnes homines damnari. . . . Having attentively considered the laws on either side, I am of opinion that children have no reason to complain of the Divine Justice. The law, says he, deceives one; and I am of opinion that he is deceived who affirms, that little children, not baptized, are not liable to be damned, since the Apostle expressly says, that by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation.' Thus we see with what temerity Father Garasse mentions Antony Cornelius's book. Who can be sufficiently surprized at his blunder? Perhaps some may reply to me that the infants objections are carried too far, and that it makes the faith of their Advocate suspected. I should not vouchsafe an answer to this scruple, if I did not well know that it is in the mouths of an infinite number of people, and objected against those, who, without any disguise, fairly represent the arguments of Heretics, or Libertines. Give me leave to answer those gentlemen with this question: If you were obliged to examine some of the controversies in agitation betwixt the Christians and the Infidels, would you, to the utmost of your knowledge, represent whatever the last could urge with the greatest force in favour of their opinions? Or would you designedly weaken their arguments, that your readers might meet with nothing to render the victory dubious? You will undoubtedly answer me, that you would do the first of these two things, and that the second is a fraud utterly unworthy of a man of honour, and much less excusable in a servant of God. Wherefore then are you surprized to see the objections of the Infidels represented with all the force which natural reason gives them? You say you would do it your self, if you were to refute them, and you agree, that swerving from this rule is to incur the guilt of an ignominious fraud. Learn then not to take all those for prevaricators, who fairly shew the beautiful side of their adversaries cause; and if they are obliged to confess that nothing but the Scripture can furnish arms against certain objections of the Infidels, and that they recur to it as to the immovable foundation of their faith, be very well contented with their conduct; for otherwise the world will be apt to distrust you, and to suppose that you endeavour to triumph by the assistance of a train of military stratagems, which are inconsistent with the Gospel.

VOL. V.

I have lately discovered one of the causes, which induce a great many people to suspect those of Libertinism, who propose the objections of the Libertines in their full force. A very honest and truly religious man said to me a few days ago, mentioning some writers, whose zeal for the good cause is known to the whole world; you do not find in their books that the enemies of truth offer any thing considerable; the objections of the Infidels are proposed there in few words, and they are amply and victoriously refuted: but in such and such writers who do not pass for great zealots, they are very prolix and more specious than the answer. I made use of the same question as above. Did those zealous writers know all that appears in the less zealous authors, or were they ignorant of it? If the latter, they are not to be praised for their silence, nor for their victory. But if the first, they deserve a severe censure, as being guilty of a pious fraud, which truth ought never to stand in need of; and I am very sure they would not dare to own that they have passed by the least particular, which could represent in a beautiful light their enemies objections. Wherein then doth their zeal surpass the less devout writer, whom you was speaking of? They said all they could in favour of their adversary before they answered him; hath the less zealous author done more?

We have seen some other mistakes of Garasse in the article CORNELLIUS.

[C] ANDREW WECHEL, his son, was also a very skilful Printer. I have read in the History of Printing (13), first, That he was obliged to retire to Francfort, under the protection of the Count of Hanaw, on account of his religion about the year 1573. In the second place, That his son John, who was married to one of the daughters of Jerom Drouart (14), Bookseller at Paris, going to Francfort with his father, carried with him half the impression of Polybii opera Gr. Lat. cum notis Casauboni, in folio, in 1609; which is the reason why some copies of Polybii are to be seen with his name to them, though it be the same edition with that of Paris. Thirdly, That Andrew Wechel died at Francfort towards the year 1600. In the fourth place, that his son John printed books in the said city of Francfort in the year 1583, and afterwards Diodori Siculi Biblioth. Historiae Gr. Lat. in 1604, and other books which procured him the reputation of one of the most able Printers and Booksellers of his time. On the first of these four things I observe, that Francfort being a Republic, not in the least depending on the Counts of Hanaw, it is not at all likely that Andrew Wechel should, fons

Clara

(13) Written by John de la Caille, and printed at Paris in the year 1689.

(14) The author says, pag. 208, that it is an error, and that this Jerom was never married.

6 U

(c) Id. ibid.

was after the Paris massacre (c). See the remark [B].

should, in that city, have put himself under the protection of those Counts. Perhaps the time is here confounded; at least it is very certain that Wechel's heirs kept Printing-houses at Hanaw, towards the beginning of the XVIIth century; and it was then that they put themselves under the protection of the Count of Hanaw. On the second head I observe, that Casaubon was not yet fifteen years old, when John Wechel retired with his father to Francfort, towards the year 1573. Wherefore it is impossible that this Printer should have carried with him half the impression of Casaubon's Polihius. On the third I observe, that Andrew Wechel died on the first of November 1581, as may be inferred from the commentaries of Oplopæus, his corrector, prefixed to the commentaries of Peter Ramus on some of Cicero's orations, printed at Francfort apud hæredes Andree Wecheli, in the year 1582. Lastly, I say on the fourth head, that his heirs who continued to print, were Claudius Marni, and John Aubri: which plainly shews, that John Wechel was not what the author of the History of Printing represents him. The edition of Diodorus Siculus in 1604, was printed by Claudius Marni, and the sons of John Aubri.

(15) Oplopæus, Pref. Commentar. Petri Rami in Orat. Cicero-nis. Note, that Oplopæus wrote that preface soon after Andrew Wechel's death.

(16) It is in the collection of Marquard Gudii & doctorum Viro-rum ad eum Epistolæ, &c. which the illustrious Mr. Graevius published at Utrecht in 1696, by the care of Mr. Burman, worthy son of the late Mr. Burman, Professor of Divinity at Utrecht. See pag. 338, of that collection.

(17) Gothofredus Jungerman-nus, Epist. ad Scip. Gentilem, pag. 361, 362, of the collection Marquard Gudii &c. Epistolæ.

Observe, that Oplopæus, speaking of the heirs of Andrew Wechel, mentions only Claudius Marni, and John Aubri, the sons-in-law of that Printer (15); which obliges me to renounce the opinion I once was of, that John Wechel was the son of Andrew. A letter of Frederic Sylburgius, dated on the twentieth of June 1587 (16), informs me, that he did no longer lodge in the house of John Wechel, but with John Aubri. After this man's death, the names of his sons appeared in the titles of books, joined with that of Claudius Marni, with whom they had several disputes. 'Aubriani rationes reddi sibi à Marnio volunt, & hæreditatem prorsus dividi; adeo ut aliquoties officina claudi debuerit, quum alias inter hæc occupationes ad calculos federe quiete nequeant (17). . . . The Aubri's will have Marni to settle his accounts with them, and require that the entire inheritance should be divided. For this reason they have been obliged sometimes to shut up their shop, because their business did not give them sufficient time to settle their accounts.' It is certain, that what they call typi Wecheliani, typographia Wecheliana, were in the hands of the Marni's and the Aubri's. During that time John Wechel printed separately. I have, amongst other books printed by him, the Paraphrase and Scholia of Monlorius in Aristotelis analyticorum priorum, seu de ratiocinatione libros duos, together with the same Monlorius's tract De Estetlechia, &c. de Universis, Francofurti in officina typographica Joannis Wecheli 1593. There is a gross error in the French translation of Bongars's letters; there we find the following words: I have wrote to one of Wechel's men to take great care of them, which answer to this Latin, Commendavi eas

Aubrio Wecheliano (18). . . . I have recommended them (18) Bongars, to the care of Aubrius Wechelianus; and these, I have ordered one of Wechel's men to send you the tract which you desire, for Libellum de Murrbinis jussu suo mitti ad te Marnius Wechelianus (19). . . . I have ordered Mar-nius Wechelianus to send you the tract de Murrbinis.

Bongars wrote this in the year 1597, and his translator hath made him speak as if Wechel had been alive then, not knowing that the original expressed the names of his sons-in-law.

As for the rest, I have very good reasons to believe, that Andrew Wechel left France before the massacre. I find in Melchior Adam, that Laurens Zingref was very uneasy at Paris in the year 1569, on account of money remitted to him, which was seized in Wechel's hands. He adds that Wechel was banished the kingdom, that all his effects were confiscated, and that his books being the greatest part of them Protestant, were seized and carried away from his shop, in order to be publicly burnt. 'Multa hoc in itinere perpeffus est indigna (Zingrefus) tum prepter alia incommoda, tum propter rei pecuniarias penuriam: cum inter peregrinos agens à patre nihil acciperet: & illa, quæ ex principis liberalitate, nec non secretò à matre transmissa fuerant, interciperentur apud Wechelium, Bibliopolam notiffimum; quippe cujus bona omnia confiscata fuerant, ipso regni limitibus proscriptos, reliquique ut plurimum Protestantium libris ab officinâ illius, Lutetie publicè combustis (20). . . . Zingref endured great hardships in this journey, on account of several inconveniences, and especially for want of money. He received no supplies from his father though he was in a foreign country; and what sums were remitted to him by the generosity of the Prince, and privately by his mother, were seized in the hands of Wechel, a very noted Bookseller, &c. . . . Zingref agreed with the Wechels to take in payment some of the books which they had saved from the Inquisition (21). He afterwards received some other money from home, and went to Orleans, where he was admitted Doctor of the Civil-Law, in the year 1570 (22). These things happened before the Paris massacre.

Notwithstanding all this, it is most certain that Andrew Wechel was at Paris on that cruel day. He fled into Germany in the year 1569, when those troubles were brought on him which Melchior Adam relates, in which he had perished if the President de Harlai had not done him good service (23). He returned to Paris, and re-established his Printing-house there, in the beginning of June 1571 (24). He himself relates (25) the danger which he run in the night of the massacre, and how he was saved by Hubert Languet, who lodged in his house. He testifies his gratitude to him in the Epistle Dedicatory of Albert Krantzius's Vandalia.

(20) Melch. Adam. in Vie Juridical. pag. 431. (21) On Wecheliani trans- gress, prope pecuniâ sibi debita libros nonnullis, quos clam adne- illi servavit, ac confiscationibus Regis subme- rant, summe co- actus fuit. Id. ibid. (22) M. Bâ. Juridical. pag. 431. (23) Languet, Epist. xlii ad Co- mmentum Po- tronum, pag. 80. (24) Melch. Epist. viii, ad eundem, pag. 104. (25) In the Epistle Dedicatory of Albert Krantzius's Vandalia, printed at Fran- cfort 1575.

WEIDNERUS (PAUL) a Jewish Physician in the XVIth century, was invited from Udine a city in Italy, to practise Physic in Carinthia, where he stayed six years, receiving a very handsome pension from the public. During this time he conceived some doubts concerning his religion, which obliged him to compare the Old and the New Testament together, and diligently to examine the expositions of the rabbins; and being convinced by this course of reading that JESUS CHRIST is the Messias, he resolved to embrace openly the Christian Faith. He wavered for about the space of one year after this full conviction (a), and carefully concealed his thoughts, not being ignorant of the dangers to which he should expose himself [A], if he let the Jews know the state of

[A] Not being ignorant of the dangers to which he should expose himself. To be firmly persuaded that a religion is true, to resolve to profess it, and suffer a great many conflicts of mind before the execution of such a resolution, are not incompatible things. Wherefore we ought not to charge Weidnerus's narrative with insincerity. There are very few designs, the execution of which meets with more obstacles than that of the change of religion; for not to mention other hindrances, do not we know that we shall thereby anger the persons whom we love and respect most? Do not we know that we shall become odious and infamous to our relations? I say infamous, for all nations are used to fix an infamous idea on any man's forsaking his religion. They are not contented with calling him a deserter, an apostate, but he must also be called a renegade (1). They affirm, that his revolt is an ignominious blemish to his family, and I have seen a devout woman who said very seriously, that she had rather see her sisters common whores, than go to mass. These hideous notions are necessary to the temporal good of a communion, and this is the reason why they are fomented. A Casuist will not think it ill for a father to turn his sons out of doors if they apostatize, or that in the like case, one brother should never see the other, and a man should abhor his wife, or a woman leave her husband. The Protestants charge this sort of persecution on the Catholics, who also on their

(1) That note was used among the Protestants in some parts of France, to denote those who turned Papists.

of his soul; but at last the interest of his salvation prevailed over the considerations of the flesh; and leaving Carinthia, he removed to Vienna, where together with his wife and four children he was baptised in St Stephen's Church, on the twenty-first of August 1558. He was made Hebrew Professor in the university of Vienna, and published something concerning the motives of his conversion, and to refute Judaism (b).

(b) Taken from the Epistle Dedicatory to the Emperor Ferdinand, prefixed to his book De locis præcipuis Fidei Christianæ, printed at Vienna, in the year 1559. See John Henichius, Professor of Divinity at Rintel, de Veritate Religionis Christianæ, pag. 360, & seq.

(2) See Mr. Brucy's book, intitled, Réponse aux Plaintes des Protestans; it is mentioned in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for August 1686, Art. 1. See pag. 879, of those Nouvelles.

(3) Arnould, Apologie pour les Catholiques, Part. ii, ch. xii, pag. 240; 241.

their side, reproach the Protestants with it (2). Be that as it will, it is certain that this custom very frequently serves as a scare-crow to those who are persuaded, that they ought to quit the church in which they have been educated. Here follows a passage of Mr Arnould on this head. The design of changing one's religion carries with it something astonishing, faith he (3), and even those who are fully resolved to execute it, can hardly bring themselves to do so I know that a young lady, the daughter of a very zealous Huguenot concealed for seven years from her father that she was a Catholic; and during that whole space of time, she accompanied him to the sermon and service only abstaining from the sacrament, out of fear that he should die for grief at the news of it. She caused me to be consulted in this case, and being informed that I did not approve of this dissimulation, she resolved, though with a great deal of difficulty, to discover her self There may be also some, as it was in St Augustin's time, who are thoroughly convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion, but cannot break the bonds of custom which drags them to the Protestant assemblies, nor expose themselves to the reproach which they fear from their relations and friends, on account of their change, unless some other human consideration, contrary to those which I have mentioned, counterbalances them, and hindering the impression which they made on their minds, enables them to follow more easily the truth of which they are convinced. There are some communities, which believe themselves so much disgraced by the apostacy of a Monk of merit, and are so afraid that it should prove a fatal scandal to the faith of the weak, as well as too great a subject of triumph to the contrary party, that they would leave no means unattempted against any person who discovers the least design to desert them. The Jews are of the same disposition. Would they not have murdered Spinoza (4)? And did they not attempt to destroy our Weidnerus after his conversion? Porro, faith he (5), meis secundum carnem non mediocria propter fidei Christianæ suspicionem expectare pericula cogebar, quæ pro dolor! in hunc usque diem mihi intrentari video & experior. Besides, when the thing could be no longer concealed, I was immediately forced to dread no small mischief from my brethren according to the flesh, on account of their suspecting me to be a Christian; and to my great grief I both see and know by experience that I am exposed to the same dangers still. Let us not forget a very terrible sort of persecution against those, who change their religion. They are loaded with defamatory libels (6); their whole lives are strictly examined; and if any blemishes can be found they are represented to the public with all sorts of artifice in the most hyperbolical manner. The least slips of youth are never forgiven them. If they have written any private letters in confidence to their friends, which may injure their reputation, they are published. In a word, for the interest of the cause, and to discredit the authority of the change, no scruple is made to turn into great crimes, those very things which would never have deprived them of the esteem and affection of any one person in the world; provided they had not changed their religion. See the remark [C] of the article SPONDANUS (JOHN).

(4) See the text of the article of SPINOZA, between the citations (b) and (c).

(5) Weidnerus, Epist. Dedicat. ad Ferdinandum.

(6) Confer with this the words of Peter CHARLTON, which I have quoted in his article, remark [P].

(a) And see Weile, as in König's Bibliotheca.

(b) See the Epistle Dedicatory, of the Theatrum lucidum.

(c) Jo. à Lendré, de Pseudo Messias, pag. 63.

(d) Whole name was Aaron Gaby Faro, and to whom in baptism they gave the name of John Rodrigues.

WEILE (a) (FREDERIC RAGSTAT DE) a German Rabbi was an early convert to Christianity; for he was no more than three and twenty years of age when he published a book against the Jews. A little before that he had abjured their religion, and had been baptised in the Protestant church at Cleves. He was named Frederic after the Elector of Brandenburg (b). The book I speak of was printed at Amsterdam in the year 1671 in 12mo, and contains one hundred and fifty pages. The title of it is Theatrum lucidum exhibens verum Messiam dominum nostrum JESUM-CHRISTUM, ejusque bonorem defendens contra accusationes Judæorum, seu Rabbiorum, in genere, speciatim R. LIBMAN NITZACHON. We find there some very extraordinary particulars touching the impostures of the false Messiah Sabbathi Tzebhi, who had made a great deal of noise in Turkey a little while before. Mr Lendré has related them, and bestowed praises on our de Weile (c), who was Minister at Spiik near Gorcum in Holland. He baptised a Portuguese Jew (d) there on the tenth of February 1686 [A]. The Flemish sermon which he preached upon that occasion, on the sixth verse of the second Psalm, was printed at the Hague soon after in 8vo.

(1) He shews there that Jesus Christ is the Messiah, and expressly confutes Aburbinel, and Isaac Ben Abraham, and Lipman Nitzachon: The second edition of this book was printed at the Hague in the year 1684, and contains 709 pages in 8vo.

[A] He baptised a Portuguese Jew The writings of Mr de Weile, and particularly the Flemish book which he published in the year 1683 (1), made a great impression upon that Jew, so that he found himself disposed to embrace the Christian Faith, and desired to confer with the author in order to get more and more light. Mr de Weile, who had at different times been deceived by two Jews, did at first reject the proposals of this, but at last he hearkened to them and made him a Profelyte. We find a narrative of the affair prefixed to a sermon which was preached at Spiik by the said minister, on the day that this Portuguese was baptized.

WERT (JOHN DE) one of the great warriors of the XVIIth century, was born in a village of the province of Guelderland, called Wert. We may see by this that he was a man of no family, since he was only known by the name of his village. . . . He was taken prisoner at the battle of Rhinfeld [A].

For

[A] He was taken prisoner at the battle of Rhinfeld. They carried him to Paris, and put him in 'the castle of Vincennes, and as soon as he had given his parole, they were very glad to leave him at his entire liberty. He went to make his court to the King who received him most graciously. He was regaled by the most considerable noblemen, and went to see all the public shews. While he staid at Vincennes he had a magnificent table kept for him, and the ladies of the first quality in Paris made it a diversion to go and see him eat. He said a thousand handsome things to all of them; though his compliments did always favour somewhat of the German and soldier He was an admirable drinker, and no less famous

For the rest, his name did not only make a noise in the public news-papers, but refounded also in songs: several were handed about of which he was the burthen, and these latter times have reckoned them so pretty that they have been revived oftener than once [B].

'famous for using tobacco. He smoked, took snuff, and pigtail. He was accompanied by several German officers, who had every one the same talents (1).'

(1) Mademoiselle l'Héritière, in the Mercure Galant, for the month of May 1702, pag. 77, & seq.
[B] Several songs were handed about of which he was the burthen, . . . they have been revived oftener than once.] Mr Menage (2) to prove that the word Tudefque is elegantly made use of in familiar conversation to denote a German (3) quotes Mr de Montplaisir who has said in one of his songs,

Faut-il se lever si matin,
Dit le Comte de Fiesque.
On ne dort non plus qu'un Lutin Avecque ce Tudefque.
Maugré-bieu de la nation :
Le Diable emporte Gaffion, Et Jean de Vert.

'Blood! must we then so early rise,
Said the Count de Fiesque,
Goblins as well might shut their eyes,
As I with this Tudefque.
A pox upon the Nation. May
The Devil take and run away
With Gaffion and John de Vert.

Several verses were composed to the same tune in the year 1690. Every body sung them. Many more have been published since (4). I have seen in the Mercurie Galant for the month of April 1702, a ballad, from which I shall quote two things: the one will confirm what I have said in another place (5), viz. that drunkenness becomes fashionable among women: the other will shew us whether Mr Chevreau, in the passages which I have quoted elsewhere (6), had reason to say that there prevails at this time a chaffity of conversation unknown to our ancestors.

A fe barbouiller de Tabac
Trouvoit-on de la gloire,
Se piquoit-on d'un estomac
Qui fut si propre à boire.
Certaines Dames de ce temps
L'emportent pour ces beaux talens
Sur Jean de Vert, sur Jean de Vert (7) . . .

Dans les cercles les mieux choisis
Fort peu je vous assure Imitent par leurs tours polis Sarafin ou Voiture.
Je quitterois tous les vivans
Pour tels defunts l'honneur du tems
De Jean de Vert, de Jean de Vert . . .

Comme l'on se retire loin
De la galanterie
On suit en fa place avec foin
La polissonnerie.
On dit des bons mots plus grossiers
Que les Goujats des officiers
De Jean de Vert, de Jean de Vert (8) . . .

(8) Ibid. pag. 298, 299.

Was it a strife who should be most Dare'd o'er with snuff like Tinkers;
And did our honest fathers boast
Of being sturdy drinkers?
There are some ladies in our days
Who claim in both a higher praise
Than John de Vert, than John de Vert.

In the best chosen circles you,
After strict search, will find,
Like Sarafin and Voiture few,
Of manners so refin'd.
I'd change the living all away
For such dead men as grac'd the day
Of John de Vert, of John de Vert. . .

The farther still that we remove From gallantry and wit,
The more we carefully improve
In wagery and smut.
Our dirty jokes would have offended
The very lackeys that attended
The officers of John de Vert. . .

Mademoiselle l'Héritier tells us in the following quotation what the original of those songs was. She says (9) that John de Vert having made himself master of several places in Picardy (10) carried terror to the very gates of Amiens by the parties which he sent out. That terror diffused itself as far as Paris, and as people are ever apt to magnify objects the bare name of John de Vert struck with terror, and became so dreadful, that the sound of it was sufficient to frighten children. When this General was taken prisoner at the battle of Rhinfield (11) the people of Paris, upon hearing the news of it, discovered such transports of joy that it would be difficult to describe them. The Muse of the Pont Neuf celebrated her joy to a trumpet-tune which was then in vogue: she set forth the triumph of the French, and said that they had beat the Germans and John de Vert. She related how they had taken a great many colours, a great many standards, and John de Vert, that they had taken such a number of prisoners and John de Vert. In short, all the couplets of this Savoyard's (12) song, which were very numerous, ended with this burden, and John de Vert. As there was a certain rustic ingenuity in these songs, which at the same time had something cheerful in it, the court and city rung with them, and John de Vert and his songs were so much in fashion that nothing else was talked of (13) . . . That valiant General, whose name had made so great a noise, left in France an everlasting remembrance of his captivity, and they called the time in which it happened, the time of John de Vert. The trumpet tune which I mentioned a little before was called the tune of John de Vert . . . Several men of wit both in the court and city did in imitation of the Pont Neuf make divers pretty songs to that tune, which had all a relation to John de Vert. In short he has made not only himself but his tune immortal, since from his time to this there have not passed ten years together wherein some agreeable songs have not been composed to that tune (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 11.

WESALIA (JOHN DE) a Doctor of Divinity in the XVth century, was very ill treated by the Inquisition in Germany, for having taught some doctrines which disgusted the Catholics. It is pretended that his conversation with some Jews disordered his head, and occasioned his falling into several extravagancies [A]. He was a famous preacher, nus Gratius. This Rabbi was Victor de Carben, who embraced the Christian Faith in the year 1515, being forty-two years of age, and became a priest, and lived to the age of ninety-two (1). He wrote some tracts in honour of the Blessed Virgin and the Church, which 1690.

[A] His conversation with some Jews disordered his head, and occasioned his falling into several extravagancies. The plague having obliged him to leave Mentz, he retired to Worms, where he conversed with the Jews; as a Rabbi, converted to Christianity, informed Orthu-

preacher, which the Monks, especially the Thomists, did not love, and accordingly they were the principal authors of the persecutions which he suffered. They accused him for certain propositions which they had heard him deliver in the pulpit; and obliged the Archbishop of Mentz to proceed against him (a). That prelate being unwilling to expose himself once more to the indignation of the Court of Rome [B], convoked an assembly of Doctors in the year 1479. John de Wesalia, who was then a prisoner in the convent of the Cordeliers at Mentz, was interrogated by John Elten the Inquisitor, who was president of the assembly. He answered in the negative, to most of the questions put to him, and seemed a little to evade some others. Wherefore on the next day, the Inquisitor declared with a great deal of eloquence [C], that he ought to be interrogated once more. His answers were much the same with those of the fore going day; but he had the confusion to be convicted out of his own writings [D], of having taught principles which he had denied in answering the Inquisitor. He submitted to the punishment imposed on him, which was to retract before all the people. His books were burnt; but some Doctors thought that this venerable old man was used too severely, and that monkish passion had a great share in this affair (b) [E]. He was confined to perpetual which Orthonius Gratius turned into Latin. In Visitationem quum acerbissime adhuc valeret, mihi sapienter retulit prælatum Johannem Wesalicensem à Moguntia ob peccatis metum Wormaciam se contulisse, atque ibidem cum Judæis Christi inimicis frequentem habuisse conversationem, eumque ab illis deceptum in putidam errorum sententiam corripuisse (2). There is no manner of appearance of truth in this story; for the doctrines, for which John de Wesalia was condemned by the Inquisition did not at all favour of Judaism.

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Taken from a relation of that trial, inserted by Orthonius Gratius, in the Fasciculus Rerum expendarum & fugiendarum, pag. 325, & seq. Edit. Londinens. 1690.

[B] The Archbishop of Mentz . . . being unwilling to expose himself once more to the indignation of the Court of Rome.] The liberty which he had taken of condemning the avarice of that court had been fatal to him, and was the cause that not only he was deprived of his archbishopric, but Mentz was destroyed. The following passage expresses his name and family; 'Reverendissimus præful Moguntinus Dietherus Hsenburgius, militi literarum ad Universitatem Heidelbergensem & Coloniensem instigantibus, imo cogentibus Thomistis quibusdam: veritus ne denuo ab episcopatu ejiceretur jussu Romani Pontificis, quod commeruerat ante levibus verbis Romanorum in vendendis palliis notata avaritia. Et minabantur ei Romani præfuli iram, quam pridem non tam ipse fuerat expertus, quam tota Moguntia & capta & direpta, ac à victoribus nullum non contumeliarum genus passa. Unde ferunt Pium Pontificem ad Moguntiam mentionem semper ingemuisse, quod jus suum tam insigni damno vindicasset' (3). . . . The most reverend Archbishop of Mentz, Dietherus Hsenburgius sent letters to the universities of Heidelberg and Cologne, being incited, or rather forced, thereto by certain Thomists, and steering left he should be again thrust out of his bishopric by the Pope's orders, as he had been before on account of some slight reproaches which he had thrown upon the avarice of the Court of Rome in the sale of preferments. They threatened him with the Pope's indignation, which had formerly fallen not only upon himself but upon the whole city of Mentz; for it was taken and plundered, and suffered all manner of indignities from the conqueror. Hence it is said that Pope Pius always sighed when he heard the name of that city mentioned, because he had asserted his right in such a destructive way. We ought not to be surprized that the agents of the Inquisition, are so greedy of rendering people suspected and amplifying things by malicious interpretations; for those who find themselves suspected, are afraid of losing their posts if they have any, and break out into a thousand violences, in order to take off the ill impressions that have been given of them. The inquisitors do very well know that their odious slanders will produce this effect; wherefore they never make any scruple of calumny. To how many people may justly be applied this saying of Horace, you design to silence envy by forsaking virtue (4).

[C] On the next day, the Inquisitor declared with a great deal of eloquence.] Those who read his speech on that occasion, need not be adverted that I here speak ironically. Adducto Johanne de Wesalia, dixit Inquisitor: Tria jam futura in hoc actu. Primum quia M. Johannes hesternæ die non satis resolutus ad certos responderet articulos, iterum sibi illos proponendos esse, ut luculenter & clare, plus masticando, responderet: deinde ad quosdam alios articulos heri non auditos quid sentiat, respondere deberet: tertio relegi

debere omnes articulos principales cum responsionibus, ut audiatur si adhuc in illis velit persistere aut ab illis resiliere (5). . . . John de Wesalia being brought before the Inquisitor, the Inquisitor said that three things were to be done at that sitting. First, because the said John had not given direct and positive answers the day before to certain articles, they should be proposed to him again, that he might answer distinctly and clearly, by pondering more than he had yet done: next, that he should be obliged to declare his sentiments upon some other points, which had not been mentioned the preceding day: and thirdly, that all the principal articles, together with his answers, should be read over, to see whether he still adhered to them or was willing to depart from them.

[D] He had the confusion to be convicted out of his own writings.] This poor man, broken by age and diseases, was not able to express his thoughts before such a dreadful tribunal, and perhaps did not remember all that he had written. The Inquisitors clearly foresaw his negative plea; and for that reason they were not content with binding him by the most solemn oaths, but first of all they seized on all his papers. Mandavit eidem Johanni (Inquisitor) sub pena obediencie, in virtute Sancti Spiritus, sub pena excommunicationis latæ sentencie (à quo nemo habet ipsum absolvere nisi solus Papa, vel ipse Inquisitor, nisi in articulo mortis) ut diceret plane verba veritatis super interrogandis de sua fide, sine ambagibus, sine verborum sophisticatione (6). . . . The Inquisitor charged the said Wesalia, by his vow of Obedience, in the name of the Holy Ghost, and under pain of excommunication (from which no man should absolve him besides the Pope and the Inquisitor himself, unless at the point of death) that he would plainly speak the truth in these things upon which he was to be interrogated, without any shuffling or equivocation. Conclufum quod M. N. Wesalia jurandum facere deberet, quod præsentare & tradere vellet omnes tractatus, opera, scripta sua qualiacunque quæ condidisset, ut per proprios sermones vinceretur Adjungebatur quod doctores Heidelbergenses cum tribus aliis, scilicet Macario, decano Sancti Victoris, & quodam alio perspicere tractatus ejus, errores exciperent dearticulare (7). . . . It was concluded that an oath should be administered to Wesalia, by which he should oblige himself to present and deliver up all his treatises, works, and compositions whatsoever, that he might be convicted by his own words. . . . It was added that the Professors of Heidelberg, together with three more, viz. Macarius, the Dean of St Victor, and a certain other person, should examine his treatises, extract the errors, and digest them into articles. It was therefore very easy to convict him on those points which he improperly denied: 'Dum certas propositiones negasset se scripsisse, tractatus sui propria manu conscripti ei præsentabantur, quam revera literam esse suam non valuit negare' (8). . . . When he denied that he writ certain propositions, they produced to him treatises written with his own hand, which he was not able to deny.

[E] Some doctors thought that he was used too severely, and that monkish passion had a great share in this affair.] This is testified by the anonymous author of the verbal process; who was present during the whole proceedings. 'Dempto solo articulo, scilicet (9), de processione

(5) Author Examinis Magistratus, apud Orth. Gratium, pag. 330.

(6) Ibid. pag. 328.

(7) Idem, Auctor Examinis, apud eundem, pag. 327.

(8) Id. Ibid. pag. 330.

(9) Id. Ibid. pag. 332.

(a) Id. Ibid.

(3) Author Examinis Magistratus ac Theologus Joh. de Wesalia, apud Orthonium Gratium in Fasciculo Rerum expendarum. pag. 327.

(4) Invidiam placare parvas virtute relictas. Horat. Sat. iii, lib. ii, ver. 13.

perpetual penance in a monastery of the Augustins, where he died soon after (c). The Protestants have placed him in their list of the witnesses of truth; which I am not surprized at, for he was condemned for several doctrines which they have since taught. What Coëffeteau offers in answer to this, hath no manner of solidity [F]. Wesalia taught at Erford (d). Consult the article WESTPHALUS (JOHN).

(c) Trithemius, in Chronico Sponheimensi, ad ann. 1479, apud Coëffeteau, Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 1213. (d) Wimpfelingus, apud Wolsium, Lect. memorab.
Tom. i, pag. 875, ad ann. 1464.

sione Spiritus Sancti in aliis videtur non ita gravi censura fuisse castigandus, si induciæ datæ fuissent, si consultores ei fuissent adhibiti, si non omnes uno solo dempto, fuissent de via realium. Et nisi forsitan impetus quidam irrepressisset in religiosos triumphandi de seculari, & præsertim de eo qui illorum Thomam peculiariter non coluerat, forsitan poterat cum eo mitius, humanius, & clementius benigniusque actum & processum fuisse. Deum testor qui omnia novit hunc processum qui cum eo servatus fuit usque ad revocationem & librorum suorum exustionem, vehe-mentissime displicuisse Magistro Engelino de Brun-swico, maximo Theologo, & Magistro Joanni Kei-serbergio, duobus utique viris cum doctis, tum integris. Præcipue Magistro Engelino visum fuit nitis præcipitanter cum tanto viro actum esse. Im-mo non verebatur asserere multos articulos ejus, & majorem partem posse sustineri. Nec obtinuit de simulate Thomistarum contra Modernos, & de gaudio triumphandi religionum contra seculares. -----

Setting aside one article touching the procession of the Holy Ghost, he seems in other things not to have deserved such a severe censure, if they would have given him some respite, and allowed him persons to consult with, and if they had not all except one been Realists. Perhaps too, if the Monks had not been violently set upon running down a secular man, especially one that had never shown any particular reverence for their great St Thomas, they would have proceeded against him in a more mild, human, merciful, and good-natured way!
I call GOD, who knoweth all things, to witness, that this process which was carried on against him, till such time as his books were called in and burnt, did highly displease Dr Engelino of Brunswick, a great Divine, and Dr Keiserberg, two men that were famous both for their learning and integrity. Dr Engelino particularly was of opinion, that they had proceeded too rashly with so great a man. Nay he did not scruple to affirm, that many of his articles, if not the greatest part of them, might be defended. Neither was he silent concerning the ill will which the Thomists bear the Moderns, and the pleasure which the Monks take in triumphing over secular Priests. He adds, that the Devil sowed the tares of division betwixt the Divines and Philosophers, and so alienated their minds, that if any person denied the reality of the Universalia, he was immediately thought to have sinned against the Holy Ghost, and to be guilty of a mortal sin against GOD, Christianity, Justice, and the State. Can this blindness proceed from any other cause but the devil, who, in order to divert us from all that is good, engages us in vain speculations, which neither inspire us with devotion towards GOD, nor charity towards our neighbour?

Unde hæc cæcitas mentis nisi à diabolo? qui ne utiliora, ne boniora, ne moribus, virtutibus, & saluti animarum conducuntur discamus, phantasias nostras illudit, & tra-hit ad res minus salubres, & ad gelidas harum inten-tionem speculationes quibus neque ad Deum devoti reddimus, neque ad proximi dilectionem inflammamur (10). This reflexion is very just, and sufficient to mortify not only the Realists and Nominalists, but also other factions.

(10) Ibid. pag.
333.

(11) Du Plessis, Mystère d'Iniquité, pag. 598.

(12) You will find the other propositions of that Doctor, in the Mystère d'Iniquité, pag.
598.

[F] What Coëffeteau offers in answer to this hath no manner of solidity. Du Plessis Mornai did not forget to say that (11) John de Wesalia, Doctor and preacher at Worms, was accused before the Inquisitors of having maintained the following propositions, viz. That the prelates had no authority to institute new laws in the Church, but to persuade the faithful to observe the Gospel precepts, &c (12).
Coëffeteau having in a different manner represented the opinions of this man, such, saith he (13), as the (13) Réponse au Protestants themselves relate them, exclaims thus (14),

These are the extravagancies of the Preacher of Worms, of which du Plessis hath left out those he found contrary, as well to his own, as the Catholic doctrine; namely the article of the proceeding of the holy Spirit from the person of the Son as well as the Father, which the Latin Church always hath asserted against the Greek. And it is certain that those whom du Plessis alledges, who supported him against the Thomists, owned that he erred in this article; and as to most of the other points, he denied that he had asserted some, and endeavoured to explain others. But afterwards he publicly recanted in the church-yard at Mentz, in presence of the Archbishop, and several eminent doctors of the universities of Mentz, Cologne, and Heidelberg; and, according to Trithemius, his books and writings were committed to the flames, and he in perpetual penance confined in an Augustinian monastery, where he died soon after. Thus it appears what the Saumur witnesses are. In the mean time the reader will remember, that the Protestant author, from whom we have cited the heads of his doctrine, hath couched them as he thought fit, in order to make them look less odious and more plausible. Trith-emius adds, that he asserted that there was not, nor ever had been any such thing as original sin, and that children were not conceived in original sin. He also recites the other articles quite differently from the Protestant, who hath perverted the Abbot of Urspers's chronicle, from whence those who furnished du Plessis with them, made their extracts. Rivetus replied in favour of du Plessis, that it is true that John de Wesalia agreed with the Greek Church on the article of the procession of the Holy Ghost (15); but that in his other propositions to the number of 23, he was taxed with the same errors with which the Protestants are charged, and this according to the enumeration, and relation not of Part. ii, pag. 631.

(15) Rivet, Remarques sur la Réponse au Mystère d'Iniquité,
part. ii, pag. 631.

(16) That it is by Orthonius Gratius. See what he saith of John de Wes-alia above, remark [4].

In general, Rivetus is in the right, for John de We-salia's propositions, cited by du Plessis, are in a book of Orthonius Gratius, a very good Papist; but he was in the wrong to charge Coëffeteau with pretending here that Orthonius was a Protestant. Coëffeteau did not cite the Fasciculus Rerum expetendarum, but only the continuator of the Abbot of Ursperg. It is at
pag. 1188, and 1189, that he says that the author of the Fasciculus Rerum expetendarum was a Protestant and a Lutheran. Rivetus had a great deal of reason to correct him here (17).

(17) Rivet, ibi
supra, pag. 611.

Observe, by the way, that the author of the Pri-guez légittimes contre le Papisme hath been censured for alleging the Abbot of Ursperg's continuator in evidence. He hath been told that it is very well known, that the publisher of that work was Cratomelius of Schlestad, one of Melancthon's disciples (18). I believe the censorer meant Crato Mylius, for that is the name of the Bookseller who published in the year 1537, the Abbot of Ursperg's Chronicle, corrected and continued by Gaspar Hedion, Minister of Strasbourg. See the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca (19), and the first tome of the Observations scliæ, printed at Hall in the year 1700 (20).

(18) Critique des Prijuques, pag.
236.

(19) de libris
Gasp. Hedion.

(20) At pag.
307.

WESSELUS

WESSELUS (JOHN) one of the most learned men of the XVth century, was born at Groningen about the year 1419 [A]; and having lost his father (a) and mother in his infancy, was educated by the care of a good lady, who having but one son caused him to study with him. She sent them both to Zwol, where there was a college, which was more esteemed than that of Groningen. It was a society of regular Priests of St Jerom, where youth were instructed. All those that were educated there were thaven like Priests and wore the religious habit; but when they quitted the college they were free to wear what habit they pleased. So that though Wesselus wore the cowl whilst he studied at Zwol, yet there is no reason to infer from thence that he was a Monk, since it is certain that he never engaged in a Monastical life [B]. It is indeed true, that early in his youth he had some thoughts which tended that way, but he refrained them as soon as he perceived that sort of life charged with some shocking superstitions, and at last the inclination wore off. As his great natural parts were attended with an incredible application to study, he made a considerable progress in learning at Zwol, and even publicly instructed others there. He left that city in order to continue his studies at Cologne, where he improved to such a degree of learning, as not only rendered him highly admired, but suspected of Heterodoxy. He consulted the originals, and there found matter for difficulties and arguments which puzzled and surprized his masters. He was by no means satisfied with their answers, that Aristotle, St Thomas, and the Seraphic Doctor, &c. had said this or that (b); and because he applied himself much to the study of the Platonic Philosophy, he thereby fell into a contempt of that of Aristotle, which rendered him very disagreeable to the Scholastic Professors. He frequently crossed the Rhine, to go to the monastery of Duytz (c) in order to read the works of the Abbot Rupert, of whom he was a great admirer. He was advised to go to Heidelberg, to read Divinity lectures there, and followed that advice; but the directors of the university alledged that he was unqualified for the Divinity Professor's chair, because he was not yet promoted to the degree of Doctor [C]; and when he requested to be so, he was answered that the canons did not allow the admission of Laymen to that degree. So that being resolved against the taking of orders, he contented himself

(a) He was a Baker.

(b) See the remark [D], citation (12).

(c) Situated over against Cologne. Rupert, who is called Abbot Tuitensis, was Abbot of that monastery.

[A] He was born at Groningen about the year 1419.]

(1) At Hardenbergius, Seckendorf, Altingius, &c. See Seckendorf's History of Lutheranism, lib. i, pag. 226.

(2) Vita Wesseli, in Libro cui Titulus Effigies & Vitæ Professorum Academiæ Groningæ: Omlandæ, pag. 12, 13, & 24.

(3) Ibid. pag. 24.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

Others place his birth about the year 1400 (1): but it is probable that they are mistaken, since two authors of Friesland say that he died in 1489, at seventy years of age (2). If we believe Geldenhaur, he lived above ninety years, and his sight remained so good to the last, that he never made use of spectacles either to write or read: Geldenbaurius nonagessimum eum annum superasse narrat, integro visu & auditu, ita ut nunquam specillis usus sit, minutissimasque literas & commode legeret, & pulchre ipse pingeret (3). Hardenbergius doth not confirm this, but on the contrary saith, that Wesselus, having never had good eyes, they grew so weak in his old age, that the continual blunders occasioned by his bad sight, in reading the Scripture before the Monks, rendered him the jest of his auditors. At quod ad visum, Hardenbergius luscitiosum eum fuisse, & senio quoque caligare oculos capisse tradit, ut cum semper die Cæne Dominice in Cætu Fratrum vesperi pro collatione, ut illi vocant, legeret sermonem Domini in Cænâ habitum à cap. Job. 13 usque ad 18. frequenter à textu aberrans à Monachis rideretur (4). As for the age attributed to him by Geldenhaur, it is thus refuted: 'Quod verò ad ætatem, Suffridus Petri & Regnerus Prædinius, quibus ut Frisius & in Urbe hac versatis rectius constare potuit, unde septuaginta annos vixisse affirmant, natum 1419, mortuum 1489' (5). - - - As for his age, Suffridus Petri and Regnerus Prædinius, who were natives of Friesland, and lived in this city, had an opportunity of knowing it much better. Now they affirm that he lived seventy years, being born in the year 1419, and dying in 1489. The registers of the church where Wesselus was buried express the year of his death, but not that of his age: which if they had mentioned we should have been more certain of Geldenhaur's, or Suffridus's error. 'Sepultus Groningæ, in Monasterio, quod Spirituum Virginum dicitur, in ipso templi choro, non longè à summo altari. In libro memoriali templi illius hæc leguntur: Anno Domini 1489 obiit Venerabilis Magister Wesselus Hermanni, egregius Doctor Sacre Theologiæ, & in Latinâ, & Græcâ, & Hebræâ linguis multum eruditus, & in tota Philosophia quasi universalis' (6). - - - He was buried at Groningen in the convent which is called the Convent of the Spiritual Virgins, in the choir of the church, not far from the great altar. In the registers of that church we find the following words: In the year of our Lord 1489, died the venerable Master Wesselus Hermanni; an excellent Divine, very well versed in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew tongues, and in a manner

'thoroughly acquainted with all the parts of Philosophy.'

[B] It is certain that he never engaged in a monastical life. This is affirmed, and frequently repeated in the tract from whence I have taken this article:

'Cucullum monasticum five Franciscanorum five alius ordinis nunquam induit. . . Rogatus quare non saltem primam tonsuram adsumeret? dixit se non metuere patibulum quanto quidem tempore mentis maneret compos' (7). - - - It is certain that he never put 'on the cowl of the Franciscan, nor of any other order.'

'... Being asked why he did not at least take the first tonsure, he replied that he did not fear the gallows so long as he kept in his right wits.' Nay, we are there assured that he constantly resisted the importunities of the General of the Franciscans, who pressed him to assume the habit of that order: 'Is cum esset eruditus & eruditorum fautor, ad se attraxit Wesselum, cum ut in disputationibus, quarum avidissimus erat, & quotidiano exercitio ejus opera uteretur; tum verò ut sui ordinis monachum eum postea faceret; à quo tamen Wesselus abhorrebat. Sed usus presenti fortunâ in familiam se ipsius dedit' (8). - - - As he was a learned man himself, and a favourer of the learned, he took Wesselus into his house, that he might use his assistance in disputes, of which he was extremely fond, and in his daily studies; and likewise that he might afterwards make him a Monk of his order. Wesselus had an aversion to that: but, embracing the favourable opportunity, he was glad to be admitted into his family. Notwithstanding this a learned man pretends, that Wesselus was a Franciscan, in the following words. Wherefore Lewis XI commanded Job

Boucart, Bishop of Avranches, to take care of this reform; he being assisted by a Franciscan, whose name was Wesselus Gransfortius of Groningen, who by his voyages in the Levant, had acquired a perfect acquaintance with Aristotle, and all the good Greek authors in each science, assembled all the principal heads and members of the university, and, with their concurrence and good advice, drew up and published an edit against the Nominalists, which we shall insert entire at the end of this chapter, as a monument not yet printed, very much to the honour of our Lewis XI (9).

[C] Because he was not yet promoted to the degree of Doctor. This objection furnishes us with an invincible argument to confute some writers, who have said, that our Wesselus acquired such a treasure of erudition in the university of Cologne, that he was made Doctor of Divinity, Law, and Phisic, there. Geldenbaurius refert magno & assiduo & vix credibili labore hoc eum adsecutum

(7) Ibid. pag. 13, 14.

(8) Ibid. pag. 17.

(9) Naudé, in his additions to the History of Lewis XI, pag. 193.

himself with reading Philosophical lectures : after which he returned to Cologn, from whence he went to Louvain, and having spent some time in hearing the lectures of the Theological Professors there, he went to Paris. The Philosophical controversies being then very hot betwixt the Realists, Formalists, and Nominalists; he endeavoured to convert the principal champions of the Formalists, by bringing them over to the sect of the Realists; and afterwards, he himself went over to the Formalists, and not finding that sect more in the right than the other, he embraced the opinions of the Nominalists. Some authors say, that he travelled to Greece and the Levant [D], the better to learn the Greek and Hebrew languages. However that be, the reputation which he acquired, procured him the particular esteem of Francis della Rovere, General of the Minor Fryers. He adhered to him, and if he was thereby obliged to see several blamable actions, amongst tum esse, ut non solum Theologicæ Majestatis lauream mereretur, sed etiam Jureconsultis & Medicis Doctoribus annumeraretur: adeoque summus in omnibus Facultatibus titulus fuit ornatus; ut vulgo quidem perhibetur. Mihi tamen vix verisimile videtur. Si enim jam tum triplici laurea insignitus fuisset Wesselus, quæ ratio fuerit, quod postea admittitur non fuerit ab Heidelbergensibus, nullam aliam ob causam, quam quod titulo Doctoris destitueretur. Pro exaggeranda ergo Wesseli viri incomparabilis eruditione hanc de tribus titulis fabulam, & plura alia, jactatam jam olim fuisse credo (10).

(10) Vita Wesseli, pag. 14.

[D] That he travelled into Greece and the Levant.] We have seen above that Naudæus affirms it. Others pretend that the name of Basilus, given him by several authors, was bestowed upon him by Bessarion. They tell us that Bessarion having been acquainted with our Wesselus in Greece, at first by changing the U into B called him Basilus, and afterwards Basilus. The author already cited rejects these traditions, and doubts whether Wesselus ever was in Greece. His words are: 'Hardenbergius pro Wesselo Basilium dictum ait, quod elegantiorum hominum auribus Wesseli nomen nimis durum & veluti barbarum videretur: vel quod alterum quodammodo Basilium magnum judicarent; vel quod Bessarion Cardinalis Græcus, quo ibi amicissimo usus, suum B per nostrum B quam V exprimeret maluerit, atque pro Wesselo Basilium, ac mox Basilium coeperit vocare. Quamvis vix videatur verisimile aut in Græcia unquam fuisse Wesselum, aut in ea familiariter usum fuisse Bessarione: cum enim hic teste Jovio jam anno 1434 in Italia vixerit, atque anno 1439 ab Eugenio Papa creatus sit Cardinalis, debuerit Wesselus ante annum xv ætatis in Græciam ad Bessarionem abiisse: quod à vero abhorret (11). - - - Hardenbergius says, that he was called Basilus instead of Wesselus, because this latter name seemed too harsh, and in a manner barbarous to polite ears; or because they looked upon him to be in some sort another great Basilus; or because the Greek Cardinal Bessarion, who treated him with great friendship there, rather chose to express his country B by our B than V, and so instead of Wesselus, began to call him Basilus, and presently after Basilus. But after all, it neither seems probable that Wesselus was ever in Greece, nor that he contracted a friendship with Bessarion there; for since, according to Jovius, the latter lived in Italy as early as the year 1434, and was made a Cardinal by Pope Eugenius in 1439, it follows that Wesselus must have gone to Bessarion in Greece before he was fifteen years of age; which is utterly false.' A little farther he brings in Wesselus boasting of his travels in Greece. 'In disputationibus Theologicis magnos titulos Doctorum contemnebat, solis Divinis literis firmiter adherens. Quare siquis forte inter disputandum, ut fieri solet, ei objiceret, hoc dicit Doctor Sanctus; hoc Seraphicus &c. ipse respondere solebat; Thomas fuit Doctor, quid tum postea? Et ego Doctor sum. Thomas vix latine intellexit, & unilinguis fuit. Ego trium principalium linguarum mediocrem peritiam assecutus sum. Thomas vix umbram Aristotelicam vidit: Ego Aristotelem Græcum IN IPSA GRÆCIA DIDICI (12). - - - In Theological disputes he despised the great titles of Doctors, strictly adhering to the holy scriptures alone. Wherefore if any one in a disputation objected to him as it usually happens. This, saith the holy Doctor, this the Seraphical Doctor, &c. he generally made answer; Thomas was a Doctor, what then? I also am a Doctor. Thomas scarce understood Latin, and but one learned language; whereas I have acquired a tolerable knowledge in the three principal tongues.

(12) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.

'Thomas scarce saw the shadow of Aristotle; whereas I IN GREECE IT SELF HAVE STUDIED Aristotle in his original Greek.' But in the same page looks upon this voyage as a fiction: 'Postea in Græciam abiisse creditur; at si quis cogitet eo tempore non solum literas in Græcia jacuisse, sed totam quæ regionem bello arsisse, & hoc conficium fuisse cognoscet. Ita de Petro de Aliaco quoque relatum est, quod Græcè exactè sciret, per decennium in Græcia vixisse; quamvis certum sit nunquam Itali excessisse (13). - - - It is thought that he went into Greece afterwards; but if any one consider that not only learning was then at a low pass in Greece, but likewise that the whole country was engaged in a bloody war, he will know that this is also a fiction. In the same manner was it reported of Peter de Aliaco that he was a great master of the Greek tongue, and lived ten years in Greece; whereas it is certain that he never went out of Italy.' Let us also see what he observes on Wesselus's answer to a scholar, who put a question to him: Stay till I return from Egypt a second time, then your difficulty shall be solved. My author imagines that by Egypt he mystically meant Rome. 'In Ægyptum quoque profectus creditur Wesselus noster, persuasus omnes libros Solomonis, & totam illam gloriosam Bibliothecam Judæorum ibi adhuc servari: sed reverius solebat dicere; frustra perfectionem ab solvi. Judæi enim totam bibliothecam suam perdere maluerunt, quam legere quod confiteri videretur. Quamvis ego ratione habitâ belli, quo eo tempore totus Oriens flagrabat, existimarim Wesselum nunquam perfectionem in Ægyptum instituisse, sed intellexisse Ægyptum mysticam, five Romanam, juxta stylum Sp. Sancti, atque Cantero significare voluisse, se nunquam Romam reditum esse. Joannes Canterus, quem ipse instituerat, & præter alia artem Raimundi Lullii eum docuerat, aliquando curiosiorem questionem ei proposuit: ad quem Wesselus: Expecta donec secundo ex Ægypto rediero: tunc respondebo tibi; deridens curiositatem Canteri (14). - - - It is likewise believed that our Wesselus went into Egypt, being persuaded that all the books of Solomon, and the glorious library of the Jews there were still preserved entire. But he used to say after his return; that his journey had been undertaken to no purpose: for that the Jews had rather chosen to destroy their whole library, than read what they were unwilling to confess. Nevertheless, considering the war which at that time raged over the whole East, I am apt to think that Wesselus never undertook a journey to Egypt, but that he meant the Mystical or Roman Egypt, according to the stile of the Holy Ghost, and only intimated to Canterus that he never would return to Rome. John Canterus, his disciple, whom besides other things he had taught the art of Raymond Lullius, died, at a certain time, propose a question to him of somewhat too curious a nature; upon which Wesselus said: Stay till I return from Egypt a second time, and then I will answer you; thereby ridiculing the curiosity of Canterus.' All this shews that the life of Wesselus is little known, and that several falsities are reported concerning this illustrious man. A Modern author assures us that Wesselus went to the river Euphrates on purpose to see Ezekiel's tomb, and the antient library of the Jews; an evident sign of the contagious evil which perpetuates falsities. Let us hear this Modern (15): 'Though Rabbi Benjamin maintains, that the Prophet Ezekiel's tomb on the river Euphrates, and the library of the first and second temple were to be seen in his time; nevertheless, the Sieur Wesselus of Groningen, and many other great men, who went to that country on purpose to see that tomb, and that library,

(13) Ibid. pag. 15.

(14) Ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(15) Gallie Traité des plus belles Bibliothèques, pag. 14, 15, Paris Ed. 1700. See also Lamoignon, Bibliothèque, pag. 14, Ed. 1700.

amongst other motives he was induced to it by the hopes of going to Basil at the time of the Council [E], where he did not doubt but his master would be present. His hopes were not vain, for he saw that council, and made himself known to the learned men; he was also consulted, and admired in some public disputes. He returned to Paris with Francis della Rovere, his patron, and some authors say he was persecuted there and even banished [F]. His Mæcenas being elected Pope under the name of Sixtus IV, continued his favour to him, and offered him all sorts of preferments; but he only asked a copy of the Bible in Hebrew and Greek, which he obtained [G]. He left Rome and returned into library, have unanimously reported, that it was a dream of the Rabbins, and that neither of them were to be found. I went thither in vain, says the Sieur Wessél (16), since the Jews have rather chosen to lose all their books, than to read what they will not confess.

(16) This word Sieur, shews that the author was very ill acquainted with our Wessélus.

[E] By the hopes of going to Basil at the time of the Council. The author whom I have abridged in the text of this article, ought to be censured here. He saith that Wessélus having intrigued for the Formalists in their disputes with the Realists and Nominalists, at last sided with the Nominalists. These things happened, continues he, at the time of the Council of Basil, when Wessélus was already become a domestic to Pope Nicolas V, by the recommendation of Francis della Rovere, General of the Franciscans, who was afterwards Sixtus IV, and who founded the Vatican Library. 'Erant hæc sub id tempus, quo Concilium Basiliense celebrabatur. Ipse autem jam pervenerat propter celeberrimam famam & incredibilem eruditionem in omni genere disciplinarum & artium in familiam Nicolai V, Pontificis Maximi, operâ Francisci à Ruvere, Generalis ministri Fratrum Minorum, qui postea Papa creatus Sixtus IV vocatus est, primusque fundamenta jecit celebratissimæ illius Bibliothecæ, quæ à loco vulgo Vaticana vocatur . . . (17)

(17) What is wanting here is to be found above in citation (8).

. . . in qua (familia Fr. à Ruvere) multa digna & indigna, quædam etiam pia, sed pleraque impia vidit & expertus est. Obduri tamen, ut per illum in notitiam omnium doctorum Virorum magis magnificæ perveniret, & liberis sine periculo disputare posset, simulque nancisci liberam occasionem admonendi hominis de vitandis idololatriæ superstitionibus & apertis obsecrationibus monasticis; maxime verò, ut via aperiretur, quâ pervenire posset in Synodum Basiliensem, in quam sciebat Franciscum, utpote totius Ordinis Supremum, vocatum iri, quod & contigit. Nam paulo post eo profectus est, & operâ Domini sui in Doctissimi cujusque notitiam pervenit, & ad multa consilia adhibitus est, & publicè aliquoties auditus disputare cum summa omnium admiratione (18). . . . These things happened at the time that the Council of Basil was held. Wessélus, on account of his great reputation and incredible learning in all the different arts and sciences, was already in Pope Nicolas V's family, by the recommendation of Francis della Rovere, General of the minor Friars, who was afterwards created Pope, under the name of Sixtus IV, and was the first who laid the foundation of that most famous library, which, from the place, is commonly called the Vatican . . . In which family (of Francis della Rovere) he was an eye-witness to many good and many bad actions, to some piety, but to a great deal of wickedness. Notwithstanding he continued there, that by his means he might become more and more acquainted with all the learned men, and be more at liberty to dispute without running any risque, and at the same time have opportunities of freely admonishing his patron to shun the idolatrous superstitions and public obsecrations of the Friars; but, above all, that he might find means to go to the Council of Basil, in which he knew that Francis, as General of the whole order, would assist.

(18) Vita Wessélus, pag. 17.

The thing fell out as he desired: for in a short time after he went thither, and by the recommendation of his master became acquainted with the most learned men, he was often consulted, and sometimes heard to dispute with universal applause. There are several mistakes in these words. I. The Council of Basil began in the year 1431, and ended, properly speaking, in 1443: and therefore since the author, whom I am censuring, supposes 1419 to be the year of Wessélus's birth, he cannot, with any colour of reason say, that this Doctor was very much admired at Basil during the session of that Council. Observe, that according to him, Wessélus's journey to Basil was posterior to his long residence at Cologne, to his journey to Heidelberg, to his return to Cologne, to his journey to Louvain, as well as to Paris, to all his intrigues in favour of the Formalists against the Realists, and lastly to his adhering to the sect of the Nominalists. If you suppose that our Wessélus was not at Basil before the last year of the Council, it were still true that he had done what I have just now mentioned before the age of twenty-four years; which cannot be said without a great absurdity, and nothing can be more false. II. Nicolas V was not elected Pope before the year 1447, and consequently was not in the Pontifical chair, during the session of the Council of Basil. That Pope is said to be the founder of the Vatican Library (19). It is true, that others ascribe that glory to Sixtus IV. Both may be in the right in several respects, therefore I do not charge what our author says on that head as a fault. III. It is false that Francis della Rovere sat in the Council of Basil as General of the Franciscans. He was born in the year 1414. He run through his course of study by the age of twenty-two, and taught afterwards publicly for several years before he was made assistant to the General of his order, who was succeeded by three Generals before Francis della Rovere attained that dignity (20). Hence it plainly appears that it is impossible he should have been possessed of that post during the session of the Council of Basil, the conclusion of which happened in the year 1441, or, as others will have it, in 1443.

VOL. V. No. CXXXIV.

[F] Some say that he was persecuted at Paris, and even banished. This particular is very uncertain: Hardenbergius declares that he never heard it mentioned by any of those who had been acquainted with Wessélus. 'Cum Domino suo Francisco, Generali ministro, reversus est Lutetiam ubi multa expertus est, multa etiam passus, ita ut quidam scribant, illum Scholâ aut Urbe pulsam esse propter reprehensas superstitiones: quod tamen Hardenburgius à nemine unquam sibi auditum eorum ait, qui cum illo domesticè versati sunt. Et certum est, illum plus minus sedecim annos Parisiis versatum esse, & cum Domino suo, jam in Papam electo, unâ Romam profectum. Unde non videtur verisimile, Papam & eundem Monachum & quidem Minoritarum monachum, passurum eum fuisse, si à Schola Theologica Parisiensis proscriptus fuisset antea. Fieri potuit, quod postea illuc reversus pulsus sit (21). . . . He returned with his master Francis, General of the Friars minor, to Paris, where he suffered several hardships. Some even say that he was banished the school or city, for having censured certain superstitions. But Hardenburgius declares that he never heard it mentioned by any of those who most frequented his house. Certain it is that he lived sixteen years at Paris, and went to Rome with his master upon his being chosen Pope: whence it does not seem probable that a Pope, who had been not only a Friar, but a Friar minor, would have suffered him, if it had been true, that was banished from the Divinity-school at Paris before. Possibly such a thing may have happened to him after his return. Observe, that the edict of Lewis XI against the Nominalists is dated on the first of March 1473 (22). Wherefore if it was true that Wessélus had been assistant to John Bouchart, Bishop of Avranches in the preliminaries of that edict (23), he would have been a very considerable man in France, even during the Papacy of Sixtus IV.

[G] He only asked a copy of the Bible. . . which he obtained. The Pope thought this was a very silly request; Why do not you rather ask a miter, or something like it, said he? Because I have no need of any such thing, answered Wessélus. He chose the good part, but he exposed himself to the ralleries of the worldlings. Respondit Sixtus; Hæc nobis curæ erunt, tu pro te aliquid pete. Rogo ergo, inquit Wessélus, ut mihi detis ex Bibliotheca Vaticana Græcâ & Hebræa Biblia. Ea, inquit Sixtus, tibi dabuntur: Sed tu stulte, quare non petis Episcopatum aliquem aut simile quiddam? Respondit Wessélus, quia iii non indigeo. Hæc ipsa Hebræa Biblia

(19) See Patris Jacob, Traité des Bibliothèques, pag. 84. Lomier, de Bibliothecis, pag. 194, & seq.

(20) Taken from a manuscript Memoir imparted by a person, whom I caused to be consulted.

(21) Vita Wessélus, inter Vitas Profess. Oronings, pag. 17.

(22) See Naudé, ubi supra, pag. 223.

(23) See Naudé's words in the remark [B].

into his native country, where he got the affection and esteem of all men. He died at Groningen on the fourth of October 1489. He was perplexed with some doubts concerning the Christian religion during his last sickness, but at length they entirely vanished away (d) [H]. It is beyond question that his opinions were in several particulars contrary to those of Rome [I]; and he has been justly called Luther's fore-runner, I must not forget in this place that he is cited under different names [K]. Part of his writings

(d) Taken from his Life among those of the Professors of Groningen, pag. 12, & seq.

(24) Vita Wesseli, ubi supra, pag. 18. This is mentioned as a thing which Wesseli had frequently related.

(25) Valer. Andria, Bibl. Belg. pag. 349.

Biblia diu beserunt Groningæ, apud virgines Spirituales, eorumque adhuc bodie quedam fragmina supersunt (24). Others say that it was Nicolas V, of whom he asked this present. 'Tantò eum promovendarum litterarum Hebraicarum studio flagrasse accepimus, ut, cùm Romam profectus Nicolao Pontifici gratissimus esset, et ique amplissima Wesselo munera offerret, his omnibus repudiatis unicum modò petierit & obtinuerit, Biblia Hebræa MSS. sibi ut liceret à Bibliotheca Vaticana in Belgium asportare (25). -- He had such a prodigious desire to promote the Hebrew tongue, as we have been informed, that when he went to Rome, and was in high favour with Pope Nicholas, who offered him very considerable presents, he refused every thing else, and only begged that he might be allowed to carry from the Vatican Library to Holland, a manuscript of the Hebrew Bible, which he obtained.'

(26) Vita Wesseli, ubi supra, pag. 24.

[E] He was perplexed with some doubts concerning the Christian religion . . . but at length they entirely vanished. Doubts of this kind more rarely occur in a death-bed than in the vigour of youth. Wherefore for the rarity of the thing I shall set down the whole narrative. Illapsum in morbum, qui etiam vitæ ipsi finem attulit, cum amicis quidam inviseret, utque valeret interrogaret: Respondit, se pro sua ætate & morbi molestia utcumque valere; sed unum admodum molestum sibi esse, quod variis cogitationibus & argumentationibus circumactis de veritate Christianæ religionis subdubitare inciperet. Obstupescerebat ille, ac hortari ægrum cepit, ut omnes cogitationes suas in Christum Servatorem unicum rejiceret. Sed cùm hujusmodi admonitionem ei molestiorem esse sensisset, tristis tunc abiit. Atque post unam vel alteram horam reversum ad se cùm Wesselus vidisset, alacri animo, & quantum valetudo linebat exultans dixit: Gratias ago Deo, omnes illæ vanæ disputationes abierunt: & nihil scio, nisi Jesum & hunc crucifixum. Et in hac confessione animam Deo reddidit (26). -- In his last sickness, when a friend, who came to see him, asked him how he did, he answered, That considering his age, and the nature of his illness, he was pretty well; but that one thing gave him great uneasiness; which was, that being perplexed with various reflexions and reasonings, he began to call in question the truth of the Christian religion. His friend was astonished at this, and exhorted him to turn all his thoughts towards the only Saviour JESUS CHRIST. But when he found that such an admonition displeased him, he went away with concern. About two hours after, when Wesselus saw that he was come back, he said, with a cheerful mind, and with as much joy as his weak condition would suffer him to express; I thank God that all my vain doubts are vanished: and now I know nothing but CHRIST, and him crucified; and, with this confession, he expired.

[I] His opinions were contrary to those of Rome. See the Catalogus Testium Veritatis, and consult also le Mystere d'Iniquité, where you will find these words: 'At the same time, tho' somewhat younger, lived Dr Wesselus of Groningen, called the light of their world, who in one of his letters discovers, that after the Inquisitors had condemned John de Wessalia, he expected they should fall upon him, and faith, that at Paris and Rome, he defended his opinions against several articles of the Church of Rome; and that some even of the court had approved of them: and it is plainly to be collected from his writings, that they were very little different from the confession of the Vaudois. Likewise in his book concerning Subjects and Superiors, he asserts that the Pope may err, and that when he doth so he ought to be resisted; that by his Simony and ill administration, he clearly enough discovers that he neither regards God, nor the salvation of his church; that his commands are no farther obligatory than they are consistent with the word of God; that his excommunications are less to be feared than those of any good and learned men: whence it was that the Council of Constance regarded John Gerson more than John XXIII; and good men long before that regarded St Bernard more than Pope Eugenius. His works are severally printed at Leipzig, Antwerp, and Basil, (27). It is observed in his life that he had been overwhelmed by the tempest which bore down John de Wessalia, in the year 1479, if David of Burgundy, Bishop of Utrecht, his good patron, had not supported him. Quibus (fratribus prædicatorii ordinis hæreticæ pravitatis inquisitoribus) non minus quam cœvus & amicus Joannes Wessaliensis jam anno 1479, succubisset, nisi Episcopi Ultrajectini Davidis de Burgundia (cui non quidem Medicus erat Wesselus, ut multi perperam tradiderunt, sed dilectus Client) autoritas eum protexisset (28). To all these may be added the words of Luther, which I have cited in the article of SIXTUS IV (29), and Mr Sekendorf's extracts of Wesselus's works (30).

[K] He is cited under different names. In the collection of the Groningen Professors, his life begins thus: 'Wesselus Groningensis . . . diversis aliis & nominibus insignitus, & elogiis celebratus. In Chronici Urspergensis Paralipomenis Magister Joannes Wesselus Groningensis nominatur. In libro memoriali templi Groningani quo sepultus Wesselus Hermannii, Pelantino (qui ad annos plures fuit Archidiaconi Davidis Burgundi Episcopi Ultrajectini) Wesselus Gofvoert, Alberto Hardenbergio Gofvoert, Geldenhausio Gansfortius vocatur. Rodolphus Agricola in epistolis ad Reuchlinum, aliquæ, Basilium vel Basilium Phrisium eum indignant. Quorum appellationum diversitas, Friscorum nomen non ignoro, & facile agnoscitur, quo fonte promanarit. Nempè Joannis nomen ei proprium ex sacro Baptismate videtur, Hermannii à patris, Wesseli ab avi nominibus additum, quod postremum in Græcia, (ut vulgo creditur) aut potius supra seculum Græcorum lingua imbutus, ad ejus sonum vel ipse inflexit, vel detortum ab aliis admittit, ut Basilium diceretur (31). . . . Gofvoerti autem seu Gofvoerti, aut Gansfortii cognomen, dialecto illud Westphalicâ, hoc Germanicâ anserum vadum sonans (Westphalis enim Goos vel Goes est, quæ Germanis olim teste Plinio 10. 22. hodieque Gansfa) suspicari liceat inde ei obvenisse, quod majores fortè ex vicina Westphalia (ut multæ aliæ honestæ hujus Urbis familiæ) huc commigrassent, quum illud nomen villæ non procul Harena, hodieque maneat. Cæteræ appellationes Patriam testentur. . . . Wesselus of Groningen . . . had several names given him, and various encomiums. In the Paralipomena of the chronicle of Ursperg, he is called John Wesselus of Groningen. In the register of that church, where he lies buried, he is named Wesselus Hermannii. By Pelantinus (who was for several years Physician to David of Burgundy, Bishop of Utrecht) he is called Wesselus Gofvoert, Gofvoert, by Albertus Hardenbergius, and Gansfortius by Geldenbarius. Rodolphus Agricola, in his letter to Reuchlinus, and other authors, call him Basilium, or Basilium Phrisius. Such persons as are not unacquainted with the Frisland names will readily perceive whence these different appellations proceed. John was his christian name. He was called Hermannii after his father, and Wesselus after his grandfather. This last name was changed into that of Basilium when he was in Greece, (as it is commonly believed) or rather because he was an extraordinary master of that language, he was willing his name should have a Greek sound; for which reason he either made that alteration himself, or allowed of it when made by others. . . . As for the surname Gofvoert or Gofsefort, and the surname Gansfortius, the one is the Westphalian, and the other in the German dialect, signifying the ford of the Geese, (for the Westphalians call Goos or Goes what the Germans of old, according to Pliny 10. 2. and even to this day, call Gans) they were probably owing to this, that his forefathers came hither from the neighbouring Westphalia (as many other honest families of this city have done); and where there is a village near Harena, which still retains that name. His other appellations denote his country.'

[L] Part

writings are lost [L].

[L] Part of the writings are lost. He made a great many collections out of the works of the Abbot Rupert, and of several others, to which he added his own reflections. These rhapsodies swelled to such an unwieldy bulk under his pen, that he called them Mars magnus, -- the great Sea. Several of them were preserved in the monastery of mount Saint Agnes, but the sending of the manuscript to some learned men of Holland and Zealand, occasioned the entire loss of it (32). After the death of Wesselus the Monks and some other persons burnt all the manuscripts which they found in his closet (33). Whatever escaped the flames was printed at Groningen in the year 1614, and at Amsterdam in 1617 (34). Valerius Andreas quotes these two editions, but instead of telling us that the first was at Groningen, he saith it was at Arnheim

(35). But possibly he might find Arnhemii in the title of his copy without the book being ever printed there, by reason it is customary amongst Bookellers to allow a correspondent, who buys of them a certain number of copies, to insert his name in the title-page as well as he who printed them. It is probable that the Groningen Bookeller allowed that of Arnheim this liberty. This custom very frequently imposes on the Bibliographers, and occasions their unnecessary multiplication of editions.

I ought not to forget that several tracts of our Wesselus appeared in print before the complete edition of his works, in the year 1614. Some were published at Leipzig in 1522, with the title of Farrago Rerum Theologicarum, and a Preface by Martin Luther. It was reprinted at Basil in 1523, by Adam Petri, &c.

(35) Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 849.

WESTPHALUS (JOHN) an imaginary person, who Moreri tells us was so named because born in Westphalia. He adds, that he was a Lutheran Heretic, 'who about the year 1533, began to preach abominable errors; particularly that the Scripture doth not say that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son; that the Church hath erred, and several other impostures worthy of Hell, from whence they proceeded.' He cites Prateolus v. West. Gaultier in Chron. But we shall prove all this to be chimerical [A]. Not but that there was one JOHN DE WESTPHALIA; but he was a Printer, who settled at Louvain in the year 1475 [B].

[A] We shall prove all this to be chimerical. I cannot accuse Moreri of having cited Prateolus falsely; for that writer doth indeed affirm (1) that John Westphalus, seu de Westphalia superiore, a German, and a Doctor of Divinity, was very much infected with the Heresy of Martin Luther, and that his books were burnt at Mentz in the time of Charles VI and of Pope Clement VII, about the year 1533. He mentions seventeen erroneous tenets of the same man, and then concludes with these words: 'Hi ergo sunt articuli, qui (autore Bernardo de Luxemburgo sacrarum literarum professore, Ordinis Prædicatorii, in suo Catalogo hæreticorum) per fratrem Gerardum de Elthen inquisitorem fidei, & patrem Jacobum Sprenger, doctores itidem sacre pagine, ejusdem Ordinis Prædicatorii, conventus Colonienfis, ex Joannis de Westphalia libris excerpti sunt. -- These are therefore the articles which (according to Bernard of Luxemburg, professor of Divinity, and of the order of the Dominicans, in his catalogue of Heretics) were extracted from John Westphalus's books, by Friar Gerard of Elthen, Inquisitor of the Faith, and Father James Sprenger, likewise Doctors of Divinity, and of the same order of Dominicans in the convent of Cologne.' He directs us to the book whence he had this; which is the catalogue of Heretics, compiled by brother Bernard of Luxemburg, a Dominican Monk. Upon consulting this catalogue I found that Prateolus hath changed Joannes de Westphalia, into Joannes de Westphalia; for it is to Joannes de Westphalia superiore (2), that Bernard of Luxemburg ascribes the seventeen Heresies which Prateolus charges on Joannes Westphalus, seu de Westphalia superiore. I cannot apprehend what ground Prateolus, or those who have copied him, had for so many alterations as they have made in names and times. The Dominican Monk observes, that John de Westphalia's books were burnt at Mentz during the reign of the Emperor Frederic III (3), and mentions this fact six years at least before the year 1533 (4).

(1) In Catalogo Heret. voce Joannes Westphalus, p. m. 236.

(2) This shews that he was born at West, between Coblenz and Mentz, and not at West in the Duchy of Cleves.

(3) Joannes de Westphalia superiore, Doctor Theologie prædicatoris in diversis locis, Bohemis communis condemnatus fuit, & ejus libri combusti fuerunt Moguntie sub Frederico Imperatore tertio. Bernardus Luxemburgensis, in Catal. Hereticorum.

(4) I express myself thus, because I have only seen the third edition of his book, which is that of the year 1547. I believe he speaks of John de Westphalia in the foregoing editions; but I am not sure of it.

(5) In Tabula Chronographica, pag. m. 757.

that he found it no where. Prateolus groundlessly believed that Westphalia was divided into higher and lower. For the rest, we ought not to be surprized that Moreri fell into this snare, since Theophilus Raynaud, though a man of so much reading, also fell into it before him. He tells us on the authority of Prateolus, that John Westphalus, the Lutheran, was the only person that ever doubted that JESUS CHRIST was nailed to the Cross. De hac (clavifigione) nemo dubitavit, præter unum quendam baud dubie cum ea effutiret, bilarierem, à Lutheri caula, Joannem Westphalum, ut ex eo refert Prateolus eo verbo artic. damnato 17 (6). In which words are two faults: 1. John Westphalus is an imaginary person. 2. Suppose that he really had existed, and been a Lutheran, he would not have been either the only or the first man who raised this doubt; for it was one of the things objected against John de Westphalia, in his prosecution for Heresy in the year 1479. 'Item prædicavit publice in Ser. de passione Christi, crucifixum eum, & quis scit an funiculis ipsum alligaverunt, aut clavis crucifixum. -- He likewise started this doubt in a sermon which he preached publicly upon the passion of Christ, they crucified him, who knows whether they fastened him with cords, or nailed him to the cross?' They are Bernard of Luxemburg's words (7); and in the Examen Magistrale Doctoris Joannis de Westphalia, inserted in the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum of Orthuinus Gratius, we find the following words: 'Vicesimo quinto (interrogatus) an prædicavit publice populo dubium esse an Christus fuisset funibus Cruci alligatus, aut clavis affixus. Fatetur se dixisse, quod non habetur in Evangelio passionis an clavis sit affixus, an funibus: Credit tamen quod clavis (8). -- In the twenty-fifth place, being asked if he had affirmed in a public sermon that it was doubtful whether Christ was fastened to the cross with cords or with nails; he confesses that he said there was no mention made in the Gospels whether he was fastened with nails or cords, but he believes it was with nails.'

(6) Theoph. Raynaud de Stigmat. §. i, cap. v, pag. m. 108.

(7) In Catalogo Hereticorum.

(8) Fascic. rerum expetendarum & fugiendarum. p. 330.

(9) Naudé, Adiciones to the History of Lewis XI, pag. 309.

(10) Revius, Histor. Daven- triens. pag. 144.

[B] A Printer who settled at Louvain in the year 1475. Let us examine these words of Gabriel Naudé: the first that I know of, who printed in the Low-Countries was Joannes de Westphalia, who settled at Louvain in the year 1475, and began the exercise of this art on Aristotle's Ethics (9). Revius's History of Deventer is not sufficient to confute this; for though we find there that Richard Pafroed, or Pafraed, a native of Cologne, and Printer at Deventer, published there the Doctrinale alium, seu liber parabolarum Alani metricè descriptus in the year 1449 (10), one cannot believe it, considering that this book is the twelfth in Revius's catalogue of the books printed by Pafroed. The two first are without any date: the third is dated in the year 1477, the fourth, which is the Golden Legend, in 1479, and the following to the eleventh are dated from 1480 to 1494. How then is it probable that the twelfth should be of the year 1449? It is doubtless a typographical error.

WESTPHALUS (JOACHIM) a Lutheran Minister in the XVIth century, was born at Hamburgh [A] in the year 1510. He was master of the second class in St John's college of that city; after which he was minister of St Catherine's church there from the year 1541, to the year 1571 [B]. From that time to the sixteenth of January 1574, which was the day of his death, he was superintendent of the churches. There was a great discord between the Ministers of Hamburgh, some of them being moderate, and the others rigid Lutherans; Westphalus was the most zealous of the latter party (a). He was violent even to brutality [C]. The Lutherans themselves own that he shewed too great an animosity [D]. Calvin, when he wrote against Westphalus, pretty well adapted his style to that of his adversary (b); but it is said that he did not reproach him with the character of a drunkard [E]. Beza was surprized, and not without reason,

(a) Ex Mollero, fig. ad Histor. Cheronef. Cimbr. p. 579. Zelotarum Hamburgenum Primicerius, says he, pag. 577.

(b) See the remark [E].

(1) Additions to the Elogies extracted out of Thuanus, Part i, pag. 454.

(2) He quotes Quenst. de Patr. illustr. Viror.

(3) Moller, fig. ad Histor. Cheronef. Cimbrice, Part. iii, pag. 579.

(4) Histor. Lutheran. lib. i, p. 245, litera i.

(5) Ubi supra, pag. 579.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 581. He quotes the livth and xxiij letters of Gabbema's Collection. Upon examination, I find his quotation to be right.

(8) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 580.

* In Comm. historico ad an. 1552, p. 604.

† Lib. 26. Comm. de statu relig. & resp. p. m. 780.

‡ In Anti-Pap. secundo, pag. 128, 129, 180. & in Anti-Pap. tertio, pag. 241, 242.

§ In Narrat. historica Controv. Sacramentarie, apud Schlusfeld. l. 2. Theol. Calv. p. m. 192, 193.

 In Hist. Sacram. pag. 119.

†† In Dedic. Concordiæ discordis.

(9) Moller, ibid. pag. 581.

(10) Ibid. pag. 579.

‡‡ In Prædicatione de orbe habitabili, pag. 263.

[A] He was born at Hamburgh. Those who say that he was called Westphalus because a native of Westphalia, are mistaken. Mr Moreri is guilty of that error; which he copied from Mr Teissier, (1), who had it from a German Lutheran. I mean Quenstedt, as appears by his citation (2). Mr Mollerus when he censures Mr Teissier for this fault, spares Quenstedt (3). [B] From the year 1541 to the year 1571. Mr Sekendorf (4) tells us that Westphalus was invited from Wittenberg to Hamburgh in the year 1542, in order to succeed Kempius in the pastoral office of St Catherine's church, and that afterwards he succeeded Æpinus in the office of superintendent. In my opinion more credit is due to Mr Mollerus (5) who places the beginning of his ministry in 1541, and of his superintendency in 1571. How could he then succeed Æpinus, who died in 1553 (6)?

[C] He was violent even to brutality. The Divines of the Confession of Geneva bestowed that encomium upon him, one of them saith that he was fitter to keep beasts of burthen, than to administer the sacraments. 'H. Bullingerus hominem illum vocat vere Westphalum, id est, crassum. Theod. autem Bibliander, hominem ineptum & importunum, qui rectius in agris farragine jumentis colligeret ac misceret, quam sacrosancta mysteria unionis ac fidei Christianæ, & salutis humanæ sacramenta tractaret' (7). '----- Bullinger calls him a true Westphalian, that is, stupid. Theod. Bibliander gives him the character of a foolish and impertinent fellow, that was more fit to look out for provender in the fields and to mix it up for beasts of burthen, than to meddle with the sacraments of salvation and the holy mysteries of the Christian union and faith.' Bibliander alludes to a book which Westphalus published in 1552, intitled, Farrago confusaneorum & inter se dissidentium de S. Cæna opinionum, ex Sacramentariis libris congesta. It is thought that this book kindled again the Sacramentarian war, which seemed extinct after the death of Luther (8). 'Belli Eucharistici Lutheri obitu sopiti acris denuo instaurandi classis A. 1552. ipsum cecinisse, edita adversus Calvinum Farragine confusaneorum &c. è Pontificiis * Laur. Surius, ex Calvinianis † J. Sleidanus, ‡ J. Sturm, § Casp. Peucerus,  Lud. Lavaterus, & †† Rud. Hospinianus uno ore clamitant. ----- Among the Papists Laur. Surius, and among the Calvinists J. Sleidan, J. Sturm, Casp. Peucerus, Lewis Lavaterus, and Rud. Hospinianus, cry out with one voice that this was the man who founded the charge, and kindled up afresh with greater violence the Sacramentarian war, (which had been extinct ever since the death of Luther) by publishing against Calvin his Farrago confusaneorum &c.' The author whom I quote (9), relates what Altingius and Hoornbeeck have said of Westphalus. 'Ab Henr. Altingio Lutheranus, accensur immoderatis, furiosis & blasphemis, ab Hoornbekio autem animi inflati & αὐτογνώμονος infimulatur. ----- By Henry Alting he is reckoned among the zealous, furious, and blasphemous Lutherans, by Hoornbeeck he is accused of being self-conceited and tenacious of his own opinions.'

[D] The Lutherans themselves own that he shewed too great an animosity. I shall again quote Mollerus (10). 'Theologus celebris quidem, sed famam †† Joach. Vægetio iudice, per magni nominis Adversarios, quos Scriptis provocabat, adeptus. Zelus illius, & summa, in impugnandis Calvinianis, Crypto-Calvinianis, Synergistis, Adiaphoristis, Majoristis, atque Mete-

rodoxis aliis, vehementia, Theologis etiam aliquot γυναικας Lutheranis, & in his Sim. Sulcero. Prof. Basileensi †, in excessu visa peccare, plurimis in Germania certaminibus sacris vel anam præbuit, vel fomitem suppeditavit. ----- He was a famous champion A. 1557, Divine, but he acquired his reputation, in the opinion of Joach. Vægetius, by the renowned adversaries whom he provoked by his writings. His zeal and great animosity in attacking the professed Calvinists, and such as were so in their hearts, the Synergists, Adiaphorists, Majorists, and other heterodox sects, may even some Divines that were sincere Lutherans, and among these Simon Sulcerus, professor at Basil, seemed to err in the excess, and either gave a handle to many religious contentions in Germany, or added fuel to them.'

[E] That he did not reproach him with the character of a drunkard. The proof which I am going to alledge of this, informs us, that Westphalus accused Calvin of gluttony. 'Ufus est aliquoties Calvinus, carnelem edendi modum oppugnans ab absurdo, vocabulis voracitatis & ingurgitationis. Quid tu ad hæc Westphale? Admodum, inquis religiose & reverenter loquitur Calvinus, ex crudo suo stomacho eructans voracitatem & ingurgitationem. Nempe Calvinum bene nosti, ut video: quem tota hæc civitas testari potest tam parvam sui rationem habere in cibo & potu, ut in eo interdum amicis non leviter peccare videretur. Quum te de temulentia reprehentum à Calvino ægre patereris, respondit Calvinus id quod res est, se de spiritus temulentia loquutum: & cur ad istam verborum asperitatem adactus esset copiose declaravit' (11). ----- Calvin, exposing the carnal way of eating, did sometimes make use of the words voracitatis, nesi and gluttony. What construction did you, Westphalus, put upon this? Calvin, said you, speaks in a most religious and reverend manner, while he belches up voracitiness and gluttony from his crude stomach. This indeed shews that you know Calvin well, of whom all this city can attest, that he is so negligent of himself, as to his eating and drinking, that sometimes his friends think him highly blamable in that respect. When you took it ill that Calvin should accuse you of drunkenness, Calvin made answer, as the thing really was, that he meant a drunkenness of spirit, and set forth at large what had obliged him to make use of these harsh words.'

But let us see what answer Calvin himself made, and at the same time let us give the History of this quarrel.

There was, for some time, a misunderstanding between the Church of Zurich and Calvin, about the Doctrine of the Eucharist; but it ceased in the year 1549, and both sides agreed on a treaty of peace, which contained twenty-six articles, and was called Consensio mutua in Re Sacramentaria (12). The rigid Lutherans were offended at this agreement, and published several libels against it: and it was on this occasion that Westphalus wrote the book, the title of which I have mentioned in the remark [C]. Calvin thought himself obliged to silence all these clamours, by publishing an exposition of his agreement. This he did in the year 1554, by a little tract in which he fell very severely upon Westphalus, without naming him. But he had not the same regard for him two years after, when he refused (13) that adversary's answer, nor in 1557, when he inscribed another treatise to him; he named him in both these books. Afterwards he gave him up to his obstinacy, and threatened to do so in the title of the last book (14). But now let us examine

† In Epist. ad Joh. Math. scripta v. Joh. Facetti (suppl. H. E. Sec. XVI. P. II. n. 63, pag. 82).

(11) Beza, de Cæna Domini, contra Westphalum, Oper. Tom. i, pag. 457.

(12) See the relation of Calvin's Tracts, pag. 73.

(13) The Relation in which Calvin stood, Second Defence pag. 6. orthodoxy de Sacramentis lib. adversus Joach. Westphalum calumnias.

(14) Ultima Admonitio Joannis Calvini ad Joach. Westphalum, cui nisi obtemperet, non erit modo publicæ habendæ etc. quo pertinetur breviter haberi.

reason, that Westphalus should publish that Calvin's mother had been a Priest's concubine [F]. He fully refuted this calumny. What is said by some that this Lutheran Doctor was the inventor of the Ubiquitarian opinion, is not true [G]. In order to judge of his character, it is sufficient to remember, that he ridiculed all the Protestant martyrs who did not believe Consubstantiation [H]. The arguments, which he once used against the examine the grounds of the complaint concerning drunkenness. 'Indolenti & temulentis homines dum Sacramentarium bellum instaurant, primis librorum paginis audacter jactant pro tota Saxonia & vicinis regionibus se pugnare. . . . These unlearned and drunken men, while they revivify the Sacramentarian war, boldly pretend in the first pages of their books that they fight the cause of all Saxony and of the neighbouring countries.' This period (15) of Calvin induced Westphalus to complain, that he in particular, and the Germans in general, were charged with drunkenness: to which Calvin answered, that he did not in the least speak of a drunkenness occasioned by wine, but of another metaphorical drunkenness mentioned by the Prophet Isaiah. 'Quia forte veritus est, ne si solus ipse læsus foret, paucos inveniret privati doloris socios, totam gentem suam ad commune prælium incitat, ac si Germanis omnibus vulgatum temulentiae probrum à me objectum foret. Si ita esset, ne ipse quidem mihi vellem ignosci. Sed notanda est quam mox addit probatio. Crimine hoc, inquit, femel atque iterum me perfringit. Quasi vero si bibulus est, sine compotioribus inebriari nequeat. Quamquam ne hic de nihilo anxius sit, sciat non indictum fuisse prælium suis poculis, scias de alia temulentia me loquentum esse, quam Propheta

(15) It is at pag. 76b, of the volume of his Tractat.

(16) Calvin. II Defens. de Sacramentis, pag. 768, Tractat. Theolog.

Isaias dicit non esse à vino (16). . . . Perhaps because he was afraid lest, if he were the only person hurt, he should find few people to sympathize with him, he stirs up his wretched nation to a common war, as if I forsooth, had upbraided all the Germans with the trite reproach of drunkenness. Were that the case I should not even desire to be forgiven. But what he subjoins as a proof of this is somewhat remarkable. He upbraids me, says he, with this vice several times. As if a man who is that way inclined could not get drunk without having his pot-companions. Nevertheless that he may not be disturbed about nothing here, I would have him to know once for all that I did not declare war against his cups: I meant another kind of drunkenness, which, as the Prophet Isaiah saith, does not proceed from wine. He renewed the same apology at the end of his last advertisement. 'Westphalum alicubi hominem temulentum vocare contigerat, non ut bibacitatem illi objicerem, sicuti interpretatus sum: sed qualiter Propheta ebrios esse dicit, & non à vino, qui stupore percussus, aut vertigine correptus, à sana mente exciderunt. Quod privatim de uno homine dictum est, ad totam Gentem trahi cæcæ profectio temulentiae est (17). . . . I happened somewhere to call Westphalus a drunken man, not that I wanted to upbraid him with a tippling disposition, as I explained myself before; but in the sense that the Prophet Isaiah calls drunk, though not with wine, such people who being struck with stupidity and dizziness have lost their right understanding. Now to apply to a wretched nation what is particularly said of one man is certainly the blind effect of drunkenness.' I am apt to think that this explanation did not satisfy Westphalus; and indeed it leaves room for great suspicions: besides, it is very visible that Calvin expresses himself in such words, as shew that he was not sorry it should be believed that he justly charged this vice on his adversary, though he protests that he meant another vice. He doth not deny the having treated him roughly, but he affirms that his vehemency is reasonable, and justifies himself by the example of God. Sicubi vehementius in eum invehebat, pro vestra prudentia & aequitate, quibus me stimuli adegerit expendi. . . . Quid mihi hic respondendum fuit, nisi ut malo modo aptare durum canem, ne sibi in sua vecordia nimis placeret? Equidem si homines istos mollires posse spes esset, non reculare demissus ac supplex Ecclesiae pacem redimere. Sed quo feratur ipsorum violentia, omnibus satis notum est. Itaque meam in ista duritie tractanda austeritatem, Dei quoque exemplum excusat, qui se pronuntiat non modo inclementius acturum cum praefraetis, sed contra eos praefraetum fore

(17) Idem, Ad monit. ultima, pag. 839, ejusd. Vol.

* Psal. xviii.

(18) Idem, II Defensio, circa init. pag. m. 765. See also the beginning of the ultima Admonitio, where he says, Quia cum duro & praefraeto capite negotium erat, an non liceret malum nodum duro cuneo retundere?

(18) That is, 'if in some places I have dealt too roughly with him and expressed my self in too

sharp terms, be pleased according to your prudence and equitable discretion to consider what sharp weapons he hath pointed against me, to constrain me to it. . . . What could I do, in this case, but act according to the proverb, which prescribes a severe driver for a head-strong ass, that he might not grow too fond of his fury? Indeed if there were any hopes of mollifying these men, I would not refuse to make humble supplications to them, in order to redeem the peace of the Church. But it appears to all men what their extravagant impetuosity aims at. So that if I have been very severe in handling such a strange obstinate people, I am excused by the example of God himself, who declares not only that he will treat the froward without tenderness, but shew himself froward to them.

[F] He published that Calvin's mother had been a Priest's concubine. A little after the words of Theodorus Beza, which I have already cited, we find these.

'Quid amplius? Ingerit, inquis, Calvinus voces auribus & oculis, meretricibus convenientes: quas fortasse didicit à matre sua Pontificii sacrilegii concubina. Itane verò nugator? honestissimam matronam jam olim defunctam, & ejus viri matrem, cui quantum debeat Christiana Ecclesia tot suscepti labores testantur, & gratioribus futuris posteris (ut confido) testabuntur, tuis verè meretriciis probris afficere maluisti quam animo tuo morem non gerere? Sed continebo ipse me, & quid nos potius quam quid te deceat, spectabo. Calvinum & honesto loco & integerrimæ famæ parentibus natum, & in nobilissima familia à pueritia educatum si testibus probare oporteret, nos non unum aliquem testem, sed integram civitatem Noviodunensem citare possumus. Itaque de hoc refutando convitio minime laboramus. . . . What next? Calvin, say you, presents to our eyes and ears words that are fit for lewd women to make use of; possibly having learned them from his mother who was once a Popish Priest's concubine. Say you so, Mr Trister? Is it thus that, rather than not gratify your own humour, you throw your loose reproaches upon a most virtuous woman who is long ago deceased, and who was the mother of that man, to whom the Christian Church is under so great obligations, as his many works testify, and as they will testify to posterity, which, I hope, will be more grateful than the present age has been? But I will contain myself, and consider more what is becoming for me to say than for you to hear. If it were necessary to prove by witnesses that Calvin was born of creditable and blameless parents, and that he was brought up from his youth in a very noble family, not one witness alone, but the whole city of Noyon might be called upon to attest it. We shall therefore take no pains to refute this calumny.'

[G] What is said. . . . that he was the inventor of the Ubiquitarian opinion is not true. George Hornius affirms it, but Mr Mollerus refutes it by the testimony of Hospinian, who acknowledges that Westphalus and Heshuius, otherwise good Lutherans, opposed the new opinion concerning the Ubiquity which Brentius and Smidelin advanced (19). The Bishop of Meaux is therefore mistaken when in his Histoire des Variations (20) under the year 1558 he saith, that the great dispute at that time amongst the Lutherans was concerning the Ubiquity, which Westphalus, James Andrew Smidelin, David Chytræus, and others, established with all their might.

[H] He ridiculed all the Protestant martyrs who did not believe Consubstantiation. Beza lashes him on this account with the utmost severity. 'Ut tuam pietatem orbi testis, in martyres jocularis qui apud Gallos & alias gentes quotidie crudelissimam & ignominiosissimam mortem perpetuantur. Extant enim eorum aliquot confessiones, quæ tibi non satisfaciunt. Atque ut tibi non satisfaciunt, an ideo digni erant quibus etiam mortuis insultares? Nam certe pro Christi nomine ingressi sunt flammam, quas haud satis scio an tu vel uno digito velles attingere. Quod si negotium

(19) Georgius Hornius (Hof. Eccles. pag. m. 496.) in eum idem debacchatur more suo impetig, & primum Ubiquitatis auctorem fuisse nugarur ipse Hospinianus (in De Concordiæ discordiis) invito, qui novum Brentii & Smidolini de Ubiquitate doctrinam, à Westphalo atque Heshuiis, inter Lutheranos ipsos, ait, esse impugnatam. Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 581.

(20) Livr. viii, num. 37.

* Corin.

the ministers of the confession of Geneva were very ridiculous [I].

I have not yet taken notice that he is reproached with having commended as a very Christian action the harsh refusal of a Toleration in Germany to the Protestants that were banished out of England [K].

* Cœnæ Domini nonnisi ex parte cognoverunt (demus enim id Westphalo, ac ne nobis quidem singula eorum dicta ac facta satisfaciunt) an idcirco non fuerunt victimæ Deo gratæ, quum ad extremum usque halitus omnes idolomanias sint execrati, & Christum ut verum Filium Dei & unicum nostrum per fidem μεσίτην sint amplexi (21). --- To give a proof of your piety to the world, you ridicule the martyrs, who, both in France and other countries, are daily suffering the most cruel and ignominious deaths. You are not pleased with some of their confessions. But what of them? Is that a reason why you should insult them even after they are dead? It was certainly for the sake of CHRIST that they gave their bodies up to the flames, which I doubt whether you would venture to touch with one finger. Let us suppose that they did not thoroughly understand the article of the LORD'S Supper (for we are willing to grant so much to Westphalus, since we ourselves do not approve of all that they say and do) should it therefore be said that they were not acceptable victims in the sight of GOD; since, to their last breath, they abominated all idolatrous extravagances, and embraced CHRIST as the true Son of GOD, and our only Mediator through faith? Compare the article HUTTERUS with this (22).

(21) Beza, ubi supra, pag. 215.

(22) In the remark [B].

(23) You will find in Hospinian. Hist. Sacram. Part. ii, fol. 224, & seq. the occasion and the consequences of it. Mr Samuel Andrews, Professor of Divinity at Marburg, speaks of it in his Epistola Gratulatoria & Apologética, printed in 1690, against the Dania Orthodoxa, fidelis, & pacifica of Mr Mafius, Professor of Divinity at Copenhagen.

(24) See the Acts of the Conference of Colindgen, published by John Utenhovijs, elder of the church of the Flemish Refugees. Vossius relates all this out of them in a letter to Grotius, which is his xliii letter.

(25) Taken from the same letter of Vossius, pag. 50.

[I] The arguments which he used. . . were very ridiculous. Lascus and Micronius, Ministers of the Flemish Church at London, being forced to leave that country, endeavoured to establish themselves and their flock in the territories of the King of Denmark (23), but the Lutherans opposed it, and even for some time refused an amicable conference with them, saying, that it was wholly unnecessary, since neither the King nor they had any scruples concerning the truth of the doctrine established in Denmark. But at last they condescended to a conference, and urged that the Calvinists rejected plain texts of Scripture; for, said they, what can be clearer than these words, this is my body? Besides this they told them, you follow neither Luther nor the Saxon Churches, and are condemned by the confession of Augsborg; in a word, you teach a doctrine which is not agreeable to the prevailing opinion in Denmark. They were answered, that the word of GOD, and not what Luther taught, or the kingdom of Denmark approved of, was the rule of faith. This, and several other such like answers, proved useless to the Flemish Refugees, and they were constrained to retire out of the kingdom in the midst of winter (24). Micronius some time after conferred, at Hamburg, with Joachim Westphalus, who immediately urged the consent of the Saxon Churches as an invincible argument. They, said he, have condemned Zwingle's opinion; it is therefore false, and ought to be rejected. Micronius replied, that if the truth of an opinion ought to be determined by the consent of the Churches, the Papal cause would be triumphant. Westphalus answered, that the Saxon Churches were the Church of GOD; and when the other urged that the true Church was not confined to any certain place, and that there was no Church but what might err, as was allowed by Luther, he affirmed that the import of Luther's words was not that the Church of JESUS CHRIST might be mistaken, but that the Popish Church might. Micronius always insisted upon this maxim, That the Holy Scripture is the sole rule of Faith; which did not prevent Westphalus's answering him: it would follow from your arguments, that his Danish Majesty, and the Senate of our city, who have decreed against you, are guilty of a great fault: consider that you are condemned by a Diet of Augsborg (25). Si dubia adhuc esset nostra doctrina, graviter peccasset senatus noster, & serenissimus Danicæ Rex, qui adversum vos decreta tulerunt. . . . Contra vestram doctrinam Comitibus Augustanis pronuntiavit est (26). Micronius did not fail to reply, that by such arguments as these Popery would every where gain its cause (27). We have here a proof of the natural inclination of all parties, to make use of the compendious way of authority, and convert their adversaries errors into state-crimes. Dare you charge the magistracy of Hamburg, and the King of Denmark, who have condemned you, with injustice? If Westphalus had remembered that there are great numbers of Papists in the world, and had he but used his reason a little, would he have talked at this rate?

[K] He is reproached with having commended. . . the harsh refusal of a Toleration in Germany to the Calvinists that were banished out of England. I have already mentioned (28) the treatment which they met with; but I add, that the description which they gave of it may be seen not only in the books of Utenhovijs, Lasco, and Micronius, but likewise in the answers that were made to our Westphalus, in the year 1555, and afterwards (29). They likewise quote (30) the first letter of Theodore Beza, and page 40 Institutionis Sacramentariæ of Lavaterus: but the following passage will shew us that nothing was more disagreeable in this perfection than to see it publicly commended, and upon that we are referred to a book of Westphalus. Non meminerunt illi fratres, quid nam sit illud pastorale μελειωσασθαι καὶ συμπλασθαι de quo Apolt. ad Hebr. cap. 5. 2. Qui in tanta cœli inclementiâ, inter tot hostes, nostros palantes majores indignissimè suis finibus ejecerunt, & ne quidem illud Jacobi c. 2. v. 16. (quod vel in ipso reprobos cadit) illis apprecabantur Abite cum pace, calefite, & saturamini, vix ac ne vix quidem illis dantes τὰ ἐπιθήσεια τῷ σώματι & crudeliter iis invidentes τὰ ἐπιθήσεια τῆς ψυχῆς. Sed hoc imprimis nostris displicuit, istius ἀναισθησίας auctores & sibi hac in re fuisse gratulatos & repperisse modum qui illud factum tanquam præclarum, Deo gratum, Regibus & Magistratibus dignum, publicè ausi fuerunt defendere; & impetrarunt à Rege Danicæ & aliis, ut ne nostri, odiosè dicti Sacramentarii, in Dania, Hamburgi, & in aliis maritimis urbibus, vel hospitio exciperentur. Vidi lib. Westphali de Cœnâ Domini ex Augustino, ad an. 1555 (31). --- These brethren did not remember what is the duty of a Pastor, which requires him to be mild and compassionate, of which the Apostle speaks in his Epistle to the Hebrews, chap. v. ver. 2. I say they did not remember it, since they did in so unworthy and shameful a manner oblige our wandering fathers to leave their territories, notwithstanding the great inclemency of the weather, and their being encompassed with so many enemies. Nor did they so much as wish them what is mentioned by James, chap. ii. ver. 16. (which is said even of wicked men) Depart in peace, be ye warmed, and filled. Scarcely, or rather not at all, would they supply them with the necessaries of the body, and most cruelly denied them the necessaries of the soul. But the most disagreeable thing to our fathers was, that the authors of this inhumanity did not only congratulate themselves upon what they had done, but likewise found persons who durst publicly defend it as an action commendable in itself, acceptable to GOD, and worthy of Kings and Magistrates: and they obtained of the King of Denmark, and others, that it should be made unlawful for any one in Denmark, Hamburg, and other sea-coast towns, to give the least entertainment or shelter to those of our persuasion, whom by an odious name they called Sacramentarians. See Westphalus's book de Cœnâ Domini, &c. The person who speaks in this manner, was a Minister and Professor of Divinity at Breda, in the year 1651, when he caused the book, of which I have spoken elsewhere (32), to be reprinted with some notes of his own.

(26) Vossius, ibid. c. 2.

(27) Similiter argumentis facit omnes vicem Papa. ibid.

(28) In the remark [I], of this article.

(29) Et eorum qui doctæ & recte responderent minimum fuit se festibus indolgenti Joachimo Westphalo anno 1555 & deinceps. Lud. Gor. à Breda, ubi infra.

(30) Id. ibid.

(31) Ludov. Corradus à Breda, Not. in Apolog. Reform. in Belgio Encl. Epist. pag. 86.

(32) In the remark [E], of the article HENMINGUS.

WICELIUS

WICELIUS (GEORGE) a pretty good Divine of the XVIth century, was born at Fuld in the year 1501. He entered young into a monastery (a), but was not there long, before he not only renounced the monastical life, but the Roman Catholic Religion, and turned Lutheran. He had not the gift of perseverance, for he returned to the Romish communion. He was not able to digest the divisions which he saw springing up amongst the Reformers, and the particular persecutions raised against him: but what side soever he was of, he never believed that marriage ought to be forbidden to Priests (b). We may therefore easily imagine that he married whilst he was a Protestant; but it is false that he had successively several wives [A]. He contented himself with his first marriage, though he was persuaded that it was impossible to live or die well in celibacy (c); and it seems, that even when a Lutheran, he disliked Bigamy. He embraced the Protestant Religion at the age of thirty, or thirty-one years [B], and became Minister of a Church, from which he says that he was forced by a cruel persecution. Justus Jonas was one of his most violent antagonists, but Luther, on the contrary, wrote in his favour, and dissipated the storms raised against him by his being accused of some state crimes (d). It is said that his return into the pale of the Romish Church, procured him but very slowly the rank he deserved. He was exposed to several disgraces before he could be made even a parish Priest; but at last he became counsellor to the Emperors Ferdinand and Maximilian. His principal character was that of being earnestly desirous of a reunion among Christians; to accomplish which, he would willingly have abolished several things practised in the Church of Rome [C], though, after his return to that Church, he continued in her bosom till his death. Cassander, the reconciler, took his conciliating spirit from our Wicelius. Masius, Ferus the Franciscan, and Bishop Julius Pflug who had been for the Interim, were also his particular friends. By this we may judge of his inclinations; but much better by his writings, his Via Regia, his Methodus Concordiæ, &c. He wrote a prodigious number of Books, most of which were in the German language; and being afterwards translated into Latin, they were printed several times. He died at Mentz in the year 1573, and was buried in St Ignatius's church. He left one son, named (as well as himself) GEORGE, who published some books: therefore to avoid confusion, the father is distinguished by the addition Major, or Senior. This is what I thought my self obliged to extract out of the life of Wicelius (e), which is inserted in the appendix to the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum (f). From thence I have taken the body of this article and the citations, without any correction, referring criticisms to the remarks. The author of this life was a very learned man; but give me leave to say that he might and ought to have been much more exact in the writing of it.

(a) Cornelius Loos, in Catal. illustr. Germaniæ Scriptor.

(b) See his Via Regia, apud Wolfium, Lect. Memor. Tom. ii, pag. 376.

(c) Uxorem in primo statim ser-vore schismatis duxi, persuasus neminem posse neque pie vivere, neque bene mori, citra uxorem. Wicel. Conf. Respons. Jonica, pag. 63.

(d) Justus Jonas excitavit Principes adversus eum, seditionario facto conjectus est in lacum, neque longe fuit à laqueo præfatore: sed Lutherus pro eo scripsit.

(e) Thomas James is the author of it.

(f) Printed at London in 1690.

[A] It is false that he had successively several wives. His life inserted in the second tome of the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum, confutes Cornelius Loos, who said that Wicelius having lost his first wife, married a second, then a third, and after that others, as it is reported. Adolescens Monasticum amplectitur, à quo vitæ instituto mox resiliit, uxorem duxit, qua defuncta, alteram, & hac, tertiam, & (ut ferunt) plures. Serarius accuses him of having left the Lutherans on account of their divisions, and of having retained some of their opinions, but more especially those relating to marriage; that in order to remain a married Priest, he endeavoured to obtain orders from a Bishop of the Greek Church; that being willing to serve two masters, he was true to neither of them; that he was disobedient to the Canons of the Latin Church, by uniting marriage to the Priesthood, and to those of the Greek communion, by marrying more than once. Georgium Wicelium lego primis adolescentiæ annis ad monasticum sese statum applicuisse: sed postea carnis Lutherique phibitis dementatam uxorem quesivisse; magnoque apud Lutheranos, propter aliquam eruditionis, linguarumque peritiæ opinionem, loco fuisse. At illis tamen cum nova, neque cum Ecclesiasticæ antiquitatis norma satis consentanea fingi ac refingi quotidie cerneret, variisque illos & acerbis inter se opinionibus diffidere, pedem retrahit; sed ita ut proprii nefcio quâ cerebri pertinacia ei quam par esset diutius glutinatiusque adhaerere, in uxoria præsertim re: cui servare simulque sacerdos esse cum vellet, dicitur Græcum nefcio ubi Episcopum, ut ab eo consecraretur, quesivisse. Sicque cum quadam veluti probro & risu Græcus audiebat. Sacerdos. At sellis federe duabus dum voluit, utraque decedit. Neque enim Latinus sacerdos bonus fuit, qui ad nuptias transit: neque sacerdos Græcus bonus, quid ad secundas & tertias, imò, ut quidam ferunt, etiam ad plures: Sed prole parum felici, ut Moguntia est notum (1).

(1) Nic. Serarius, in Moguntia, lib. i, cap. xl, apud Miræum de Scriptor. Sæculi xvi, p. 23.

[B] He embraced the Protestant religion at the age of thirty or thirty-one years. Paul Freherus, in his Theatrum, contradicts Thomas James in this particular; for we find there, that Wicelius went to study at Wittenberg, about the year 1521, that afterwards he became the leader of the rebels in Thuringia; that he was taken and condemned to die, but that he was pardoned by the intercession of Pontanus, Chancellor of Saxony; that Luther settled him as Minister in a village called Nimeck, near Wittenberg; that in the year 1531 he was imprisoned by order of the Elector John Frederic, and by the advice of Melancthon, on account of his attacking the Divinity of JESUS CHRIST; that not long after, he was banished the Elector's territories; that he retired to Leipzig, where Duke George protected him; that some time after he turned Papist (2), and in the year 1534, wrote against Luther's book de bonis Operibus; that after the death of that Duke, he was driven from Leipzig, spent the remainder of his life at Mentz and Cologne, turning a bitter enemy to the Lutherans, and that he died in 1563. As to the last particulars, Freherus's Theatrum wants correction; for the Appendix to the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum, affords incontestable proofs, that Wicelius would have yielded to the Lutherans several things for the sake of peace, and that he was still alive in the year 1564. What is yet more, one of his tracts inserted in this Appendix, pag. 750, is dated on the tenth of August 1575; and yet page 787, Cornelius Loos is allowed to be in the right, in placing the death of Wicelius in 1573. Molanus (3) and Serarius (4) place his death in the same year 1573.

[C] Several things practised in the Church of Rome. A specimen of it extracted out of his books, may be seen in the Appendix to the Fasciculus rerum expetendarum subjoined to his life.

See also the second volume of John Wolfius's Latiniæ Memorable (5). Wicelius's Letters, printed at Leipzig in 1537, contain as many invectives against the Canonists and Scholastic Divines, as against the Lutherans. There is just reason to wonder that the Inquisition did not fulminate against these works (6); this confirms what has been said of them, that their conduct is not uniform (7).

(2) Molanus, ubi infra, scribit, ibat se returned to the Romish Communion, in 1532.

(3) Molanus, in Bibliotheca Sacra, MS. apud Miræum de Scriptor. Sæculi xvi, pag. 23.

(4) Serarius, ubi supra, apud Miræum, ibid.

(5) From pag. 354, to 393.

(6) See Rivetus, pag. 976, of Tom. iii, of his Works.

(7) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Sep. 1685, p. 1053, & alibi passim.

WICKHAM (WILLIAM) Bishop of Winchester, was born at Wickham in the county of Southampton in the year 1324. He went through his classical learning at Winchester, and besides, he learned the elements of Geometry, Arithmetic, and Logic, as well as the French tongue: he was afterwards sent to Oxford, where he closely attended the lectures of Lewis Carleton, professor of Mathematics, and of William Dorach, professor of the Civil-Law. He staid near six years in that university, and behaved himself so well that he was very much esteemed by the most famous Doctors. He would have staid longer if his patron Nicolas Wedal (a), upon his being made Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Southampton by King Edward III, had not obliged him to come and live with him, in order to make him his Counsellor and Secretary. He could not have chosen a fitter person for that employment; for no man in those days either wrote or spoke more politely than our Wickham. From thence it came to pass that three years after Edington Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Treasurer of England, chose him for his Secretary. King Edward having seen him in that prelate's palace, could not help owning that he discovered a majestic air in him, upon which, receiving a great character of him from Nicolas Wedal, and Bishop Edington, he engaged him in his service. Encouraged by this, Wickham made his court to that great monarch with the utmost assiduity, and with equal address acquitted himself of the affairs entrusted to him: besides, he answered so pertinently to several political questions which the King put to him, that the idea of his merit which that Prince had conceived, daily increased. 'Quo ejus ingenium altius exploraret multas illi illustres quæstiones quæ statum ac summam rerum continerent, ut de bello suscipiendo vel deponendo, de conditionibus pacis ineundæ, de ærariis rationibus amplificandis, de industria proponere solebat, quibus Wicamus extempore ita ornate & prudenter tum verbis tum sententiis respondisse fertur, ut Rex præsentis ejus ingenio & peracutis responsis mirifice oblectaretur (b). - - - In order to make a further trial of his capacity, the King used to propose many remarkable questions to him concerning the state and management of affairs, the necessary measures for beginning or ending a war, the conditions upon which a peace was to be concluded, and the ways and means of increasing the revenues: to all which questions Wickham answered extempore (as it is reported) with so much elegance and discretion, both in words and sentiments, that his Majesty was wonderfully delighted with his ready wit and smart answers.' As he understood Geometry and Architecture, he was made surveyor of the King's buildings, to which post was joined that of Chief-Justice in Eyre. It was he who had the direction of the building of Windsor Castle, Edward was born in that place, and had at one time the King of France, and the King of Scotland prisoners there. Being therefore desirous to erect a magnificent monument of his victories, he preferred this to all other places: he caused all the ancient buildings to be demolished, and ordered a new and most magnificent structure to be erected. Wickham, who had the whole management of this, acquitted himself in a glorious manner, and took up but three years to finish the whole. His enemies gave so malicious a turn to an inscription which he put upon that palace [A], that they exposed him to the King's displeasure; but he soon dispelled that

(a) He was Lord of the village of Wickham.

(b) Hist. descript. Vitz. Wicami, pag. 22.

[A] So malicious a turn to an inscription which he put upon that palace.] The words were, This made Wickham, which admitting of the double interpretation of Wickham made this, or this made Wickham, his enemies interpreted it in the first sense, and possessed the King, that the surveyor of that edifice insolently arrogated the glory of it to himself. Non deerant quidam invidi & malevoli qui Regi in aures insurrerent Wicamum tam magnificæ structuræ honorem sibi arroganter vendicasse, adeoque in nomen suum in interiori quodam pariete artis Windelorensis insculptum regalis ædificii titulum nominatim trajecisse (1). The King being very much incensed, charged Wickham with that crime, but was soon appeased, and laughed at it when he heard his defence. Wickham answered, with a smiling air, that his accusers must either be very malicious, or very ignorant of Grammar, since the true sense of the inscription was this: I am the creature of this palace, it is that which hath procured me the favour of my Prince, and raised me from a low to a high state. It is proper to insert the Historian's own expressions here: Cum autem Rex stomacharetur & iracunde Wicamo crimen objiceret, quod delatum erat, ille vultu non tristis aut consternatus, sed hilariter ac jucundo respondit, aut sultum hominem inscitia Grammaticæ, aut calumniatorem malitiosa casum inverfione illam criminationem instituisse. Neque enim Rex serenissime (inquit) ego hanc Arcem, sed hæc Arx me quantus quantus sum effecit, hoc est me in laudem ac gratiam apud tuam majestatem posuit, atque ab humili conditione ad tantas fortunas & dignitates evexit. Quod responsum tam factum ac Wicamo dignum (erat enim verum specimen humanitatis, venustatis, ac leporis) non solum omnem iracundiæ acerbiter Regi absterpsit, verum etiam lætitiâ in ejus animo tum commotionem suavem jucunditatis in corpore excitavit (2). I would not swear that Wickham had no eye to the equivocal sense of this inscription. But that King Edward's anger, expressed on this occasion, may not pass for an uncommon weakness, I shall mention some particulars concerning the nicety and jealousy which sovereign Princes have discovered in parallel cases.

(1) Historica Descriptio (See the whole title at the end of the text of this article, in the margin, citation (f)), pag. 27, 28.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 28.

The magnificence of Pericles in the construction of public edifices at Athens is very well known. Now when the Orators, who sided with Thucydides, and were of his party, were at one time inveighing (as their custom was) against Pericles, as one who squandered away the public stock in idle expences, and made havock of the state-revenues, he starting up in the open assembly, put the question to the people, whether they thought that what he had laid out was too much: and they saying, Too much of all conscience. Well then, said he, since it is so, let not the cost and charge go upon your account, but upon mine, provided the inscription upon the temples and other public buildings be only in my name. When they heard him say this, whether it was out of a pride to see the greatness of his spirit, or because they would not yield to him the glory of having erected so magnificent and sumptuous buildings, they cried aloud, bidding him spend on, and take what he thought fit out of the public purse, and spare no cost, 'till all were finished (3).

When Pausanias, King of the Lacedæmonians, consecrated a golden tripod to the temple of Delphi, he caused to be inscribed on it, that under his conduct the Perians were beaten at the battle of Platæa. The Lacedæmonians not being able to suffer this vanity, caused the inscription to be erased, and the name of the towns which had furnished the victorious troops to be inserted instead of it, as we are informed by

(3) Pausanias in the Life of Pericles.

Cornelius

that storm, and made it contribute to the increase of his interest with that Prince. Having entered into Holy Orders, he was immediately presented to several rich benefices by the liberality of that monarch, who not thinking these donatives sufficient, made him Principal Secretary of State, and Keeper of the Privy-Seal. Whilst he continued in these posts, and with the greatest conduct discharged all his offices, he was promoted to the See of Winchester in the room of Bishop Edington, in the year 1367. Not long after he was made Lord High-Chancellor, and afterwards President of the Privy-Council. In a word, he had such a large share of the King's favour, that they applied to him what St John says of the Eternal Word [B]. In order to discharge the duties imposed on him both by his spiritual and temporal dignities and posts, he applied himself on one side to regulate his manners, according to the strictest discipline, and to establish in his diocese a Clergy which led an exemplary life, and were able to instruct their parishioners [C]; and on the other side he omitted nothing that might contribute to the exact and impartial administration of justice. In the year 1371, when he foresaw that the great seal would be taken from him, he prevented the dishonour, and surrendered it to the King. That Prince returning to England after a very successful war with France, found his treasury very much exhausted. The Duke of Lancaster, one of his sons, at the head of several of the nobility complained of the Ecclesiastics, who at that time had the greatest part of the civil offices in the kingdom; they represented to the King that it was not the clergy's business to intermeddle with temporal affairs, and that it was more proper those places should be filled by the laity, who would discharge them with

Cornelius Nepos. Quā victoriā elatus plurima miscere cepit, & majora concupiscere. Sed primum in eo est reprehensus, quod ex præda tripodem aureum Delphis posuisset, epigrammate scripto, in quo erat hæc sententia: SÜO DUCTU BARBAROS, APUD PLATÆAS ESSE DELETOS, EYUSQUE VICTORIÆ ERGO APOLLINI DONUM DEDISSE. Hos versus Lacedæmonii excelsulerunt, neque aliud scripserunt, quām nomina earum civitatum, quarum auxilio Perse erant viði (4). Alexander, proud as he was, and jealous lest any body else should share in his glory, made use of an inscription which admitted the Greeks to a part of the honour of the triumph. Κοινόμενος δὲ τὴν νίκην τοῖς Ἕλλησιν . . . κοινῇ τοῖς ἄλλοις λαούροις ἐκέλευσεν ἐπιγράψαι φιλοτιμοτάτην ἐπιγεγραψὴν, ἈΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ Ὁ ΦΙΛΙΠΠΙΟΤ ΚΑΙ Οἱ ἙΛΛΗΝΕΣ, ΠΑΝ Ἡ ΛΑΚΕΔΑΙΜΟΝΙΩΝ, ΑἰΠΟΤΩΝ ΒΑΡΒΑΡΩΝ ΤΩΝ ΤΗΝ ἈΣΙΑΝ ΚΑΤΟΙΚΟΝΤΩΝ. Participans autem Græcis victoriam . . . cæteris manibus in communi gloriosissimum titulum inscribi iussit, ALEXANDER PHILIPPI ET GRÆCIS, PRÆTER LACEDÆMONIOS, DE BARBARIS ASIATICIS (5). . . . That the Grecians might partake of the fruits of his victory . . . upon all the rest of the spoils be ordered this glorious inscription to be written, ALEXANDER, the son of PHILIP, AND ALL THE GRECIANS, EXCEPT THE LACEDÆMONIANS, WON THESE FROM THE BARBARIANS WHO INHABIT ASIA. This was after the battle of Granicus; when he had occasion for their further assistance, and consequently was afraid to irritate them by omitting their names in the monuments of his victories, and hoped to endear them to him by mentioning them (6). He desired to appropriate the whole inscription of the temple of Diana to himself, and offered to defray the expence of the whole edifice; but the inhabitants of Ephesus would not consent to it, and not daring directly to refuse him this honour, they had recourse to a flattering shift, which extricated them out of this affair. They told him that it was not proper for one god to raise monuments to another. Scriptus Ephesii, se omnes sumptus qui in id ædificium facti essent, restitutum; quique porro requirerentur, præbiturum de suo, ita tamen ut ipsius nomen insinuaturo operi inscriberetur. Idque deprecati sunt Ephesii. quo tempore, quia Alexandro petenti aliquid denegare arduum erat, legatus eorum ad adulationem confugit, quā maxime expugnabilem norat, dixitque dedecere culmen ipsius, si diis aliquid consecraret, quum ipse deus esset. nam eum honorem ad hominibus haberi potiori naturæ. Ea gloriæ contentio inter maximum regem, & unam civitatem fuit. obtinuerunt Ephesii; & maluerunt ingenti pecunia carere, quam insinuaturo templi titulo regi cedere (7). The Thebans, I believe, were not in such a perplexity, when a courtesan offered to rebuild their walls on the same condition. I am sure they absolutely rejected the offer, if what Athenæus says be true. Ἐπύλει δὲ σφῶδεξ ἡ Φρύνη καὶ ὑπισχυρίτα τεχνίται τὰς Θήβας, εὖν ἐπιγράψασι Θηβαῖοι, ἈΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ ΜΕΝ ΚΑΤΕΣ-

ΚΑΨΕΝ, ΑΝΕΣΤΗΣΕ ΔΕ ΦΡΥΝΗ Η ΕΤΑΙΡΑ, ὡς ἰσοπὶ Καλλίστῳ ἐν τῷ περὶ ἱταίρων. Phryne usque adeo dives erat, ut Thebarum mœnia extructuram se polliceretur, si adscriberetur, ALEXANDRUM DIRUISSE, PHRYNEN VERO SCORTUM REFECISSE, ut ait Callistratus libro de Scortis (8). . . . Phryne the courtesan was so rich, that she promised to build the walls of Thebes, upon condition that the Thebans would make the following inscription, ALEXANDER DEMOLISHED THESE WALLS, BUT PHRYNE THE COURTESAN REBUILT THEM. So says Callistratus in his book Of Courtesans. But before I conclude, I shall relate a stratagem full as good as that of Wickham. The architect who built Pharus, engraved his own name on a stone, and that of the King on the lime which covered it. The trick was not discovered during his life, nor was he consequently exposed to any manner of danger on that account, no person being able to accuse him to the King as a robber of his glory; but he expected after the expiration of several years that the name written in the lime would crumble away, and none would remain visible besides his own, which he had fixed in a much more durable substance than lime. The following citation acquaints us with the name of this Architect. Οἰκοδόμος ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ, ἐνδοξον μὲν κατὰ τὸν λίθον τὸ αὐτοῦ ὄνομα ἐπιγράψαι. ἐπιχρίσας δὲ τιτάνη, καὶ ἐπιχαλύψας, ἐπιγράψαι τὸνομα τῷ τότε βασιλευσσομένου, εἰδὼς ὅτι καὶ ἐγίνετο, πᾶν ὀλίγον χρόνον συνεκτασόμενα μὲν τῷ χρίσματι τὰ γράμματα, ἐφανερὸν δὲ, Σώσεσθαι Δεξιφάνους κνίδισθαι, θεοῖς σωθῆσθαι ὑπὲρ τῶν σωζομένων. Postquam igitur hoc opus exedificasset, intus in faxis suum nomen inscripsit: quo calce illita occultato, nomen ejus qui tum regnavit, superinscripsit, ratus, id quoque etiam evenit, fore ut brevi admodum, literæ illæ cum illita calce caderent: hoc verò appareret: Sosthratus Cnidius, Dexiphani filius, diis servatoribus pro salute navigationum (9). . . . When therefore he had finished the building, he engraved his own name, &c. . . . expecting, as it really happened, that after a short time these letters would crumble away with the lime, and that then the following inscription would appear: Sosthratus Cnidius, the son of Dexiphanes, erected this to the gods preservers, in behalf of seafaring men.

[B] They applied to him what St John says of the Eternal Word.] The author I here cite (10) quotes a passage of Froissard which runs thus; At that time reigned a certain Priest called William of Wickham, and this William of Wickham was so much in favour with the King of England, that all things were done by him, and without him nothing was done. Compare this with the words of St John (11), and you will find no great difference.

[C] A Clergy which led an exemplary life, and were able to instruct] It is not sufficient for them to be either learned or good men. Both these qualities ought to be united. But in the age we are speaking of, it was much easier to find Priests who were neither learned nor pious, than to find any that were either the one or the other; and though the ignorance of

(8) Athenæus, lib. xiii, pag. 591, D.

(4) Cornelius Nepos, in Paulinus, cap. ii.

(5) Plot. in Alexandro, pag. 673, C.

(6) See Freinæmius, Suppl. in Q. Curtium, lib. ii, cap. v.

(7) Freinæmius, Suppl. in Q. Curtium, lib. ii, cap. vi, num. 33. Et quotes Pausanias, lib. vii, and Strabo, lib. xiv. I have found no such thing in Pausanias, but only in Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. m. 441.

(9) Lucianus de conscribenda Historia, sub fin. pag. m. 706, Tom. i.

(10) The author of the Historica Descriptio, pag. 32.

(11) All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. John i. 3.

VOL. V.

7 A

with more fidelity and decency. The King being persuaded that if he slighted these complaints, he should disoblige a potent faction, and that if he removed the Ecclesiastics from the civil offices, he should draw vast sums from those whom he should call to an account, resolved on the alteration. Wherefore our Wickham very seasonably resigned the seal, and desired leave to retire to his diocese, which he did not obtain before the year 1374. The laymen being promoted to the public offices, discharged them so ill that the court was forced to re-instate the Ecclesiastics. The Duke of Lancaster was removed from the helm, but returned to the administration, when the death of the Prince of Wales had thrown the King into a languishing and mortal disease. Being now in power, he vehemently declared against the Clergy, and left no means unattempted to ruin our Wickham. He caused him to be accused of disloyalty and extortion, and forced him to appear at the King's Bench, as being the court empowered by law to take cognizance of this affair. He provided judges to condemn him, without allowing him the necessary time to digest his papers in order to his defence. Not content with depriving him of his temporalities, he advised King Edward to banish him; but that Prince though enfeebled in body and mind, refused it. He remembered that Wickham was found innocent of all manner of extortion five years before, when all the Ecclesiastics were obliged to give an account of their administration of the treasury. Wherefore he suspected the justice of the sentence which condemned him, and gave encouraging hopes to those deputed by the Bishops to him in order to request the annulling of this sentence; and at the same time suspecting the Duke of Lancaster to be guilty of some sinister design [D], he declared Prince Richard his grand-son (c) his successor, and restored to Wickham whatever the Duke of Lancaster had deprived him of. He died not long after (d). King Richard who succeeded him was but eleven years old, which rendered it very easy for the Duke of Lancaster, President of the Council, to revive the accusations against our Bishop of Winchester. They were accordingly reduced to seven heads, and maintained with very great assurance before the Council by the accusers, but the accused so strenuously refuted them that he was declared innocent. From that time, his noble desire of applying the riches which providence had bestowed on him, to very good uses, increased more than ever; and not being able to think of a more useful appointment, than that which furnished youth with the means of learning the sciences, he founded two magnificent colleges, the one at Oxford, and the other at Winchester [E]. Whilst he was taking care of whatever could contribute to the completing these two noble establishments, he was recalled to court, and by a sort of force obliged to accept of the dignity of Lord High Chancellor in the year 1389. He discharged that office for three years so well, that he rendered the nation happy; and this of those times was prodigious. yet there were more who were able to instruct than those who led a good life: and therefore this care of our Wickham must have proved a business of no small fatigue, since he ordered, in an especial manner, that all Deacons and Priests should be obliged to be free from drunkenness and leudness. Ante omnia tam Diaconos quam qui supra eos collocati sunt presbyteros ac sacerdotes ab infamia illa ebrietas & libidinis macula omnino immunes esse voluit. Nam quum ipsi sal terræ, lux mundi, ac dispensatores mysteriorum Dei crebro in scripturis usurpentur, nimis indignum esse dicebat eos vinolentia deformari vel cubilibus & immunditie inquinari, à qua turpitudinis labe & ignominia omnes etiam ex populo (quos Laicos vocant) melioris notæ abhorrent (12). -- Above all he required that as well the Deacons as the Presbyters and Priests, that were in a rank above them, should keep themselves entirely free from the foul stains of drunkenness and uncleanness. For whereas in the Scripture they are frequently called the salt of the earth, the light of the world, and the dispensers of the mysteries of GOD, he said that it was a thing very unbecoming their characters to be guilty of drunkenness, or lust and uncleanness; especially since even the better sort of people among the Laity obtained from these filthy vices. This is not the least glorious part of his administration.

(c) He was the son of the Prince of Wales.

(d) In the year 1377.

(13) Vehementissima regni appetendi suspitione & invidia laborabat. Ibid. pag. 53.

(14) Qui in fenili ætate credulus & suspitionibus paulo indulgentior esse cepit . . . post hujusmodi scrupulum injectum paulo alienior deinceps à filio Lancastrie pater nonnullis videbatur. Ibid. pag. 54.

he could not get any thing by its establishment; he stood in need of a law that should prefer the uncles to the nephews. It may be replied that not daring to endeavour directly at the exclusion of Richard his eldest brother's son, he began with the project of an innovation, wherein he could not be suspected to have an interested view: but if he could have gained his end, (viz.) the establishment of the Salique law, he would have found room for other innovations, and would have requested a law in preference of the rights of uncles to those of nephews. Mr Varillac imagines that he designed to abrogate the law for the succession of grand-children, and that on that account he was an encourager of Wickliff (15); but Mr de Larroque agreeably and solidly refutes this thought (16).

[E] He founded two magnificent colleges, the one at Oxford, and the other at Winchester. He had long given very signal proofs of a zealous inclination to relieve the necessitous. Hospitality, one of the virtues which, according to St Paul (17), ought to shine in the life of a Bishop, was remarkably exemplified in him. He lodged in his house twenty-four poor people, and maintained them there all his life. He received all strangers with great humanity; and seven years before the foundation of the abovementioned colleges, he began to settle an annual pension on fifty hopeful youths, whom he sent to study at Oxford (18). These were his preludes. After which, having obtained Letters-Patents to build a college in that city, he laid the first stone of it very early in the morning on the fifth of March, in 1379, and designed it for one hundred persons, besides servants, fifty scholars were to be entertained there, in order to be instructed in the sciences, and a grave and learned man to govern the college with the title of Warden. He added ten Chaplains, three Clerks, and sixteen Choristers. This edifice being finished in seven years, he himself placed those hundred persons (19) in it at three of the clock in the morning, on the fourteenth of April 1386. The first thing they did after their entrance was by a solemn public prayer to implore the blessing of God (20). The following year he founded another college

(15) Varillac, Histoire de Wickliff, pag. 11, & 12.

(16) Larroque, nouvelles Accusations contre Varillac, pag. 11, & 12.

(17) Tit. i. 8.

(18) Taken from Historia de scriptis, pag. 15.

(19) He chose them himself.

(20) Taken from the same book, pag. 101, 102.

(c) Omnes illos simul ac conjunctionem proditiōnis ac lēse majestatis reos fecit, perinde ac si illi Regem regio imperio ac omnium rerum dominatu depoliare festuissent. Historia Descript. Vita Wickhami, p. 109.

was the reason why, without the most pressing instances, he could not obtain the King's leave to retire, when he saw the fatal troubles that were ready to break out, which induced him to desire a retreat in order to shelter himself from the storm. Being then returned to his church, he finished the building of his college at Winchester, and there built that sumptuous cathedral, which equalled, or wanted but little of equalling, that of St Paul in London. Besides this he very liberally disbursed several sums to the great advantage of the public, and the poor; all which could not yet prevent his being exposed to imminent dangers in the year 1397, when he and some others were accused of high-treason in full parliament (e), but he was very honourably acquitted. From that time to his death he lived quietly in his diocese, and was wholly intent upon discharging all the duties of a good prelate. Nay he was there pretty secure from all those commotions which violently shook England. He died in the eighty-first year of his age in the year 1404. Several scandalous reports were spread against him; amongst other things it was said that he revealed a secret declared in confession concerning a supposititious son [F], and that he made presents and promises to King Edward's mistress, in order to obtain the restitution of his episcopal temporalities (f) [G]. We ought not to forget that in the suburbs of Winchester, near the Episcopal palace. He laid the first stone of this on the twenty-sixth of March, in 1387. He designed it for one hundred and five persons besides servants. These persons were, a Head or Warden, ten Priests, seventy scholars, an upper and under School-master, three Chaplains, three Clerks, and sixteen Choristers (21). All these entered the first time at three in the morning, on the twenty-eighth of March 1393 (22). The statutes of these two colleges are so excellent, that they served as a model for all those, who for the space of two hundred years made the like foundations in Oxford and Cambridge (23). I must not omit that Wickham provided that this college at Winchester should be a nursery for that which he founded at Oxford; for he ordered that all the places vacant in the last should be supplied by a draught from the former: which is religiously observed to this very day. My author expresses this part of the statutes in very significant words: Quod Collegio suo Oxoniensi quasi fons & seminario inferretur, ex cujus (ut ita dicam) utero junior alia scholis quotannis nasceretur, & in alterum Collegium decreſcentium loco veluti ad Patres literarum ac Senatores immigraret. Est enim hoc illius Collegii Oxoniensis proprium & peculiare, quique statutiſ sanctum ut cum Lettera Collegia Oxoniensia in demor-tuorum aut discendentium locum ex scholis quibuscunque aſcitiſ cooptare ſolent, ſolum hoc non niſi naturales ex ſeminario ſuo Vintonienſi velut ex ſua & propria ſtirpe ſuccreſcentes eligat, & electos ad ſe tanquam ad novam Coloniam ſuo tempore & loco deducat (24). Observe that his last testament and codicil were very memorable proofs of his charity and liberality (25).

(f) Taken from a book, intituled, Historia Descriptio complectens Vitam ac Re gestas beatissimi viri Guilelmi Wickam quondam Vintonienſis Episcopi, &c. printed at Oxford in the year 1690, in 4to.

(24) Ibid. pag. 102.

(25) Ibid. pag. 112, 113.

(26) Ibid. pag. 116, & ſeq.

[F] It was said that he revealed a secret declared in confession, concerning a supposititious son.] This is the third of the five calumnies which my author undertakes to refute. The two first are that Wickham's learning was even below a moderate degree, and that he had been a servant. Our author refutes this by several remarks which it is not necessary to transcribe here; those who are curious to see them may consult the original, to which I refer them (26). But as for the third calumny I shall give the substance of the Apology: in order to which let us begin with the accusation. It is pretended that the Duke of Lancaster's hatred to Wickham was grounded on his divulging that that Duke was not the son of Edward III. They add, that Philippa, King Edward's Queen, revealed in confession to our Bishop of Winchester, that John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was the son of a German, and that she had fraudulently imposed him on the King, her husband, instead of a female infant she had by him. They farther say, that she intreated this Prelate to reveal it to the nobility of the realm, in case the Duke, this supposed son of King Edward, should aspire to the crown, or prepare to succeed to the true Princes of the blood according to the laws. Hence some have taken occasion to charge this Bishop with a notorious sacrilege, I mean the non-observation of the Canon-Law, which forbids the divulging any secrets delivered in confession. His Apologist justifies him. I. By the shining virtue of the Queen. II. By the good understanding always preserved betwixt the King and Queen. III. By the impunity of Wickham. IV. By his reconciliation to the Duke of Lancaster. V. By the silence of Historians, and public records on this head. It is impossible, faith our author, that such a virtuous Princess should have killed her own daughter (27), in order the better to cover an abominable fraud. A King of such a great spirit would not have left so villanous an action of his wife unpunished: nor could he be ignorant of it, since it is pretended that it was revealed to the nobility of the realm. And if he had not believed it, he would have treated Wickham as the most infamous detractor deserve; the whole royal family being dishonoured by a report so injurious to the Queen, the slanderer would have been duly punished. But the Duke of Lancaster, hereby disgraced more than all the rest, would have brought him to justice, and never have been reconciled to him; and yet it is certain that after King Richard had reconciled them, they continued very well together till the Duke's death (28), that is about twenty-one years. Observe also that this story is no where to be found except in the compilation of a Monk: 'Reſte Harpiſfieldus in hiſtoria illud de ſuppoſito Regine partu tanquam fictum & commentum rejicit, ac nullibi niſi in Monacho Albanenſi reperiſ ſcribit' (29). - - - Harpiſfield, in his Hiſtory, very juſtly rejects as a fiction what is ſaid of the Queen's ſuppoſitious ſon, and affirms that it is no where mentioned but by a Monk of St Albans.

(27) Si primo hujus calumnie auctori credimus, ea quem non peperit, aluit, quam peperit, occidit. - - - If we believe the author of this calumny, ſhe killed her own child, and brought up another's.

(28) Ibid. pag. 121.

(29) Ibid. pag. 124.

[G] . . . And that he made presents and promises to King Edward's mistress, in order to obtain the restitution of his Episcopal temporalities.] This is the fourth calumny: our author indeed refutes it, but by arguments very far short of the strength of those which he alleges against the third. The express terms of the accusation run thus: 'Regi jam ægroto, ipsaque senectute confecto semper aderat atque ministrabat quedam femina Alicia Pierce, quæ Regi languido & infirmo obsecuta majorem quam ipse dux (30) cum Rege inuit gratiam: hanc præſenti mercede & uberiori promiſſa ſpe Wickam adduxit ut à Rege reſtitui ſibi ablata Episcopatus jura tam quæ ante percepta & in ſiſco reſervata eſſent, quam omnia prædia procuraret, quod illa invito duce, continuo impetravit' (31). - - - The King being now ſick and worn out with age, a certain woman, whoſe name was Alice Pierce, always attended and ſerved him. She, by humouring him in his weak and languishing condition, got more into his favour than the Duke himſelf. Wickham prevailed upon her by a preſent he made her, and the promiſe of another much greater, to ſolicit the King to reſtore the temporalities of his biſhopric which had been taken from him, as well thoſe which he had enjoyed before, and which were ſequeſtered in the Exchequer, as all the lands belonging to it. This ſhe immediately obtained for him in ſpite of the Duke. He refutes this. I. By the hatred which this immodest woman bore to the Biſhops. II. By the very ſmall confidence which the corruption of her manners could allow any perſon to have in her. III. By her ſtriſt friendſhip with Wickham's enemies. IV. By the expreſs terms of the Letters-Patents granted to this Prelate for his re-eſtabliſhment, which contain the reaſons of it, and declare the conſent of the Duke of Lancaſter, of all the nobility, and all the King's council: they are ſubſcribed at the bottom in this manner, per ipſam Regem & conſilium, - - - by the King and his council. The Apologiſt's exclamation ought not to be forgotten. 'O indignæ calumniatores, & chartarum publicarum malicioſes

(30) That is, the Duke of Lancaſter.

(31) Ibid. pag. 125, ex Actwor-tho in Vita Sado-bured.

he was employed in the expulsion of Wickliff [H].

(32) Ibid. pag. 126.

liciosos interpretes, qui quod instrumenta Regalia per sanctum Senatum fieri afferunt, id per impurum scortum factitatum prædicant. Num scortum & confilium istis idem sonat (32)? - - - O notorious calumniators, and malicious interpreters of the public records, who pretend, That to be the action of a strumpet which the royal acts assert to have been done by the sacred council. Do the names, council and strumpet, signify the same thing with them? He thinks it very strange, that, notwithstanding this declaration of King Edward, the liberalitate Episcopi ex promissione in difficultatibus suis atque Regni adductum fuisse ut ea bona restitueret, - - - that he had engaged himself by a promise to restore these temporalities, being induced to it by the liberal assistance which the Bishop gave him in the straits that he and his kingdom were reduced to, any should presume to assign, as the cause of this restitution, the good offices of a courtesan, purchased with money. V. Lastly, he urges that King Richard, after the flight of Alice Pierce (33), confirmed this restitution by the advice of his council, in which were present the Duke of Lancaster, the Prelates, Earls, and Barons. I am inclined to believe, that this calumny, of which we have just now seen the refutation, is false; but I do not find that it is refuted by very strong reasons. Thousands of instances prove these two things: first, that those who are persecuted by a King's mistress, will apply to her to be re-established, and endeavour to gain her by dint of money and promises, without ever distrusting her on a supposition that a professed whore must be capable of all sorts of perfidy; secondly, that an act of Replevy, obtained by the interest of a mistress, runs in the same stile, with that obtained by lawful means. A King, who grants any thing at the solicitation of his mistress, may easily engage his council to approve it; and if he doth not do it, his mistress herself will be able to gain the chief Counsellors: and then the most favourable and glorious clauses are inserted in the Letters-Patents, and no part of the usual form is omitted. To this may be added, that there have been some persons unjustly oppressed, who have been restored by no other means but by buying the good offices of a mistress. Nor ought we to be surprized, that after the disgrace of such a woman a confirmation of the Patent was obtained: for that is not at all extraordinary. So that the arguments of our author do not seem to me to be very strong. But it would indeed have been enough to have laid it upon the authors of this calumny to prove it. What is very certain, is, that King Edward's mistress could do every thing with him at that time, and that her power ended only with the life of that Prince. This King was unexpectedly surprized by the loss of his speech all at once, so that he had only time to express some pious sentiments, (to which he was exhorted by a Priest) by his gesture and eyes. This did not happen by reason that he was not long and dangerously ill; but the famous Alice Peers, too really his mistress, had so possessed him, that no person could have access to speak to him before he himself was speechless. Then this dissolute party, having in haste torn off the diamond rings which he wore on his finger, withdrew, and left him in the hands of a Chaplain, who could only draw some signs of penitence from him; which indeed, tho' late, when sincere are good; but are rarely sincere when so late (34).

(33) Quom jam Alicia Peers le in fugam cum sua peste ac pernicio convertisset. Ibid.

I shall by the by say, that the fifth calumny, refuted in the above-cited book (35), is, that Wickham was banished, and continued three years in exile, according to some, and seven entire years, according to others. But this is utterly false, for he never lay under any sentence of banishment. I add farther, that he was never deprived of his bishopric, so that the fee of Winchester was never vacant from 1367 to 1404. Whence it necessarily follows that Wickliff was refused this bishopric in 1367, if what is pretended by Varillas (36) were true, viz. that his not being able to obtain that bishopric disgusted him, that it inspired him with a design of setting up for a Heresiarch; but if he was not able to obtain it that year, one of the reasons by which Mr de Larroque (37) refutes Varillas concerning the consequences of this pretended refusal, will become yet more specious.

[H] He was employed in the expulsion of Wickliff.]

My author touches only accidentally on this particular, when he is proving that our Bishop of Winchester was more learned than his detractors imagined.

Quid animi fuisse putas Richardo Regi quum Wickham anno Regni sui septimo una cum Courteney Cantuariensi Archiepiscopo Oxonium contra virum acerrimum Johannem Wicklesum mitteret? An mediocri eruditionis & ingenii esse oportebat, qui (quod ille ibi præstitit) dissentientes in religione opiniones conciliaret, & tam celebrem & acutum virum suspectæ fidei redargueret & ex Academiæ sinibus exterminaret (38)? - - - What do you think was King Richard's motive for sending Wickham in the seventh year of his reign, together with Courteney Archbishop of Canterbury, to Oxford, against that subtle and acute man John Wickliff? Is it reasonable to suppose that he was only a man of inconsiderable parts and erudition, who reconciled the differences of opinion in religious matters, and convicted the great Wickliff of being a Heretic, and expelled him from the bounds of the university? Observe here a remarkable particular of which the Jesuit Maimbourg (39), Mr Varillas, nay, even Mr de Larroque, as well as several others, have made no manner of mention; viz. that the Archbishop of Canterbury was in person at Oxford with the Bishop of Winchester, in the year 1383, or 1384 (40), in order to expel Wickliff from that university.

(34) Father D'Oriens, Hist. des Révolutions d'Angleterre, liv. v. pag. 68, 69, Tom. ii.

(35) Hæzer, Description, pag. 127, 128.

(36) Varillas, Hist. Angl. p. 2.

(37) Larroque, Hist. Angl. pag. 13, 14.

(38) Historia Descriptio, pag. 117, The Records of London are quoted.

(39) Maimbourg, Hist. de grand Schisme d'Occident, Tom. i. pag. 177, & de D. D. Edm.

(40) The French year of Richard is partly in 1383 and partly in 1384.

WIDA (a) (HERMAN DE) son to William de Wida Count of the empire, was made Archbishop of Cologne in the year 1515 (b). Long after he was elected Bishop of Paderbon, and persecuted the Protestants of that place [A]. In the year 1536 he held a council,

(a) It is more commonly written so in Germany, than Wida, or Weida. See Seckendorf, Hist. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 435.
(b) Seckendorf, ibid. Theod. de Beza, in Iconibus, says it was in the year 1510.

• Chytræus, ad ann. 1532.

(1) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luthéranisme, liv. iii, pag. 264, Dutch Edit.

(2) Irritatus plebis Paderbornensis petulantia & à Caenonia simulata. Seckendorf, Hist. Luther. lib. iii, pag. 435.

[A] He persecuted the Protestants of Paderborn.] As a commentary upon this I shall cite Father Maimbourg's words. 'After' the death of Eric of Brunswick, Bishop of Paderborn, Wida being elected by the Canons of that church to succeed him, with a design that he should oppose the Lutherans who began to establish themselves there, he performed it so well, that being assisted by his friends, who, together with several good troops, accompanied him, he made himself master of that city, drove out all the preachers he found in it, utterly abolished Luthéranism there, and prohibited any persons professing it on pain of death (1). Mr Seckendorf observes, that our Herman was excited to this rigour by the Canons, and by his resentment against the influence of the populace (2), and that, notwithstanding this, he gave some proofs of moderation. For he did not molest two Ministers who had escaped out of prison, and pardoned sixteen citizens who were condemned to death. To this mercy, the intercession of their relations, and the executioner's refusing to behead them, contributed very much. Civibus Paderbornensibus XVI ad mortem condemnatis gratiam fecit, precibus supplicum & adstantium, immo & carnificis facto singulari, motus: Hic enim gladium, quo productus in forum decollare justus erat, iudicibus publice tradidit, negans, se innocentium cruore manus polluturum esse (3). - - - He pardoned sixteen citizens of Paderborn who had been condemned to death, being moved by the prayers and intreaties of those who were standing by, and even by a very singular action of the executioner; for the sword with which the executioner was ordered to behead those who were brought forth into the market-place, he publicly delivered to the judges, and said, that he would not stain himself with the blood of the innocent.' [B] He a council, the regulations of which were very much approved [B]; for being a very good man, whose life was exemplary, he passionately desired the establishment of good order in his diocese. He not only endeavoured to restore a good discipline there, but also intended a reformation of doctrine, and having consulted Melancthon, and had several secret conferences with Bucer, he caused the latter to preach at Bonn, and engaged the former to come thither some time after [C]. The majority of the canons of Cologne opposed this enterprize, and not being able to gain any advantage by the books which they

[B] He held a council, the regulations of which were very much approved. Let us again cite Maimbourg.

• Concil. Col-
lon. 7. t. 14.
Concil. edit. Paris.

(4) Maimbourg,
ubi supra.

(5) It is in the sixth book of Sadole's letters,
pag. 559, Edit.
Lugd. 1554, in 8vo.

(6) Seckendorf,
ubi supra, pag.
138, 139.

• Being apprehensive that the Lutherans already spread in the neighbouring provinces, would insensibly introduce the venom of their Heresy into his electorate, he, in conjunction with his suffragans, held a council at Cologne, where he made the most excellent Canons that could be desired for the maintenance of religion in its purity, the re-establishment of Ecclesiastical discipline in its vigour, and the regulation of the duties and morals of all true Christians in every station (4). Cardinal Sadole very much commended this Council of Cologne, but thought it somewhat strange that purgatory was not mentioned in it. See his letter to Herman (5). For the rest, this Archbishop was not much afraid that the Lutherans should introduce the venom of their Heresy into the electorate of Cologne: Father Maimbourg was ignorant of his real sentiments: read Mr Seckendorf, and you will find that this Prelate was already at that juncture more than half a Lutheran. * Hermannum jam tum meliora intendisse, ex epistola M. S. Joh. Lumpii, Doct. Colon. quæ inter Heckerianæ extat, & d. 6. Oct. hoc anno data est, apparet. Scribit enim: Archiepiscopus nondum audit, quæ sentit, prode, ob Monachorum & Theologorum superstitiosa supercilia, quibus adhuc, infidum est, quod ex eorum non prodit culina, speratur tamen finis. Addit: Minoritanum, qui Præsuli à confestim & sacra concione est, cucullum ferre adhuc, sed aliud sentire: in templo majore concionari aliquam puram Evangelii doctrinam, aduolantibus ex vicinis oppidulis, etiam ex Hassia ditte præcul diffusa, non nullibus ut eos vix capiat Templum (6). --- It appears by a manuscript letter of John Lumpius, Doctor at Cologne, (which letter is to be found among the Heckerianæ, dated the sixth of October that year) that the Archbishop had even then better sentiments. The Archbishop, says Lumpius, dares not yet declare his sentiments, for fear of the superstitious frowns of the Monks and Divines, who still look upon every thing as infidum which does not come out of their own kitchen. Nevertheless an end of this is to be hoped for. He adds, that the minor Friar, who was Father Confessor and Preacher to the Archbishop, still wore the cowl, but that his opinion was changed; that in the great church there was one preached the pure doctrine of the Gospel; and that so many thousands of people crowded thither from the neighbouring villages, and even from the remote dominions of Hesse, that the church could hardly contain them.

[C] Having consulted Melancthon, and had several secret conferences with Bucer, he caused the latter to preach . . . and engaged the other to come . . . some time after. He deputed Peter Medman to Melancthon in the year 1539, and wished he would come to him immediately, but his journey was deferred to the year 1543. Bucer being sent for by this Archbishop, came to him towards the end of 1541, and after several conferences which were very well relished by that Prelate, he went back to Strasbourg, from whence he returned to Herman the following year, and preached publicly at Bonn. He also informed the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, that this Prelate had very good designs; but that he wanted encouragement, by reason of his age which made him act timorously and slowly. Those Princes did not fail to write to him in order to confirm him in his Christian intentions. He thanked them, and informed them that he had no other aim than the glory of God, and the happiness of his neighbours. He had before entreated the Elector of Saxony to send Melancthon to him; who accordingly set forwards on his journey about the end of April 1543, and, in conjunction with Bucer, drew up a project of Reformation, which the Archbishop caused to be read to him, and he himself carefully examined it (7). Some particulars, which did not favour much

(7) Taken from Seckendorf, ubi
supra, pag. 436.

V O L. V.

of Protestantism, were overlooked in this project to please him; which obliged Luther to complain of Melancthon's and Bucer's connivance. The Elector of Saxony was not better pleased with this conduct, tho' the Landgrave told him, it was not to be expected that the work could be perfected all at once (8). We ought to know that the Archbishop was desirous to retain all the ceremonies which were not impious, and that each order should preserve its privileges: he did not pretend to abolish Episcopacy. * Propositum scilicet erat Hermannus ut ex Melancthonis literis colligeret, Chytræus etiam Lib. 16. fol. 460. aperius tradit, ceremonias veteres omnes, quotquot sine pietate servari possent, una cum collegiorum dignitate, libertate, prærogativis & juribus omnibus, retinere, ut moderatæ & pie ordinationis Ecclesiæ Cathedralis exemplum esse posset: sed eventus ostendit, in rebus tantopere corruptis modum difficillime inveniri; quapropter omnis ista cautio inutilis fuit, & retenta illa pompa, doctrinæ puritati incrementa omnia subtracta fuerunt (9). --- Herman proposed, as may be gathered from Melancthon's letters, and as Chytræus more plainly asserts, to retain all the old ceremonies which were not impious, together with the dignity, freedom, and all the rights and privileges of the colleges; that there might be an example of a moderate and pious administration in his Episcopal church. But the event showed that, when things are so far corrupted, it is very difficult to find a medium; for which reason all this caution proved useless, and the retaining of that pomp put an entire end to the increase of the purity of doctrine. The project of Reformation which he published, did not at all mention either Luther, or the Pope (10), and he took care to express himself so cautiously concerning the LOR's Supper, that the Zuinglian's could agree to it (11). Luther was very well pleased that his name was not mentioned (12), because he was well assured it might have deterred people; but he condemned the other parts of this cautious conduct, and became so violently enraged against Melancthon, that, perhaps, he had never been reconciled to him, if the latter had not laid the fault on Bucer, and if the Elector of Saxony had not laboured to prevent an open rupture betwixt them. * Non latuit Melancthonem indignatio Lutheri, immo tantopere eum afflixit, ut de deferenda Wittenbergæ cogitaret, si Luthero invisus esset, aut quod futurum esse dicebatur, publice ab illo refutaretur. Sed pia Electoris Saxonie providentia & industria Pontani placatus est Lutherus, & Melancthonis excusationem accepit, dicentis, se neque caput illud reformationis Colonienfis de sacra Cœna composuisse, neque Bucerum celasse, quæ in eo desideraret, hunc tamen admonitionis suæ nullam habuisse rationem. Sic ira Lutheri vehementius in Bucerum versa est (13). --- Melancthon was not ignorant of Luther's indignation; nay, he was so much concerned at it, that he resolved to leave Wittenberg, if he should prove obnoxious to Luther, or in case (for such a thing was talked of) he should be publicly confuted by him. But by the pious care of the Elector of Saxony, and by Pontanus's means, Luther was appeased, and admitted the excuse of Melancthon, who said that it was not he who composed the article of Reformation at Cologne touching the LOR's Supper, and that he had freely told Bucer what he thought was wanting in it, but that he had shown no regard to his admonition. Thus the edge of Luther's indignation was turned against Bucer.

This project of Reformation was printed at Buchen, if we believe the Preface, and that is all we can know of it; the time of the impression not being mentioned. A second edition appeared at Bonn, in 1543, printed by Laurence Mylius, or von der Matlen. And a third was printed the following year. These three impressions were in the German language. But the Latin edition, printed at Bonn, in 1545, by the same Mylius, is intitled, Nostra Hermann, ex gratia Dei

(8) Non Geli placuit illa simulatione Electori monito licet a Landgravo quod non omnia sub initium exacte constitui possent. Id. ibid. pag. 437, num. 3.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Hermannus ea placuit lenitas qua etiam cavet ne in toto scripto aliquid contra Pontificem nominatum spargatur. Id. ibid. pag. 448, d.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Id. ibid.

(c) See the remark [D].

(d) Chytræus, in Saxonia, ad ann. 1552, in fine.

they published, they had recourse to the Pope and the Emperor. The former excommunicated and deposed the Archbishop, and was so effectually seconded by Charles V, that our prelate was forced to renounce his dignity in the year 1547 [D]. He retired to his paternal estate (c), where he died on the thirteenth of August 1552, being eighty years old (d). His scheme of reformation was more like that of England, than that of Germany

Archiepiscopi Colonienfis & Principis Electoris, simplex ac pia Deliberatio, qua ratione christiana, & in verbo Dei fundata, Reformatio doctrinae, administrationis divinarum Sacramentorum, ceremoniarum, totiusque curae animarum, & aliorum ministeriorum Ecclesiasticorum, apud eos, qui nostrae pastoralis curae commendati sunt, tantisper instituta sit, donec Dominus dederit constitui meliorem, vel per liberam & christianam Synodum, sive generalem sive nationalem, vel per Ordines Imperii Nationis Germanicae in Spiritu sancto congregatos. The copies of the (14) Taken from Seckendorf, ibid. pag. 443.

(15) The Latin edition I make use of is that of Louvain, printed for Servatius Zaltinus 1544, in 8vo.

(16) Seckendorf, ibid. supra, pag. 438. Clari Colonienfis de doctrina & vocatione Martini Bucer, which was ascribed to Everard Billicus, a Carmelite, and so stuffed with scurrilous boresoneries, that the Canons of Cologne would not license it; wherefore the first title, Judicium Cleri & Academiæ, was struck out, and the other made use of, as we find in one of Melancthon's letters. 'Colonie liber editus est, non tam contra Bucerum, quam contra universam doctrinam Ecclesiarum nostrarum, & contra nostros Principes. Poeta operis est Carmelita ille bene fagnatus, & Bacchi ac Veneris sacerdos. Titulum operi fecerant: Judicium Cleri & Academiæ. Cum autem faniore in Collegio quidam Comites vidissent, scriptum dignius esse scurrile, quam Clero, iusserunt mutari titulum, ac testati sunt, id opus non probari suo Collegio. Addita est ergo tituli correctio, pro Clero jubent legi Clerum secundarium, nothos videlicet Cleros intelligunt. Petulantissime convitiatur doctrinae & Luthero, & in loco de conjugio spurcitie & obsecratione verborum utitur, quam vix in lenone ferrent aures mediocrium hominum. Convitia ex Plauti fabulis lecta sunt, quibus fortasse Carmelita ille magis delectatur, quam Psalmis (17). - - - A book

(17) Melancthon. Epist. ad Crucigerum. It is the lexicon of the ibid. book. It was written at Bonn, in 1543.

(18) Seckendorf, ibid. supra.

(19) See Seckendorf, ibid. pag. 443.

was published at Cologne, not so much against Bucer, as against the whole doctrine of our Churches, and against our Princes. The author is that big-bellied Carmelite, who may very well be taken for the Priest of Bacchus and Venus. The book was originally called, The Judgment of the Clergy and the University. But when some of the more judicious Fellows of the college had observed that it was a piece more worthy of buffoons than Clergymen; they ordered the title to be changed, and publicly declared, that their college did by no means approve of the book. For this reason they corrected the title, and instead of the word Clergy, they ordered to be put in, Under Clergy. The author rails in a most saucy manner at Luther and his doctrine, and in that place where he speaks of marriage, he makes use of such filthy and obscene words as the ears of ordinary men could hardly bear from profligate fellows. Unseemly jests are picked out of Plautus's comedies, which, perhaps, that Carmelite liked better than the Psalms. Gaspar Gennep translated this tract into German (18) and Melancthon published a refutation of it. The appeal which the Chapter of Cologne brought in before the Pope, may pass for a controversial tract (19): the Archbishop caused it to be refused. The Chapter published a Programma in German, on the eighteenth of November 1544; and the Archbishop answered it on the thirteenth of December, the same year (20). In all probability, the prodigious superstition of the city of Cologne, was one of the obstacles which stifled Herman's design. That city is vastly abounds with monasteries, reliques, and images, that it may be called the Teutonic Rome. Magni autem restituta est, de qua Melancthon quassus fuit, populi superstitio, Coloniae potissimum Agrippinae, Clero, templis, sacellis, statuis, reliquiis, plus, quam ulla in Germania civitas, repleta, ita ut Romam Teutonicam esse dicant (21).

[D] He was obliged to renounce his dignity in the year 1547. He was promised assistance, that he might oppose force against force, but he chose rather to submit, in order to save his faithful subjects from the demerits of war. Read what follows, and you will find there the character of a good man: 'Constantiam profitebatur Ordines, & res ad vim spectabat: sed bonus senex Comitibus Mandercheidis & Nuenariis, nobilitatis in Archiepiscopatu facile primis, ita suadentibus obtemperans, tum misericordia Populi suumotus, & ne bello vastaretur provincia, ultro cessit, fideique & iurandum omnibus remisit. Obiit post annos sex Idibus Augusti anno 1552, in patria sua, & ut Sleidanus loquitur, qualem expevit, finem habuit. Nam, aut Evangelii propagare doctrinam, & recte constituere suae diocesis Ecclesias, aut privato sibi vivere licere, non semel optaverat: Et ab amicis aliquando motus, quantum invidiae sibi constaret ex ista religionis mutatione, respondere solebat: nihil esse, quod inopinanti posset accidere, seque jam pridem in eam casum obfirmasse mentem (22). - - - His subjects professed their refusal to stand by him, and it looked as if violence would have ensued. But the good old man complying with the advice of the Count Mandercheid and Nuenarius, who were the chief noblemen in the Archiepiscopate, and moved with compassion for his people, whom he was willing to save from the devastations of war, submitted of his own accord, and absolved them all from their oath of fidelity. He died six years after, on the thirteenth of August 1552, in his own country; and, as Sleidan says, his end was suitable to his desire. For he had been often than once bearded to wish that he might rather leave it in his power to propagate the doctrine of the Gospel, and to settle the Church upon a right footing in his dominions, or else that he might live a private man: and sometimes when his friends advised him to consider how much hatred he would draw upon himself by this change of religion, he used to answer, that nothing which should happen to him could surprize him unawares, for that he had prepared himself against all events.' Erasmus would have admired this conduct, he being so charmed with a saying of Otho, that he thought it very well deserved the Roman empire without prolonging the war, chose rather to die than occasion it's continuation. Cum inter ethnicum etiam hoc animo repertus sit Otho, ut potius duxerit spontanea morte vitam abrumpere, quam imperium tot hominum vitam mercari, vir vel ob hoc ipsum dignus imperio, si fortuna virtuti faveret (23). This thought hath something in it so heroic, that it is pity such an effeminate person as Otho should discover so much greatness of mind. But, as we have shewn elsewhere (24), his body and his mind were not of the same temper (25). The former was drowned in effeminacy, but the latter retained a large vigour; I speak of that vigour which forms itself on the ideas of equity. He always abhorred civil wars, and never would have attempted to set up against Galba, if he had not believed that affair would terminate without any effusion of blood. Othonem etiam privatum usque adeo detestatum civilia arma, ut memorante quodam inter epulas de Calpurnio Brutique exitu coaruerit: nec concurrebat cum Galba fuisse, nisi consideret sine bello rem transigi posse (26). When he resolved to kill himself, he had a sufficient number of forces to have continued the war with just hopes of success; but because it would have cost the

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 448.

(22) Id. ibid. See also ibid. in Iconibus. Non modo, sed et conscientiam tuam liberasti, sed teipsum quoque memorabili sceleris omnibus exemplo spernit, quem ultro vi majorem, prorsus boni consilium, placide Christianique vivere, quam licet immenso etiam deperitatum novum iniquum tamen huius

(23) Erasmus. Epist. Dedic. Suetonii Dicitur Calpurnio, &c.

(24) In the remark [8], of the article SEXTONIUS: towards the end.

(25) Non erat Otho nisi mollis & corporis lenitas. Tacitus. Hist. lib. 1, cap. 2.

(26) Suetonius. ibid. cap. 2.

Germany (e). Though it cannot be denied, that this Archbishop was rather a good man than a learned man, it may yet be said, that he was not ignorant [E]. The error committed in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary is one of the most enormous that can be seen any where [F]. In the Paris edition of Moreri of 1699 (f) our Herman's article runs in Maimbourg's words.

I shall add something to the remark (g) concerning the prodigious mistake in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary [G].

lives of great numbers of men, he concluded that it would be buying the preservation of a crown at too dear a rate. This was what Erasmus thought so excellent. He had read it in Tacitus and Suetonius. Hinc inquit, (Otto) animam, hanc virtutem vestram ultra periculis objicere, nimis grande vitæ meæ pretium puto . . . Civile bellum à Vitellio cepit; & ut de principatu certaremus armis, initium illic fuit: ne pluraquam semel certemus, penes me exemplum erit, hinc Othonem posteritas æstimet . . . An ego tantum Romanæ pubis, tot egregios exercitus, sterni rursus, & Recip. eripi patiar (27). . . I should think that I bought my life at too dear a rate, if I should expose this spirit and this invincible courage of yours to any farther dangers. . . . The civil war was begun by Vitellius; and to him it is owing that we have fought once for the sovereign power: but it shall be my part to prevent our fighting more than once. From this let posterity form their character of Otto. . . . Shall I suffer the Republic to be deprived of such a number of young citizens, and of so many brave armies, by offering them up to a second havoc? Erasmus would not have failed to approve the pacific modesty of our Herman, had he lived to that time; but I do not think he would have said, that it was less surprising in a Bishop than in a Pagan.

[E] The' he was rather a good than a learned man . . . he was not ignorant. Here is another passage of Father Maimbourg: 'He was † very ignorant, and utterly unacquainted with what a Prelate ought to know, even to that degree, that he had not Latin enough to enable him to say mass and read his Breviary. In effect, when the Landgrave of Hesse, who † took him into his protection after he was perverted, one day told the Emperor, that the only crime of that Archbishop was his attempting to reform his church: Alas, answered that Prince, what can that poor man reform, who hardly understands a little Latin? He never could say above three masses in his life, two of which I have heard, and am witness that he could not read even the introit. All those excellent Canons of his Council, which are so well expressed, were not made by him who knew nothing of the matter, but by the celebrated Dr Gropperus, Archdeacon of the church of Cologne, who drew them up, and put them in the condition we now see them in (28). It is certain that Sleidan (29) recites this discourse betwixt the Emperor and the Landgrave; but he adds, that the Landgrave replied, that this Archbishop had very carefully read the German books, and understood religion very well. Sed diligenter evoluit libros Germanicos, ait ille, Et quod certo novi religionem intelligit. Melancthon informs us, that this Prelate discovered a great deal of knowledge, when the model of the Reformation was examined in his presence: Legi sibi totum librum jussit, attentissime audivit, multa de plerisque locis graviter disseruit, quædam suo judicio recte mutavit, interdum nostras sententias, re disputata, suæ opinioni prætulit. Huic labori dies sex tribuit, ac quotidie matutinas horas quatuor continas. Miratus sum Senis assiduitatem & diligentiam, ac animadverti serio hanc rem tantam ab eo agi; quod, quantum referat, intelligis. Et hæc controversiæ, pene ut artifex, dijudicat (30). . . . He ordered the whole book to be read to him, heard it with great attention, and made many solid reflexions upon the most part of it. Some proper alterations he made according to his own judgment, and sometimes after the matter had been argued, he preferred our opinion to his own. He allotted six days to this work, four hours at a time every morning. I was amazed at the old man's assiduity and diligence, and observed that he was very earnest in this important affair. Of what consequence that is you know very well. He reasons upon these controversies, as if he was perfectly master of the subject.'

[F] The error committed in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary is one of the most enormous that can be seen any where. It was by express order of Herman, that Cardinal John Gropper was strangled with his hatband for endeavouring to oppose this new religion, are the words of the supplement (31). It would be very difficult to form probable conjectures concerning this horrible fatality, if the author had not cited Beza; but when we consult the place he points at, we find what was the occasion of his mistake, and then our surprize continues, and, what is more, increases. Beza compares our Herman to JESUS CHRIST, and John Gropper to Judas. He pretends that Gropper betrayed his master, and obtained for a recompence, a string which strangled him, that is to say, a Cardinal's hat. Tu vero haud scis quam olim à Juda Christus à tuo Joanne Groppero proditus quam esset, retulit quidem hic quoque proditor stipendium peccati mortem Cardinalitii Galeri vinculis strangulatus (32). It would be infinitely more excusable to say with Father Maimbourg, that Beza childishly aiming at wit, made a wretched dull jest (33), than to find in those words an execrable crime of the Archbishop of Cologne.

[G] I shall add something . . . concerning the . . . mistake in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.] Florimond de Remond furnishes me with this addition. He says that Theodore Beza, not satisfied with employing this allusion to Judas in prose, has likewise thought fit to express it in rhyme:

Voy d'un autre côté ce malheureux Groper,
Qui son Seigneur trompant, son cœur laisse attraper, Estranglé d'un cordon d'un chapeau détestable.
De la grace divine Herman est le témoin
A celui qui du Ciel plus que du monde a soing, Groper monstre de Dieu la vengeance effroyable.

See wretched Gropper on the other hand,
Seduc'd and strangled with an impious band,
His master he betrays. While Herman shall Remain an evidence of grace to all Who bear'n before vain earthly things desire,
Lo! Gropper stands a monument of ire.

A silly fool,' adds he, 'taking Beza's words in their literal signification, wanted to persuade me, that Gropper had made a halter of his hat-band, and strangled himself with his own hands: whereas Beza only means that his strong inclination for a Cardinal's hat had taken away his speech from him, which he would otherwise have employed in the defence of Lutheranism (34). Who could have imagined that such a plain metaphor as this would occasion such groundless and ridiculous fancies.

WILHEM (DAVID LE-LIEU DE) Counsellor in the council of the Princes of Orange, and in that of Brabant, deserves to be placed amongst the illustrious men of the XVIIth century. He was descended from a very noble and ancient family [A], and born

[A] He was descended from a very noble and ancient family. It held an honourable place amongst the nobility of Artois, and Cambresis ever since the year 1096, being, besides other estates, then possessed of the lordships and seats of Bantoux, Bantoufel, Wilhem, Chantemerle, Froidebize, and Avesnes lez Gobert, &c. as appears by a decision of the council of Brabant at Brussels, on the fifth of July 1678. GEORGE LE-

LIU

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Under the word Weiden.

(g) It is the remark [F].

(27) Tacit. Hist. lib. ii, cap. xlviii. These are Suetonius's words, ubi supra, cap. ix. Moriendi imperium cepit: ut multi nec frustra opinantur, magis potest, ne tanto rerum hominumque periculo deminutionem sibi afferere perferrent, quam desperatione ulla, aut diffidentia copiarum.

† Rouer. Post. Suri Comm. Sleid. l. i.

↓ Sleid. l. 27.

(28) Maimbourg, ubi supra, pag. 265.

(29) Lib. xvii, pag. m. 438, veris.

(30) Melancthon, Epistola ecciv. lib. iv. It was written from Erford. to Camerarius, the 11th of Aug. 1543.

(31) At the word Herman, pag. 670. This article is not in Moreri's Dictionary of the Dutch edition. Note, that Moreri, calls this Archbishop, Herman de Meurs, which is wrong.

(32) Beza, in Iconibus.

(33) Maimb. ubi supra, pag. 268.

(34) Flor. & Remond. Hist. de l'Heret. liv. iii, ch. ix, num. 4, pag. 322.

born at Hamburgh on the fifteenth of May, 1588. His mother, who joined to nobility of blood [B] great piety, and great zeal for the Protestant religion, educated him with a particular care; she sent him to study at Stade, at ten years of age, under the direction of very good tutors: and after he had improved, at Hanaw, by the lectures of John George Crobius, and John Rodolphus Lavaterus, she carried him to the university of Franeker. He staid there three years, and in 1611 went from thence to Leyden, where he made great advances in Philosophy, the Civil-Law, and the Oriental languages, &c. After that, he went to France, and made some stay in the Academy of Saumur, and afterwards in 1613, he went to lodge at Thouars, in the house of the learned Andrew Rivetus, who shewed him all the marks of a very particular esteem [C], on account, amongst other excellencies, of the Theological learning he had acquired. He improved himself very much by his Levantine voyages to Grand Cairo, Jerusalem, Alexandria, &c. in the years, 1617, 1618, 1619. He was very intimate with Cyril Lucaris, and frequently conferred with him concerning the differences betwixt the Greek and Latin Churches. He received several letters from that famous Patriarch (a), which very well deserve printing; and his heirs promise accordingly to publish them to gratify the curiosity of the learned. After his return from this long voyage, he resided some years with his brother at Amsterdam [D]; but his earnest desire of a more perfect knowledge of the Oriental tongues, and an inclination for the Levant, engaged him to make a second voyage thither in the year 1625. It is certain, that he travelled like a man of parts, that is to say, he made excellent and curious observations, acquiring besides an accurate knowledge of the Arabic, Persic, and Chaldaic tongues (b). He was met in those countries by the learned Golius, who had been recommended to him [E], and they contracted a cordial and intimate friendship which lasted as long as their lives. Being returned to Holland about the year 1631, he insinuated himself so far into the esteem of Frederic-Henry, Prince

(a) See the remark [E].

(b) Besides the learned languages, which he understood to perfection, he could easily speak most languages that are now spoken in Europe, and Asia.

LEU DE WILHEM, the father of him who is the subject of this article, left Tournay at the beginning of the troubles concerning religion, being himself, together with his five brothers, out-lawed for having buried their mother without observing the ceremonies required by the Romish communion. It appears by an authentic act of the twenty-second of December 1565, that their estates were confiscated; but they endeavoured to release themselves from this act, after the year 1576, by virtue of the pacification of Ghent. JAMES LE-LEU DE WILHEM, one of the six brothers, took refuge in England, and first married Margaret de Zegre, and for his second wife Mary de Duyts. By his first wife, besides other Children, he had TIMOTHY LE-LEU DE WILHEM, born at London the twenty-sixth of November 1568, and Lord of Borgerie Finges lez-Courtrai. By the second, he had besides others, MICHAEL LE-LEU DE WILHEM, born the twenty-seventh of September 1587, who died Counsellor and Schepen of the Hague, and who had married at Delft on the twenty-fifth of May 1614, Anne de Rechtere Niece to the Secretary Adrian Duyck: his sister (1) was married to Sir Dudley Carlton (2), King James's Ambassador in Holland (3).

(1) I follow word by word the Memoir imparted to the Book-seller.

(2) Who had by her a daughter, that is still living (in 1666.) She is the widow of the Lord Ferrers, and mother of the Countess of Arran, widow of a son of the Duke of Hamilton, mother of an only daughter, who is a very rich heiress.

(3) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Book-seller. Item dic de plerisque infra Memorandis.

(4) He married the heiress of the house of Aigremont, Lady de M. Jett, &c.

[B] His mother, who joined to nobility of blood,] Her name was Gilliette van Opalsens: she was the daughter of John van Opalsens Esq; and of Joan l'Empereur d'Oppyck, filster to John l'Empereur d'Oppyck, Lord of Malerit, &c. (4), who was deputed to the Ducheys of Parma, Governors of the Low-Countries, by the city of Tournay, in conjunction with the confederate nobility. His son Antony l'Empereur d'Oppyck was the father of CONSTANTIN L'EMPEREUR, born at Bremen in 1591, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, and Counsellor to Prince Maurice, a person very well versed in the Oriental tongues, as he hath shewn by several books. He was twice married, first to Levina de Witt, daughter of the Lord of Rosenburgh, Counsellor of Amsterdam. Secondly, to Catherine Thyfius of Ky-nogen. He died in the year 1648, leaving only one daughter Sarah l'Empereur d'Oppyck, who was married to Mark du Tour, gentleman to the Prince of Orange, Father to the King of England. He died Counsellor in the Court of Brabant. But after this digression justly due to the merit of Constantin l'Empereur, I return to the mother of our David Wilhem. She was at Paris on St Bartholomew's day, and was saved from the massacre as it were, by a miracle; her husband was then at Rouen, and was also saved. Her father, John Van Opalsens, had the same good fortune some years before. He was condemned to death for his religion, the sentence was pronounced; but he escaped out of the prison of Tournay by the connivance of the goaler, and fled into England.

[C] Andrew Rivetus who shewed him, all the marks of a particular esteem.] To know the mutual friendship, which they contracted, and the peculiar esteem Rivetus had for him, we need only call our eye on the Epistle Dedicatory to his commentary on the decalogue (5). It also gives a very great character of the virtue, learning, piety, and other excellent qualities of David Wilhem.

[D] With his brother.] That is, with PAUL LE-LEU DE WILHEM, the Father of DAVID LE-LEU DE WILHEM, still living (6), who is President of the Schepens, and receiver of the city of Amsterdam. His wife is Hillegonda Van Beuningen, sister to the late Mr Conrad Van Beuningen, so well known by his embassies.

[E] The learned Golius, who had been recommended to him.] I have seen the original of the letter which Rivetus wrote to Mr de Wilhem (7) on the twentieth of October 1625, and from thence I have extracted these words: 'Servo adhuc tibi literas itineris tui Hierosolymitani, & eas quas à Patriarcha Alexandrino acceptas mihi communicasti quas vel tibi, vel ei qui tuo nomine eas petet, restitum cum vobis. Commendatione mea apud te non opus habet. Clariss. Golius, vir in rara eruditione, rara pietate & modestia præditus, nostro defuncto Erpenio intimus, & mihi tam proprio nomine quam tali necessitudine charissimus, &c. I still keep for you, the letters, which you received in your journey to Jerusalem, together with those of the Patriarch of Alexandria, which you were so good as to communicate to me. I shall restore them, as soon as you will, either to yourself, or to any one that you shall commission to receive them. Mr Golius, a man of rare erudition, singular piety, and great modesty, does not stand in need of my recommendation to you. He was intimately acquainted with our deceased friend Erpenius, for whose sake, and no less for his own, he is exceedingly dear to me, &c.' This informs us that Rivetus was, at that time, the depository of the Patriarch Cyril's letters to Mr de Wilhem. He has acquainted the public with the correspondence which his friend kept up with Cyril: as appears by these words we find in the Epistle Dedicatory which I have already quoted. 'Ex iis (retracatory) etiam ex ipsa Aegypto, quæ tabernaculo Dei intervirent abstulisti non pauca, aliis liberaliter communicaturus, ad communem utilitatem. Inter quæ non minima sunt, quæ ex intimâ illâ admiffione cum Reverendiss. Cyrillo tum Patriarcha Alexandrino, haufisti; cujus communicationis fructus, & sedulitatis tuæ in eo de rebus nostris plenus informando utilitatem, ringentibus adversariis, etiamnum colligimus & percipimus, postquam evehus est ad summam inter Orientales Christianos dignitatem. Quæ

(5) Ad Amplissimum præfatum sanctissimum pietate & multiplici eruditione virum D. Davidem de Wilhem. Tride honorabile, pios et literat. David de Wilhem.

(6) I write this in the year 1666. (7) Who was then at Aleppo.

Prince of Orange, that he was made a Counsellor in his Highness's council at the Hague. He married a filter of the celebrated Mr de Zuylichem (c), a lady of great parts. He had some children by her [F], as we shall see below. The States-General having made very considerable conquests in the province of Brabant, by the victorious arms of Prince Frederic-Henry, augmented the council of that province in the year 1634, bestowed a counsellor's place on our Mr DE WILHEM, and made him Superintendent of that country in 1640. As he loved and understood the sciences and the liberal arts, the great business in which so many posts engaged him, never hindered his studying hard, and keeping up an extensive correspondence with the Learned [G]. He took pleasure in protecting and serving them on all occasions at the court and elsewhere. He had a very fine library, furnished with the most excellent books in all faculties, besides a large number of very curious manuscripts (d) in Arabic, Persian, Chaldaic, &c. The present of mummies, manuscripts, and such other rarities, which he made to the university of Leyden [H], is still preserved there as an ornament. He died of the Stone on the twenty-seventh of January 1658, having faithfully, and with great application, served three Princes of Orange, namely Frederic-Henry, William II, and William-Henry, at present King of England (e).

(d) This may be confirmed by a passage of Frederic Spanheim, Vindic. Exercit. de Grat. universali, Part. i, pag. 67, wherein he says that David de Wilhem è tenebris eruit tractatum de tribus questionibus, compositum à Lupo Servato Abbate Ordinis Benedicti, Rabani discipulo, qui vixit octavo seculo, & mihi communicavit.

(e) Taken from a Memoir im-

(8) Andreas Rivetus, Epist. Dedicat. Commentar. in Decalog. Oper. Tom. i, pag. 1223.

* Quæ argumento sunt, quantæ fuerit in te propagandæ veræ Religionis cura, etiam inter remotissimos à nobis (8). From these countries, as well as from Egypt itself, you brought away many things, that were to be of no small use to the Church of God, and you intend generously to communicate them to others, for the public advantage. Among these what you learnt from your intimate familiarity with the most Reverend Cyril, then Patriarch of Alexandria, is not the least considerable: and even now since he had been raised to the highest dignity among the eastern Christians, we reap the fruits, and, notwithstanding the malicious scuffs of our adversaries, feel the benefit of your correspondence with him, and of the pains you took to inform him more particularly concerning our affairs. All these are proofs of your great diligence in propagating the true religion even among those people who are the most remote from us.

[F] A lady of great parts. He had some children by her. Her name was Constantia Huygens, and she was very well read. Mr Des Cartes highly esteemed her, and readily, nay with great deference, desired to know her opinion on the new Philosophical ideas which he had invented. She survived her husband about ten years, and died on the first of December 1667, very much regretted by all the judicious people of the Hague. Mr de Wilhem left behind him three daughters and one son, MAURICE LE-LEU DE WILHEM, at present Dean of the Council and Feodal Court of Brabant, sitting at the Hague (9), who is a gentleman of great honour, enriched with a very great stock of learning and merit; and whose conversation is most entertaining. I speak by experience, he being one of the first acquaintance which I had the honour to make at my arrival in Holland. After he had completed his studies, he travelled in Italy, France, Germany, Hungary, Sweden, and several other places, where he gained the esteem of all eminent persons. He accompanied Mr de Zuylichem his uncle to Orange in the year 1665, when that principality was restored with all the necessary formalities to its lawful sovereign. He was then received a Doctor of Law with great applause (10). He hath been always very curious, not only in the antiquities of his own country, but the Roman also. His strong inclination for these made him interrupt his study of the practical part of the law in 1670, in order to travel a second time in a more advanced age; and having staid some months at Paris, he set forward for Italy with Don Francisco Brancaccio (11), nephew to the Cardinal of that name, and in company with Messieurs de Grancei, the sons of the Marshal. He stayed a whole year at Rome, in order to search into whatever was remarkable in that famous city. Being returned into Holland, he diligently applied himself to inquire into the law of nations, and the interests of the Princes and states of Europe. His genius led him to it, and his acquaintance with several languages furnished him with great helps for that study. In November 1671, he went into Sweden with his Excellency Mr de Haren, Ambassador from the United Provinces, and was chosen (12) by the States-General to take care of their affairs at that court, when that Ambassador was upon the point of his return. A few days after, the same States bestowed on him the place of Counsellor in the Court of Brabant, in the room of Mr Fagel, promoted to be their Register. Having acquired a very considerable acquaintance at the Court of Sweden, and standing very well with the Chancellor de la Gardie, and the other Senators of that kingdom, the States of Holland resolved in June 1673, to send him to that court, with the character of Deputy-Extraordinary of the United Provinces. The following year he was twice nominated to the office of Counsellor at the Court of Holland, first on the part of the towns and afterwards on the part of the nobility. In 1683, he married the eldest daughter of Mr Timmers, Burgomaster of Rotterdam, who has been Director of the India company, and several times Deputy to the Admiralty of the Maes (13) (§ 2).

(§ 2) He has by her a fine family of children, viz. DAVID LE-LEU DE WILHEM, Lord of Barlicum, of Middelrode, &c. Counsellor in the Council and Feodal Court of Brabant, by the voluntary demission of his father Lord of Woelwyk, who had been a long time Dean and fifteen years President of that court: PAUL-SEBASTIAN, and CONSTANTIN, LE-LEU DE WILHEM, who have taken their degrees in law in the university of Leyden; and MARY-CONSTANCE LE-LEU DE WILHEM, married to Mr William Paedt's Counsellor of the city of Leyden.

[G] An extensive correspondence with the learned. And above all, with Salmasius, Heurnius, Rivetus, Des Cartes, Heinsius, Vossius, Junius, Manasseh-Ben Israel, who dedicated to him his treatise de Creatione (14). The letters which he received from them and several other illustrious men, lie in heaps amongst the papers of his son Mr de Wilhem, who, if he had but leisure to select them, would find great numbers of which he might make a considerable present to the Republic of Letters. He would likewise find there pieces in manuscript like that which has been seen above (15).

[H] The present . . . which he made to the university of Leyden. Here is a public testimony of it: Id mihi silentio non est prætereundum, quod erga hanc nostram Academiam, studiorum tuorum olim promotricem, matrem proinde tuam, liberalem admodum te præbueris: factum est enim id curâ tuâ & ære tuo, ut Theatrum in eâ Anatomicum, tot raris & pretiosis skeiniosis, exterorum omnium qui illud invisunt animos in admirationem rapiat; inter quæ eminent duo condita cadavera (Mumias vocant) antiquissima, quæ in Ægypto eruta, & à te redempta, integerrima, te mittente, ad nos pervenerunt (16). . . . I must not forget to mention your generosity to our university, which formerly gave you your education, and is consequently your mother: to your care and expence we owe it that the Anatomical theatre, by the many rare and curious things contained in it, excites the wonder of all foreigners who come to see it. Among the rest, there are two very antient mummies, which being found out in Egypt, and purchased by you, came very safe and entire from you to us.

(c) See his article.

(13) Taken (as far) from a Memoir imported to the Bookeller.

† Taken from a Memoir communicated to the Bookeller, in the year 1719.

(14) That Epistle Dedicatory deserves to be consulted: It may serve for a proof to this article.

(15) Remark [L], of the article BORE.

(16) Rivetus, ubi supra.

(9) He was made President of it in the month of September 1703.

(10) See Mr Chambrun's Relation, printed at Orange in 1666, pag. 161.

(11) He had been a Captain of Horse in the service of the King of Spain, in the Low-Countries.

(12) By a resolution taken on the 26th of August 1671.

VOL. V.

7 C

WIMPINA

(a) It is a small town of Odenwald, in the Diocese of Wurtzburg.

(b) In the year 1506.

(c) Taken from the book published by Joachim-John Mæderus at Helmstad 1660, and written by an anonymous author with the title of Scriptorium insignium . . . Centuria.

(d) Seckendorf, Hist. Lutheran.
lib. i, pag. 25.
num. 1.

(1) At Helm-stadt in the year 1660. in 4to.

WIMPINA (CONRAD), Divinity Professor at Francfort on the Oder in the XVIIth century, was born at Buchen (a). He acquired a great reputation by his public as well as private lectures at Leipsic, in Philosophy, Divinity, and Poetry, &c. He had great crowds of auditors, and at the same time raised the envy of several people. These not being able to obscure his glory, by the sophistical subtilties which they proposed to him, and to which he learnedly answered, had recourse to calumnies and libels. He was obliged to appear at the tribunal of the Archbishop of Magdeburg, Primate of Germany, where he triumphed over his enemies. He was in a splendid manner promoted to the degree of Doctor of Divinity : a Cardinal-Legate, to whom he made a speech in St Paul's church at Leipsic, and who admired his eloquence, caused that degree to be conferred on him. Wimpina was presented by the whole faculty of Divinity. The reputation of this doctor advanced so high, that the Marquisses of Brandenburg designing to found an university at Francfort on the Oder, made him offers of a very considerable salary to be Professor there. He accepted the proposal, and went thither to lay (b) the foundation of that new university, where he became rector of two colleges, and first Professor of Divinity. He published several books (c) [A]. He was one of Luther's antagonists [B], and passed for the real author of the Theses which appeared under the name of the Dominican John Tezelius against this reformer (d).

[A] He published several books.] The anonymous author of the catalogue of illustrious men, published by Joachim-John Maderus (1), mentions several books written by Wimpina before the year 1514; but he makes no distinction between those already printed, and those which were not. However the catalogue of them runs as follows: Editio proprietatum logicarum in commentatione non vulgaris libri IV. De erroribus Philosophorum in fide Christiana. De nobilitate celestis corporis. De eo an animati cæli possint dici. De nobilitate animarum cæli. De fato opus infigne & præclarum. Palillogia de Theologico fastidio. Panegyrici de Christi mirabilitate ac sublimitate. Apologeticus in sacra Theologia defensionem. Apologia secundata contra obstrationem Theologia. Apologia tertia ad Mellerstinas offensiones & denigrationes S. Theologia. Apologia quarta contra Laconium Mellerst. pro defensione Theologia. Apologia quinta pro repressione errorum Mellerst. Cribratio in tergiversationes Martini Mellerst. De ortu, progressu, & fructu S. Theologia. Super sententias libri IV. Præcepta cogitandi & rhetorice orationes. Opus quoddamque disputationis mirum & varium. Orationes & Carmina. I do not in the least doubt but this Martin Mellerst, against whom Wimpina so often drew his pen, was the same Martin Mellerst of whom our anonymous author speaks particularly under number thirty-one, and of whose works he inserts a catalogue, amongst which we find no mark of his controversy with Wimpina. This Martin Mellerst bore the name of his country which is situated, in Franconia, and taught the Philosophy of the Thomists at Leipzig, for the space of twenty years, with great reputation ; after which, he applied himself to the study of Physic, and being admitted Doctor in that science, became so famous, that Frederic, Elector of Saxony, chose him for his Physician (2).

As for the rest, Wimpina's book of Divinationes is one of his principal works; but he is charged with stealing it from Picus Mirandula (3). Here therefore is another author to be added to Thomafius's catalogue of Plagiaries. This tract of Divinationes was printed with several others of Wimpina, at Cologne in the year 1531, in folio. And three tomes of the said author were published at Francfort on the Oder, in 1528, of Setisii, Erroribus, ac Schismatibus, together with the tragicæ de Providentiâ et de Fortuna, in folio.

[B] He was one of Luther's antagonists. [H]e was one of the four Divines of Brandenburg, who, in the year 1530, refuted the articles of faith which Luther had published, and which served for a foundation to the Augsburg Confession. He was one of those Divines whom the Catholic Princes brought to the Diet that year (4). They chose the most able disputants (5); and finding that the first conferences between the deputies on both sides, did not make way for an accommodation, and supposing that the multitude of disputants, on each side, kept them at a distance from the ways of peace, they reduced the whole number of Divines to three of each side only. Those of the Romish party were Eccius, Wimpina, and Cochleus (6): whereas we may conclude that Mr Konig is mistaken in placing Conrad Wimpina's death in the year 1529.

(2) Ex Centuria Scriptor. insignium, in lucem edita à Joush. Joh. Madero.

(3) Toto clam pere ex Pico piori
ma. Mart. del Rio, Disq. Magic
lib. i^o, cap. ii,
Quæst. vii, §. ii,
pag. m, 247.

(4) Seckendorf,
Hift. Lutherana.
lib. ii, pag. 152

(5) Addeſſi
erant à variis principibus in Comitia pugna-tiffimi ex adver-ſariis Lutheri.
Secundus. ibid.
pag. 171, mss.

ng (6) Id. ib. sup.
177, sup. 16.

(a) He was born in Alsace, as he says himself in the Epistle Dedicatory of the Prognosticon.

WINDECK (JOHN-PAUL) Doctor of Divinity, a German by nation (A), and Canon of the Collegiate Church of Marchdorff, published at Cologne in the year 1603 a book wherein he pretended to prove by forty-two demonstrative reasons, that the Protestant religion would soon be destroyed [A]. His motive for undertaking this work, was that a Lutheran not long before had published a book concerning the prefages of the approaching ruin of Popery [B]. The event has shewn that these two authors were both equally

[A] He published a book wherein he pretended to prove . . . that the Protestant religion would soon be destroyed. It is a book in 4to of 423 pages. The whole title of it runs thus: Prognosticus futuræ status Ecclesiæ, opusculum insensu cuiusdam per Sæviciam Lutherologum libro: ab hinc bimestri edito, de signis ruinæ Papæ, aliisque sectariorum jactantibus mendaciis, in quo duabus & quadraginta rationibus Apostolicis demonstratur, Lutheranismum, Calvinianum, aliisque sectas, contra Romanæ-Catholicam Ecclesiam longè latèus ac diutè grassantes, brevè esse perituræ: illam vero stæbilis constantia permauramur. Eisdem totidem etiæm Causæ continentur, cur ad unicum Ovile redire debeant sectarii, & in eodem permanere Catholici. Item Christiana Deliberatio, de optimo Religiosis statu continuando, seu quibus remediis, à Catholicorum provinciis sectæ omnes arceri, aut ubi misceantur, funditus evelli queant. The author dedicated this book to Maximilian of Austria, Grand Master of the Teutonic Order.

(1) De Signis
brevis interituri Papatus. See
Windeck's Epistolae Dedicatory.

[B] A Lutheran, not long before-hand, had published a book concerning the presages of the approaching ruin of Popery (1.) He was not the only one that had dispersed the like prophecies. Windeck remembered several other prognosticators. Demiratus sum effrontem Eusebio-Euangelicorum impudentiam : è quorum catervis nullius gijfmodi fanaticæ, prodigijsseque vanitatis vaticinia, in vulgus sparsisse memineram (2). He takes notice that Luther often boasted of his being the man appointed to destroy the Church of Rome, and that, according to Peucer, this had actually come to pass. Per doctrinam Lutheri Pontificatum Romanum corruisse (3). He adds, that there hardly passes a year without some English prognostication, that such a Pope should die, and that no body shall succeed him. He does not forget the Calvinists of France, who, as he says, hand about the prediction of one Peter Clement, a Huguenot, who was burnt at Paris forty years before, whereupon they alledged an inscription found amidst a heap of rubbish.

Calviniste in Galliis . . . splendide nugarunt de vaticinio cuspide Petri Clementis Hugonote, ante XL annos Parisiis combusti. Aium enim in ultima obfidione Parisiensis, cam tormentis muri quaterentur, inter rudera lapidem inventum, cui artificiosè vaticinium hoc fuerit insculptum : Pontificem Romanum . . .

hat (2) Windeck.
ted Epist. Dedicat.
folio (i) 3 vers.

(3) Id. ibid. fol.
(:) 3: be greater book v, Chron.
Carina.

equally mad [C]. Windeck added to his book a second part wherein he proposes to the Sectaries forty-two motives for their reuniting to the Church of Rome. He ends with a Christian consultation upon the means of extirpating the sects. He adopts the most rigid principles of the enemies to Toleration, and he reasons sometimes ad hominem, that is to say, he alleges the Penal Laws established against the Roman Catholics in several Protestant states, and the persecutions which some of the new sects suffered from the rest. He does not forget the hardships which the fugitives of England suffered from the Lutherans, as I have observed elsewhere (b). He published at Cologne in the year 1604 a book de Theologia Jurisconsultorum. His treatise on the Electors was printed in 1616 (c). The Protestants made use of his maxims as a handle to throw the blame of the wars in Germany upon the Court of Vienna; but it was said in answer to them, that this Author had done no more than followed his own private notions, and that he never had

(b) In the remark [1], of the article WESTPHALUS.

(c) Konig. B.S. pag. 870.

(4) Id. ibid.
exterminandum, & ejus Doctrinam radicitus eradicandum: vicissim verò Calvinismum ubique recipiendum, & regnatum esse (4). . . . The Calvinists in France . . . talk mightily about the prediction of one Peter Clement, a Huguenot, who was burnt at Paris forty years ago. For they say that in the last siege of Paris while the canons played upon the walls, a stone was found amidst the rubbish, with this prophecy artfully engraved on it: That the Pope of Rome was to be destroyed, and his doctrine utterly extirpated: on the other hand, that Calvinism was to be received, and to prevail in all places.' He concludes that all this proceeds from a peevish jealousy, which makes people greatly expect what they vainly wish for (5).

(5) Ita deploratissimi isti homines im-probo livore ta-bescunt quod vanissime optant, stulte sperant & augurantur. Id. ibid. verso.

(6) Windeck, Prognost. pag. 27, 28.

(7) See the remark [C], of the article MORLIN.

(8) Those of the Nestorians, Eutychians, &c.

merical fancy to think of extirpating them otherwise than by an open war. Now it is folly to depend upon the good success of a war (9). Fortune sports with prudence and valour, and shifts the victory from one side to the other, at a time when such a thing is least expected (10): it equally frustrates our hopes and fears, it supplies the weak side with unforeseen resources; and when these last see themselves in their turn capable to obtain the most compleat triumph, new misfortunes happen to them, which revive the courage of the enemy. This is what people felt, to their sad experience, in the war of Germany, from the year 1618, to the peace of Munster. In a word, if those who pretend to guess what the event will be of such or such a war, are generally deceived from month to month (11), what can we think of those who flatter themselves with the hopes that a war which is not yet begun will prove the ruin of several nations? Experience should have taught Windeck that he was a rash prognosticator. Did not he know that the Roman Catholic Princes had succoured the Protestants (12)? And was it possible for him to doubt but that, considering the situation of affairs in Europe, the same thing would happen upon all such occasions? He had, in a peculiar manner, foretold the total ruin of the Heretics in the United Provinces, and promised that great exploit to the House of Austria.

'Austria pro-pago, acerrima Catholica fidei propugnatrix, sese ceu murum opponit pro Domo Dei, ad profligandos immanes ejus hostes, Turcas & Hereticos; adeo ut spes certa nos foveat, faventi potenti Numine, Heroicis vestris facinoribus utroque tandem ac praesertim infelices sectarios in Belgio radicitus evulsus iri. Quod hoc Opusculo, proxima foetura apud me nato, evincere conor (13). . . . The House of Austria, the zealous defender of the Catholic faith, stands fast, like a bulwark, for the House of GOD against its fierce enemies the Turks and Heretics: which gives us sure ground to hope, that by your heroic exploits, and the powerful assistance of the Deity, both these, particularly the unhappy sectaries in Holland, shall be utterly extirpated; as I endeavour to prove in the second edition of this treatise.' Ignorant fool that he was, did he not know that France protected the Dutch. Had he seen into futurity, he must have known that this crown would continue to be the chief instrument of their rise, and a very powerful obstacle to the House of Austria; and that the House of Austria, in her turn, would become their strongest bulwark, and save them from the ruin which should threaten them from France. It is certain that the House of Austria was one of the principal causes of their preservation in the war of 1672 (14); for France did not abandon her conquests till such time as the Emperor and Spain declared war against her in favour of that Republic. Spain stood in the breach to cover the Dutch, and chose to become the seat of the war, in order to ease them of it; and besides, it was Spain that paid the cost. The United Provinces recovered all that had been taken from them; but Spain lost Franche-Comté, and several towns in the Low-Countries.

It would be easy to shew the invalidity of all the other reasons of this prognosticator. He could not have found so many as forty-two if he had not divided one and the same into several branches, and if, to multiply his numbers, he had not turned the same commonplace into several shapes, in order to present it in different views. It is proper to observe, that he has grounded several of them upon false facts, or upon facts which he proves very ill.

(9) See Berneggerus, in Tuba Pacis, pag. 6, & seq. & 19, & seq.

(10) Quidam etiam vicis resit in praecordia veritus, Viresque cadunt Danaï. . . . Not only Trojans fall but in their turn, The vanquish'd triumph and the victors mourn. DRYDEN, Virgil, Aeneid. lib. ii, ver. 367.

(11) See the Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, pag. 151, & seq.

(12) See the remark [R], of the article ELIZABETH; the remark [P], of the article FRANCIS I; and the remark [R], of the article HENRY II.

(13) Windeck, in Epist. Dedicat. fol. (:) (:) 2 verso.

(14) These are the words of a famous Protestant Professor at Hall in Saxony: Certe nisi imperator noster atque Hispanus tum (anno 1672) advenissent jam pridem sub Gallorum jugo gemeret pristinam frustra requirens libertatem, Belgium. . . . It is certain that unless the Emperor and the King of Spain had suddenly interposed, then (in the year 1672) Holland had been long ago subjected to the French yoke, and might have wished for her ancient liberty in vain. Jo. Francisc. Buddeus, Select. Juris Nat. & Gent. pag. 623.

[D] The

had any place in the Emperor's councils [D].

[D] The Protestants made use of his maxims as a handle . . . but it was said in answer to them that, &c. . . [The author of the Cancellaria Bavarico-Anhaltina (15) had maintained that the Protestant

(15) See, remark [C], of the article KELLER.

(16) Pleßius, in Respons. ad præcipua Capita Cancellariæ Bavarico-Anhaltinæ, imit.

league had not hitherto been able to alledge any particular whereby it could appear that the Roman Catholics had formed designs against the States which adhered to the confession of Augsburg. He was answered, that the project formed against all the Protestants in general, was sufficiently discovered by Paul Windeck's book. Quis in Protestantibus omnes Generalis In the printed book from Cancellar. Anhalt. Appendix, pag. 1. as far as (16) Ut exclud.

It was replied that Windeck and Scioppius were private men, whose opinions and writings were of no authority. Duas nefcio cujus Martii Spiritus in the printed book from pag. 2. as far as (17) Quid (17) Appendix Cancellariæ, pag. 2.

The Protestant author replied, that the Roman Catholics alledged the very fragments of letters to convict the Protestants, and that there was much more reason for reproaching them with the books of Windeck, (18) See Respons. ad Pab. Hercynianum, pag. 15, 13. who had an ecclesiastical post, and with those of Scioppius, who was Counsellor to his Imperial Majesty (18).

WITTICHIUS (CHRISTOPHER) Professor of Divinity at Leyden, made himself famous among other things by introducing the Cartesian Philosophy into the schools of Divinity. He was born in Silesia on the seventh of October 1625. His father, who had been originally a Lutheran, turned Calvinist at the Duke of Brieg's Court, and was Minister there in quality of Vice-Superintendent of the whole country of Brieg. His son, of whom we speak here, was sent to study the Civil-Law at Bremen in the year 1642; but he soon quitted that study and applied himself to Divinity in which he made great progress, as well at Bremen as at Groningen, and Leyden. The first post he enjoyed in the universities was given him in the year 1651. He was made Mathematical Professor in ordinary at Herborn in the county of Nassau, with leave to give private lectures to students of Divinity. He found that post so little to his liking, that he soon quitted it, and went to teach in the college of Duisburgh in the Duchy of Cleves, where he likewise discharged the office of Minister from the year 1653. As that college was erected into an university in the year 1655, Wittichius received there the degree of Doctor in Philosophy and Divinity, and went from thence to Nimeguen to be Professor of Divinity, in which post he continued sixteen years. The books which he had published, and which turned in a manner all upon subjects that were partly Theological and partly Philosophical in the Cartesian way, procured him a great number of opponents: but that only served to make him the better known; so that he was judged worthy to teach Divinity at Leyden, the principal university of the United Provinces in the Low-Countries. He entered upon that office in the month of November 1671, and continued in it to his death, having a very numerous auditory, to which not only the clearness of his ideas contributed, but likewise his attachment to the doctrine of Des Cartes and Cocceius, which is indeed the least in favour with the great and powerful in Holland, but is most to the relish of young people, and of those who set up for men of wit. Wittichius died the nineteenth of May 1687. His principal books are these, Consensus veritatis in Scriptura divina & infallibili revelata cum veritate philosophica à Cartesio detecta. Theologia Pacifica. Exercitationes Theologicae. Causa Spiritus Sancti. Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos. After his death, his brother, an advocate at Aix la Chapelle, published the Anti-Spinoza, and some notes upon the meditations of Mr Des Cartes (a).

(a) Gronovius, in Orat. funeb. Christi. Wittichii.

(a) See the remark [C].

WOUWER (JOHN DE) one of the learned men of the XVIth century, and author of some books [A], was of Hamburg, and the son of a Refugee in Germany on account of Religion (a). He was born on the tenth of March 1574, and having gone through his Classical studies in his native country, he was sent to Leyden in 1592, where he spent five years in an intimate familiarity with the most learned men, and even with the great Scaliger. From thence he went to France where he acquired the friendship of Claudius Puteanus, Francis Pithæus, and several other great men. He afterwards spent two years in Italy, and received a great many civilities there from some Prelates and some Cardinals. He had even access to the Pope, who shewed great affection to him, and offered him a very honourable pension. Being returned to Germany, he accepted the post of Counsellor to the Count of East-Friesland, and was his envoy at the Hague in the treaty for the Pacification of Embden, as he was afterwards at the court of John Adolphus, Duke of Holstein. That Duke was so pleased with him at the first conversation, that he obliged him to bind himself by an oath, to engage in his service. He was first honoured with the place of his counsellor, and then advanced to the government of Gottorp. But after he had continued three years in that office, he fell into a disease which wasted him by slow degrees, and of which he died on the thirtieth of March 1612, to the extreme regret of his master, who caused him to be pompously interred interred in the great church at Sleswic (b). He held an epistolary correspondence with the most learned men of Holland, and of several other countries [B]. He neither wanted learning, nor other good qualifications; but we are told that his faults were not less than his virtues (c). Being born a Protestant he embraced the Romish religion in Italy [C]; or at least it was reported so. He is ranked amongst the Plagiaries [D]. He was too fond of flattery, as appears by his testamentary legacy to those who should write on Christian IV, King of Denmark. We have also two centuries of his Latin letters, and a Synagma de Græca & Latina Bibliorum Interpretatione (1).

[A] Author of some books. He published, with notes, the works of Sidonius Apollinaris, Petronius, Firmicus de errore profanarum Religionum, Minutius Felix, and Apuleius; besides several notes on Tertullian, a treatise de Polymathia, a dissertation de cognitione veterum novi orbis. Diis æstiva seu de Umbra. A panegyric on

(b) Taken from Henningus Witte, in Memoria Wouweriana, pag. 79. & seq. of the Memorial Philoforum.

(c) See the remark [E].

(1) Taken from Henningus Witte, Memor. Philoforum. pag. 81, 82.

[B] He held an epistolary correspondence with the most learned men . . . of several . . . countries. This appears by the collection of his letters printed with his Synagma de Græca & Latina Bibliorum Interpretatione. See Mr Morhof's opinion of them. 'Varie hic institutæ sunt de multis rebus literariis consultationes & judicia: nam multa, quæ agitantur illo tempore inter viros literatos, his in epistolis recensentur. Scriptæ illæ sunt ad illustres ejus temporis viros, Scaligerum, Meursium, Heinsium, Gruterum, Scriverium & plures alios, cum quibus non nisi erudita tractari poterant. Epistolæ ejus multas ineditas servat illustris Gudius, latitant & aliquæ inter MStæ Bibliothecæ Hamburgensis (2). . . . Several literary consultations and decisions are found here; & for many of the disputes which then employed the learned, are mentioned in these letters. They are written to the famous men of that age, Scaliger, Meursius, Heinsius, Gruterus, Scriverius, and several others, with whom he could only correspond upon learned subjects. Many of his letters remain unpublished in the hands of the famous Gudius, and some of them lie concealed amongst the manuscripts of the Hamburg library.'

(2) Morhofius, Polyhist. lib. i, cap. xxvii, pag. 304. He says that edition was published at Hamburg, in 1608. But how can this be reconciled with what Mr Witte says, ubi supra, pag. 82, that Elmenhorst published that Synagma, in the year 1618.

(3) Illustri Baronum stirpe oriundus. Id. ibid. cap. i, pag. 7.

[C] Being born a Protestant he embraced the Romish religion in Italy. Nicholas Wouwer, his father, a person descended from an ancient and noble family (3), left his country on account of the persecution of the Protestants there, and settled at Hamburg: a manifest proof that the person who is the subject of this article was born a Protestant. Badius's letters inform us that he changed his religion. 'Illud pro certo habetur, cum Romæ publicitus religionem abjurasse, nullo metu qui in virum constantem cadere possit, sed contemptu & inficitia pietatis, vel quod his potentius est apud mentes præcipiti ambitione afflatus spe consequendæ alicujus opimæ largitionis. Sed, ut audio, eluca elapsa est, solum hamum retinuit (4). . . . It is believed, for certain, that he publicly abjured his religion at Rome, not from any motive of fear that could work upon a resolute man, but from a contempt and ignorance of piety, or (which has still a greater influence upon minds that are hurried away by ambition) from the hopes of obtaining some large reward. But, as far as I hear, the bait slipped off and he retained nothing but the book.' In the second tome of the Fasciculus Reuerum expensarum & sugiendarum (5), there is a letter from one Francis Broccard (6), in which our John Wouwer (7) is ranked amongst the learned men who having apostatized, favoured the designs of the Inquisition at Rome. But read the letter which he wrote to Badius, and you will there find him denying this abjuration of his religion; and only owning that he disliked several things in the Reformation of Luther and Calvin. 'Non ego profecto eos, qui religionem reformatam susceperunt, multa, quæ fortasse disuadenda erant, pio sed improvido zelo tota rescidisse, hoc me serio improbare aperte fateor: neque illa sententia heri aut hodie mihi nata, sed ex illo tempore quo aliquem veri gustum sensus communis mihi suggessit, hoc si omnes in me improbant, ne irascor quidem. Mihi vero ita sentire liberum erit, & ostendere suam cuique sponfam esse pulchram (8). . . . I do not, indeed, deny, that those who undertook the Reformation of religion, did, with a pious but unwary zeal, cut off at once many things which, perhaps, it would have been much better to have unript by degrees. This, I freely own, was a method which I seriously disapproved of: neither did I conceive this opinion to day or yesterday, but ever since common sense taught me to have the least relish for truth. If all the world should censure me for this, it will not offend me. But I shall still be at liberty to think so, and to show that every one reckons his own bride the handsomest.'

(4) Badius, Epist. lib. ix, centur. i, pag. m. 701. It is dated the 18th of February 1603.

(5) Page 875.

(6) See concerning this man, the History of the Edit of Nantes, Tom. i, pag. 374: & seq.

(7) He is there called wrong Johannes Amburgensis.

(8) Joh. Wouwer, Epistola ad Badius, pag. 110. It is the laud of the first century of Badius's letters.

[D] He is ranked amongst the Plagiaries. The learned Mauffac, after having told us that since Casaubon could not finish his book of the studies of the Antients, he would one day treat of that subject himself if he had leisure, adds that Wouwer interfered with Casaubon, without publishing any thing but what he had taken from that Critic. It is supposed that Wouwer appropriated this rich treasure to himself when he was at Montpellier with Casaubon. De Isaac Casaubono loquor, in cujus messum falcem iniecit Joannes Wouwer vir certe ingenii non vulgaris, sed qui opus imperitum reliquit, quamvis omne quod edidit à Casaubono habuerit, dum una cum eo agebat Montpelii (9). The book out of which I cite these words was printed at Toulouse, in the year 1615; that of Wouwer which Mauffac means, is intitled, de Polymathia Tractatio, and was printed in 1603 (10). Several reports, to the disadvantage of Wouwer, had been spread about before Mauffac published this accusation. Wouwer protested his innocence, in a letter which he wrote in the year 1605 (11). And Badius, to whom it was addressed, wrote to him in answer, that those rumors were vanished, and that he ought not to ascribe their rise to Casaubon. Refrixit jam sermo levisimorum hominum, qui Polymathiam tuam Plagii suspitione infamabant. Casaubonus vir melior & candidior est, quam ut hujus culpæ insimulandus esse videatur (12). He sent him besides a fragment of a letter of Casaubon, by which it appears, that without ever complaining of any theft, that learned Critic very much commended Wouwer's book. See also what Badius wrote to the brothers Puteani the same year (13); but above all see Thomaeus's Preface to the new edition of the treatise of Polymathia, which strenuously refutes Mr Mauffac. Mr Morhof mentions this particular, and cites Schoockius, who says that this reproach of Mauffac proceeded from envy, and that Vossius was guilty of stealing from Wouwer. Ex invidiâ profectum hoc Mauffaci judicium Martinus Schoockius Confutatione Fab. Hamel. p. 2. c. 4. eximat. Ex ipso autem Wouwerio multa cepisse, suppresso ejus nomine, Vossium etiam Schoockius loco laudato, & Joannes Jonsson, lib. 1. descript. Hist. Phil. c. 10. p. 49. testatur (14). Scaliger affirmed the same thing in conversation which Mauffac did in print (15). He generally called Wouwer a great Plagiary, and retailer of trash. Notwithstanding this he highly compliments him in his letters (16).

Lindenbroch was enraged against him. He accuses him of a thousand plagiarisms, particularly in his little book de Umbra (17). He tells us, that Wouwer finding that tract among Guelielmii's papers, only altered the form of it, and interwove some Latin verses which were made by another hand. 'Lindenbrogium nescio quomodo is semper infensum habuit: super sunt enim Lindenbrogii tum in Bibliothecâ Hamburgensi, tum in Gudianâ, Epistolæ, quibus illi acerbè insultat. Vocat illum hominem cum latrante nomine (à baubando). Multa in illo plagia notat, ac in aliquâ epistolâ hæc de illo habet, ejus de Umbra Tractatum inter plagia recensens: Quem novissimè edidit librum tenebrosissimum umbratilis ille, inter doctissimi optimique viri Jani Guelielmi schedas repertum ajunt: in quo id tamen præstitit, quod aliam illi vestem induit, & suo more turpavit. Nam & carmina, quæ passim intermixta, non adulteri hujus fuerunt, sed Schoole Schlefwicensis Rectoris, viri eruditissimi & probi, qui etiam nunc vivit, & id aperte fateatur. Epistola hæc scripta est Hamburgi an. 1613. Gravis hæc in illum virum injuria est, & nescio quid acerbatis sapit. In aliis epistolis passim in eum invehitur, ac plura ejus plagia notat (18). . . . Lindenbroch was, I know not for what reason, always an enemy to Wouwer: for there are extant, both in the library of Hamburg, and that of Gudius, some letters written by Lindenbroch, in which he bitterly insults him. He calls him the man with the barking name (Wouwer). He takes notice of many of his plagiarisms, and in one of his letters writes thus of him, reckoning his book de Umbra among plagiarist pieces. It is reported that the book de Tenebris, which that cloudy author has lately published, was found among the papers of the learned

(9) Philippus Jacobus Mauffacus, Notis in Plutarchum de Fluvio, p. 149.

(10) The edition I make use of is of that year, ex Bibliopolo Frobeniano. Thomaeus de Plagio Literario, p. 261, mentions only that of Hamburg 1604.

(11) The with of the second century of Badius's Letters, in the Leyden edition, 1650.

(12) Badius, Epist. ix, Centur. ii, pag. 165.

(13) Monui vos jampridem diffipatum fuisse rumorem de Wouwerio nostro quasi plagio domestico sublegerit potissimum partem sum Polymathie. Badius, Epist. iii, Cent. ii, pag. 155.

(14) Morhofius, Polyh. lib. i, cap. i, pag. 7.

(15) See the Scaligeriana, at the word Wouwerius.

(16) See Scaliger's Letters, particularly that which I have mentioned above, citation (1), of the article ELMENHORST.

(17) It is intitled Dies æstiva, five de Umbra Paegnon. It was printed in 1610. My edition is that of Oxford 1636, in 12mo.

(18) Morhof. ubi supra, cap. xxix, p. 304.

write a panegyric on him, after his death [E]. The letters which Baudius wrote to him, are an instance of the little sincerity to be met with in the compliments usually made to authors [F]. Some writers confound our John Wouwer with another ed and excellent Janus Gulielmus; and that the pretended author did no more than alter the form of it, and spoil it after his own fashion. The verses, which are interperfed in it every where, are not the compofure of this Plagiary, but of the rector of the fchool of Slefwic, a man of learning and probity, who is ftill living, and publickly owns them. This letter is dated at Hamburg, in the year 1613: It is highly injurious to him, and betrays very much rancour againft him. In the reft of his letters, he every where inveighs againft him, and points out many of his plagiarifms.

[E] He was too fond of flattery, as appears by his . . . legacy, &c. . . .] This testamentary promise took effect; for in hopes of the promised fun feveral Panegyriſts ſtarted up, who extolled Wouwer above the ſkies. But if we had his life written by Lindenbroch, we ſhould find a great many particulars different from their relations. Felicior & alius Eruditus, & ipſo Principe ſuo, Johan. Adolpho, nullos, uti ſupra

† P. I. c. 13.
§. 3. pag. 198,
199.

‡ Promiſſe tam
A. 1613. in Epiſt. quadam
Mſta, cujus
Autographum Gudius & μακρίτως affer-
bat. Conf. Mor-hofii, Polybiſt.
lib. i, cap. xxiv,
pag. 304.

(19) Joh. Mol-lerus, ſagace ad Hiſtoriam Cherſoneſi Cimbrica,
Part. ii, pag.
209, 210.

(20) Satis alias arrogans & παρις δόξης.
Id. ibid. Part. i,
pag. 188.

(21) Wouwer, in a letter of a later date written to Baudius affirms the truth of it: Me Con-ſiliarium Cæſaris electum vera ſama fuit. See Baudius's Letters, num. lxxviii
Cep. i.

(22) Baudius, Epiſt. lxxv, Cent.
i, pag. m. 100, 101, this letter is dated on the 18th
of February 1603.

monuimus, Encomiaſtas Poſthumos naſto, fuit Job. Wouwerius, Miniſter Aulae Gottorp. Primarius. Biographias enim, & Sermones Panegyricos, memoriz illius ſacros, publicarunt Gev. Elmenhorſtius, Ad. Olearius, Nic. Johann. Cruſius, alique complures, ſpe potius Nummi doſi (Præmii ſc. LX. Joachimicorum, quod cuilibet, Laudationem ſibi poſthumam ſcripturo, in Tabulis ultimæ Voluntatis Wouwerius deſtinavit,) ipſis affugente invitati, quam ſincero in virum Virtutibus pariter atque Vitiis magnum ducti affectu. Alio haud dubie ſine, ut Animo ſc. ſuo, in Wouwerium ob ſtudiorum Emulationem iniquiori, morem gereret, Vitæ illius Hiſtoriam † ſcribere in Animo habuit Frid. Lindebrogius, Civis ipſius, quo rigidiorum Vitiis ejus Cenſorem hæctenus obſervavi neminem (19). Job Wouwer, prime Miniſter of the Court of Gottorp, was more fortunate than other learned men, and even than his own Prince Jobn Adolphus who, as we ſaid before, had no encomiums written upon him after his death. But to Wouwer's memory, deſcriptions of his life, and Panegyric diſcourſes were dedicated and publiſhed by Elmenhorſt, Olearius, Cruſius, and ſeveral others. Theſe authors were rather prevailed upon by the bewitching temptation of money, (for Wouwer in his laſt will, had ordered a reward of ſixty Joachims to any one that ſhould write an encomium upon him after his death) than moved with a ſincere regard to the man himſelf, who was equally remarkable for his virtues and vices. Lindenbroch, his countryman, and the moſt rigid cenſor of his vices that I have ſeen, intended to write his life. But certainly it was with a quite different view, viz. that he might gratify his own humour, for he was ſomewhat prejudiced againſt Wouwer on account of a mutual emulation in their ſtudies. The author from whom I have borrowed theſe words, obſerves elſewhere that Wouwer was a little vain, and frequently talked of himſelf (20). Baudius alſo obſerved a great preſumption in him. Read the following lines: 'De Wouwerio eadem ad nos fama pervenit, eum id ætatis hominem admiratione doctrinæ (vide & ride ludibria judiciorum) coopertum in collegium Sena-torum ſacræ Cæſaræ Majeltatis, ſed certiffimo argumeto perſuadeor rem ita ſe non habere (21), quod cum à reditu ſuo bis terve ſcripſerit ad Scaligerum, ad Scrivarium, ad Francicum Douſam etiam, cum perhonorifica noſtri mentione, tamen ubique miſerabiliter inſectator fortunæ ſuæ malignitatem, nec homo ſui oſtentator magnificus, quidquam de ſuperbo illo titulo adjicit, quem proculdubio non fuit omiſſurus, niſi prout ab ingenio deſicere vellet. Detepuit jam mucro iracundiæ noſtræ adverſus eum, quod ex pluribus indicis apparet eum non tam nocendi animo, quam ſui extollendi vanitate ſolium detrudere famæ & meritis laudibus amicorum. Dempto certe hoc vicio, multa habet ingenii naturæque dona, quibus ſupra vulgus ſapit, & illuſtrium virorum amicitiam meretur (22). The ſame report concerning Wouwer reached me, viz. that on account of his being ſo much admired for his learning, (behold, and laugh at the ridiculous judgments of men) he was at ſuch an age, made one of his Imperial Majeſty's Counſellers. But I have a very certain proof for believing, that it was not ſo: for whereas after his return he wrote two or three letters to Scaliger, Scrivarius, and Francis Douſa, in which he makes very honourable mention of me, he does at the ſame time moſt piteouſly complain of his own ill fortune, and takes no notice at all of that proud title, which certainly a man of his vanity and oſtentation would never have omitted, unleſs you can ſuppoſe that he acted in a manner that was quite contrary to his natural diſpoſition. Nevertheleſs the edge of my reſentment is taken off, ſince I have found by ſeveral manifeſt proofs, that in detracting from the reputation of his friends and from their due praifes he is not ſo much influenced by the deſire of hurting them as by the vanity of extolling himſelf. Setting that vice aſide, we muſt own he has many qualities and endowments which ſet him above the vulgar, and give him a title to the friendſhip of great and learned men.'

[F] Of the little ſincerity to be met with in the compliments uſually made to authors.] Wouwer publiſhed a panegyric on Chriſtian IV King of Denmark in the year 1603. Baudius writing to the author loads him with praifes, but in a letter to another he ſpeaks of this work as of a performance full of faults. What follows will prove the truth of theſe two particulars: In Dominici Baudii ἀλλοπροσαλλῶς Epiſtola ad Wouwerium ‡ haud parum obſerves ἐλαττωσεως. Illic † enim non tantum Generoſi Wouwerii impetus, & ardua felicitis Ingenii tentamenta, laudem apud De-os, Amorem apud Homines, admirationem apud peritos Rerum æſtimatores, cenſet mereri, ſed Ironice etiam eundem laudat, quod, videretur & Eræſtarum mentium exemplo, Eloquentiam ſuam in Panegyrico Præceptuſculis Maſteſtrum non circumſcribat, ſed, Artium repagula ſidenter perrumpens, libero curſu ſeratur. In Epiſtola contra ad Corn. Mylium * Scaligero ἐμύνησθαι, majori, quam ille, ἀεὶ ῥαία, quid in Oratione hac deſideret, ſignificat: Affectavit Wouwerius, in Panegyrico ſublime & ſtordidum ſimul genus dicendi. Laudandus ob generoſum conatum, eſt interdum languenti, & pellucet nimis Emulatio Antiquorum. Multa ſunt, quæ non Ignaro Leſtori placere poſſunt. Si curram interdum non bene moderatur, magnis tamen exitit auſis. Generoſiores Animi, dum vitant humum, ſepe nubes & inania captant. Etas & poſteræ cura, limabunt, & depaſcent luxuriam agnata melioribus Ingeniis (23). Dominic Baudius, in his letter to Wouwer, does not uſe the ſame freedom of ſpeech; for there he not only allows that Wouwer's noble flights, and the courageous attempts of his happy genius ſerves the praife of the learned, the eſteem of honeſt men, and the admiration of the judicious, but he likewiſe ironically commends him, for that after the example of lively and daring minds he ſcorns to circumscribe his eloquence in panegyrics by the narrow rules of little maſters, but boldly breaking through the barriers of art roams at large. On the contrary, in his letter to Cornelius Mylius, he is of the ſame opinion with Scaliger, and, with more freedom than he, declares what he thinks faulty in that oration. Wouwer, ſays he, in his panegyric, affected both the ſublime and the ſtordid ſtile. He is to be commended for his noble attempt, tho' ſometimes he flags, and diſcovers an affected imitation of the Antients. There are many things in it which may pleaſe an attentive reader. If ſometimes he does not govern his chariot well, it muſt nevertheleſs be owned that he fails in a bold undertaking. Generous minds, while they avoid being low and mean, are often loſt in the clouds, and run into bombast. But age and new application will poliſh and correct the luxuriance that is peculiar to the beſt genius's. Wouwer himſelf knew the defects of his performance, and made a great many excuſes on account of the hurry he wrote it in, and deſired that the world would not judge of his ability by this eſſay. Obſerve, that this panegyric was compoſed on occaſion of the homage which the city of Hamburg paid to his Daniſh Majeſty; but as ſomething had eſcaped the author's pen which might redound to the prejudice of the liberties † Cent. iii. Ep.

‡ ib. pag. 490.

* Cent. i. a. 66.
† Cent. iii. Ep.
‡ ib. pag. 490.

(23) Joh. Mol-lerus, ubi ſupra,
Part. i, pag.
187, 188. His addition of Baudius's Letters, does not agree with mine.

another of the same name, who studied under Lipsius, of whom I shall speak in one of the remarks [G].

of that city. The Senate prohibited the sale of it, till the first pages were corrected (24).
[G] Some writers confound our John Wouwer with another of the same name . . . of whom I shall speak in a remark.] This other JOHN WOUWER (25) was born in the year 1576, at Antwerp, where he began his studies under the Jesuits, and afterwards went to Louvain, and lived with Lipsius, who had such an affection and high esteem for him, that he appointed him one of the executors of his last will, and recommended the care of his manuscripts to him alone. This Wouwer having spent three years in travelling into France, Spain; and Italy, was no sooner returned but he was promoted to the dignity of a Counsellor in his own country, and afterwards became a member of the Council of Finances and the Council of War. The Infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia deputed him to Philip IV, King of Spain, who dignified him with the honour of knighthood. He published some books, and died on the twenty-third of September 1635. The world expected from him the publication of two hundred letters, written to Lipsius (26). Father Schottus confounds this Wouwer with that of Hamburg, as Mr Morhof observes.

(24) See Mollerus, ubi supra.
(25) Or rather Vanden Wouwere, according to Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 587.

(26) Taken from Valerius Andreas, ubi supra.

(27) Morhof, ubi supra, pag. 7. See also Colomies cap. II, Καταγὰ Λίαν.

(28) It is the wife, of the first century ad Belgæ.

'Duo monenda nobis sunt, scilicet (27), in quibus erratum à viris doctis est. Primum est, quod duo confundantur ejus nominis, Antwerpianus & Hamburgensis Polymathie Autor. Andreas Schottus hunc Belgam facit in notis ad Proverbia Græca p. 68. sed falso. Lipsius in Epistolâ 8 Kal. Novembr. 1599. ad Antwerpianum illum scriptâ (28), utrumque probè distinguit: Janus Wouwerinus, inquit, cogn-

'minis tuus, si non Gentilis, quam bona tecum fæderatio! Optimum par, nec vel Dii dederint magis ex usu aut voto. Modestiam & probitatem in eo adolescente semper amavi, & ut vidi primum (Hamburgi id fuit, ante annos novem) unâ laudatum illam indolem ivi. Vivat, crescat, & lampada à nobis in hoc cursu jam stipsis accipiat: me libenter & judicia tradente. . . . We are to observe two things here, concerning which learned men have been in a mistake. The first is, that two of the same name are confounded, viz. the Wouwer of Antwerp, and the Wouwer of Hamburg, who was the author of the Polymathia. Andrew Scotus calls the latter Dutchman, in his notes on the Greek proverbs, but he is wrong. Lipsius, in his letter to the Wouwer of Antwerp, dated the 25th of October 1599, distinguishes them very well. Your namesake, John Wouwer, says he, if he is not your countryman, yet how well may he be confederated with you! An excellent couple, than which it is impossible to wish for a better or more useful. For my own part, I was always in love with the modesty and virtue of that young man, and the first time that I saw him, (which was at Hamburg nine years ago) I could not help launching forth in praise of his genius. Let him live and prosper, and take our places, and relieve us who are already worn out in this career. As for me, I surrender very willingly.' König (29) is guilty of the same mistake, for when he is speaking of our Wouwer, he cites Swertius (30), who mentions only the other. Mr Mollerus hath collected several mistakes on this head (31).

(29) König, Bibl. vet. & novæ, pag. 875.

(30) Page, 487, and the book he means, is Athenæ Belgicæ.

(31) Johannes Mollerus de Scriptoris Homonymis, pag. 733, & seq.

XENOCRATES,

X.

XENOCRATES, one of the most illustrious Philosophers of Antient Greece, was born at Chalcedon (a), and very early placed himself under the direction of Plato, to whom he always gave great proofs of his respect and fidelity [A]. He studied under this great master, at the same time with Aristotle, but was not endowed with the same parts; he wanted a spur, and the other a bridle (b). This was Plato's judgment of them, who farther added, that in setting them together he matched a horse with an ass (c). But his slow capacity rendered him far inferior to Aristotle (d), he very much surpassed him in Practical Philosophy: the purity of his manners had in it something extraordinary; his gravity, severity, or rather austerity, were of such a nature, that a Divine who at present should resemble him would infallibly pass for a Jansenist or a Rigidist. He had acquired such an absolute command of his passions, that a most beautiful courtesan, who laid that she would subdue his virtue, lost her wager [B], though she had the liberty to lie by him, which afforded her an opportunity of using all her artifices to allure him to enjoy her. This is a triumph as remarkable as that of St Aldhelme (e), and some other canonized Saints who have escaped untainted from the like temptations, as we are told. Chastity was not the sole virtue of this Philosopher; all the other parts of temperance shone in his conduct [C]. He

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. vi.

(b) Compare with this, what is said above, in the remark [B], of the article THEOPOMPUS.

(c) Ex Diog. Laërt. ubi supra.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) See, above, the remark [C], of the article FRANCIS of Assise.

[A] He always gave great proofs of his respect and fidelity to Plato. He accompanied him in his voyage to Sicily, and was with him at the court of Syracuse.

(1) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 6.

(2) Id. ibid. num. 11.

(3) See Kuhn's Notes, in Diog. Laërt. ad lib. iv, num. 11.

(4) In the remark [E], of the article ARISTOTLE.

(5) Ælian. Var. Histor. lib. xiv, cap. ix.

(6) See Plutarch, in Vita Marii, iust. pag. 407.

(7) Valer. Maximus, lib. iv, cap. i, num. 2, in Est. pag. m. 351.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) In the remark [R], of the article LAÏC.

(1) Dionysius, the tyrant, one day in discourse with Plato, telling him, some body will cut off your head; no man shall do it, replied Xenocrates, before he hath cut off mine (2). Observe that the tyrant's expression imported the same thing, as if he had said, I will cut off your head (3): which gives a greater idea of the generosity of Xenocrates. We have seen above (4), what is reported of his zeal for Plato's honour, when he was injuriously treated by Aristotle. I add, that he very patiently bore Plato's reprimands; and when he was excited to defend himself, he made no other answer than this, he treats me so for my advantage. Ξενοκράτης (5) ὁ Χαλκηδόνι ἐπὶ τῷ Πλάτῳ. εἰς τὸ ἀχαι (6) σκαπτομένῳ, ἐδ' ἔπαυσε καὶ ἐπὶ τῷ Πλάτῳ, ὅτι καὶ πᾶσι ἐμφορῶν καὶ αἰσιν ἐπὶ τὸν ἀνδρα, ἔφατο· ἀλλὰ τὸ ἐμοὶ συμφέρει. Xenocrates Chalcedoni, quum à Platone propter mores inurbanos reprehenderetur, nunquam indignatione iracunde commotus est: sed & illi, qui ipsum ad respondendum Platoni instigaret, Hoc, inquit, mihi bonum atque commodum est: & prudentissime homini silentium imposuit. But instead of this we are told the quite contrary by a Latin writer: where we find, 1. That Plato was told that Xenocrates had spoken ill of him. 2. That Plato would not believe it. 3. That the informer, with an audacious air, asked why he did not believe it? 4. That Plato answered, it is not to be believed that a person, whom I love so well, should not love me also. 5. That the informer offered to swear it. 6. That Plato would not suffer it to go so far, but ended the dispute by the following words; Xenocrates would never have said that, had he not believed that it was for my advantage (7). Postremo cum ad iurandum inimicitias ferentis malignitas confugisset; ne de perjurio ejus disputaret, asseruit nunquam Xenocratem illa dicturum fuisse, nisi ea dici expedire sibi judicasset (8). This story in Valerius Maximus seems to me to be but that which we find in Ælian, maimed and reversed, and it confirms the text of this remark.

[B] A most beautiful courtesan, who laid that she would subdue his virtue, lost her wager. I mention this elsewhere (9); but I add here what Valerius Maximus saith: 'Phryne nobile Athenis scortum juxta eum (Xenocratem) vino gravem in pervigilio accubuit, pignore cum quibusdam juvenibus posito, an temperantiam ejus corrumpere posset: Quam nec

taetu, nec sermone aspernatus, quoad voluerat in sinu suo morari, irritam propositi dimisit. Factum sapientia imbuti animi abstinentis; sed meretriculæ quoque dictum perquam facetum, Deridentibus enim se adolescentibus, quia tam formosa, tamque elegans poti senis animum illecebris pellicere non potuisset, pactumque victoriæ pretium flagitantibus: de homine se cum iis, non de statua pignus posuisse, respondit. Potestne hæc Xenocratis continentia à quoquam magis vere, magisque proprie demonstrari, quam ab ipsa meretricula expressa est? Phryne pulchritudine sua, nulla ex parte constantissimam ejus abstinentiam labefecit (10). - - Phryne, a famous courtesan at Athens, lay down by Xenocrates in a night. lib. iv, cap. 2, in Est. num. 3. 351. 376. laid a wager with some young men that she would de- bauch him. He declined not her caresses, and suffered her to embrace him as long as she pleased; but he disappointed her expectation. As this was a proof of his abstinence and wisdom, so what the courtesan said upon it was very witty; for when the young men laughed at her, because with all her beauty and charms she had not been able to raise the passion of an old man warmed with wine, and desired her to pay her bet, she answered, that she had laid a wager about a man, and not about a statue. Could any thing more truly and properly describe the continence of Xenocrates than this expression of the courtesan. Phryne, beautiful as she was, could not make the least impression upon his constant chastity. You see this author supposes several particulars which raise the glory of the victory: it was entire tho' all the circumstances favoured the enemy. He will have it that the courtesan took hold of an opportunity when Xenocrates had drank plentifully; and adds, that the Philosopher did not refuse the caresses of her hands and voice, and that Phryne had leave to stay with him as long as she pleased.

[C] All the other parts of temperance shone in his conduct. His having drank plentifully when Phryne tempted him may be objected against this. They may likewise object against it the story of Athenæus, who relates that Xenocrates won the crown of gold, which the Syracusan tyrant promised to the person that should first drink off a certain measure of wine (11). It will be said that a man, who gets the prize appointed for the greatest drinker in the court of a drunken Prince, is not sober. But Xenocrates carried off this prize; therefore he was not sober. Consider this expression of Diogenes Laërtius: Χρυσὸν στεφάνη τιμήν· 347/α ἐπ' ἀθλοῦ πολυποσίας, Corona aurea donatum in PRÆMIUM LARGIORIS COMPUTATIONIS (12). Remember

He loved neither pleasures, riches, nor praises (f). He never could be corrupted by presents [D], and he acquired such a great reputation with regard to sincerity and probity, that he was the sole person whom the magistrates of Athens exempted from confirming

(f) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 11.

Remember also that Ælian inserts Xenocrates in that chapter, where he gives us a catalogue of those who loved drinking, and could drink a great deal (13). The first in this list is the Syracusan tyrant, who promised a golden crown to him who could drink most, and Xenocrates won the prize. Πρέκειο δὲ ἄλλον τῶ πρῶτον πάλιν σέβαν χρυσῆς καὶ ἐνίκησε Ξενοκράτης ὁ Χαλκεδόνιος; Premium ordinatum est ei, qui plus bibisset, aurea corona, quam meritis est Xenocrates Chalcedonius (14). Thus you have the objection fortified with all necessary proofs. It would be in vain to answer that Xenocrates was admired on this occasion (15), for the Historian who saith so adds another particular, which is really laudable, I mean, that the victor did not keep this golden crown, but placed it on a statue of Mercury, as he was going home. He used, on other days, to crown that statue with flowers, but that evening he fixed on it a golden crown: This was a proof of a disinterested mind; this was shewing that for the honour of the gods he could as easily part with what was most precious as with a nosegay. If the objectors should be so opinionative as to affirm that Athenæus's meaning is, that Xenocrates was admired both on this account, and because he drank more than the rest, they would be but small gainers: for every thing that is admired is not a good moral quality: several things are admired by reason of their singularity, and upon this foot a Philosopher might be admired for carrying off the prize from all the drinkers of Syracuse. He should have been vanquished; he ought to have avoided such an engagement; and if he had been temperate he had never entered these lists. Let us then see whether we can think of any other way of justification.

It must be owned that some very sober people, may be of such a constitution as to drink a great deal without losing their reason. Socrates, whose sobriety and austerity of life are incontestable, did not love drinking, and yet when he was forced to it by company, no body could hold out against him; and what was admirable in him, was, that he never was indisposed on these occasions, and that there was no difference between Socrates fasting, and Socrates at his departure from a feast and merry-making (16). If such a man on some extraordinary occasion as that festival, which was celebrated at Syracuse, when Dionysius the tyrant promised the golden crown to the drinker, makes a trial of his strength, and wins the prize, it ought not to be concluded from thence that he is intemperate. He does not thereby lose the character of a sober man: this virtue ought to be considered in the same manner with other habitual qualities. They constitute a character which is not lost by any single act of the opposite quality. Mr Daillé made this remark when he was charged with calling Mr Cottibay an extravagant visionary. 'Sometimes the want of attention, replied he (17), and frequently an excess of passion, starts a foolish or extravagant notion in the mind of a wise man. But you do not therefore call him a fool. If you believe Horace, the excellent Homer nods sometimes. Will you from thence accuse Horace of railing at that incomparable author, whom he elsewhere so highly esteems and admires? Will you say that he calls him a stupid, dull, and stupid Poet? No. For these names, as well as those of detractor, and visionary are only bestowed on such as are habituated to these vices, and not on those from whom such actions barely escape, and that very seldom, either through human weakness, or by the force of some extraordinary cause: One swallow does not make the spring, as the Philosopher hath it on a like occasion.' This is sufficient to justify what I have affirmed concerning Xenocrates.

I shall say by the bye, that two very learned Critics (18) are of opinion, that he was not at Syracuse when he carried this prize, and even was at Athens when he won it. I own, indeed, that their opinion is probable, tho' to me it seems less so, than that which I have followed. It is undeniable that Xenocrates was at the court of Dionysius, and that he was then very young. Is it not therefore more likely that he should indulge himself to drink on that occasion, than in the city where he stood upon the foot of a thorough austere Philosopher?

What more authentic proof can we have of his great sobriety than the proverb of the Antients, Xenocrates's chesfe, which they made use of to express that a thing lasted a long time? The author of this particular (19) adds, 1. That when he had pierced a cask, it was so long before it was empty that the wine quite lost its virtue. 2. That Xenocrates several times threw away his provisions by reason they grew rusty or musty; which would not have happened to a less frugal person.

[D] He never could be corrupted by presents.] The Macedonian court used these means to corrupt a great many persons in the neighbouring Republics, and such persons who refused their presents did thereby sufficiently declare that they never intended to take any measures prejudicial to the interest of their country. Xenocrates took this course. He refused King Philip's presents; whence that Prince despairing to gain him, treated him uncivilly, and did not admit him to the conferences which he held with the other Ambassadors of the Republic of Athens, whom he had softened by his generosity, by feasting and cajoling. But Xenocrates continued inflexible, and preserving his integrity inviolable, never appeared at the audience and feasts as his colleagues did. They complained that he did no service in his embassy, for which he was very near being fined: but he discovered the whole secret, and warned the Athenians to have a watchful eye upon the public good, since the other Ambassadors were corrupted by presents. This procured him double honour (20). He would not receive the money which Antipater sent him (21), and when he accepted a small part of the sum which Alexander's Ambassadors brought him, it was only that he might not shew any contempt for that great Monarch. Xenocrates quum legati ab Alexandro quinquaginta ei talenta attulissent, quæ erat pecunia temporibus illis Athenis præsertim maxima, adduxit legatos ad cœnam in Academiâ. Is apposuit tantum quod satis esset, nullo apparatu. Quum postmodum rogarent eum, cui numerari juberet, quid vos hesternâ inquit cœnula non intellexistis me pecunia non egere? Quos quum tristiores vidisset, xxx minas accepit, ne aspernari regis liberalitatem videretur (22). -- Xenocrates, when Alexander's Ambassadors brought him fifty talents, Tusc. Quæst. lib. v, fol. m. which in those days was a very considerable sum, especially at Athens, carried them to sup with him in the Academy, where he set before them no more than was just sufficient, and that too in the plainest manner. The next day, when they asked him, into whose hands he would order the money to be paid: Could you not see, said he, by last night's supper, that I have no need of money? But upon observing them troubled at this, he accepted of thirty minæ, purely that he might not seem to despise the King's generosity. Observe, in this Latin passage, the consequence he draws from the mean supper with which he treated Alexander's Envoys. Doth not this, said he, give you to understand that I have no need of money? Another Historian tells us (23), that having accepted part of the present, he sent back the rest to Alexander. He hath more need of it than I, said he, for he subsists a greater number of men. This is excellent morality; it points out the true source of avarice, and of the contempt of riches.

Let us observe that Valerius Maximus, who could not be ignorant of what Cicero relates, hath left out a circumstance, which was not convenient for his purpose. He aimed at a jingle of antitheses and parallels: he resolved to connect the triumph over Phryne to that over Alexander's money. Having told us that Xenocrates, in Phryne's judgment, was a statue; he takes it to be very witty to say that this Philosopher was no less a statue, with regard to the charms of gold, than those of a courtesan (24); and to add, that a great Prince would have bought the friendship of a Philosopher, but the Philosopher would not sell it to that great Prince (25). All these witty turns would have been spoiled, if it had been said that Xenocrates took part of the present. Wherefore he suppressed this circumstance.

7 E

Such

(13) Φιλοπότης τινος καὶ πολυπότηται. De qui-busdam qui & libenter & multum bibebant. This is the title of the xlii chapter of the iud book of Ælian.

(14) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. ii, cap. xii.

(15) Ἐν τῷ αἰναιμῶν. Quamobrem in admiratione summa fuit. Ælian. ubi supra.

(16) Charpentier, Vie de Socrate, pag. m. 100.

(17) Daillé, Replique à Adam, & à Cottibay, Part. iii, ch. iii, pag. m. 157.

* Arist. en ses Mor. à Nicom. lib. i, cap. vii, towards the end.

(18) Kuhnus in Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 8. Perizonius, in Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. ii, cap. xli, but observe that Mr Perizonius is not so positive in this opinion as the author.

(19) Stobæus, de continen. & sobri. Serm. xv, fol. m. 69.

(20) Ex Diog. Laërt. ubi supra. num. 8, 9.

(21) Id. ibid. num. 8.

(22) Cicero, Tuscul. Quæst. lib. v, fol. m. 277, B.

(23) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 8.

(24) Quid rex Alexander? an divitiis cum quætere potuit? ab illo quoque statum & quietam æque frustra tentatam putes. Valer. Maxim. lib. iv, cap. iii, num. 3, in Ext.

(25) Ita rex philosophi amicitiam emere voluit: Philosophus regi suam vendere noluit. Id. ibid.

XENOCRATES.

570 u/rv - mer +

(g) Id. ibid.
num. 6.

confirming his evidence with an oath [E]. A discourse, which he made about temperance, so moved the most dissolute debauchee of that time, that he took an immediate resolution to renounce voluptuousness, and apply himself to wisdom [F]. This conversion was steady; for the convert, afterwards, became a very grave Philosopher. This great alteration ought not to be attributed to the charms of eloquence, but rather to the austere gravity of Xenocrates. There was nothing charming, or graceful in his behaviour; but a solid gravity and severity were inseparable from his manners; whence it was that Plato frequently advised him to sacrifice to the Graces (g). This want of politeness set off the glory which he had acquired by his austerity (b). It is not to be wondered that with this dry genius, he should have been so strongly inclined to the Mathematics, that he would not admit any scholars who were ignorant of that science (i). We ought more to admire that with this great character of rigid severity, he

(i) Lez. ibid.
num. 10.

(b) Audivi . . . illum, (Scipionem Nasticam) qui T. Gracchi conatus perditos vindicavit, nullam comitatem habuisse sermonis: ne Xenocratem quidem, severissimum philosophorum, ob eamque rem ipsam & magnum & clarum fuisse. . . . I have heard the same thing of Xenocrates, the severity of all the Philosophers, and that for this very reason he was esteemed great and famous. Cicero, de Officiis, lib. 1, cap. xxx, pag. m. 120, 121.

Such is the exact fidelity of this, and several other writers; they enlarge or curtail facts as they find it convenient, in order to adjust them to their own conceits.

Father Abraham cites a passage of Themistius, where this action of Xenocrates is ascribed to Xenophanes (26). He should have corrected that mistake.
(26) See Abraham's Commentary, in Orat. Ciceron. pro Sextio, p. 181.

[E] He was the sole person whom the magistrates of Athens exempted from . . . an oath. He could not have a greater honour done him than this. Valerius Maximus is very judicious on this head: 'Quantum porro honoris Athenis Xenocrati sapientia pariter ac sanctitate claro tributum est? Qui cum testimonium dicere coactus ad aram accessisset, ut more civitatis juraret, omnia se vere retulisse; universi iudices confurrexerunt, proclamantque ne iurandum diceret: Quodque sibi metipsis postmodum dicendæ sententiæ loco remissuri non erant, sinceritati ejus concedendum existimant (27). . . . How great an honour was done at Athens to Xenocrates, a man equally famous for his wisdom and virtue? Who when he was obliged to give in his evidence, and came up to the altar, in order to confirm what he had said with an oath, as the custom of the city was, all the Judges rose up, and told him not to swear. Thus what they themselves did not desire to be excused from, when afterwards they gave judgment, they dispensed with in him, as thinking it was due to his sincerity.' Cicero mentions this in one of his epistles to Atticus (28).

(27) Valer. Max. lib. ii, cap. ult. in fine, pag. m. 234.

(28) The words, of the first book. See also the same author, in Orat. pro Balbo, pag. 657, where he mentions the thing without naming Xenocrates.

hagn probr + convert

[F] A discourse on temperance . . . made one take an immediate resolution to renounce voluptuousness, and apply himself to wisdom. If the sermon of a Capuchin should at this time cause such an alteration, the world would acknowledge it to be a particular operation of the Holy Ghost, and admire the influence of Grace, which, according to the Jansenists, would be self-efficacious to the highest degree; for the person who was prevailed upon by this discourse, to change his course of life, was not an ordinary voluptuous man, but a ring-leader in that kind, who gloried in his debaucheries: his wife also accused him before a court of justice for neglecting her, and brutally debauching with boys; the brought the indictment against him called, Male Tractationis. θυγάτηρ δὲ τὸν Πολέμωνα καὶ δίκην κακώσεως, ὑπὸ τῆς γυναίκος, ὡς μειστεῖος συνέβη. Et in judicium vocatum Polemonem ab uxore nequitie infamatum, quod adolescentibus congrederetur (29). He was not ashamed to shew his excessive drunkenness in the most public place of Athens, being accompanied with a singing-woman, and several players on instruments. He was drunk almost every time that he appeared in the streets (30), and his lewdness was not less than his drunkenness. He went always well provided with money, and even concealed it in several parts of the city, that he might be supplied at all times, and in all places, with sufficient sums for his expenses, in order to gratify his vicious appetite (31). In short, he was the most famous debauchee in Athens. One day when he had drank plentifully, and run, as usual, through the streets with his customary equipage, and leud companions (32), he entred the auditory of Xenocrates, with a design to ridicule him, and to play some insolent tricks. When all the audience took offence at his behaviour, Xenocrates was not in the least discomposed (33), but more vigorously pursued the discourse which he had begun concerning temperance. Some authors say, that he

(29) Diog. Laërt. Ibid. num. 16.

(30) Lucian, in his accusatio, pag. m. 327, 323, Tom. ii.

(31) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 16.

(32) Origen. ubi infra.

(33) Id. ibid.

was not treating that subject, but leaving that which he was upon, he turned the discourse to this virtue; on which head he spoke so excellently and gravely, that all of a sudden he created an affection for modesty and wisdom in the mind of this hardened sinner (34). Polemo, (for that was the name of this drunkard) from that very moment became a disciple of virtue, and an exact imitator of the gravity of Xenocrates (35), whom he succeeded in his professor's chair. He gave over his drinking wine, and drank nothing but water (36). The Latin description of his conversion, which I shall transcribe here, is pretty enough: 'Perditæ luxuriæ Athenis adolescens Polemo, neque illecebris tantummodo, sed etiam ipsa infamia gaudens; cum è convivio non post occasum solis, sed post ortum surrexisset, domumque repetens, Xenocratis Philosophi patentem Januam vidisset: vino gravis, unguentis delibutus, fertis capite redimito, pellucida veste amictus, resertam turba doctorum hominum scholam ejus intravit: Nec contentus tam deformi introitu, confedit etiam, ut clarissimum eloquium, & prudentissima præcepta temulentia læcivius eluderet. Ortâ deinde, ut par erat, omnium indignatione; Xenocrates vultum in eodem habitu continuit, omnisque de quibus diserebat, de modestia ac temperantia loqui cepit. Cujus gravitate sermonis resipiscere coactus Polemo, primum coronam capite detractam projecit, paulo post brachium intra palium reduxit, procedente tempore oris convivalis hilaritatem depouit; ad ultimum, totam luxuriam exiit, uniusque orationis saluberrima medicina sanatus, ex infami ganeone maximus philosophus evasit. Peregrinatus est hujus animus in nequitia, non habitavit (37). . . . Polemo, a young man at Athens, of a very debauched life, who not only loved pleasures, but also gloried in his wickedness, one day, as he was returning home from a feast, not at night, but in the morning, saw Xenocrates the Philosopher's door open: upon which, drunk as he was, perfumed, having a garland of flowers on his head, and covered with a very thin robe, he entered his school, which was crowded with learned men: and not contented with such an indecent intrusion, he sat down on purpose to ridicule his eloquence, and his most judicious precepts, with the wanton sighs of drunkenness. While all that were present expressed a proper indignation at this, Xenocrates alone did not alter his countenance, but, quitting the subject he was upon, he began to speak of modesty and temperance. The gravity of his discourse was such that it wrought a sudden repentance in Polemo; and first he stripped off the garland from his head, next he pulled back his arm under his gown, and afterwards he laid aside the cheerfulness of his looks; at last he renounced his luxury, and being cured by the wholesome medicine of one discourse, of an infamous rake that he was, he became a very great Philosopher. This man was a sojourner in the territories of vice, not an inhabitant. To this may be added the following lines of Horace.

vmt

(37) Valer. Maximus, lib. vi, cap. 12, num. 1, in Edit. pag. 581, 582.

Faciasne, quod olim Mutatus Polemon? ponas insignia morbi Fasciolas, cubital, focalia: potus ut ille Dicitur ex collo furtim carpsisse coronas, Postquam est impransu correptus voce magistri (38).

(38) Horat. Sat. 111, lib. ii, vers. 233.

. . . . For let me ask thee this,

Can?

compatible

(k) See Ælian, in lib. xiii.
Var. Hist.
cb. xxxi, which is intitled, ὅτι Ξενοκράτης Φιλοκτιρίζων ἦν, quod Xeno- crates fuerit mi-sericors.

(1) Elian, ibid.

(m) Plut. de vitioso pudore,
pag. 533.

(n) Diog. Laërt.
lib. iv, num. 11,
& seq.

(c) Id. ibid.
 14.

fee (p) Id. Laërt.
ibid.

CREECH.

to but from strangers pain — publicans

(49) Plut. in Vita Flamini,
pag. 375, 376.
He relates the same thing in the lives of the ten Orators, p. 342.

2. (1)

(50) Above, in the article TYRANNION, remark [C].

(51) Plut. in Vita Phocion.
ppp. 755.

(52) In the remark [I.], citation (67).

$$7 + 1 = 8$$

[C] This Philosopher's Theology was very contemptible.] He acknowledged no other gods than the seven planets, and the heaven of the fixed stars. This made eight Deities; each planet being a god, and all the stars together making but one. See how Cicero rejects this doctrine: 'Nec vero ejus (Aristotelis) condici- pulus Xenocrates in hoc genere praeuditor est, cojus in libris, qui sunt de natura Deorum, nulla species divina describitur. Deos enim oculo esse dicit: quinque eos, qui in sphaera vagis nominantur.

(139) Plut. de Xenocrates was sufficient to convert Polemo (39).
Discrim. Adul. [G] He thought much, and was seldom seen in the & Amici, p. 71. streets; and when he appeared there, the debauched youth

(40) Diog. Laert. 10.116 (supra, num. 39). The Greek text reads: ἔπειτα ἐκείνην ἀποστρέψας τὴν ὄψιν, ὡς ἴσμεν, ἀπέβη. The French translator (41) hath rendered these Greek words thus: Hennessy, se tournant vers l'arrière, comme nous le savons, descendit.

(41) Francis de Feugerolles,
Doctor of Physic.

(42) His misfabe is the same with that of Oliverris, in Valer. Maximus, ubi supra, where he says, si quando ad urbem profecturus esset turbas omnes tumultuosum ac impudicorum ipsi transfreturo de via decedere solitas, sunt qui tradant (43). That is, according to Mr Foucherols, he spent the greatest part of his life in the Academy, without scarce ever going out; but if by chance he went thence into the city, it is reported that some of the rabble followed him, and disturbed him with

(43) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 6. Greek author's thought, and robbing Xenocrates of one of the brightest parts of his glory. The debauchees

(44) See, above, citation (8), of the first article FLORA.

(45) See the end of the foregoing remark. I must not forget what Plutarch saith, that Xenocrates did not come out of the Academy but once in

(46) See, the remark [L], citation (6=) to be present at the new tragedies which were acted during the feast of Bacchus.

[1] they sold him . . . Demetrius Phalereus bought him . . . immediately set him at liberty, and paid the debt to the Athenians.] We find all these particulars in Diogenes Laërtius (48), and I am surprised that Plu-

(48) Diog. Laërt. tarch doth not mention them, since he speaks of an adubi supra, πρωτ. venture somewhat like this. ' But we are told that Ly-
14. curgus, the Orator, one day seeing the farmers and

+ Plato says it was r. to get drunk on the festival of Father's Day.

see below. He lived to the age of eighty-four, if we believe Lucian (q). Others say he died in his eighty-second year, having, through inadvertency, hit his forehead against a kettle in the night-time (r). Some authors pretend that he lived one hundred and three years [K]. He had a share in the friendship and esteem of Alexander the Great (s), and

(q) Lucian. in Macrobius, pag. m. 640, Tom. ii, Oper.

(s) See, remark [D].

(r) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, mem. 14, 15.

planetary gods

(53) Cicero de Natura Deorum,
lib. i, cap. xiii.

one god

A CONFUTATION of those, who said that each planet was a god.

soul of star see Julian

unum, qui ex omnibus sideribus, quæ infixæ celo sunt, ex dispersis quasi membris simplex sit putandus Deus: septimum solem adjungit, octavumque lunam, qui quo sensu beati esse possint, intelligi non potest (53). - Nor was Xenocrates, Aristotle's disciple, more judicious in this respect: In his books of the nature of the gods, there is no account of a divine species. For he says there are eight gods, five of whom inhabit the planets, and bear their names; and one is composed of all the fixed stars, and is to be reckoned a pure and simple god, tho' made up of so many dispersed members. He adds the sun as the seventh, and the moon as the eighth. In what sense these gods can be happy, it is impossible to understand. This opinion of Xenocrates will be found absurd, not only if examined by the light of Revelation, but, even compared with the light of Nature; for without the assistance of the Bible, we conceive distinctly, that the idea of God is neither that of a species, nor of a genus, and consequently cannot comprehend any thing under it but an individual Being. It is therefore acting against reason, to admit more than one Deity. It is another fault against reason, to acknowledge any gods composed of matter; this necessarily subjects them to imperfection, limits them with regard to place and power, and, in a word, distinguishes them from the most infirm creatures, barely by the difference of more or less. How great was the incoherence of our Philosopher? How unaccountably he argues? He would have the moon a distinct deity from all the rest; he said the same thing of every planet, but not of each of the fixed stars, to which he allowed no other advantage than that of being parts of a Deity. The objection urged against him in the Latin passage which I have cited, is just, tho' perhaps he might have eluded it, by asserting that a planet is a god, in the same manner as Socrates is a reasonable creature. He is not reasonable as composed of flesh and bone, &c. but as possessed of a soul which knows and reasons. The sun, for example, is not a deity, considered as composed of that luminous matter which imparts its rays and heat to the earth; but as the seat of an intelligent power, which moves that vast body. What hinders this power from the enjoyment of pleasure and felicity? This is what he might have answered to the objection; but it is a very ill resolution of the point: for this intelligent power not being numerically the same with that of the other planets, will be fixed and centred in the sun by a natural necessity; and consequently, will depend on the matter of the sun, and follow its state and alterations, like those slaves called servi glebæ, or glebæ ascripti; - - - slaves who were bought and sold with the land. We cannot conceive any real happiness in such a dependence. The doctrine of the soul of the world is not so repugnant to right reason as this is; it doth not divide the Deity into several individuals really separated from each other.

(54) Plot. de
Idée & Ofride,
pag. 360.

Here is, I think, a contradiction in Xenocrates's doctrine. He took the planets to be gods, he therefore supposed the matter of them to be an essential part of the gods; for it would be absurd to affirm, that Socrates is a man, and that the body of Socrates is not essential to that man. But, on the other side, Xenocrates admitted a distinction betwixt the gods and certain genii, which supposes that he did not believe matter to be a part of the substance of the gods. Was this arguing consistently? Let us cite Plutarch, who observes (54), that Pythagoras, Plato, Xenocrates, and Chrysippus, according to the opinions of the ancient Divines, acknowledged that there were some great demons, who were neither gods nor men, and who were stronger and more robust than men, and highly surmounted our nature in power; but had not the pure and unmixed Divinity, but were agents compounded of the corporeal and spiritual nature, capable of pleasure and pain, and of other passions and affections which accompany those mutations, discomposing some more, others less; for there is a diversity in vice and virtue, amongst demons, as well as amongst men. . . . (55) Plato attributes to the olympic and celestial gods whatever is right and odd; and whatever is left and even, to the demons; and Xenocrates held, that the unfortunate days, and seasons, wherein fighting, striking of the stomach, fasting or any scandalous or base custom obtains, do not appertain to the good gods, or good demons; but that there are in the air some great and mighty beings, but malicious and ill-natured, who find such things done on their account pleasant to them, and when they have obtained them, they cease to do any more evil to the persons. A commentator on Cicero, hath made a note on this opinion of Xenocrates. He saith that the evil angels may be well pleased with the obscene discourses of men, and that if any thing was capable to appease them, it were those discourses; but that fasts, macerations, and flagellations, with which the penitents labour to expiate their faults, infinitely displease those unfortunate genii: Longe fallitur Xenocrates, cum miseris illis Geniis mortalium plantis, verberibus, jejuniis, aliisque id genus corporis afflictationibus delectari putat: nihil enim perinde averfantur, atque oderunt, ut voluntaria, et sancta ejusmodi supplicia, quibus debita flagitii exolvitur pena, ac Divina Nemesis placatur. At si quo modo leniri possent hostes crudelissimi, non dubium quin male omniſi obsequiis vocibus, quæ impurissimorum Geniorum pollulas ad aures jucundissimæ semper accidunt, suaverent se mulier (56). I do not know where the French translator of Diogenes Laërtius took the following words: 'Xenocrates . . . compared the nature of triangles with that of intelligences: for, said he, the Divine Nature is like an equilateral triangle, the nature of man like a triangle, whose sides are all unequal; and that of demons, like a triangle, with one side unequal, and the other two equal (57)'. I omit Xenocrates's assertion, that the soul is a self-moving number (58). Several illustrious persons approved of this definition (59); but I cannot tell whether we can any way understand it at this time: for, I believe, the Greeks annexed to the word ἀριθμός, an idea which we do not fix to the word number; and that from thence may arise the obscurity which we find in this definition of the soul.

Let us observe that the Dominican Doctor who wrote a letter to Father le Comte, concerning the Chinese ceremonies, was not well informed of the doctrine of Xenocrates; for after having spoken of the Philosophers who admitted no more than one GOD, whom they acknowledged to be the principle and author of all things, a spirit diffused throughout, who governed all things. . . . A pure spirit, the love and enjoyment of which rendered man happy; he adds, that 'Xenocrates, Heraclides, and Theophrastus, Aristotle's disciples, had the same sentiments of the Deity (60)'. And yet these are the three Philosophers whom Cicero ranks together (61), when he refutes the erroneous opinions concerning the nature of God. I would fain know why they are all three put together as orthodox in this Doctor's letter. Remember that the two former were not Aristotle's disciples.

[K] . . . pretend that he lived one hundred and three years.] Meursius maintained this opinion. His reasons are these: Xenocrates was born in the first year of XCIII Olympiad. He began to teach in the second year of the CXth Olympiad, and taught twenty-five years; he must therefore have died in the second year of the CXVth Olympiad, at the age of one hundred and two (62). This is Meursius's conclusion in the ninth chapter of the third book of the Athenian Archontes. But in the twelfth chapter of the fourth book, he computes his life at one hundred and three years, and founds his calculation on the same facts. He is in the right to conclude, that Xenocrates died in third year of the CXVth Olympiad, and reckons better than he did before; but betwixt that year and the first of the XCIII Olympiad, he ought to have

(56) Lelacop.
Plus, in Cicero.
de Nat. Deor.
lib. i, pag. 57.
col. 1.

(57) Fougères.
Additions to the life of Xenocrates.
in Diogenes La-ërtius, pag. 280.

Note that he adds, 'he calculated the number of syllables, which the Greek letters can make by their combinations and transpositions, which amounts to 100,000,000.

I do not know where the translation had real auth.

(58) Plot. de procent. Asi-me, p. 1019.

(59) Id. ibid.

(60) Lettre d'un
Docteur de l'Ordre de S. Dominique, sur les Cé-rimoniaes Chinoises, p. 17.
Cologne, 1700.

(61) Cicero, lib.
supra.

(62) Meursius,
de Arch. Athén.
lib. iii, cap. 11.
pag. 113, 114.

(1) Plat. adv. Colot. circa fin. pag. 1156.

at his request wrote a treatise of the art of reigning (1). He was sent Ambassador more than once [L]. It must not be forgotten, that, according to his opinion, the true Philosopher are the only persons who do cheerfully, and of their own accord, what others are moved to do by the fear of the Laws (u), and that casting an eye on one's neighbour's house, is as great a sin as setting foot into it (x). This last thought condemns the coveting of another's goods, and a prying humour. He had a good maxim for the education of children [M]. He is praised for not being discouraged in the course of his studies by the slowness of his capacity [N].

(u) Plat. de Virtute morali, pag. 446.

(x) Plat. de Curiosit. pag. 521. See also Elian. Var. Histor. lib. xiv. cap. xlii.

10th
L. 10th

(63) 'En vñs Παύρος ἡγεμ. A primis sermo annis Platonis auditor fuit.
Diogen. Laërt.
lib. vi. num. vi.

(64) See the following remark.

(65) In remark
[D].

* Some verses of Homer in the xth book of the Odyssey.

J. C.

(66) Diogen. Laërt.
ubi supra, num.
9, 10.

found no more than one hundred and two years. Let us come to the main point. I think we ought not to rely, as he hath done, on the authority of the anonymous author, who described the Olympiads, and placed the birth of Xenocrates in the first year of the XC1st Olympiad. I have two reasons for believing that he is mistaken. The first is, that Xenocrates was very young when he became Plato's disciple (63). But Plato being advanced in years when he began to teach, it could not be possible for Xenocrates to enter his school very young, if he was born in the first year of the XC1st Olympiad, for he would not have been above twelve years younger than Plato. In the second place, I observe that he was deputed to Antipater, in the second year of the CXIVth Olympiad (64): at that time he must have been ninety-three years of age, according to the computation of the anonymous author. But it is not easy to imagine, that the authors who mentioned this embassy, should have taken no notice of the extraordinary age of the Ambassador.

[L] He was sent Ambassador more than once. I have already said (65), that he was one of the Ambassadors whom the Republic of Athens sent to King Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. Being also sent on an embassy to Antipater, for the deliverance of the prisoners of war taken at the battle of Lamia, he was by that Prince invited to supper, to whom he answered in the following words:

O Circe *, thy allurements tempt in vain
The man whose virtue prudent thoughts sustain;
For who can come with pleasure to a feast,
Before he see his captive friends releas'd.

Intimating by these words, that he would never eat till he obtained his request, meaning the liberty of his captive citizens and friends. The King perceiving the address of the man, freely condescended to his suit, and immediately set the prisoners free (66). Antipater was not so just in the following juncture. He exacted from the Athenians that they should send him full power to act as he should think fit, and refer the conditions of the treaty of peace to his pleasure. They sent to him Phocion, with other Ambassadors, and amongst the rest Xenocrates the Philosopher, whose reputation for prudence and wisdom was so great and universal, that they said, no man could be so arrogant, so cruel, or passionate, but that the mien and aspect of Xenocrates would soften him, and even inspire him with reverence and respect. Notwithstanding this, such was the malignity of the nature of Antipater, who was an enemy to virtue, that the contrary happened: for at first when he embraced all the rest of his companions, he passed by Xenocrates, not vouchsafing to take any notice of him: upon this occasion Xenocrates said, Antipater may well be ashamed to see me a witness of the ill-usage

he would give the Athenians. Afterwards when he began to speak, Antipater had not patience to hear him, but thwarted and interrupted him on every subject, and at last enjoined him silence: but when Phocion had declared the purport of their embassy, he replied, that he would make a peace and alliance with the Athenians, provided they would deliver up to him Demosthenes and Hyperides, and govern their Republic, according to the antient form of government instituted by their ancestors; according to which, none but people of fortune were admitted in to public employments, &c. All the Ambassadors, except Xenocrates, were content with, and accepted, these conditions as mild and indulgent, but Xenocrates said, that if the Athenians were slaves, Antipater treated them mildly enough; but if a free people he treated them too harshly (67).

Some will think, perhaps, that Antipater used Xenocrates so roughly, in order to revenge the incivility with which this Philosopher had received him. We are told (68), that going to Athens he made a visit to Xenocrates, who would not vouchsafe to interrupt his lecture, and made him no answer before he had finished it. But as every body knew that this Philosopher affected not to appear a courtier, and that the esteem which the world had for him was founded on his Philosophical gravity, it is not at all probable that Antipater should have taken it amiss that he was received in such a manner.

[M] He had a good maxim for the education of children. He was of opinion, that children rather ought to have a defence fitted to their ears, than fencers, or prize-fighters; because the ears only of the latter suffered by the blows, but the morals of the former were hurt and corrupted by words. Not that he thereby recommended deafness, or forbade that they should be suffered to hear at all; but he advised them not to listen to wicked discourse, that debauchery might be kept out, till better principles (like so many guardians appointed by Philosophy) had taken charge of that part, which is so liable to be drawn aside and corrupted by discourse (69). Plutarch greatly approves of this advice (70).

[N] He is praised for not being discouraged in the course of his studies by the slowness of his capacity. Plutarch made use of this example to encourage those of slow parts. Let us bear with patience the jests of those who are, or who fancy they are, more lively and quick of apprehension than we. This course was taken by Cleanthes and Xenocrates, who being somewhat duller than their school-fellows, did not however give over learning nor despond; but prevented the jests of others, by comparing themselves to narrow-mouthed vessels and copper-plates; because, though they received learning with difficulty, yet they retained it surely (71). One of these two comparisons hath been employed in one of Moliere's Comedies (72).

(67) Plat. in Vita Phocion. pag. 753.

(68) Diogen. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 11.

(69) Plut. de auditione, init. pag. 38.

(70) Compare with this what is above in remark [G], of the article LY-CURGUS.

(71) Plut. de auditione, pag. 47.

(72) See, above, remark [E], of the article E-RASMUS.

Educator

XENOPHANES, a Greek Philosopher, born at Colophon, was a disciple of Archelaus, as some say (a). According to this account, he should have been contemporary with Socrates (b). Others will have it that he learned of himself all that he knew (c), and lived at the same time with Anaximander (d). According to this account, he must have flourished before Socrates, and about the LXth Olympiad, as Diogenes Laërtius affirms (e). He lived very long; for some verses are cited in which he declares, that his studies had been applauded in Greece sixty-seven years: 2. That he began to meet with applause at the age of twenty-five (f) [A]. He wrote several poems on Philosophical

(a) Diogen. Laërtius, lib. ix, num. 18.

(b) He was a disciple of Archelaus.

(c) Diogen. Laërtius, ubi supra.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid. num. 20. See remark [A].

(f) Laërtius, ibid. num. 19.

[A] He lived very long; for some verses are cited, &c. It appears by those verses that he was ninety-two years old when he made them; and as we have no reason for believing that he died in a short time after, we may hence the more certainly know the error of Lucian, who allows him to have lived no longer than ninety-one years (1). Censorinus bestows on him above one hundred years (2). Scaliger is inclined

(1) Lucianus, in Macrobiis, pag. m. 640, Tom. ii, Oper.

(2) See Scaliger, in Euseb. pag. m. 96.

7 F

Philosophical subjects: besides two thousand on the foundation of Colophon (g), and on that of the Colony of Elea (b). His opinion concerning the nature of God, is very little different from Spinozism [B]. He wrote some verses against Homer and Hesiod (i), on the idle stories which they sung of the gods. He held a maxim which entirely overturned

(g) Idem, ibid. num. 20. Note, that Moreri reduces all the verses of Xenophanes to that number. Artemaus often quotes verses of that Philosopher. (b) A town in Italy. (i) Diog. Laërtius, ibid. num. 18. See Sext. Empiricus adv. Math. pag. 57, 341.

- clined to believe that he lived at least one hundred and four years (3). From this long life we may reconcile those who make him flourish in the LVth Olympiad (4), or the LXth (5); and those who place him under the XLth Olympiad (6); for we may suppose that the latter do not point out the time when he flourished, but that of his birth. Observe, that even on this supposition, it is not possible to reconcile them with those, who tell us that he lived till the time when the Persians were driven out of Greece. We have still some verses where it is pretended that he mentions their flight. Athenæus quotes them (7). If you understand by this the time when they lost the battle of Marathon, it was in the LXXIth Olympiad. If you understand the battle of Salamis, or that of Plataea, it was the LXXVth Olympiad. Suppose in the next place, not with Casaubon, that he made these verses fifteen or twenty years after the defeat of the Persians (8), but the very year of that great event, and you will find it impossible for him to have been born in the XLth Olympiad, since in that case it must be said that he lived at least 126 years. What shall we then think of a passage of Clemens Alexandrinus, which informs us that he was born in the XLth Olympiad, and lived to the time of Darius? *Τῆς Ελεατικῆς ἀγωγῆς, Ξενοφάνης ὁ Κολοφώνιος κατάρχει, ὃν φησι Τίμαιος κατὰ Ἱέρωνα τὸν Σικελίας δυνάστην, καὶ ἐπὶ χαρμῶν τὸν ποιητὴν, γεγενῆσθαι. Ἀπολλοδωρὸς δὲ, κατὰ τὴν τεσσαρεσκῆντ' Ὀλυμπιάδα γενόμενον, παρτετακέναι ἀγχοὺ τῶν Δαρείων τε καὶ Κύρου χρόνων: Eleaticæ disciplinæ princeps fuit Xenophanes Colophonius, quem dicit Timæus fuisse tempore Hieronis, qui in Sicilia obtinuit dominatum, & Epicharmi Poetæ. Apollodorus autem cum natus esset quadragesima Olympiade, pervenisse usque ad tempora Darii & Cyri (9). - - - Xenophanes of Colophon was the head of the Eleatic Philosophy: Timæus affirms, that he lived in the time of Hiero, who reigned in Sicily, and of the Poet Epicharmus. But Apollodorus says that he was born in the XLth Olympiad, and lived down to the times of Darius and Cyrus. Must we believe that an error crept into the Greek text, and that instead of Δαρείων we ought to read Κεῖρας? My answer is, there is no necessity to suppose it. For a life of one hundred years, which is allowed to Xenophanes, is sufficient to fill up the space betwixt the XLth Olympiad and the LXVth, which was the beginning of Darius's reign. I do not deny that it is a little strange to see, that so good an author as Apollodorus, should say that Xenophanes lived to the time of Darius and Cyrus. It would have been much more regular to have said to the time of Cyrus and Darius, as Mr Menage observes (10). Besides, it is certain that in pointing out the times, the Antients usually joined Cræsus and Cyrus together, which serves to support the correction I have mentioned; but at the bottom there is neither any absurdity nor any falsity in Apollodorus's opinion, that Xenophanes lived from the XLth Olympiad till the time of Darius. Yet I should rather choose to place his birth much lower, since, according to Timæus (11), he flourished in the time of Hiero, who did not begin to reign before the LXXVth Olympiad. I shall observe by the way, that I take their opinion to be ill founded, who say that he was a Disciple of Archelaus. This is Lucian's opinion (12).*
- [B] His opinion concerning the nature of God, is very little different from Spinozism. If we had all his works, we should be much better able to give a precise and distinct account of his system: and if we knew his opinions only by some small and very obscure fragments cited by Cicero, it were impossible to avoid confusion: 'Xenophanes qui mente adjuncta omne præterea quod esset infinitum Deum voluit esse, de ipsa mente item reprehenditur ut cæteri: de infinitate autem vehementius, in qua nihil neque sentiens neque conjunctum esse potest (13). - - - Xenophanes, ὃς οὐκ ἦν ὁμοῖον, of opinion that God is all that is infinite united
- (3) Scaliger, ibid.
- (4) Euseb. in Chron. pag. m. 127.
- (5) Id. ibid. pag. 128. Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 20.
- (6) Sext. Empir. adv. Math. pag. 51.
- (7) Athen. lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. 54.
- (8) Casaub. in Athen. pag. 110.
- (9) Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i, p. 301, C.
- (10) Menag. in Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 20.
- (11) See, above, citat. (9).
- (12) Lucian. ubi supra.
- (13) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xi.

with a mind, is likewise refuted with the rest, as to that mind. But he is yet more absurd with regard to infinity, in which there can be nothing that has any sensation or conjunction. These words of Cicero shew that Xenophanes taught that the intellect is God, and that all that is infinite is God. As for the first part of this doctrine, Cicero forbears the repetition of what he had said before to refute those who held the Divinity of the intellect; he supposes that the same refutation falls also upon this first point of the opinion of Xenophanes. With regard to the second part, he advances what he thinks capable of refuting it; for he observes, that infinity, as it contains nothing that has any sensation or conjunction, cannot be God. I shall not examine the weak side of this argument, it being wholly unnecessary: Every body will clearly apprehend that since there is something cogitative, connected with finite extension, as in man, such things also are not incompatible with an infinite extent. I might easily believe that Cicero did not apprehend the opinion he mentions; he divides it into two parts, when perhaps it ought not to be divided. It is more probable that Xenophanes meant, that God was nothing but the infinity of nature, accompanied with an intellect. 'Xenophanem notum est omne infinitum cum mente, Deum tradere (14). - - - (14) These words of Menæmus affirm that God was all that is infinite, accompanied with a mind. It would be a very strange doctrine to assert, on one hand, that every infinite is God; and, on the other, that the human intellect is God: this would be multiplying the Deity in a discordant manner, and erring inconsistently. I very well know that the ancient Philosophers do not appear to us exact, in the fragments we have of their opinions concerning the principles of all things: but what particularly obliges me to believe that Xenophanes did not make that division ascribed to him, is, that even according to the testimony of Cicero, he taught that there was but one sole Being, and that this Being was immutable, eternal, and the true God: (15) Xenophanes paulo etiam antiquior unum esse omnia, neque id esse mutabile & id esse verum Deum, neque natum usquam quicquam & sempiternum conglobata figura (16). This is more distinct than what Aristotle relates of Xenophanes's opinion. *Ξενοφάνης δὲ πρῶτον τῶν ἐνίστας (ὃ γὰρ Παρμενίδης τὴν λέγεται μᾶθησι) ὑδὲν διεσαφηνίσεν, εἰς τῆς φύσεως τῶν ὑδὲτος εἴκει δῖον. ἀλλ' εἰς τὸν ὅλον ὑδὲν ἀποκρίσας, τὸν εἶναι φησι τὸν θεόν. Xenophanes autem, quantum prior illi, unum posuerat, (nam Parmenides ejus auditor fuisse dicitur) nihil tamen clarum dixit, & neutrius horum naturam attigisse videtur: sed ad totum cælum respiciens, ipsum unum ait esse Deum (17). These words of Aristotle inform us, that Xenophanes took up with confused notions, and that he did not examine in particular whether unity be, with respect to matter, and that he asserted in general, what is One is God. Others say he maintained, that nature had no beginning, and shall have no end, and that she is always like her self; but that he spoke of the gods in the plural number. *Οὗτος γὰρ εἶπεν, ὅτι θεοὶ ἀπολείπει· ἀλλ' εἶναι λέγει τὸ πᾶν ὡς ὁμοῖον. Nullum penitus vel ortum vel interitum relinquit, sui semper simile hoc universum esse ratus (18). It is true he rejected the common opinion, that the gods stood in need of, and gave commands to one another (19). Dependence seemed to him incompatible with the Divine Nature. He added, that the gods saw and heard in general, but not particularly this or that thing. Thus I would understand these words of Eusebius, ἀκούει δὲ καὶ ὁρᾷ καθόλου καὶ μὴ κατὰ μέρος, in universum audire ac cernere, non verò per partes (20). This favours of Spinozism; for Spinoza affirmed that God, as a substance, is barely endued with thought in general, and that the particular knowledge of every object does not unite in the sole mind, in order to represent all things to the substance of God. I own it may be pretended that Xenophanes

(15) Cicero, Academicæ Quaest. lib. i, cap. xxxvii.

(16) Confut. Seculæ Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypothesis τῶν ὑδὲτος εἴκει δῖον. lib. i, cap. xxxvii.

(17) Aristoteles, Metaphysic. lib. i, cap. vi, pag. m. 648, E. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. m. 1048, A. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xiii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xiv, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xv, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xvi, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xvii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xix, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xx, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xxi, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xxii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xxv, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xxvii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xxix, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xxx, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xxxii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xxxiii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xxxiv, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xxxvi, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xxxvii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xxxviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xxxix, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xl, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xli, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xliii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xliiii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlv, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlvi, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlvii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, K. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, L. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, M. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, N. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, O. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, P. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Q. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, R. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, S. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, T. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, U. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, V. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, W. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, X. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Y. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, Z. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, A. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, B. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, C. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, D. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, E. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, F. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, G. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, H. lib. i, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 1072, I. lib. i, cap.

turned the Pagan religion; viz. that it is not less impious to assert that the gods were born than to affirm that they die, since in either case it would be equally true that their existence is not eternal (k). This maxim is very true and not at all contrary to the doctrine

(k) Οἷον Ξενοφάνης ἔλεγεν ὅτι ὁμοίως ἀσεβῆσαι οἱ γένεσθαι φασκαρτες τὰς θεὰς τοῖς ἀποθανεῖν λέγουσιν. ἀμφοτέρως γὰρ συμβαίνει μὴ εἶναι ποτε τὰς θεάς. Ut Xenophanes dicebat similiter esse impios qui nasci affirmant Deos, & qui mori dicunt. Utroque enim modo contingit, ut non sint aliquando Dii. Aristot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. 446, B.

Xenophanes meant, that by a single act of the mind God sees all things, and not every one of them by a particular idea. He might explain himself if he was to return into the world: he would not be a little puzzled to remove the difficulties proposed to him concerning his contradictions, and inconsistencies. He admitted an infinity of invariable worlds, and four elements of all things (21). But to what purpose is this infinity of worlds, since he taught that all things were but one being, and that this sole and only being was God? Was not this speaking of the world, like the people who call America the new world, and who give the name of world to mankind, and in France even to a great Lord's footmen, &c. (22). He asserted that God was of a round figure, and yet made him infinite (23). He said that God did not in any thing resemble man, and that he heard and saw all things without respiration (24). A fine exception indeed! Was it necessary to express it? If the Deity hath nothing common with men, is it not evident, that he has no lungs and doth not breathe? Why did he not also at the same time except the eyes, the ears, and the face, &c. as well as the act of respiration? Xenophanes spoke more properly in the verses which Clemens Alexandrinus cites (25), for he said no more there than that God is not like man either in body or soul; and that if brutes could paint, they would represent the Deity in the shape of their own species: He continually returned to his unity. Ἐν παντὶ τὸ εἶναι, οὐ καὶ φρονέειν, καὶ αἰσθάνειν, simulque (Deum) esse OMNIA, mentem, prudentiam, eternitatem (26).

That God is ALL, a mind, prudence, eternity. The whole Eleatic sect also believed the unity of all things (27), and the immobility of all things (28). And perhaps I should not be mistaken, if I should venture to say, that from thence arose the doctrine so much extolled by the Sceptics, I mean, that our senses deceive us, and that we ought not to rely on their evidence. For when it was objected against those Philosophers that new generations continually happen in the world; which supposes that there are two principles, one active and the other passive, or at least that the sole substance of nature is not immutable; they found no better expedient to solve this difficulty, than to deny that there was any generation. They were therefore obliged to assert, that nature continues always the same, and that the alterations which we believe the undergones are nothing but meer illusions of our senses, and meer appearances. Eusebius informs us that Parmenides taught, that the universe being eternal and immovable, and one sole being, remained always the same with regard to the reality of things, and that the generations were only founded on a false judgment of the senses (29): Ἀίδιον μὲν γὰρ τὸ πᾶν, καὶ ἀκίνητον ἀποφαίνεται, καὶ κατὰ τὴν τῶν περὶ φύσιν ἀληθειᾶν εἶναι γὰρ αὐτὸ μόνον. μὴ γένεσθαι τε καὶ ἀτρέμεναι, ἢ δὲ ἀκίνητον. γένεσθαι δὲ τὸν καθ' ὑπόληψιν ψευδὴ δοκῶντα εἶναι. καὶ τὰς αἰσθήσεις ἐκβάλλει ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας. Etenim sempiternum esse orbem hunc universum, omnisque motu carere; ipsiusque naturæ veritatem omnino constare defendit (30); singularem enim illum & unigenam, stabilem ac quietum, nec certo aliquo tempore generatum esse: Generationem porro ad ea rejicit, quæ falsa quadam opinione patentur esse, adeoque sensus omnes communiōne veritatis excludit. Let us also consult the same Eusebius, if we would see those Philosophers driven from this subterfuge. Aristotle clearly evinced to these defenders of immutability, or ingenerability, that the refuge which they had chosen betrayed them; for since they durst not deny the mutation of appearances, that is, that we do feel the earth at one time cold, and hot at another, it follows that nature is not immovable; and that the must of necessity change in the subject which produces, or receives our sensations. Perception is passive, and therefore the alteration of it supposes an efficient cause and a passive principle: and thus your unity of all things is overturned. Besides, this alteration is incompatible with your pretended immobility, or incorruptibility. Ὡς ἐπὶ πρῶτον εἴη ἂν τὸ λεγόμενον ἔτερον. . . . ἔπειτα δὲ ἐν τῷ ὄντι ἔχει καὶ μὴν ἔδδ' ἀκίνητον. ἢ γὰρ αἰσθήσεις ἐστὶ κινήσεις. Habemus ergo primum id esse, quod diversum vocatur. . . . deinde quicquid est, non esse, quid unum. Adde ne immobile quidem illud esse, cum ipsa sentiendi ratio motus quidam sit (31). I shall return again to this subject in the remark [K].

I shall observe by the way that there is a great deal of probability that the author of the Art of Thinking censures Aristotle unjustly in favour of Parmenides. 'It were to be wished, saith he (32), that Aristotle, who took care to acquaint us of this sophism (33), had taken as great care to avoid it. For it is too evident that he hath attacked several ancient Philosophers, by citing their opinions not very fairly. He refuses Parmenides and Melissus, for having admitted but one principle of all things, as if they had meant the principle of which they are composed, whereas they meant, the sole and only principle from which all things derive their original, which is God. The author of the Art of Thinking does Parmenides and Melissus more honour than they deserve. He represents their opinions concerning the origin of created beings as orthodox; and yet they are as impious as those of Spinoza, or very nearly so: these Philosophers acknowledged no difference betwixt the principle of which all things are composed, and that which produced them. They admitted but one sole Being, and pretended that all things were eternal. This is what is imputed to them in Eusebius, as we have seen above. Aristotle doth not charge them with all this in every respect: he owns that Parmenides teaching on one side that in reality there is but one Being; and, on the other side, that according to appearance, there are several Beings, accommodated himself to appearance, and supposed two other principles, which are heat and cold, fire and earth: Ἀναγκαζόμενοι δ' ἀκολουθεῖν τοῖς φαινομένοις, καὶ τὸ ἐν μὲν κατὰ λόγον, πλεῖον δὲ κατὰ τὴν αἰσθήσιν ὑπολαμβάναν εἶναι, δύο τὰς αἰτίας, καὶ δύο τὰς ἀρχάς τίθισσι πάλιν. Σεισμὸν καὶ ψυχρὸν, οἷον αὐτὸς καὶ γὰρ λέγων. Τέτων δὲ τὸ μὲν, &c. Coactus vero illa, quæ apparent, sequi, & unum ratione, plura vero secundum sensum putans esse, duas causas rursus, ac duo principia ponit, calidum, & frigidum, velut ignem, & terram dicens. Horum autem alterum, &c. (34). It is hard to apprehend by what turn of thought, such a great number of the ancient Philosophers could believe that there is but one substance in the universe (35). But it is very easy to apprehend that this being granted, they were then obliged to assert that the universe perpetually continues in the same state: for a being which necessarily exists, and which alone is all things, must of necessity be perfectly immovable. No external cause can change it, nor can it alter itself. It hath, independently on its own will, both its existence and all the attributes of its nature. Whatever it hath once, it ought to possess continually; for what had no beginning is not liable to destruction. This also proves that it cannot acquire any thing new, since the production of one new quality would be the destruction of some other (36). Thus far the system of Xenophanes and Parmenides was well supported. But as experience convinced them that changes do happen in nature, such as must be internal and effectual with regard to our thoughts, even tho' such changes were supposed to be meer illusions of the senses, these Philosophers should have acknowledged that they had built upon a false supposition, and should have admitted two principles, one active and the other passive. This being granted, we may believe that the active principle remains always in the same state amidst the continual variations of nature (37). It's uniform and invariable action impressed on different subjects, must necessarily produce all the vicissitudes in the world. Do not we see that the motion of the air, without altering in itself, produces different effects,

(31) Euseb. de ubi supra, lib. xiv, cap. xviii, pag. 756, D. ex lib. viii, Aristotelis de Philosophia.

(32) Art. de pensée, Part. iii, ch. xviii, pag. m. 316.

(33) This is, the sophism called ignoratio elench, to prove a different thing from that in question.

(34) Aristotle, Metaphysica, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 648, F. See also cap. iii.

(35) I think they were led into such an opinion by this supposition, that since nothing can be produced out of nothing, whatever exists has a necessary existence, and is therefore eternal and infinite, and that infinite can be but one.

(36) From hence we may draw a strong proof that our souls and matter are not uncreated beings. See the remark [K].

(37) Stabilisque manens dat cuncta moveri. Boet. Consolat. Philof. lib. iii, Manu in.

(21) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 19.

(22) See Furetier's Dictionary at the word Monde.

(23) Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(24) Id. ibid. brutes painte

(25) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. v, pag. 601, & ex eo Eusebius, ubi supra, lib. xiii, cap. xiii, pag. 679.

(26) Laërt. ubi supra. See also Eusebius, ibid. lib. xiv, cap. xiv, p. 725, B.

(27) Euseb. ibid.

(28) Idem, lib. xiv, cap. xvii.

(29) Eusebius, ubi supra, lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 21. C, ex Plutarcho.

(30) This passage seems to be ill translated: it had rather signified that nature is not really exist, but only according to appearance or the delusion of the senses.

(1) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i, init.

doctrine of the Incarnation. He believed that the Moon is an inhabited country [C], and that it is impossible to predict future events (I); and if the conjecture of a learned Critic is well grounded, he asserted that there is in nature more good than evil [D]. He would (38) Cicero, Academ. Quest.

lib. ii, cap.
xxxix.

it is Drwn
as moon late from

(39) Laftant.
lib. iii, cap. xxii,
pag. m. 307.

(40) He married a sister of Cromwell, by whom he had a daughter, who was married to Dr Tillotfon, Arch-bifhop of Canterbury.

Isaac Newton conjectured

(41) Plut. de Placitis Philo-foph. lib. ii, cap.
xxiv, pag. 901.

(42) Plurima
deteriora mente effe. Diogen.
Laërt. ubi fupra,
num. 19.

(43) Meric. Cafaubon. in hac verba Diogen.
Laërtii.

effects, according as it meets with a wind-mill, a ship, scattered straw, or a heap of leaves, &c.?

[C] He believed that the Moon is an inhabited country.] Cicero informs us of this; and he is not the only author, who ascribes this opinion to him. 'Habitari

' ait Xenophanes in Luna, eamque effe terram multa-
' rum urbium & montium (38). --- Xenophanes fays

' that the moon is inhabited, and a country having feveral ' towns and mountains in it.' Laftantius greatly ridi-cles this opinion, and represents Xenophanes as believing, not that the furface of the moon was inhabited, but that it contained within it's bofom an earth, peopled with a race of men. He juftly blames him for having asserted that this planet is eighteen times bigger than the earth: 'Xenophanes dicentibus ma-

' joribus orbem lune duodeviginti partibus majorem
' effe, quam terram, ftultiffime credidit: & quod huic levitati fuit contentaneum, dixit, intra concavum lune finum effe aliam terram, & ibi aliud genus hominum fimili modo vivere, quo nos in hac terra vi-vimus. Habent igitur illi lunatici homines alteram lunam, quæ illis nocturnum lumen exhibeat, ficut hæc exhibet nobis. Et fortaffe nofter hic orbis alte-rius inferioris terræ luna fit (39). --- Xenophanes

' was foolifh enough to believe the Mathematicians, when ' they faid that the moon's orb is eighteen times greater ' than the earth: and, what was confiftent with this ' credulity, he faid that the moon contained in it's bofom

' another earth, inhabited by a race of men, who live in ' the fame manner, as we do here. So thefe men in the ' moon have another moon to enlighten them in the night,

' as theirs enlightens us, and, perhaps, this globe of ours

' is a moon to that other earth.' I would not engage that he has rightly underftood this Philofopher's opinion;

but feveral very great men of thefe latter ages would laugh at him for making a jeft of it. This opinion of Xenophanes does him honour: it is the opinion of feveral famous Mathematicians. See what Dr Wilkins, Bifhop of Chefter (40), faith on this head. His treatife of the World in the Moon was translated into French, by the Sieur de la Montagne, and printed at Rouen, in the year 1656, in 8vo. See alfo Mr Huy-gen's Cosmotheoros. Mr Bafnage de Bauval gave us an extract of it in his Journal for the month of May 1698. For the reft, the opinions of Xenophanes, concerning the motion of the fun and moon, and concerning the caufe of eclipfes, are very pitiful. He fays that 'the fun is eclipsed, by being extinguished, and ' that it recovers it's light next morning when it riles:

' he gives an account of an eclipse of the fun, which ' continued for a whole month, and alfo of a total ' eclipse fo that the day feemed to be night. . . . that ' there are feveral funs and feveral moons, according to ' the various climates of the earth, and at a certain time

' the orb of the fun falls upon fome part of the ' world which is not inhabited; and thus moving as

' in a vacuum, it undergoes an eclipse. The fame
' perfon affirms, that the fun moves ftrait forward in

' infinitum, but appears to us to move orbicularly by ' reason of it's great diftance (41).'

[D] He asserted that there is in nature more good than evil.] Diogenes Laërtius reckons among the chief opinions of Xenophanes τὰ πολλὰ ἥ τ'ω νῦ εἶναι, that moft things are worfe than, or inferior to, the mind (42). It feems unworthy of a Philofopher to fpeak thus; for the meanest peasant knows very well, and no body needs be taught, that the mind of man is better than metals, water, or air, &c. We therefore ought to believe that Xenophanes meant something greater. The following is the conjecture of Meric Cafaubon. He pretends that this Philofopher taught that the Divine mind, which made the world, endeavoured to endow all creatures with a ftate of perfection;

but that having met with ftrong obftacles in matter, he could not always compafs his defigns; and therefore, on fome occafions, he was forced to produce evil things (43). This is faying, that in this conflict he was fometimes vanquifhed, but oftener vanquifher; that the greateft part of things were fubmitted to the defires and power of the Divine mind, and confe-quently ἥ τ'ω νῦ εἶναι, doth not mean worfe than the mind, but fubjected to it, and the matter of it's triumph. Cafaubon confirms his conjecture by a pa-ffage in Plato, where it is faid, that neceffity and the mind concurred in the production of the world, and that neceffity was perfuaded to confent that things for the moft part fhould be governed for the beft (44). (44) Plato, in Timæo, pag. m.

1058, D.

Μεμιγμένη γὰρ ἐν ἡ τῷδε κόσμῳ τῷ γένεσιν, ἐξ ἀναγκῆς τε καὶ νῦν συσδύσας ἐγενήθη· νῦν δὲ ἀναγ-κῆς ἀρχόντῳ, τῷ παίδειν αὐτὴν τῶν γιγνομένων τὰ ἀλίστα ἐπὶ τῷ βέλτιστον ἄγειν, ταῦτα κατὰ ταῦτα δὲ ἀνάγκης (45) ἡτ'ωμίνης ὑπὸ παίδος (46) Meric. Cafaubon reads τῆς ἀνάγκης.

ἐμθεν, ἥ τω κατ' ἀρχὰς ἐγενήσθ' οὐ τῷδε τῷ παῖ.
Mundi enim bujus generatio ex neceffitatibus mentisque coitu mixta est. Nam cum mens neceffitati dominaretur, coitu mixta est. Nam cum mens neceffitati dominaretur, propterea quod perfuadendo eam ad optimas ut plurimum rerum eventus induceret, ipsaque hac ratione cedensienti perfuafioni pareretur, mundi bujus exordia confite-runt. Cafaubon obferves (46) that Homer, on a particular occafion, having faid that evil exceeds good, it was converted into a general maxim (47): as if, uni-verfally fpeaking, the miferies of human life overbalanced the happinefs of it. The fame Critic obferves, that thofe who fpoke of this fubject with the greateft modesty, excufed Providence on account of the fatal neceffity which constrained it to open a gate to feveral evils. 'Qui parciffime loquebantur Deum excufabant

' qui Bonus non nifi bona in operibus fuis & omni ad-
' miniftratione fua propofuiffet, fed materię obfultan-
' tis vel deficientis neceffitate coactus, etiam malis non

' paucis invitatus locum reliquiffet. --- Thofe who fpoke
' of this fubject with the greateft modesty, excufed GOD,
' who, as a good Being, had propofed nothing but what ' was good, both in his works and providence; but that,

' being forced by the neceffity of the matter which refifted
' or was deficient, he had unwillingly left room for feveral

' evils.' He adds, that Euripides hath ftrenuoufly refuted the common opinion, that evil furpaffes good, and he cites the beginning of that confutation.

Ἐλεξε γὰρ τις ὡς τὰ χείρονα

Πλείω βροτοῖσιν ἐστὶ τῶν ἀμεινόνων.

Ἐγὼ δὲ τῷ τοῖς ἀντίαν γινώμην ἔχω

Πλείω τὰ χρεῖα τῶν κακῶν εἶναι βροτοῖς.

Some fay that there is in nature more evil than good:
but I hold a contrary opinion to others, viz. there is in nature more good than evil.

The fubfequent words of Euripides feemed to Cafau-bon to be written by an infpired pen (48). Pliny (48) Cereus differs from this Poet's opinion; for tho' he doth not say that it plainly appears nature behaves to us rather like a cruel ftep-mother, than a tender indulgent parent, yet he intimates that he is of fuch an opinion: parentis

' Principium jure tribuetur homini cujus caufa videtur
' cuncta alia genuiffe natura; magna fæva mercede boni. id.

' contra tanta fua munera: non fit ut fatis æftimare
' parens melior homini, an trifitior noverca fuerit (49). (49) Plinius, lib.
' --- The chief place will be juftly allowed to man, for who, aut. p. m. p.

' whofe fake nature feems to have produced all other ' things. Great are the bounties of nature, but attended

' with many evils, and purchafed with many afflictions:
' fo that it is hard to judge, whether fhe act the part ' of a tender and indulgent parent, or that of a cruel ftep-

' mother to mankind.' She lets the prefents fhe makes us, to faith he, at the price of a thoufand afflictions. To this purpose he gives a long defcription of human infirmities, and oppofes them to the advantages of animals;

nor doth he forget the vices in which men exceed the brutes: 'Uni animantium luctus eft datus, uni luxuria,
' & quidem innumerabilibus modis, ac per fingula

' membra: uni ambitio, uni avaritia, uni immenfa
' vivendi cupido, uni fuperftitio, uni feputuræ cura,

' atque etiam poft fe de futuro. Nulli vita fragilior,
' nulli rerum omnium libido major, nulli pavor con-
' fuftor, nulli rabies acrior. Dentque cetera animantia in

' fuo genere probe degunt: congregari videmus, & ftare
' contra diffimilia: Leonum feritas inter fe non dimi-
' cat: ferpentium morfus non petit ferpentes: ne us-

' ris quidem belluæ ac pifces, nifi in diverfa genera
' fæviunt. At hercules homini plurima ex homine

' funt

would not be singular in this opinion : but it is probable that he was of a very different sentiment ; and if the question was only about evil morally considered [E], I do not believe he would find one opponent. Every body owns that good and honest men are very rare, and

(50) Id. ibid.
pag. 5. Compare with this the passage of Arnobius, cited in the article TUL-LIA, citation (52).

* sunt mala (50). -- Of all animals man alone is subject to sorrow, to luxury, and that in numberless respects, and through all his senses: man alone is addicted to ambition, to avarice, and an immoderate and excessive desire of life: he alone is concerned for his burial, and even for what shall happen after his death. No animal is more frail, none more lustful, none more liable to consternation, none more furious. In fine, other animals live friendly with their respective species. We see them flock and herd together, and only oppose others of a different kind. A lion, however furious, does not attack a lion. A serpent does not sting a serpent. Nor do the sea-monsters and fishes destroy any but those of a different kind from themselves. But men bring numberless evils upon each other. He doth not forget the reflexion which several people have made, that it would be best for a man not to be born, or to die quickly

(51) Multi ex-istere qui non nasci optimum censerent aut quam ocyssime aboliri. Id. ibid.
pag. 4. See above, the article
TULLIA, cited.
(56). See this justice in Seneca Enchiridion. Pyr-rhon. Hypotyposis. lib. iii. cap.
xviii, pag. 157.

(52) *Plin. lib. ii,
cap. vii, pag. m.*
146.

(53) Id. ibid.

(51). He affirms, in another book, that the greatest blessing that God has bestowed upon men amongst so many pains and troubles of life, is the power of killing themselves: Nec sibi potest (Deus) mortem consciscere, si velit, quod homini dedit optimum in tantis vitæ pænis (52). He had enumerated several of the follies of Paganism, and concluded, that of all these things there is but one certain, which is, that all things are uncertain, and that man is the most miserable and vainest part of the whole creation: Quæ singula improvidam mortalitatem involvunt, solum ut inter ista certum sit, nihil esse certi, NEC MISERIUS QUIDQUAM HOMINE, AUT SUPERBIUS. Ceteris quippe animantium sola victus cura est, in quo sponte naturæ benignitas sufficit: uno quidem vel præferendo cunctis bonis, quod de gloria, de pecunia, ambitione, superque de morte non cogitant (53). -- All these things discover the weakness of our understanding; so that this alone is certain, that nothing is certain, and that MAN IS OF ALL ANIMALS THE MOST VAIN AND MISERABLE. For other living creatures take no care for their food, which is abundantly supplied to them by the voluntary produce of nature. But this advantage of theirs is greater than all the rest, that they have no thoughts of glory, riches, ambition, or even death.

Plautus hath so naturally expressed an opinion contrary to Euripides's maxim, that I think myself obliged to transcribe his words :

Satin' parva res est voluptatum in vitâ,
Atque in ætate agundâ,
Præquam quod molestum est ! ita cique comparatum
Est in ætate hominum.
Ita Dis est placitum, voluptatem ut moror comes consequatur :
Quin incommodi plus malique ilico addit, boni si ob-tigit quid (54).

(54) *Plaut. in Amphitr. Act. ii,
Sc. ii, init. pag.
m. 25.*

How few are the pleasures in every age of life, when compared with the troubles of it : This is the fate of all men, and the will of the gods, that pain and sorrow should accompany our pleasures. But let me immediately have more pain, and more sorrow, if it is attended with any pleasure.

Diphilus, the Poet, thought that fortune obliges us to drink a liquor composed of three evils, and only one good,

Ὠσπερ κυδαζέουσ' ἐνίοθ' ἡμῖν ἡ τύχη,
Ἐν ἀγαθῶν ἐπιχέασα τρεῖ' ἐπ' ἀνελπίστοις κακῶν.

(55) Diphilus, apud Stobæum.

Fortuna nobis, tanquam cyathos effecantibus,
Si unum bonum infundat, tria mala affundit (55).

[E] If the question was only about evil morally considered. Many things might be observed upon the question, Whether Euripides is rather to be believed than Pliny, and so many other great men, who have maintained that the evils of human life surpasses the good things of it. Let us consider this subject a little, and say in the first place that if the dispute is only about vicious evil, it will soon be decided in favour of Pliny. For where is the man who dares maintain that the virtuous actions, compared with the crimes of mankind, are in proportion as ten to ten thousand ! In the second place, if the dispute is about painful evil, Euripides will have several adherents. As to the second point, I shall refer it to the following remark, and offer something there on the first.

V O L. V. No. CXXXV.

How detestable soever the opinion of two principles hath constantly appeared to all Christians (56), they have nevertheless acknowledged a subaltern principle of moral evil. Divines teach us that a great number of angels having sinned, made a party in the universe against God. For brevity sake this party is denoted by the name of Devil, and he is acknowledged as the cause of the fall of the first man, and as the perpetual tempter and seducer of mankind. The Devil having declared war against God from the moment of his fall, hath always continued in his rebellion, and there was never any peace or truce. He continually applies himself to usurp the rights of his Creator, and debauch his subjects, in order to make them rebels and engage them to serve under his banner against their common master. He succeeded in his first hostilities with regard to man : In the Garden of Eden he attacked the mother of all living, and vanquished her ; immediately after he attacked the first man, and defeated him. Thus he became master of mankind. God did not abandon this prey to him, but delivered them out of their bondage, and recovered them out of that state of reprobation by virtue of the satisfaction which the second Person of the Trinity undertook to pay to his justice. This second Person engaged to become man, and to act as a Mediator between God and mankind, and as a Redeemer of Adam and his posterity. He took upon him to combat the Devil's party ; so that he was the head of God's party, against the Devil, who was the head of the rebellious creatures. The design was not to conquer all the posterity of Adam ; for they were all, by birth, in the power of the Devil, but to preserve, or recover the country which had been conquered. The design of JESUS CHRIST, the Mediator, and Son of God, was to recover it ; that of the Devil was to hold it. The victory of the Mediator consisted in leading men into the paths of truth and virtue ; that of the devil in seducing them into the road of error and vice. So that in order to know whether moral good equals moral evil among men, we need only compare the victories of the Devil with those of JESUS CHRIST. Now in history we find but very few triumphs of JESUS CHRIST : Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto (57) ; and we every where meet with the triumphs of the Devil. The war between these two parties is a continual, or almost continual, train of successes on the Devil's side ; and if the rebellious party made annals of their exploits, there is not one day in the year, but what would be there marked with some ample subject for bonfires, songs of triumph, and such other signs of victory. The Annalist would have no occasion for hyperboles and flattery, to shew the superiority of that faction. Sacred history tells us of but one good in Adam's family (58), and reduces to one good man the family of that good man, and so on in the other generations to Noah, in whose family we find three sons whom God saved from the deluge with their father, mother, and wives. Thus at the end of sixteen hundred fifty-six years, all mankind, except one family of eight persons, were so deeply engaged in the interest of the Devil, that the enormity of their crimes rendered it necessary to extirpate them. The deluge, that terrible monument of the justice of God, is a lofty monument of the Devil's victories ; and so much the rather as that general punishment did not deprive him of his prey : the souls of those who perished in the deluge went to hell : This is the Devil's aim and intention, and therefore his triumph. Error and vice, soon after the deluge, lifted up their heads in Noah's family : his descendants plunged themselves into idolatry, and all manner of debaucheries ; that is to say, the Devil preserved his usurped power over them. There was no more than a handful of people, confined in Judæa, that escaped him with respect to Orthodoxy ; nay, it must be owned, that among that people the success of the good party was very variable,

(56) For the Manichees, the Manichees, &c.
do not deserve to be called Christians.

See Campbell on gospels triumph over

(57) *Virgil.
Æn. lib. i, ver.
118.*

(58) Compare with this remark [E], of the article OROSIUS

and that nothing is more common than men who depart from the rules of virtue. But, without doubt, Xenophanes intended to speak of Physical evil; and his sense was, that ble, with respect to Orthodoxy, since that very nation suffered it self to be seduced to idolatry from time to time; inasmuch, that their conduct was a continued shifting between true and false worship. But as for vice it never suffered a real interregnum amongst the Jews, any more than in other countries: and consequently the Devil continually kept a footing in the small conquests which the good party recovered. There happened a happy revolution at the birth of Jesus Christ: his miracles, his gospel, and his Apostles, made glorious conquests. Then it was that the empire of the Devil received a very great check, and a considerable part of the earth was wrested out of his hands; but he was not so driven out that he did not preserve several correspondents, and a great many creatures there; he maintained himself there by the abominable Heresies which he sowed: vices were never entirely driven out of it, and soon after entered into it again, as it were, in triumph. Errors, schisms, disputes, and cabals, introduced themselves, together with the fatal train of infamous passions, which generally accompany them. The Heresies, superstitions, violences, frauds, extorsions, and impurities, which have appeared all over the Christian world for several ages, are things which I should only be able to describe imperfectly, though I was master of more eloquence than Cicero. What Virgil said is true in the most literal sense.

(59) Virgil.
Æneid. lib. vi,
ver. 625.

Non, mihi si linguæ centum sint, oraque centum, Ferreæ vox, omnes scelerum comprehendere formas,
..... possum (59).

Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
And throats of brass, inspired with iron lungs,
I could not half those horrid crimes repeat:

DRYDEN.

Thus whilst the Devil reigned uninterrupted without the limits of Christendom, he so successfully disputed the ground in Christendom, that the progress of his arms was beyond comparison greater than that of truth and virtue. A stop was put to this progress, and he was forced to give ground in the XVth century; but what he lost on one side he regained on the other; and what he does not effect by lies, he brings to pass by the corruption of manners. There is no asylum, no fortress where he does not make men feel the effects of his power in this respect. Leave the world, shut your self up in a monastery; he will follow you, he will bring into it intrigues, envy, factions, or, if he can do no worse, lewdness; this last resource is almost infallible; Diaboli virtus in lumbis est, --- The power of the devil lies in the loins, faith St Jerome (60). A modern author affirms, That in those places where Popery is yet predominant, there is no true piety . . . and that Italy and Spain are places where there is scarce any more true virtue than in Turkey (61). He

(60) Montagne, Essais, liv. iii,
chap. vi, pag. m.
134.

(61) Jurieu, Vrai Systeme de
l'Eglise, pag. m.
162.

(62) Esprit de
Mr Arnauld,
Tom. ii, pag.
392.

(63) See the Abbot Richard, Critique des Preju-gez de Mr Jurieu, pag. 234.
He quotes the Avis aux Protestants de l'Europe. This Avis, is prefixed to the Preju-gez de l'Eglise contre le Papisme.

(64) Id. ibid.
pag. 238, quoting the same Avis aux Protestants.

saith in another book (62), That it is a notorious and acknowledged truth, that all the convents of Spain and Portugal are places of prostitution; and that when chance draws the curtain, to give us an opportunity of seeing what passes in the French monasteries, we discover that they take a little more care of external appearances, but at the bottom are as lewd as others. He spares the Protestants a little more; but yet he says (63) that corruption runs very high amongst them, and is become so general, that it is not only amongst the Reformed in France, but also those of England, the northern kingdoms, and the provinces of Germany; that the Princes and Sovereigns of those places think of nothing but their political interests; that the people are void of piety, and the pastors remiss; that a prodigious indifference for religion reigns every where, generally speaking; that Princes take no care of the truth (64); that the women of England are debauched to the last degree, and that the Protestant countries in Germany, are plunged into such a debauchery, as debases them, and makes them brutish. You may say, if you please, that this author's descriptions are overstrained; but it will nevertheless be true, that there prevails among Christians a deplorable corruption of manners.

These two things require our reflexion. War reigns at least for as long a time as peace amongst the Christians: I confine my self to Christianity, because it is unnecessary for me to speak of the Infidel nations; they are continually in the service of the Devil, and subject to his empire; and the usurper reigns there unmolested. It is undeniable that war is the Devil's time, or, if I may so express my self, his turn of reigning; for without mentioning the violences and debaucheries committed in it, every soldier is obliged to profess that he will suffer no injuries; he must either quit the employment, or revenge an affront: but this is manifestly denying our allegiance to the empire of Jesus Christ, and deserting to the enemy. Times of peace do not seem so favourable to the empire of the Devil, and yet they are very much so; for as people grow rich, they grow more voluptuous, and plunge themselves deeper in luxury and voluptuousness.

Nunc patimur longæ pacis mala, sævior armis
Luxuria incubuit, victumque ulciscitur orbem (65).

(65) Juvenal,
Sat. VI, ver.
291.

We suffer all the inveterate ills of peace,
And wasteful riot; whose destructive charms
Revenge the vanquish'd world of our victorious arms.

DRYDEN.

My other remark is more decisive. The Papists and Protestants agree, that very few people escape damnation. They allow none to be saved but only the Orthodox who lead good lives, and repent of their sins at the point of death. They do not indeed deny but that habitual sinners may be saved upon a sincere death-bed repentance, but withal they maintain, that nothing is more rare than such a repentance. According to which it is plain, that for one man saved, there are perhaps a million damned. Now the war which the Devil wages with God, is about the conquest of souls; and therefore it is certain that the victory is on the Devil's side: he gains all the damned, and loses only the very few souls who were predestinated to be saved. He is therefore victor prælio, & victor bello. . . victorious in the battle, and victorious in the war. For having inspired men with an infinitely greater number of wicked actions, than Jesus Christ has inspired them with good ones, he has been superior in the battle; and as he makes almost all men die in impenitence, he keeps all he had conquered (66). Death puts an end to the war. Christ doth not combat in order to release the dead from the power of the Devil. We must therefore say that this war ends in the Devil's advantage, what he claimed is yielded and abandoned to him. I know he will suffer eternal punishment for his victories: But this, far from obscuring my position, that moral evil is greater than moral good, serves to make it more indisputable: For the Devils amidst the flames will eternally curse, and make all the damned eternally curse the name of God. There will therefore be more creatures who will hate, than who will love God. Besides, in this remark, the question is properly about the state of things in this life.

I have an Italian book intitled Monarchia del nostro Signor Gesu Christo, printed at Venice 1573, and written by Giovanni Antonio Panthera Parentino. The author of this book gives the history of the battles of Lucifer with Jesus Christ, from the beginning of the world down to the times of Mahometanism. He passes slightly over some of the attempts in which Lucifer succeeded; but gives a full account of every attempt in which he failed; such as the Design of destroying the posterity of Abraham in Egypt, his enterprises against David, against the Macabees, against Jesus Christ, &c. This is like a man who seeing people gaming, should only take an account of the losses (67): it would appear by such a computation that he who had won the most had lost all his money. This is an image of the conduct of several Historians. Their nation appears always victorious: for they relate only those events which were profperous.

(66) That it is say, all he conquered when he made the first man fall, when by all his posterity became flames to the Devil.

(67) Mr En-quest in the first volume of the consideration of the Defence, who this thought which regard to those, who only computed what he had expended, but not what he had received.

Observe,

that the sweets of life do not equal the bitter potions which it obliges us to swallow [F].
Several

Observe, that all I have been saying is every day preached, and that without any design of derogating from the almighty power of Jesus Christ. No more is meant by it than (what is also my opinion) that man is naturally so prone to evil, that except the small number of the elect, all other men live and die in the service of the evil spirit, and render the paternal love of God to remedy their wickedness, or bring them to repentance, of no effect.

[F] His sense was that the sweets of life do not equal the bitter potions which it obliges us to swallow. Those who hold the contrary opinion, chiefly insist upon a parallel betwixt diseases and health. There are very few persons, whatever age they be of, but can reckon up, incomparably more days of health than of sickness; and there are a great many, who, in the space of twenty years, have not been afflicted with diseases that will take up in all fifteen days. But this comparison is fallacious (68); for health considered alone is rather an indolence than a sense of pleasure; it is rather a bare exemption from evil, than a good, whilst sickness is worse than a privation of pleasure: it is a positive state which plunges the mind into a sense of suffering, and loads the patient with pain.

(68) See the article P E R I-CLES, remark
[K].

(69) I think it is Madam de Scuderi.

(70) Rarum est quod sub magna dimensione pacium continet ma-teriam: densum quod sub parva dimensione multum continet materiam.

happy
compro

inde

Somebody (69) judiciously says, that when health is alone, it is a good which is not much perceived, and sometimes only serves to make us the more ardently desire all the other pleasures which we cannot have. Let us make use of a comparison taken from the schoolmen: they say that rare, i. e. porous, bodies contain but very little matter under a great extent; and that dense bodies contain a great quantity of matter in a small compass (70). According to this principle we must say, that there is more matter in three feet of water than in two thousand five hundred feet of air; this is a lively image of sickness and health. Sickness resembles the dense bodies, and health the rare. Health lasts many years successively, and yet contains but a small portion of happiness. Sickness continues but a few days, and yet comprehends a vast load of misery.

If we had a scale adapted to weigh both a disease of fifteen days, and the health of fifteen years, we should observe the same difference that we find in the balance betwixt a bag of feathers and a piece of lead. In one scale we should see a body which takes up a great deal of room, and in the other, one which lies in a very small compass; and yet one of them is not heavier than the other. Let us then beware of the illusion which the extension of health may draw us into, when it is paralleled with sickness. But you will say that health is considerable, not only by reason it exempts us from a very great evil, but also by the liberty it affords us, to enjoy a thousand lively and very sensible pleasures. I grant all this, but it ought to be farther considered, that there being two sorts of evils to which we are subject, it only secures us from one, and leaves us wholly exposed to the other. We are subject to pain and sorrow, two such terrible afflictions, that it is not to be decided which is most dreadful. The most vigorous health doth not secure us from grief. For grief flows in upon us through a thousand channels, and is of the nature of dense bodies: it comprizes a great deal of matter in a very small compass; evil is heaped up, crowded and pressed close in it. One hour's grief contains more evil, than there is good in six or seven pleasant days. The other day I was told of a man who killed himself, after an anxious melancholy of three or four weeks. Every night he had laid his sword under his bolster, in hopes that he should have courage enough to end his life, when darkness should increase his grief: but his resolution failed for several nights successively. At last, not being able to resist his uneasiness, he cut the veins of his arm. I affirm, that all the pleasures which this man had enjoyed in thirty years, would not equal the evils which tormented him the last month of his life, if both were weighed in the balance. Look back to my parallel of dense and rare bodies, and remember this, that the good things of this life are a less good, than the evil things are an evil. Evils are generally more pure and unmixed than good things; the lively sense of pleasure doth not continue long, it immediately grows flat and dull, and is followed with a disgust.

Πάντων μὲν κύριος ἐστὶ καὶ ὕπνος, καὶ φιλότιμος
Μολπῆς τε γλυκερῆς, καὶ ἀμύμονος ὄρχησμός.

Omnium quidem satietas est, & somni & amoris
Cantusque dulcis & egregiae saltationis (71).

*The best of things beyond their measure cloy;
Sleep's balm, blessing, love's endearing joy;
The staff, the dance*

Mr POPE.

(71) Homer,
Iliad. lib. xiii,
ver. 636. See, above, a like thought of Pin-dar, in citation (4), of the last article BER-NICE.

What appeared to us a great good when we did not possess it, scarce affects us in the enjoyment: so that we acquire, with a thousand troubles, and a thousand uneasinesses, what we possess with no more than a moderate pleasure; and very often the fear of losing the good we enjoy, surpasses all the pleasures of the fruition of it.

There has been pointed out to me a very fine passage of Pliny, and a very proper one to confirm the thoughts which I have just now offered. 'Si verum facere judicium volumus, ac repudiata omni fortunæ ambitione decernere, mortalium nemo est felix (72). Abunde igitur, atque indulgenter fortuna decidit cum eo, qui jure dici non infelix potest. Quippe ut alia non sint, certe, ne lassescat fortuna, metus est: quo semel recepto, solida felicitas non est. Quid quod nemo mortalium omnibus horis sapit? utinamque saluum hoc, & non a vate dictum quam plurimi judicent! Vana mortalitas, & ad circumscribendum seipsam ingeniosa, computat more Thracie gentis, quæ calculos colore distinctos, pro experimento cujusque diei in urnam condit, ac supremo die separatos dinumerat, atque ita de quoque pronunciat. Quid quod iste calculi candore illo laudatus dies, originem mali habuit? Quam multos accepta afflixere imperia; quam multos bona perdere, & ultimis merere suppliciis? ista nimirum bona, si cui inter illa hora in gaudio fuit. Ita est profecto, alius de alio judicat dies, & tamen supremum de omnibus: ideoque nullis credendum est. Quid quod bona malis paria non sunt, etiam pari numero: nec lætitia ulla minimo merore pensanda? Heu vana & imprudens diligentia! numerus dierum comparatur: ubi queritur pondus (73). If we would make a true judgment of things, without being biased by the allurements of fortune, we must determine that no man is happy. Fortune is bounteous and indulgent to the man who may justly be said not to be unhappy. For as to those who are called happy, their condition is always attended with a fear lest fortune should change and forsake them: and where this fear takes place, there can be no solid happiness. What shall we say of this observation, that no man is wise at all times? I wish this was false, and that a great many people did not justly account it an oracle. Man is vain, and ingenious in circumscribing himself, and computes his happiness after the manner of the Thracians, who every day put into an urn either a black or a white pebble, to denote the good or bad fortune of that day: at last they separated these pebbles, and upon comparing the two numbers together, they formed their judgment of the whole of their lives. Shall that very day which is distinguished by the white pebble give rise to evil? How many have been afflicted by the power which they have accepted? How many undone and reduced to the greatest misery by good things, and the same good things which were the cause of their former rejoicing. Thus it actually happens, one day judges of another, and the last judges of all the rest; so that no particular day can be relied upon. What shall we say of this observation, that the good things of this life are not equal to the evil, not even in number? And that the least affliction is not to be compensated by any joy? Alas! how vain and imprudently diligent is man, who compares his fortunate with his unfortunate days by their number, when the question is concerning the weight and nature of them.' I have found another passage which gives a lively description of the ill side of felicity, I speak of those common to all men, I mean corporeal pleasures. 'Quid autem de corporis voluptatibus loquar, quarum appetentia quidem plena est anxietatis, satietas verò penitentia? Quantos illæ morbos, quàm intolerabiles dolores, quasi quendam fructum nequi-

none (72) Euripides, in Medea, ver.
1228, & 1230,
pag. 327, says
the same thing.
happy

(73) Plinius, lib.
viii, cap. xi, pag.
m. 62. Mr du Roi has acquainted me of this passage.

Several people are persuaded of the truth of this, and do not want plausible reasons for it,

‘tiae fruentium solent referre corporibus! . . . Tristeis vero esse voluptatum exitus, quibus reminisci libi-dinum suarum vult, intelliget . . .

Habet omnis hoc voluptas,
Stimulis agit fruentis,
Apiumque par volantum,
Ubi grata mella fudit,
Fugit, & nimis tenaci
Ferit ista corda morfu (74).

(74) Boëtius, de Consol. Philo-soph. lib. iii,
Prosa vii, pag.
m. 61.

‘What need I speak of bodily pleasures, the pursuit of which is full of anxiety, and the enjoyment followed by disgust and repentance. How great distress, how intolerable pains do they bring upon the body, as the fruits of wickedness! . . . But that the issue of pleasures is disagreeable and painful, whoever reflects on his own lusts, must easily understand . . .

*If pleasures e'er invade the heart
They stimulate through every part:
But when th' enjoyers happy made,
And when their grateful bones' s'bed,
Their sweet allurements soon decay,
They leave a sting and flee away.*

Thus Boëtius introduces Philosophy speaking to him. It appears by this discourse, that if anxiety precedes the enjoyment of pleasures, disgust and repentance follow close after it. A vast number of authors observe this unhappy concomitance, or, to speak more intelligibly, this connexion of pleasure and uneasiness.
The two following were cited in my first edition:

(75) Ovidius, Metam. lib. vii,
ver. 453.

‘*usque adeo nulli est sincera voluptas,
Sollicitique aliquid latens intervenit (75).*

*But mortal bliss will never come sincere;
Pleasure may lead, but pain brings up the rear.*

*The young disease with musty voluptuaries
mixes with our grief, and with our joys
the young disease with musty voluptuaries
mixes with our grief, and with our joys*

(76) Lucet. lib. iv,
ver. 1127.

*Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsa floribus angat.
Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsa floribus angat.
His sancti mirth, and poisons all his joys.*

CREECH.

And now I add a third, who is Antiphanes.

‘Εν τῷ αὐτῷ δὲ γὰ τέρψι, ἔνθα τὸ ἡδὺ ἔστι, πᾶσιόν τε καὶ τὸ λυπηρὸν. αἱ γὰρ ἡδοναὶ οὐκ ἐπὶ σφῶν αὐτῶν ἐμπορεύονται, ἀλλ' ἀκαλε-στῶ αὐταῖς λύπαι καὶ πῶνοι.

Id est,

At in eodem ipso, in quo
Jucunditas inest, prope sanè & molestia praesto est.
Voluptates enim
Non ipse solae ingrediuntur, sed earum comites sunt
Dolores ac labores.

Wherever pleasures and delights are present, pain and sorrow are at hand. For pleasures never come alone, pain and toil are their constant attendants.

(76) Munera ista
fortune putatis?
insidie sunt.
Quisquis nostrum
tutam agere vitam vult, quantum plurimum potest ista viscata beneficia devitet, in quibus hoc quoque miserimi fallimur, habere
nos putamus,
habemur. Seneca,
Epist. viii.

Let us also observe this circumstance. We are not only in fear of losing what we possess, but also vexed to see other people equal or surpass us, and that others will soon be able to come up to us, and afterwards get before us. Observe, that in order to prove that good is not so perfectly good, as evil is evil, I have made no use of this argument, that it rarely happens fallimur, habere
nos putamus,
habemur. Seneca,
Epist. viii.

say, I have omitted this reason, because I do not here consider the causes and occasions of good and evil, but good and evil in themselves. For the rest, it would be departing from the state of the question to say, that man afflicts himself without cause. For it is not our business here to know whether his grief is reasonable, or the effect of his weakness; but the question is, to know whether he grieves. This very thing, that a man vexes himself without reason, and makes himself unhappy by his own fault, is an evil.

We must own with Seneca, considering the multitude of good things which nature has imparted to us, and the inexhaustible industry with which the wit of man diversifies pleasures, and discovers the sources of them; that God, not contented to provide barely for our necessities, hath besides furnished us wherewithal to live deliciously. ‘*Unde hæc innumerabilia oculis, aureis, animum mulcentia? unde illa luxuriam quo-que instruens copia? Neque enim necessitatibus tan-tummodo nostris provivum est: usque in deliciis amamur. Tot arbuta, non uno modo frugifera, tot herbæ salutare, tot varietates ciborum, per totum annum digestæ, ut inertique quoque fortuita terræ alimen-ta præberent. Jam animalia omnis generis, alia in sicco solidoque, alia in humido innascentia, alia per sublime dimissa: ut omnis rerum naturæ pars tributum aliquod nobis conferre (77) . . . Unde ista palatum tuum saporibus exquisitis ultra satietatem lacef-sentia? unde hæc irritamenta jam lassæ voluptatis?
unde ista quies, in qua putrescis, ac marces? Nonne si gratus es, dices,*

Deus nobis hæc otia fecit (78).

‘*Whence proceed these numberless delights for the entertainment of our eyes, our ears, and mind? Whence that abundance which supplies even our luxury? For care is taken not only for our necessities, but also for our pleasures, and the gratifying of all our senses and appetites. So many pleasant trees, fruitful in various manners, so many wholesome herbs, and such a variety of meats, in every season of the year, that the casual produce of the earth might supply a lazy man with food for his maintenance. Whence all these animals, bred on the earth, some in the waters, and others descending from the heavens, that every part of nature might be tributary to man? . . . Whence those things which by their exquisite tastes, and delicious flavours, provoke your appetite even after it is satiated? Whence those things which awaken your pleasures when de-cayed? Whence that quiet and ease in which you rot and moulder away? Will you not say, if you are thankful, that you owe all this to the bounty of Heaven?’
All that Seneca saith in this part of his book de Be-neficiis is very true; but, on the other side, doth not Pliny (79) assure us that nature makes us buy her presents at the price of so many sufferings, that it is dubious whether she deserves most, the name of a parent, or of a step-mother? To reconcile these two authors, we ought to consider what the Scripture teaches us concerning the oeconomy of God, as a father, and as judge of mankind. Those two relations require that man should feel good and evil:
but the question is, whether evil exceeds good? and upon this head I am apt to think that we can go no farther than opinions and conjectures. Several people say, that most persons, when a little advanced in years, grow like la Mothe le Vayer, who would have refused to pass again through the same good and evil which he had felt in his life (80). If it be so, we must believe that, upon the whole, every one finds the pleasures which he has enjoyed, has been unequal to the uneasinesses and pains with which he has been afflicted. I do not alledge that no body is content with his condition, for this is no proof that every man believes himself less happy than unhappy.
These verses of Horace contain a most certain fact:*

Qui sit, Mæcenas, ut nemo, quam sibi fortem
Seu ratio dederit, seu fors objecerit, illa Contentus vivat? laudet diversa sequentes (81)?

*Whence comes, my Lord, this general discontent?
Why do all laud the state that chance hath sent,*

Paley

(77) Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib.
iv, cap. v. Compare what has been said above of Cicero, in citation [90], of the article PE-RICLES.

(78) Seneca, ibid.
cap. vi.

(79) I have cited his words in remark [D].
See the words of Seneca, in remark [C].

(80) See remark
[F], in the article VAYER, and what has been said of Cicero, in the article TULLIA, remark [2].

(81) Horat. lib.
i, satira 2a.

Or their own choice procur'd? but fondly blest
Their neighbour's lots, and praise what they possess?
CREECH.

(82) I have quoted his words in the article TULLIA, citat. (83).

(83) Felicitas cui
præcipua fuerit homini non est humani iudicii :
cum prosperitatem ipsam alius alio modo & suopte ingenio quisque terminet.
*Plin. lib. vii,
cap. xl, pag. m.
62.*

(84) Tacitus, Annal. lib. vi,
cap. xxii,

(85) See the article MANICHEES, remark [C].

(36) Pausanias,
lib. viii, pag.
296.

Phlopidium, fecit & Cræsum (87) Lydorum regem, vitam omni suæ ætatis tempore beatam egisse, id ego ut credam non facile adducor. Nam ut hominum quis levioribus multo, quam alius quicumque qui iidem vixerit temporibus, incommodis affectus, non difficilimè fortasse reperitur, uti navis adversis tempestatibus minus agitata : sic promodum neminem unquam crediderim perpetuò molestarum & calamitatum immunem fuisse : quando neque ulla navis memorari possit, quæ semper secundissimis ufa fuerit tempestatibus. Nam & Homerus id sensitse videtur, quo loco duo, bonorum unum, alterum malorum, doliâ apud Jovem statuit. id enim ille ex Delphico Apolline didicerrat ; qui ipsium & miserum simul, & beatum dixerat, utpote ad utramque vitæ sortem genitum. - - What I have heard at Plophis, concerning Aglaus, a man of that city, who lived in the time of Cræsus, King of Lydia, that this Aglaus was happy through the whole course of his life, seemed to me incredible. One man indeed may meet with fewer afflictions than other men, as one ship may suffer less in a storm than another. But that any man should be continually free from troubles and distresses, is as incredible, and contrary to experience, as that ever there was a ship which always enjoyed favourable winds. Homer says that there lies by Jupiter an urn containing good things ; but he places by him another containing evil things. This he learned from Apollo of Delphos, who pronounced, that Homer himself was both an unhappy and a happy man, and was born both to a good and a bad fate. As this Aglaus was living in Cræsus's time, it is no wonder that Solon omitted him, when he named to that Monarch three men who to him seemed happy (88), for he believed that to deserve such a title, one ought to be sheltered from the inconstancy of fortune, and that, during this life no man is secure from this inconstancy. If Solon had affirmed that those three men, never felt either grief or pain, he had been mistaken (89), and had contradicted that profound good sense which made him look for instances of happiness, not at the court of Cræsus, but amongst men of an ordinary condition.

(87) This is now well translated by Romulus Amæus. It should be, tem-pore Cræsi. This fault has not been mended in the Leipsic edition, 1696.

(88) Plutarch. in Solone, pag. 93.

(89) See, above, in citation (86), the words of Pausanias.

'It is certain that those who would find persons, who have felt more happiness than uneasiness, will rather meet with them among the peasants, or the meanest tradesmen, than amongst Kings and Princes' (90). Read these words of a great man: 'Do you believe then that afflictions and the most deadly pains do not hide themselves under the purple, or that a kingdom is an universal remedy against all evils, balm that assuages them, or a charm which enchants them? Whereas, by the course of Divine providence, which knows how to counterpoise the most exalted conditions, this grandeur which we at a distance admire, as something more than human, affects less those who are born in it, or confounds itself in its own plenty; and, on the contrary, in grandeur, afflictions are more deeply felt; their blow is so much the heavier on great men, as they are less prepared to bear it' (91). These are the two forces of the un-

PRINCES and great men are not so happy as other people.

(90) See HORACE, Epodon Ode II.

m s v

C
G r n

(91) James Be heavier on great men, as they are less prepared to 'bear it' (91). These are the two sources of the unhappiness of Princes: their being continually accuffed to the advantages of their condition, renders them insensible as to good, and very sensible of evil.

 Let them receive one piece of bad news, and three of good, they scarce feel the happiness of the latter, but are touched to the quick with the misfortune of the former.
 Can they then want uneasiness? Are their prosperities not thwarted by some ill fortune? Read all that Gustavus Adolphus did in Germany, and you will there find a superiority of fortune, which has very few examples; yet you will observe so great a mixture of disadvantageous events, that you will easily believe him to have run through a great deal of uneasiness (92). Nay, suppose the victories gained in some provinces, do not concur with the losses sustained in others, you will have reason to believe that the joy is not pure and unmixed. An hundred anxious reflexions disturb it. People will imagine that the attack was made too soon or too late; too many men were lost, and all advantage was not taken of the disorder of the vanquished, but they were permitted to recover from their fright; and they believe that by a different conduct the victory had been more complete. How many Generals are there who have very uneasy nights after entire victories? They are sensible that they are beholden for them to some lucky chance, to the

(91) James Be-nignus Bossuet,
Bishop of Meaux,
Oraison funebre
de Marie Terese d'Autriche,
Reine de France,
pag. 78, 79.
Dutch edition.

(92) He was obliged to publish some Manifesto's against those who blamed him for not taking the present of Magdeburg.

7 H fault

(87) This is not well translated by Romulus A-maſæus. It ſhould be, tempore Cræſſi. This fault has not been mended in the Leipſic edition, 1696.

e (88) Plutarch. in Solone, pag. 91.

(89) See, above, in citation (86), the words of Pausanias.

O PRINCES and great men are not so happy as other people.

(90) See Horace,
Epodon Ode II.

(91) James Be-nignus Bossuet,
Bishop of Meaux,
Oraison funebre
de Marie Tereſe
d' Auſtriche, Reine de France,
pag. 78, 79.
Dutch edition.

(92) He was obliged to publish some Manifesto's against those who blamed him for not preventing the taking of Magdeburg.

kind with an infinite number of agreeable conveniences, and appointed all other things for fault of the enemy, and sometimes even to their own faults. They are sensible they have not done all that might have been done. They are apprehensive of the comments of the experienced, and of the malicious reflexions of their enemies. In a word, they cannot bear a good testimony to themselves, nor internally applaud the eulogies bestowed upon them. This disturbs and racks them. Whilst their consciences are sometimes asleep, with regard to the law of God, they are touched to the very quick with respect to the transgression of some laws in the art of war, and the non-observance of some rules which an expert General would have followed. Observe, that the most fortunate Princes, either in gaining of battles, or conquering of towns, are those, whom the defeat of an army, or the raising of a siege, afflict the most sensibly. A long train of adversities hardens others; but these grow almost insensible as to good success, and extremely sensible of the least disgraces. Augustus is an example of this. On a thousand occasions he obtained the most important and glorious advantages over his enemies that he could have wished, and scarce experienced any of the effects of bad fortune: but the loss of three legions so prodigiously afflicted him, that the pain, we may say, he suffered on this account, was greater than the pleasure which he had felt by ten victories. Read what follows: 'Graves ignominias cladesque, sait Suetonius, after having made a long enumeration of the successes of this Emperor, duas omnino, nec alibi quam in Germania, accepit, Lollianam, & Varianam: Sed Lollianam majoris infamiae quam detrimenti: Varianam pene excusabilem, tribus legionibus, cum duce, legatibusque, & auxiliis omnibus cæsis. Hæc nuntiata, excubias per urbem indixit, ne quis tumultus existeret: & Præsidibus provinciarum propagavit imperium, ut & à peritis & assuetis sociis continerentur. Vovit & magnos ludos Jovi Opt. Max. si rempublicam in meliorem statum vertisset: quod factum Cimbrico Mariscoque bello erat. Adeo namque consternatum ferunt, ut per continuos menses barba capilloque summisso, caput interdum foribus illideret, vociferans: Quintili Vare, legiones redde: diemque cladis quotannis mœstum habuerit ac lugubrem (93).

(93) Suetonius, in Augustus, cap. 23.

Augustus met only with two disgraces, viz. the overthrow of Lollius and that of Varus, both in Germany. The former was attended with more infamy than loss. The latter was almost fatal, for in it were slain three legions, with their General, the Ambassadors, and all their auxiliaries. Upon the arrival of this news, Augustus set a guard in several parts of the city, to prevent tumults, and enlarged the authority of the governors of the provinces, that they might keep the allies from making commotions. He likewise made a vow of instituting solemn games to Jupiter, if he brought the Republic into a better condition: This was done in the war with the Cimbrians, and the Marfi. It is reported that Augustus was so much affected with this disgrace, that having, for several months, neglected his beard and hair, he would sometimes knock his head against the wall, and cry out, Varus, restore my legions; and he annually held the day of that overthrow as a day of sadness and mourning. I cannot better prove, than by the example of Augustus, that we ought not to look for happy people upon the throne; for, if any monarch was ever fortune's favourite, it was Augustus; and yet the list of his griefs (94) is so large, that no one will deny, that at least he felt as much evil as good. See what I observe concerning Charles V (95), Queen Elizabeth (96), Lewis XI (97), and Lewis XIII (98). Mr Silhon faith judiciously, that the whole lives of the Emperors, Ferdinand, Charles V, and Philip II, were nothing but a mixture of good and evil; that in them we see prosperities without number, and misfortunes without measure; wounds covered with laurels, and triumphs adorned with mourning. . . . Look upon Ferdinand, proud of the reduction of the kingdom of Granada, and of obtaining the title of Catholic: see him triumphing in the conquest of Naples, and over the fortune of France: behold, a caprice gives him Navarre, and chance guides him to the discovery of an unknown world, and new riches. . . . But let us consider the other side of his life, and turn the tables. We shall see a prince ill treated by fortune, and

(94) You will find it in Pliny, lib. vii, cap. xlv.

(95) In the remark [L], of his article.

(96) In the remark [S], of her article.

(97) In the remark [T], of his article.

(98) In the remark [B], of his article.

a diadem broken by her blows. We shall see a father burying his only son, and solemnizing the funeral of his eldest daughter. A husband losing a wife, who had been his glory, and more the companion of his fatigues than of his bed. A master forsaken by his servants and creatures: An old man driven from his house, and a father-in-law deplored and stripped by his own son-in-law (99). Add to this, that he could not bear the reputation of a great Captain. And this jealousy was not the least of his uneasinesses. See in the original what Mr Silhon faith of Charles V (100), and Philip II. And see what Plutarch relates of a great Prince who was esteemed happy (101).

The Abbot Regnier had great reason to say (102),

Qu'ont ils d'ordinaire,
Qu'ont ils au dessus
Du destin vulgaire
Ceux qu'un fort prospère
Elevé le plus?
Une montre vaine
De grandeur humaine,
Qui marche avec eux,
Des dehors pompeux,
Brillants agréables,
Des soins devorants,
Des biens apparents,
Des maux véritables.
Les grands en un mot
N'ont pas le bon Lot.

The man whom fortune raises high
In power, or wealth, or dignity,
Say what has he above the fate
Of other men in humble state?
What but a pageant outside show
Of human grandeur does he know?
Devouring cares, apparent bliss,
Not one degree of happiness:
Whilst anxious thoughts, and misery
Lie hid beneath the pageantry.
In short, the truly happy state
Is not the portion of the great.

The following words of the Count de Buffi struck me the first time that I read them: 'When you and I shall no longer have upon our hands the expense of the war for our children, we shall meet with other troubles in time of peace; for, in short, we must have some. Hear our friend Comines talking on this subject of the crosses of human life. No creature is exempt from trouble, all eat their bread in pain and sorrow; our Lord promised it when he made man, and hath faithfully performed it to all sorts of people (103).' If Philip de Comines had been asked, Do you believe that Kings have a larger share in the execution of this promise of our Lord than other men? I am thoroughly persuaded that he would have answered, Yes, I believe it (104).

What I have been saying of Kings, may, in proportion, be said of all those whom providence raises to eminent posts, and who share in any kind of grandeur. Their lot is a mixture, in which evil is for the most part predominant. Great knowledge and a sublime genius do not exempt men from this fatality. No, look rather amongst the most ignorant rabble, than among illustrious learned men for happiness: the glory that surrounds authors and celebrated orators, doth not secure them from a thousand troubles. It exposes them to envy two several ways, which are very inconvenient. They have rivals who persecute them, and are jealous, in their turn, of the praises which others deserve; a Typographical error gives them more disturbance, than four letters full of eulogies can afford them pleasure. The glory which they have acquired diminishes the pleasure they take in being praised, and increases their uneasiness for the want of praise, for censure, sharing of fame, &c. Besides, the more learning they have, the more they know that

(99) Silhon, Mémoires d'Etat, liv. ii, Discours iii, pag. 131, Dutch edition.

(100) He is in the wrong to call him Ferdinand's nephew. He was deposed by some Latin book, wherein he found that Charles V, was nephew, that is, grandson to Ferdinand.

(101) It is in Agnæmon, See Plutarch, de tranquillitate animi, pag. 466, 471. Read the whole Dissertation of la Motte le Vayer, upon Prosperity, in the eighth volume of his Works.

(102) In a piece of Poetry, prefixed to Mr Lett's Critique sur les Lettres.

(103) Buffi de Comines's sixth letter of the first Part, pag. 215, Dutch edition.

(104) See the last chapter, and the conclusion of his Memoirs.

for their use, consider man in another respect as an unhappy being [G]. That kind of necessity to which so many people are reduced, of seeking a remedy for their uneasiness among that their works are imperfect. If they guard against the weakness of prejudices, and the irregularities of a hundred mean passions, and are willing to conform their language and conduct to this temper of mind, they become odious, and must renounce all external advantages. If they externally conform to the depraved taste of the world, they reproach themselves a hundred times a day with this ignominious hypocrisy, and thereby disturb their quiet. There are very few who, like Democritus, can know the extravagance of humours, and divert themselves with it: that Philosopher was master of this talent. Read Hippocrates's letter to Damagetes, and add to it the paraphrase upon it which an author of the XVIIth century (105) published. He elegantly and particularly unfolds what the Greek author had said in general. He diverted himself with this censure, one may perceive that he was vexed, and that if he had been asked,

Quelle humeur sombre
Fais tu voir à contretiens ?

What puts you so much out of humour ?

He might have said

C'est que je ne suis point du nombre
Des Auteurs qui font contents (106).

I am not a contented author.

Pausanias (107) mentions the oracle which was delivered to Homer, You are happy and unhappy. Apollo could not answer better.

It is time to put an end to these common-places. Give me leave then to conclude with four remarks. The first is, that if we consider mankind in general, it seems that Xenophanes might have said, that pain and grief prevail over pleasure. II. That there are some private persons, who we may presume, taste in this life much more good than evil. III. That there are others of whom we may believe, that they have a much larger share of evil than good. IV. That my second proposition is more especially probable, with respect to those who die before their declining age; and that the third appears chiefly certain in those who arrive to a decrepit old age. When Racan said,

Que pour eux seulement les Dieux ont fait la gloire,
Et pour nous les plaisirs (108).

For them alone the gods have glory made,
And for us pleasures.

Doubtless he considered only the flower of our age; it is then that pleasures are predominant; and that good turns the scale (109): it is then that the Pagan Nemesis makes advances, and gives credit: she is then willing that accounts should be settled without any deduction; but she reimburses her self in old age.

Multa senem circumveniunt incommoda, vel quod
Quærit, & inventis miser abstinet, ac timet uti:
Vel quod res omnes timide gelideque ministrat,
Dilator spe longus, iners, avidusque futuri:
Difficilis, querulus, laudator temporis æsti
Se puero, censor castigatorem minorum.
Multa ferunt anni venientes commoda secum,
Multa recedentes adimunt (110).

An old man's character is hit with ease
For he is peevish, and all one disease:
Still covetous, and still he gripes for more,
And yet he fears to use his present store:
Slow, long in hope, still eager to live on,
And fond of no man's judgment but his own:
On youth's gay frolics peevishly severe,
And oh! when he was young, what times they were!

The flow of life brings in a wealthy store,
The ebb draws back what e'er was brought before,
And leaves a barren sand and naked shore.

CREECH.

This Poet hath not said all, nor was it necessary for him to touch on the disadvantage of old age which Juvenal displays.

Ut vigeant sensus animi, ducenda tamen sunt
Funera natorum, rogus aspiciendus amatæ
Conjugis, & fratris, plenæque fororibus urnæ.
Hæc data poena diu viventibus, ut renovata
Semper clade domus, multis in luctibus, inque
Perpetuo mœrore, & nigra veste senescant (111).

(111) Juvenal.
Sat. X, ver.
240.

Well, yet suppose his senses were his own,
He lives to be chief mourner for his son:
Before his face his wife and brother burns,
He numbers all his kindred in their urns.
These are the fines he pays for living long,
And dragging tedious age in his own wrong:
Griefs always green, a household still in tears,
Sad pomps: a threshold throng'd with daily biers
And liveries of black for length of years.

DRYDEN.

Add to this that passage of Virgil:

Optima quæque dies miseris mortalibus ævi
Prima fugit: subeunt morbi, tristisque senectus;
Et labor, & duræ rapit inclementia mortis (112).

(112) Virgil.
Georgic. lib. iii,
ver. 66.

In youth alone unhappy mortals live;
But ah! the mighty bliss is fugitive.
Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,
And age and death's inexorable doom.

DRYDEN.

Observe, that Racan advanced a maxim which contradicts the greatest of the ancient Poets, for see what Homer saith:

Ὅς γὰρ ἐπ' ἀλάσartos θεοὶ δειλοῖσι βροτοῖσι,
Σέθεν ἀχρυμένους αὐτοὶ δὲ τ' ἀνδρείας εἰσι.

Sic enim fato tribuant dii miseris mortalibus,
Ut vivant tristes: ipsi vero sine curis sunt (113).

(113) Homer.
Iliad. lib. xxiv,
ver. 525.

... man is born to bear,
Such is, alas! the gods severe decree
They, only they are blest, and only free.

MR POPE.

[G] Even those who believe that nature... appointed all other things for their use, consider man... as an unhappy being.] Have we not seen, above (114), that Pliny, after a prologue which allows the superiority to all other animals, with regard to disadvantages? Could Seneca, who so well represents the favours which God bestows on men (115), have denied Pliny's observation? Could Socrates, who so advantageously described the prerogatives of human nature, have denied them? 'Thou thinkest,' said he to a disciple who denied Providence, 'that the gods take no care of man, they who have allowed him alone the privilege of going erect, which is of great advantage to him in discovering things at a distance, in considering things above at his ease, and avoiding many inconveniences. In the next place, all animals which walk have indeed feet; but they serve them for no other use than barely to walk. Whereas the gods, besides this, have given hands to man, which render him the happiest animal in the world. All animals have tongues; but there is none besides that of man, that can form words, to explain his thoughts, and communicate them to others. And

(114) Remark
[D], at the beginning.

(115) See, above, citation (77), (78).

(105) Alardus Amstelredamus. This paraphrase upon the Epistle of Hippocrates was composed in the abbey of Egmond in Holland, in the year 1526. The edition I make use of was printed Salongiæ apud Joannem Soterem, 1539, in 8vo.

(106) These verses are in one of Quinault's Operas. I only change the word Amans into that of Auteurs.

(107) See his own words above, in citation (86).

(108) See his letter to Balzac, in the second tome of the Recueil de Lettres nouvelles, printed at Paris in 1634, pag. 300.

(109) This is not contrary to that passage of the Psalmist: Even the flower of this life is such; that we are always in pain and sorrow: for Moses only represented the state of the Jews at that time.

(110) Horat. de Arte Poetica, ver. 169.

among forbidden pleasures, is no small part of the severity of their fate [H]. However, we may here alledge the authority of Aristotle; for that great genius, who philosophized with so much application, and penetration, acknowledged that there was in nature more evil than good, and that therefore Empedocles disliked the hypothesis of the unity of a principle, and first supposed two principles, one of good, the other of evil [I]. The Holy Scripture so emphatically represents the miseries of this life (m), that it is sufficient to afford a demonstrative argument on this controversy. I wonder Rabbi Maimonides, a man of great learning and judgment, and a good Philosopher, could think that he had fully refuted the doctrine I mention [K]. It is not improbable that Xenophanes believed the

(m) See particularly the book of Job, and that of the Psalms in several places.

non volges

to shew that the gods have provided even for our pleasures, they have not determined the season for the amours of men, who may continually enjoy, till their extreme old age, a pleasure which the brutes taste only at a certain season of the year. Lastly, not content to bestow so many advantages on the body of man, they have endowed him with a soul, transcendently excellent, and surpassing all others. For which, amongst the souls of other animals hath any knowledge of the essence of the gods, the works of whose creation are so stupendous? Is there any other species, besides that of man, that serves and adores them? What animal like him can defend it self from hunger, thirst, cold, and heat? Which of them like us can discover remedies against disease, or exercise his strength? Which of them is so capable of learning, or so perfectly retains the things which he hath seen, heard, or known? In a word, it is clear that man is a god in comparison with other living species, considering the advantages of body and mind, which he naturally hath over them (116). It is very likely that after this beautiful description, he would have owned the deplorable condition of man, if he had been desired to examine the matter thoroughly.

(116) Xenophon, de memorab. Socrat. lib. i.

[H] Of seeking a remedy for their uneasiness among forbidden pleasures. Is not this removing a Physical evil by a moral one? Is not such a remedy worse than the disease? And is not the man very miserable, who can have recourse to no other remedy than this? It is very certain that a great many people find no other. Domestic brawls, and the fight of an ill management at home force men out of doors to gaming, or to drinking at the tavern. Without that they cannot drive away their melancholy; and that is the sole diversion which they oppose against uneasiness. Some even get drunk on purpose to avoid uneasy thoughts at night, the time when they are most troublesome. They have found that such thoughts keep them from sleeping, and make them too cruelly attentive to their misery. Therefore by wine they procure themselves a perfect drouziness. This is so much gained from ill fortune; this is securing the most formidable part of the whole day. Generally speaking, women cannot make use of this antidote to anxiety, and therefore their condition is more deplorable than that of men. Whence Medea declares in Euripides, that a woman ill married is in such a miserable condition, that it is better for her to die than continue in it; she cannot, like the men, go abroad in quest of necessary consolations.

Κἄν μὲν τὰς ἡμῖν ἐκπορεύμεναισιν εὖ
Πόσις ξυνοικῇ, μὴ βία φέρων ζυγόν,
Ζηλωτὸς αἰὼν εἰ δὲ μὴ, θανεῖν χρεών.
Ἄνδρ' δ' ἔταν τοῖς ἔνδον ἀχθεται ξυνών,
Ἐξω μολὼν ἵπτασε καρδίας χόλον,
Ἦ πρὸς φίλων τιν', ἢ πρὸς ἡλικά τεταπείσ.
Ἡμῖν δ' ἀνάγκη πρὸς μίαν ψυχὴν βλέπειν.

1000 miserable

Et si nobis hæc quidem peragentibus bene Cohabitaverit maritus, non violentum nobis imponens jugum,
Beata est vita: sin minus, fatius est mori.
Vir vero cum dolet propter res domesticas,
Foras egressus fedat cordis bilem,
Conversus aut ad aliquem amicum, aut coetaneum,
Sed nos oportet spectare ad unam animam (117).

(117) Euripid. in Medea, ver. 841, pag. m. 876.

If, when
The careful comfort rules her household well,
Her husband governs with a gentle sway,
And courts her lov'd embrace; what home-felt joy,

What inward comforts seize her raptur'd breast!
But if, he, scornful, flights her converse sweet,
'Tis better for her far to die than live.
Man when oppress'd with black domestic cares,
Ranges abroad to seek relief, and meets
The healing comforts of a faithful friend,
Or fellowship of some companion dear.
But helpless, hapless, woman, when denied
Those tender joys which from her husband's love
She justly claims, must seek it no where else.

[I] Aristotle . . . acknowledged that there was in nature more evil than good, and that therefore Empedocles . . . first supposed two principles, one of good, the other of evil.] Before I cite his words, I must observe, that he takes the liberty of unravelling Empedocles's opinion, and explaining it according to the spirit, rather than the letter of it; but after all he takes for granted, that good is the cause of all good, and evil the cause of all evil. The two principles of Empedocles, were amity and discord: Ἐπεὶ δὲ καὶ τὰν αὐτῶν τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς ἐνόντα ἐφαίνετο ἐν τῇ φύσει, καὶ ἡ μόνον τάξις, καὶ τὸ καλὸν, ἀλλ' ἀταξία, καὶ τὸ αἰσχρὸν, καὶ πλείον τὰ κακὰ τῶν ἀγαθῶν, καὶ τὰ φαῦλα τῶν καλῶν. ὅπως ἀλλόως τις φιλίαν εἰσένεγκε, καὶ τὸ νείκεον, ἐκείνου ἐκατέρωθεν αἰτίον τῶν. εἰ γὰρ τις ἀκαταξίαν, καὶ λαμβάνοι πρὸς τὴν διάνοιαν, καὶ μὴ πρὸς τὴν φιλίαν εἶναι τῶν ἀγαθῶν, τὸ εὐρύσει τὴν μὲν φιλίαν εἶναι τῶν ἀγαθῶν, τὸ δὲ νείκεον τῶν κακῶν. ὥς εἴ τις εἴποι τινὰ καὶ λέγον, καὶ πρῶτον λέγον τὸ καλὸν καὶ τὸ ἀγαθὸν ἀρχὰς ἑμπεδοκλέα, τὰς αἰτίας λέγον καλῶς. εἰπερ τὸ τῶν ἀγαθῶν αἰτίον, αὐτὸ τὸ ἀγαθὸν εἴσι, καὶ τῶν κακῶν, τὸ κακόν. Cum autem contraria quoque bonis inesse naturæ apparent, nec solum ordo, & pulchrum, verum etiam inordinatio, & turpe, pluraque mala, quam bona, & turpia quam pulchra, idem alius quidam amicitiam introduxit, & contentionem, utrumque utriusque horum causam. Si quis enim sequatur, & secundum sententiam accipiat, non secundum ea, quæ balbutiens Empedocles dicit, inveniet amicitiam quidem bonorum causam esse, contentionem verò malorum. Quare si quis dicat quodam modo dicere, & primum Empedoclem dicere malum, & bonum esse principia, fortasse bene inquiet: siquidem bonorum omnium causa, ipsum bonum, ac malorum, ipsum malum est.

(118) Aristotle, in nature things; which are contrary and opposite to good ones, and we observe not only order and beauty, but also disorder and deformity, and more things evil than good, more things deformed than beautiful; so there must be two distinct principles, one the cause of amity, and the other of discord. For if you take the sense and spirit of this opinion, and not the inaccurate expressions of Empedocles, it will appear that amity is the cause of good, and discord of evil. Therefore, if any one should say that Empedocles affirmed, in some respect, and was the first who affirmed that there are two principles, one good, the other evil, perhaps he would be in the right: for the principle of all good things is a good principle, and that of all evil things, is an evil one. Observe that he elsewhere (119) censures this opinion of Empedocles, and that he did not believe that there was any eternal principle of evil; for he affirms (120), that there is nothing but good in the eternal Beings.

[K] I wonder Rabbi Maimonides . . . could think that he had fully refuted the doctrine I mention.] He confesses that the Heathens, and even some of the Rabbins, made declamations on the superiority of evil, and he treats them as ridiculous and senseless men. Scapissime, faith he (121), solent in cordibus hominum imperitorum istiusmodi cogitationes exsurgere, ac si longè plura essent in mundo Mala quam Bona: ita man

thee

(118) Aristotle, in nature things; which are contrary and opposite to good ones, and we observe not only order and beauty, but also disorder and deformity, and more things evil than good, more things deformed than beautiful; so there must be two distinct principles, one the cause of amity, and the other of discord. For if you take the sense and spirit of this opinion, and not the inaccurate expressions of Empedocles, it will appear that amity is the cause of good, and discord of evil. Therefore, if any one should say that Empedocles affirmed, in some respect, and was the first who affirmed that there are two principles, one good, the other evil, perhaps he would be in the right: for the principle of all good things is a good principle, and that of all evil things, is an evil one. Observe that he elsewhere (119) censures this opinion of Empedocles, and that he did not believe that there was any eternal principle of evil; for he affirms (120), that there is nothing but good in the eternal Beings.

(119) Aristotle, in nature things; which are contrary and opposite to good ones, and we observe not only order and beauty, but also disorder and deformity, and more things evil than good, more things deformed than beautiful; so there must be two distinct principles, one the cause of amity, and the other of discord. For if you take the sense and spirit of this opinion, and not the inaccurate expressions of Empedocles, it will appear that amity is the cause of good, and discord of evil. Therefore, if any one should say that Empedocles affirmed, in some respect, and was the first who affirmed that there are two principles, one good, the other evil, perhaps he would be in the right: for the principle of all good things is a good principle, and that of all evil things, is an evil one. Observe that he elsewhere (119) censures this opinion of Empedocles, and that he did not believe that there was any eternal principle of evil; for he affirms (120), that there is nothing but good in the eternal Beings.

(120) Aristotle, in nature things; which are contrary and opposite to good ones, and we observe not only order and beauty, but also disorder and deformity, and more things evil than good, more things deformed than beautiful; so there must be two distinct principles, one the cause of amity, and the other of discord. For if you take the sense and spirit of this opinion, and not the inaccurate expressions of Empedocles, it will appear that amity is the cause of good, and discord of evil. Therefore, if any one should say that Empedocles affirmed, in some respect, and was the first who affirmed that there are two principles, one good, the other evil, perhaps he would be in the right: for the principle of all good things is a good principle, and that of all evil things, is an evil one. Observe that he elsewhere (119) censures this opinion of Empedocles, and that he did not believe that there was any eternal principle of evil; for he affirms (120), that there is nothing but good in the eternal Beings.

(121) Maimonides in More Necessaries, lib. i. c. 2, p. 717.

the incomprehensibility of all things [L]. He gave the Egyptians good advice, when he saw them lamenting in the celebration of their festivals: if the objects of your worship, said he (n), are gods, do not weep: if they are men, offer no sacrifices to them.

(n) Plutarchus de Superstit. 174 fms, pag. 171.

Others

ita ut in multis poematis & cantilenis Gentilium hæc & similia reperiantur; Miraculi instar esse, quando in Tempore boni aliquid invenitur: Mala autem esse multa & perpetua. Atque hic error non folum in Vulgo obtinuit, verum etiam apud eos, qui Sapientes haberi volunt, & apud ipsum Alraft in libro illo celebri, quem Sepher Elobuth h. e. Theophrastum nominavit, in quo multa ex deliriis & stoliditatibus suis congesta, è quibus & istud est, quod plura existant Mala quam Bona; eò quod, si comparationem instituas inter recreationes & voluptates Hominis, quas tempore tranquillitatis percipit, cum doloribus, cruciatibus, perturbationibus, defectibus, curis, sollicitudinibus, & afflictionibus, deprehendatur, vitam Hominis illorum bonorum respectu, esse Vindictam magnam & Malum magnum. --- There arise very frequently in the minds of ignorant men such thoughts as this, that there is far more evil than good in the world; and accordingly in the poems and songs of the Heathens, we very often meet with these and the like expressions; It is as it were a miracle, if good things continue for any time: but evil things are numerous and lasting. This error prevailed not only among the vulgar, but even among those who desired to be thought wise men, and was held by Alraft himself, as appears from that famous book of his called The wisdom of God, where he has collected together a great many of his own delirious and foolish conceits, and this among others, that there is in the world more evil than good, because if you compare the recreations and pleasures of any man, such as he enjoys in times of health and peace, with his pains, torments, disorders, wants, cares, anxieties, and afflictions, it will appear that his life, compared with these good things, is a great punishment, and a great evil. He says that the cause of their extravagant error is (22), that they fancy nature was made only for them, and do not mind that which has no reference to their persons, from whence they infer that if any thing goes ill with them, all is amiss in the universe. He adds, that if we would consider the smallness of man, with respect to the universe, we should be soon convinced that the superiority of evil has no place among the angels or the celestial bodies, nor among the elements and the mixt inanimate beings, nor among several sorts of animals. This observation of Maimonides doth not come home to the question; for those whom he refutes mean nothing else but that among men evil surpasses good. What doth it avail then in order to convince them of their error, to say that evil doth not surpass good in the rest of nature? All inanimate bodies are incapable of good and evil; they must not therefore be put into the account when this question is in dispute: and there is no body but may maintain, that all in which we place the order, beauty, and perfection of the celestial bodies, &c. being changed, it would be no evil with respect to the universe, though man, or some other particular creatures, should suffer damage by it. If the sun and the planets, had the same variation as the ships, which go and come between Marfeilles and Naples, sometimes in fewer and sometimes in more days, without any fixed rule, could not one pretend, that, with respect to the universe, it is not an evil, an imperfection and a disorder?

[L] Xenophanes believed the incomprehensibility of all things. Let us begin this remark with a passage of Diogenes Laërtius: Φησὶ δὲ Σωτρίων πρῶτον αὐτὸν εἰπεῖν ἀκατάληπτα εἶναι τὰ πάντα, πλανώμενον, that is, Sotion, who says that Xenophanes maintained that all things are incomprehensible, is mistaken (125). We cannot judge by these words whether Diogenes Laërtius denied that Xenophanes held the incomprehensibility of all things; for he might not deny it, and yet charge Sotion with an error. This accusation would be just, if before Xenocrates others taught that all the objects of our mind are beyond our comprehension. There are a thousand such places in Diogenes Laërtius; they do him but little honour: for an exact genius would avoid these ambiguities and obscurities. I conjecture he intended to say that Xenophanes did not teach the incomprehensibility of all things (126); but at the same time I think he is to blame to speak thus of this Philosopher. All appearances engage us to believe that Xenophanes taught, that we could not comprehend any thing in the nature of things. Plutarch charges him with saying, that our senses and reason are fallacious faculties. Αποφαίνονται δὲ καὶ τὰς αἰσθήσεις ψευδεῖς, καὶ καὶ τὸν λόγον ἀσθενεῖν, καὶ αὐτὸν τὸν λόγον διαβάλλειν. Sensus fallaces esse contendit, unaque cum illis ipsam quoque rationem in omnibus criminatur (127). Others will have it that he denied the evidence of the senses in order to conclude that nothing ought to be relied upon but reason, and they tell us that he was the first author of this doctrine. Οἰοῦνται δὲ τὰς μὲν αἰσθήσεις καὶ τὰς φαντασίας καταβάλλειν, αὐτῷ δὲ μόνον τὸν λόγον πισύειν. Τοιαῦτα γὰρ τίνα πρότερον μὲν Ξενοφάνης, καὶ Παρμενίδης ἐλεγον. Sensus visque omnia funditus repudianda, rationi uni fidem habendam opinantur. Ac primum quidem Xenophanes, & Parmenides in ea sunt doctrina versati (128). I believe Plutarch represents the system of Xenophanes more faithfully than Aristocles. I believe Xenophanes relied no more upon reason than upon his senses. This is what induces me to think so. He was the first who taught that whatever has been made is corruptible. Πρῶτον ἀπερίναλον ὅτι πᾶν τὸ γινόμενον φθαρτὸν ἐστὶ. Primus definiit omne quod fiat corruptioni obnoxium esse (129). He also taught that all things were but one sole being, that there was neither generation nor corruption; and that this sole being continued always the same, and could not be subject to any change (130). Ὅθεν ἡξίουν ὅτοι γὰρ τὸ ὄν ἐν εἶναι, καὶ τὸ μὴ ὄν ἕτερον εἶναι, μὴδὲ γενέσθαι τι, μὴδὲ φθείρεσθαι, μὴδὲ κινεῖσθαι τὸ παρ᾽ ἑαυτῶν. Hi quicquid esset, unum duntaxat esse: quod ab eo diversum esset, id non esse: generari nihil: nihil corrumpi, moveri omnino nihil statuebant (131). But the following is a more exact account of the principles of Xenophanes, in their natural connexion. First of all he affirmed (132) that nothing is made out of nothing, that is, to remove all ambiguity, that a thing which has not always existed can never exist. From thence he concluded that whatever is, hath always existed: Zephone, & Gorgias, init. in the first tome of his works, pag. 939; Edit. of Geneva, 1805.

(123) The fra water, whole bitterness is intolerable, contains 40, or 42, times more sweet particles than salt ones.

(124) Saint Evremont in his discourse of vexations and displeasures. I quote him from the extract of an anonymous writer, who criticised that author, pag. 137; for my edition, (Tom. iv, pag. 45) which is the Dutch one, in 1693, contains but part of what that Critic mentions. [(5a) This piece was falsely ascribed to Mr de St Evremont. R. x. m. c. x. i.]

(125) See, below, in citation (142), the passage of Sextus Empiricus.

(126) Diog. Laërtius, lib. ix, num. 20.

(127) Plutarch. in Stromatis, apud Eusebium Præparat. Evangel. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 23, B.

(128) Aristocles, de Philosophia, lib. viii, apud Eusebium, ubi supra, lib. xiv, cap. xviii, pag. 756, B.

(129) Diogenes Laërtius, ubi supra, num. 19.

(130) See Plato, in Sophista, pag. m. 170, C.

(131) Aristocles, apud Eusebium, ubi supra.

(132) See Aristocles's Treatise, de Xenophane, init. in the first tome of his works, pag. 939; Edit. of Geneva, 1805.

more evil

(122) Causa erroris fatui illius Homini & omnium ipsius fociorum est quod, &c. Id. ibid, pag. 355.

3 sorts of evils

little evil says much good

Hume - universal sense of evil

Others say (o) that he made use of this thought, when the Eleates desired to know of him whether they ought to sacrifice to Leucothea, and shed tears for her or not. I must (o) Aristot. Rhetoric. lib. ii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 447, C.

with st cal

(133) Ubi supra.

(134) When a being is distinct from another, it is not a part of it; and therefore a being distinct from any other being is made out of nothing, and consequently created.

not be one, but several beings. Lastly, this sole, eternal and infinite being, ought to be immovable, and immutable; for if it could change its place, there would be something beyond it, it would not therefore be infinite: and if it could suffer any alteration without changing of place, something that did not always exist would begin to be produced, and something which had always existed would cease to be. But that is impossible; for every thing which not having eternally existed should begin to exist, must be produced out of nothing, and every thing which never had a beginning hath a necessary existence; and therefore cannot ever cease to be. These were his principles, if we believe Aristotle (133). I do not doubt but they appeared evident to him, and that he was persuaded they were a gradation of consequences necessarily drawn from an incontestable principle. The orthodox Divines would deny him, that nothing can have a beginning; but would grant him that the being which never had a beginning is one only, infinite, immovable, and immutable, and that no being, whose existence is necessary, can be destroyed. They teach, and with reason, that God is not subject to any alteration? for if any change should happen to him, he would acquire, and lose something. What he should acquire would be either distinct from his substance, or a mode identical with his substance. If it was a distinct being, God could not be a simple being; and, what is worse, would be composed of an increased nature, and, created one (134). If it was a mode identical with his substance, God could not produce it without producing himself: but as he exists independently of his own will, and did not give himself his existence at the beginning, it follows that he can never do it. Besides, nothing that necessarily exists can ever cease to be: from whence it must of necessity follow, that God never can lose what he once had. Now what is called a modification, or an ens inherens in alio, is of such a nature that it cannot be produced but by the ruin of another modality; just as a new figure is necessarily the destruction of the old one. Wherefore if God acquired something new, he must necessarily lose some other thing; for this new acquisition would not be a substance, but an accident, or an ens inherens in alio. Since therefore nothing which necessarily exists can cease to exist, it follows that God can never acquire any thing new. Thus the immutability of God is supported by evident notions. Xenophanes added to his maxims the following one, viz. that nothing is made out of nothing; now every accident produced a new, and distinct from the divine substance, would be produced out of nothing. He was therefore obliged to deny that the eternal being could acquire any new mode distinct from its own substance. But he found himself very much perplexed when the continual generations in nature were objected to him. They prove both that the universe is not one sole being, and that it contains something mutable, since it actually changes. In order to remove this objection, he excepted against the evidence of the senses; he urged that they deceive us, that it is not true that there happen any generations in nature, and that they are but false appearances. But he was doubtless answered, that the appearances of the senses would not change at all, if our mind continued always the same, and if the beings without us did not change; and therefore at least, what in us is the passive subject of perceptions, which you call the fallacies of the senses, must be mutable and variable: Therefore what you assert that there is no change in the universe, is not true. I cannot see that he could make any other reply than this; our reason is as fallacious as our senses, and every thing is incomprehensible to reason. For if when it is grounded even on evidence, which is her ne plus ultra, she doth not hit on truth, it is a sign that truth is a thing incomprehensible, and impentenable. Now relying upon evident notions, I had asserted that nothing is made out of nothing; whence it necessarily follows that nothing can begin, and that every thing that once exists, exists always, which evidently proves the immobility, and immutability of all things; I had, I say, clearly comprehended this, and yet the experience of my sensations and passions, convinces me that I am mutable: I had not therefore comprehended any thing with certainty, I have not therefore a faculty adequately proportioned to truth. Thus we may suppose he reasoned, and thence we might conclude that the sect of the Acataleptic (135), and that of the Sceptics, owed their birth solely to the principle of the immutable unity of all things maintained by Xenophanes. I do not affirm, that he was in the right in the consequences just mentioned. The only reason why I allege this, is to shew that I do not contradict the writer of this Philosopher's life without just reasons (136). First I have on my side the evidence of Sorion (137), Cicero (138), Plutarch (139), and some verses of Xenophanes (140) which were not unknown to Diogenes Laërtius (141). In the second place I may affirm that Xenophanes held some principles, which, as I have just now given several proofs of it, necessarily engaged him to assert the incomprehensibility of all things. Let us here cite the verses in which he declares his opinion.

(135) There, who taught the incomprehensibility.

(136) See what I have said of Diogenes Laërtius at the beginning of this remark.

(137) See, above citation (115).

(138) See, below.

Καὶ τὸ μὲν ἔν σαφὲς ἔστι ἀνὴρ ἰδεῖν, εἰς τις ἔσται Εἰδὼς ἀμφὶ θῖον τε, καὶ ὅσα λίγῳ περιπάρτων.
Εἰ γὰρ καὶ τὰ μάλιστα τύχοι τετελεισμένον εἰπὼν Αὐτὸς ἡμῶς οὐκ οἶδε, δὲκ' ὁ δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσι τί-τυκται.

*Nullus aperte vir scit, sed neque vir sciet unquam
De Diis & cunctis à me quæ dicta fuerunt.
Namque licet sit perfectum quod dixerit ille,
Ille tamen nescit, cunctis & opinio in bis est (142).*

We see plainly in these words, that Xenophanes (143) Xenophanes, apud declared it impossible for any person to arrive at the Sextum Empiricum clear and certain knowledge of the truth; and that adverbi- Mathematis, even if a man should meet with the truth, yet he can- pag. 146, 157, not know that he has met with it: he adds, that there 280. See also is nothing but opinions within our reach. Sextus Placitum, de Empiricus (143) ranks him amongst those, who deny not. Poet. pag. a criterium veritatis, a rule or measure of truth. I own 17, E. that he disagrees (144) with those, who place him among the Acateleptics; but wistful he ascribes to him (145) Phil. pag. the opinion, that we do not comprehend things to 146, that degree of certainty which amounts to science, and that our determinations never go beyond likeli- (144) Ibid. & hood and probability. Is not this at bottom to assert pag. 156, 157. Acatelepticism, or the incomprehensible nature of things? φαίνεται μὴ πᾶσαν κατάληψιν ἀναρῆναι ἀλλὰ τὸν ἐπισημονικὴν τε καὶ ἀδελτοτικὴν, ἢ ἀπολαύειν δὲ τὴν δόξαν. τίτῳ γὰρ ἐμαρῖν τὸ, δόξῃ δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσι τίθεται. ὥς κρηττόν γίνεσθαι κατὰ τὸν τὸν δόξαν λόγον τῆς τῶν τῆ εἰσότης, ἀλλὰ μὴ τὸν τῆ πᾶσις ὕμνον. Videtur non omnino tollere comprehensionem, sed eam quæ est ex scientia, & quæ non potest aberrare. Relinquit ergo opinabilem, quo enim indicat illud cunctis & opinio in his est: quo fit ut ex ejus sententia id quod judicatur sit ratio opinabilis, hoc est ratio ejus quod est probabile, non autem ea quæ sequitur id quod est firmum ac stabile (145). So that I do not think Mr Menage (145) Ibid. Phil. pag. 157. was much in the right to say, that Sextus Empiricus in this place favours Diogenes Laërtius against Sotion (146). And I am the more confirmed in this because (146) Menage in Diogenes Laërt. lib. 12, num. 1. that learned commentator says just before, that Cicero and Origen are favourable to Sotion (147): ‘Sotioni adimulatore Cicero in Lucullo: Parmenides, Xenophanes, minus bonis quamquam versibus, sed tamen illis, quibus, increpant eorum arrogantiam quasi iusti, qui, cum sciri nihil possit, audent se scire dicere. Item Origenes in Philoiphicis: Οὐτῶν ἐπὶ ἀσπῶν ἀκατάληπτα εἶναι πάντων, τίποσιν ὄντες, εἰ γὰρ κατὰ τὴν μέλειαν τυχόν τεταλεσμένοι εἴσιν. Αὐτὸς ὁμοίως ἐν οἷσδε, δόξας δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσι τίθεται. Cicero in his Lucullus favours the opinion of Sotion. Parmenides and Xenophanes in these verses, however indifferent, reprehend and seem to be angry with those men, who, though we can know nothing, are however so bold as to pretend to know the truth. And likewise Origen, in his Philoiphicis, favours the same’

(135) Those, who taught the incomprehensi-bility.

(136) See what I have said of Diogenes Laërtius at the beginning of this remark.

(137) See, above
citation (125).

(138) See, below, cit. (147)

(139) See, citation (127).

(140) See, in citation (142), the passage of Sextus Empiricus.

(141) He cites the beginning of them in Vita Pyrrhonis, lib. ix, cap. 72.

(142) Xenophanes, opud Sextum Empiricum adversus Mathematicos pag. 146, 19280. See also Plutarch, &c. diend. Poët. 17. E.

him (143) Ind. A
to 146.

kel- (144) Ibid.
1:6. 1

of πειν

[Handwritten signature]

7561 4401. W

inquit
s. & pro-

iricus pag. 157.

because (146) Ma in Diogen.
Cicero lib. ix, m

Xen- (147) Ma-
en illis ibid.

Item

ὁ γὰρ εἰπὼν· opinion verles, angry nothing, mouth

the same

(p) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 18. (q) The same town with Missena, now Messina.
(r) Cicero, Acad. Quæst. lib. iv. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. i, pag. 301.

(148) Plato, in Sophista, pag.
270.

(149) Sextus
Empiricus, Pyr-rhon. Hypoty-
pos. lib. i, cap.
xxxiii, pag. 46,
Edit. Genev.
1621.

(150) Aristoteles, Physicor.
lib. i, cap. iii.

(151) In the article STILPO, remark [H].

(152) Conimbricenses, in the paraphrase upon the third chapter of the first book of Aristotle's Physics.

(153) Aristot.
ubi supra.

(154) See the Conimbricenses,
ubi supra.

(155) Lescalopier, in Cicer.
de Nat. Deorum
lib. i, num. 28,
pag. 44.

attest

(156) Socrates, Zeno of Elea, Arcefilaus, Carneades, and such like impugnors of certainty, were some of the greatest genius's of antiquity.

(157) Qui plura
novit, eum majora sequuntur dubia. --- The more a man knows, the more matter he finds for doubting. Naudé, Addit. à la Vie de Louis X

(158) Thucydides
lib. ii, pag. m.
136. A.

(159) Terence says this upon another occasion in his prologue to the Andria.

f (160) Pyrrhone,
lib. ix, num. 72

disciple, and that the complained of poverty [M]. The answer he gave a man with whom he refused to play at dice, is very worthy of a Philosopher. This person calling him a coward; yes, replied he, I am extremely so, with respect to shameful actions (S).

(1) ὁ μολογῶν καὶ πάντῃ δουλοῦναι πρὸς τὰ ἀσεβῆ καὶ ἄτοκα. Fallus est ad res inhonestas se timididissimum etiam esse. Plutarchus, de vitiojo Pudore, pag. 530.

'want, but hath reserved this for himself, and makes use of it: he is not at all happy in the possession of vast quantities of Gold, nor powerful by holding the thunder and lightning in his hand, but rather by his wisdom and knowledge; and this is one of the best and wisest things which Homer said, speaking of Jupiter and Neptune:'

Ἡ μὲν ἀφροσύνησιν ὁμῶν γίνετο ἡδ' ἰα πάτρην,
Ἀλλὰ Ζεὺς πρότερος γεγόνει καὶ πλείονα ἦδ' η.

Est ambobus idem fane genus & patria una,
Sed Jupiter natu prior erat, pluraque noverat (161).

(161) Homer.
Iliad. lib. xiii,
ver. 354.

Both of one line, both of one country boast;
But royal Jove's the eldest, and knows most.

He affirms that the preference and the precedence of Jupiter was more venerable and worthy, because he was more wise and intelligent. And as for me, I am of opinion, that the beatitude and felicity of eternal life, which Jupiter enjoys, consists in that he is ignorant of nothing, and that of all things which ever were, none escapes him: I believe that an immortality deprived of the knowledge of all things which exist and have existed, would not be a life, but a space of time only. So that we may say, that the desire of understanding truth is a desire of the Deity, especially the truth of the nature of the gods: the study and acquisition of which science, is, as it were, the entering, or being initiated into a religion, and a more holy work than a vow of chastity, or cloistering one's self within a temple (162). Add to this, that the Christians, with respect to whatever constitutes the character of speculative Christianity, make public profession of the incomprehensibility of things, and look upon those as owls and Turks, who refuse to believe what surpasses the extent of their understanding. Such is the mystery of the Trinity, which, as Mr Nicolle owns (163), confounds reason, and prompts it to revolt. If there be any visible difficulties, they are those which are contained in that mystery, that three persons really distinct have only one and the same essence, and this essence being the same thing in each person with the relations that distinguish them, may be communicated without the communication of the relations which distinguish the persons. If human reason consults herself, she will revolt against all those inconceivable truths. If she pretends to make use of her own light to penetrate into them, it will only furnish her with arms against them. Wherefore in order to believe them, she ought to blind herself, to stifle all her ratiocinations and perceptions, and to depress and sink herself un-

(162) Plutarch, at the beginning of his treatise concerning Isis and Osiris.

(163) Nicolle,
Perpetuité de la
Foi, pag. 118,
119, Edit.
1666.

XYLANDER (WILLIAM) was born at Augsburg on the twenty-sixth of December 1532. The inclination he had for the sciences would have been fruitless, by reason of his father's poverty, if he had not met with a patron (a), by whose means he was maintained at the public expence, till such time as he had made progress enough to enter into the colleges where the city (b) furnished a subsistence to a certain number of students. He afterwards studied in the university of Tubingen, and then in that of Basil [A]: and having given proofs of his learning, he was called to Heidelberg to succeed

(a) Wolfgangus Reisingerus nobilis patricius Aug-ustanus. Melch.
Adam, in Vita Philosophorum,
pag. 289.

(b) That of Augsb. Moreti was in the wrong to say after Mr Teffier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 448, that the Magistrates of Strasbourg maintained him at the universities.

[A] And afterwards in that of Basil] Melchior Adam affirms, that he there solemnly received the degree of Master of Arts, in the year 1556 (1). I suspect this date; for how is it probable that a man who had studied with so great application, and so many fine talents, should have received this little degree only at the twenty-fourth year of his age? Add to this, that he made his Latin version of Dion Cassius in the year 1557. He was already so learned, that he only spent seven months in writing that work, for the truth of which he appeals to the person to whom it is

(1) Melchior
Adam, in Vita Philosophorum,
pag. 289.

der the weight of Divine authority. The Socians themselves in some respects are Acataleptics; they cannot say, with any sincerity, that it is an incomprehensible thing, that a self-existent nature should be mutable. Wherefore, in some respects, their rathness surpasses that of Xenophanes. The latter, at last, thought fit to say, that he did not comprehend either that an eternal nature is mutable, or that it is immutable: but as to the former, they decide that it is mutable: whence it follows that a being which necessarily, and from all eternity exists, is liable to destruction (164); which is the most contrary opinion in the world to our clear and distinct ideas.

I cannot conclude without observing two things:
one is, that the evidence of Xenophanes's principles, with respect to the immutability of what is eternal,
is as conspicuous as the clearest ideas of our mind;
so that it being incontestable, on the other hand, by what passes within us, that there are alterations and changes, the best course that our reason can take, is to assert, that all things had a beginning, God alone excepted. This is the doctrine of the creation; for to pretend to explain the generations of nature, by supposing several eternal principles, the action and reaction of which diversifies what would remain uniform, if nothing external intervened, is to avoid one inconvenience, and fall into a much greater. My second observation is, that the evidence of Xenophanes's principles furnishes us with an excellent demonstration against Spinoza; for if whatever had no beginning is immutable, Spinoza's God is incapable of any change:
he is not therefore the immanent cause of all the alterations in the universe (165). An immanent cause produces something in itself: that thing is either a mode identified with the substance which it modifies, or else an absolute quality, and really distinct from it's subject of inhesion. If an identified mode, God cannot produce it; for since the Divine substance necessarily exists, it cannot depend on any efficient cause.
If it is a distinct quality, God can therefore create beings distinct from himself; and then there is no longer room for Spinoza's hypothesis. Add to this, that the production of one mode or accident (166), is the destruction of another. Whence it follows, that if God was the immanent cause of the changes of nature, some eternal modalities would have perished:
for Spinoza cannot, without contradicting himself, affirm that what he calls God, had not always modalities. Examine his distinction betwixt Natura naturans and Natura naturata, and you will find a heap of contradictions in it.

[M] He complained of poverty. I am so poor, said he once to (167) Hiero King of Syracuse, that I am not able to maintain two servants. How, replied Hiero, Homer, whom you commonly blame and censure, tho' dead, maintains above ten thousand.

(164) They say that God bestowed upon matter what form he pleased, when he made the world.
He therefore destroyed the eternal form of matter. Whether this form was a mode, or a distinct accident, is of no importance to me: It was a real being, which could be, tho' it had no beginning, and no efficient cause.

(165) Now, that if the Fathers had believed what the minister, who wrote the Pastoral Letters, imputed to them
concomitancy;
the generation of the Word, their opinion concerning the immutability of God, had been almost as impious as that of Spinoza.
See Juana can-ram refuta,
pag. 128, &
129.

(166) I mean such an accident as is necessary in all.
(167) Plat. in Apollon. pag.
175.

succeed Mycillus (c) who died Professor of the Greek Tongue in the year 1558. Not long before that time Xylander had published at Basil his Latin version of Dion Cassius (d). He acquaints us in his epistle dedicatory that indigence had made him undergo several uneasinesses [B]. In the year 1559 he gave a Latin version of the book of Marcus Aurelius; and because a great many errors had crept into it (e), he caused it to be reprinted more correctly in the year 1568, with the Latin version of some Greek writers [C].

(c) Taken from Melchior Adam, ubi supra.

(d) See the remark [A].

(e) See the Epistle Dedicatory, to the Basil edition 1568.

* exhortations, and even by your good offices and favours, prevailed upon me to translate from the Greek into Latin, that excellent writer of the Roman History, Dion Cassius, &c. This Epistle Dedicatory is dated at Basil, November the first, 1557: the impression was finished by Oporinus in the month of March 1558. Xiphilin was joined with Dion Cassius, but Xylander did not translate that book, and contented himself with giving a translation of it which had been done by William le Blanc, a native of Albi (3), and with correcting some passages in it. His notes on Dion Cassius and Xiphilin are good enough to persuade us that in the year 1556 the university of Basil would have honoured him with a higher degree than that of Master of Arts.

(3) It was dedicated to Cardinal d'Armagnac, at Rome in the month of February 1550.

[B] He acquaints us that indigence had made him undergo several uneasinesses. This must surely be his meaning in these words: 'Ego cum ab ineunte ætate bonas literas flagranti amore essem persecutus, earumque causa adversissima & acerbissima quæque perpeffus, &c. (4). . . . As I have had the most passionate desire after learning ever since my earliest years, and for the sake of that, have suffered the greatest hardships and vexations.' He ranks himself amongst those whom poverty obliges to cultivate learning: 'Meæ conditionis hominum, quorum honestos conatus in hoc genere angustia vitæ sustentandæ & paupertas quasi instigat. . . . Men in my condition, whose commendable endeavours toward the improvement of learning are owing to their indigence, and as it were prompted by poverty.' See especially the elogy which he placed at the end of the Epistle Dedicatory of his Dion Cassius. There he owns that, when he was eighteen years of age, he studied for the sake of glory; but that at the age of twenty-five, the low state of his fortune obliged him to study for the sake of a subsistence.

(4) Xylander, ubi supra.

Te mala pauperies, pulcrisque gravissima ceptis,
Conatu indignor plus potuisse meo.

Ut cumque excidimus præclaris protinus ausis
Jam querant, quibus hoc fata dedere decus
Et mea cum fortuna solo me affixerit, atque
Abjectum cogat serpere præter humum.
Ergo, divinis quantumvis æger inhærens
Artibus, & studiis deditus ingenuis:
Et TOLERARE QUEAM VICTUM, & fustenter honeste
Non aspernandi fruge laboris alor.

Accurs'd wants, thou deadly foe
To brave attempts, my greatest woe,
Whilst eager after fame I press,
Why dost thou still oppose my bliss?
Thou' fortune far below the great
Has plac'd me, and in humble state,
Yet fir'd with love of ev'ry art
That lights the mind, or mends the heart,
I've in this bold attempt prevail'd,
Or, like Prometheus, nobly fail'd.
Thou' poor, yet arts are my delight,
Arts my employ both day and night:
Theirs are my labours: they relieve My wants, and by their bounty I shall live.

[C] With the Latin version of some Greek writers.] That is, of Antony Liberalis, of Phlegon de mirabilibus & longævis, & de Olympiis, of Apollonius Historiæ memorabiles, and of Antigonius mirabilium Narrationum Congeries. All this, with Marcus Aurelius, makes a pretty large octavo: the Greek and Latin are in it, but each by itself. The few notes which Xylander added are neither considerable, nor contemptible.

Z.

(a) His epitaph imports that he died at the age of 78 years, in 1417.

(b) He made him Cardinal Deacon (and not Cardinal Priest, as Giesner asserts in his Biblioth. fol. 261.) by the title of St Cosmus and St Damianus.

(c) In the year 1413.

(d) It was Antony de Chaland. See Spondanus, ad ann. 1413, num. 5.

(1) See Thomassin, Elog. Part. i, pag. 3.

(2) Taken from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 443.

(3) Thomassin, Elog. Part. i, pag. 10.

(4) Quod divino impulsu factum esse videtur. Panzirolus, ibid. pag. 445.

(5) Maimbourg, Hist. du grand Schisme d'Occident, liv. iv, pag. 106, Dutch edition. He quotes Saint Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, Part. iii, Tit. xxii.

(6) That is the time and place of the council.

ZABARELLA, or DE ZABARELLIS (FRANCIS) Archbishop of Florence, and a Cardinal, was one of the most celebrated Canonists of his age. He was born at Padua, in the year 1339 (a). He studied the Canon-Law at Bologna, and taught it at Padua with great applause. That city was then subject to Francis Carrari: it was attacked by the Venetians in the year 1406, and deputed Zabarella to the King of France to desire his assistance, which he not obtaining, Padua was obliged to submit to the Republic of Venice. The act of their submission was very solemn: Zabarella, at the head of fourteen other deputies, delivered the banner of Padua to the Senate in the great place at Venice, and made an eloquent speech on that occasion [A]. Some time after he went to Florence to teach the Canon-Law, and was there so loved and esteemed, that the Archiepiscopal see becoming vacant, he was chosen to fill it: but this election proved ineffectual, for the Pope being more diligent, had already bestowed it on another. Zabarella being invited to Rome by Boniface IX, stayed there some time, and gave his opinion on an important question proposed to him, concerning the methods of putting a stop to the schism. He afterwards returned to Padua, and was honoured with several deputations. He wisely refused the bishopric of that city which was offered to him, because he would not expose himself to the indignation of the Senate, which had nominated another to that dignity. Pope John XXIII, resolving to strengthen his party with learned men, made him come to his court, and gave him the Archbishopric of Florence. He did not confine his liberality to that alone, but created him Cardinal (b) in the year 1411. He sent him on an embassy (c) with another Cardinal (d), and with Emanuel Chrysoloras, to the court of the Emperor Sigismund, who demanded a council, as well on account of the heresies in Bohemia, as of the Anti-Popes. This Pope ordered his Ambassadors to chuse such a town for the holding of the council as might be in his interest. It is said that he gave them in writing the names of those towns which he liked, but at the moment of their departure, tore the paper on which he had written them [B], and gave them full powers on that head. For this reason they left it to the choice of his Imperial Majesty. The city of Constance was pitched upon. Francis Zabarella distinguished himself at the council held there, and advised the deposing of Pope John XXIII, who was charged with forty notorious crimes. If the right of election had been left to the Cardinals, it is highly probable that Zabarella would have succeeded the deposed Pope; but they were obliged to divide this right between themselves and the other members of that council [C]. It was divided into five classes, each of which nominated six Persons, who,

[A] And made an eloquent speech. He was not only a learned Civilian, but also a good Orator (1). He pronounced an eloquent oration on the fourth of July 1397, on the nuptials of Nicolas d'Este with Giliola, the daughter of Francis Carrari, the second of that name, Lord of Padua. Seven years after he made a speech to the Lady Belfiora, who was married to the son of the same Carrari, when she made her entry into Padua, and was received under a canopy; I say, he made a speech to her, in the name of the university (2). He also made the funeral orations of Francis Carrari, and Arcuanus Buzacharinus (3). [B] At the moment of their departure he tore the paper on which he had written them. Panzirolus, whom I have faithfully followed in the text of this article, ascribes this alteration of the Pope to a sudden inspiration (4). But that we may see this affair in its full extent, which is too briefly related by him, I will cite a French author. (5). 'It never appeared more clearly than on this occasion, that the providence of God at once frequently overthrows all the designs of human prudence, in order to accomplish its own. This Pope, as Leonard Aretin, his secretary and confident, assures us, had, in appearance, given full power to his Legates to agree with the Emperor on these two points (6), as they should think proper; but because on the other hand he would not be at the Emperor's discretion in a city where that Prince was master, he had noted, in a private paper, certain cities of Italy, and expressly charged them not to agree to any other; and yet when he dismissed them, as he was exhorting them faithfully to acquit themselves of their duty, and was just going to deliver them this paper, which he held in his hand, all of a sudden he changed his mind; and after having expressed himself in their praise, with great transports of tenderness and affection, protesting that he had a full and entire confidence in their fidelity; he told them, that, contrary to his former resolution, he would not limit their power, he shewed them the writing, and immediately tore it before their eyes. But, he was not long without altering his mind a second time; for, understanding that his Legates had at last consented, in compliance with Sigismund's desire, that a general Council should be summoned to assemble on the first of November, the following year, at Constance, a city of Germany, subject to the Emperor; he was like to go distracted, and a thousand times cursed his fortune, or rather imprudence, in changing his resolution so easily, and delivering himself up, as it were, bound hand and foot to a Prince, who would always have it in his power to put in execution whatever it should please the Council to order against him. But he was obliged to dissemble his resentments, for fear of rendring himself suspected, &c.' [C] Zabarella would have succeeded the deposed Pope, but, &c.] Panzirolus's relation is not very exact; for it who, in conjunction with the Cardinals, elected Otho Colonna Pope, who took the name of Martin V. This happened in the year 1417. Zabarella died at Constance (e) on the fifth of November, in the same year (f). His funeral was celebrated with great magnificence; the Emperor and all the council were present at it: the funeral oration was pronounced by Poggius; the corps was carried to Padua, and interred in the cathedral church on the left side of the altar of the Holy Virgin. Our Zabarella wrote a great many books [D], and deserved the esteem of the public, as much by his virtuous life [E], as by his learning. He appointed for his heir BARTHOLOMEW ZABARELLA his nephew (g), of whom I shall speak in a remark [F]. I must not forget that he had among other disciples Peter Paul Vergerio, who wrote an excellent and very exact letter, on the life and death of his professor (h).

(g) Taken from Panzirolus, de clara Legum Interpretibus, lib. iii, cap. xxviii, pag. m. 443, & seq. ibid. pag. 444. Mr. Telfer says nothing of it in the Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum.

(h) Panzirol.

(e) And not in his own country, as Fæstus affirms, Hist. Juris Civil. Rom. lib. iii, cap. xxxi, pag. m. 515.

(f) Therefore he did not flourish in the year 1418, as Gefner affirms in Bibl. fol. 261.

(7) See Maimonides, ubi supra, lib. vi, p. 264.
(8) Constantine extirpatus est anno dñi. mccc. xviii. viii. Idus Novembris. Tomasin. ubi supra, pag. 5. Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 17, has not rightly transferred this; for he says extirpatus est Idus, Nov.

(9) Tomasin. Eleg. Part. i, pag. 5.

(10) Doujat. Prænot. Canon. pag. 609.

(11) Ex Tomasin. ubi supra, pag. 9. See also Oldoini in Athenæo Romano, pag. 258.

(12) For instance at Basil, by John Oporinus, in 1565, in folio. I make use of that edition.

(13) Bellarm. de scriptor. Ecclesiast. pag. m. 384.

(14) Tomasin. ubi supra, pag. 5.

it tends to persuade us, that Zabarella was living when they entered into the conclave to elect a Pope. This is false. The electors entered on the eighth of November (7), and Zabarella, according to Panzirolus, died on the fifth, others say on the sixth of that month (8). So I find that Tomasinus conforms himself better to the circumstances of time: Zabarella, according to him, would have arrived at the Papal dignity, by the unanimous consent of the electors, if death had not transported him to heaven. He also tells us that this Cardinal supplied the Pope's place in the Council. Concilio convocato Pontificis vices gessit. Unde omnium consensus summus Pontifex dicitur, re quoque ipsa designatus, fuisse, ni Deus Opt. Max. ipsum in Cælum, ibi satius Ecclesiæ suæ profuturum exisset (9). Panzirolus misled Doujat, who assures us that Zabarella died after the election of Martin VI (10).

[D] He wrote a great many books. Six volumes of commentaries on the Decretals and Clementines. One volume of Counsels. A volume of Orations and Letters. A treatise de Horis canonicis. De Felicitate libri tres. Variæ Legum Repetitiones. Opuscula de Artibus liberalibus. De natura rerum diversarum. Commentarii in naturalem & moralem Philosophiam. Historia sui temporis. Acta in Concilio Pisano & Constantensi. In vetus & novum Testamentum. De Schismate (11). This last treatise does not please the court of Rome. The Protestants have published it several times (12) with other pieces of the same nature, in which the jurisdiction of Princes is maintained without subjecting it to the power of the Popes. Read the following words of Bellarmine: 'Occasione longissimi schismatis scripsit etiam librum de schismate, in quo sunt aliqua corrigenda: quare in indice librorum prohibitorum, liber ejus de schismate cum præfationibus, Argentinae impressus ab hæreticis, prohibitus est, donec corrigatur (13). - - - On occasion of the long schism, he also wrote a book on schism: There are some things in this book to be corrected: for this reason in the catalogue of prohibited books, Zabarella's treatise on schism with the prefaces to it, printed by the Heretics at Strasburgh, is prohibited till it is corrected.' Observe, that Zabarella is cited under the name of Cardinal without any addition (14).

[E] He deserved the esteem of the public . . . by his virtuous life. He not only slept but little, and was extremely careful not to lose any time, but was endowed with a particular probity and chastity: being an enemy to luxury, his domestic affairs were managed with the utmost frugality, in order to diffuse his wealth abroad amongst the poor. He never connived at his neighbour's faults, but always exhorted his friends and disciples to a virtuous life. 'Somni parcissimus, & ne quàm temporis iacturam faceret, valde sollicitus. Vir recti animi, suavissimæ consuetudinis, & integerrimæ, castissimæque vite fuit, familiares & discipulos ad bonos mores hortari solitus ab ipsis non fecus ac pater diligebatur. Domi par-

cus, foris fortunas inter pauperes dividebat (15). - - - He slept very little, and was extremely careful not to lose any time. He was an upright man, his behaviour was most engaging, and his whole life most chaste and unblamable: he used to exhort his friends and disciples to lead a virtuous life, and was loved by them like a father. In his domestic affairs he was exceedingly frugal, but diffused his wealth abroad among the poor. One of the things which made him thought worthy of the bishopric of Padua, was, I believe, his charity to the poor, when he was Arch-priest of the cathedral church (16). I have mentioned (17) the reason which induced him to refuse that Bishopric. That refusal acquired him the admiration of the Paduans, and obliged them to resign to him a very rich abbey which had belonged to some Monks. This he held but a very short time; he soon restored it to its ancient possessors; they accepted it with the utmost gratitude, which they perpetuated as much as possible; for to this day his sacerdotal vestments are preserved in their monastery: and his arms are set up there in several places (18). It was on account of his holy life, as well as learning, that he was chosen Archbishop of Florence, when he was only Professor of the Canon Law (19).

I have also given (20) the reason why this choice was ineffectual at that time.

[F] BARTHOLOMEW ZABARELLA, of whom I shall speak in a remark. He was the son of ANDREW ZABARELLA, brother to our Francis; and professed the Canon-Law at Padua with great applause. He was afterwards called to Rome, where he discovered a great deal of learning, as well in his disputations as consultations. He was first raised to the Archbishopric of Spalato, and then advanced to that of Florence, and at last to the dignity of Referendary of the Church by Pope Eugenius IV. It is thought he had risen yet higher, if he had not died before he arrived at old age, in the year 1445. His body was carried to Padua, and interred in his uncle's tomb (21). I am surprised that his name doth not appear in the epitaph of our Francis, and that instead of it we see Joannes Jacobi viri clarissimi Filius id monumenti ponendum curavit. - - - This monument was erected by John the son of James, who was an illustrious man. Panzirolus and Tomasin give the whole epitaph; the latter observes, that the author of the Patavina Felicitas, and Swertius (22), have given it with some faults. The same thing may also be charged on Panzirolus; for in his book we read Obiit Constantiæ mccccviii, which ought to have been mccccxvii. An infinite number of transcribers and Printers of inscriptions are guilty of the like negligence. But to return to our Bartholomew. He died at the age of forty-six years, on the twelfth of August 1445, being then on the embassy with which Eugenius IV honoured him to the Kings of Spain and France. It is affirmed that the Pope had declared his design to make him a Cardinal (23).

(15) Panzirolus, ubi supra, pag. 445.

(16) In Cathedrali Patavina Ecclesia Archiepiscopatibus honore insignitus pauperum incommodis mira subveniebat liberalitate. Tomasin. ubi supra, pag. 4.

(17) In the text of this article.

(18) Tomasin. ubi supra.

(19) Florentiam vocatus jus Canoniconum explicavit ibique obviatæ sanctimoniam ac doctrinæ præstantiam ab illius Reip. procuribus ad Archiepiscopatus dignitatem conclamatus est. Tomasin. ubi supra, pag. 3.

(20) In the text of this article.

(21) Panzir. ubi supra, pag. 446, 447.

(22) In Deliciis Orbis.

(23) Taken from Riccobonus, in Descriptione Gymnasii Patavini, apud Freherum, in Theatro, pag. 19.

ZABARELLA (JAMES) one of the greatest Philosophers of the XVIIth century, was born at Padua on the fifth of September 1533. Having learned Rhetoric and the Greek tongue under very learned professors (a), he applied himself to the study of Logic, and to that of the Mathematics, in both which he made great progress. He extremely delighted in Astrology, and amused himself in drawing a great many Horoscopes, and it is reported, that he many times made true predictions. He acquired a profound knowledge of Aristotle's Physics and Ethics; so it is no wonder that the university of Padua made him one of its professors, in the year 1564. He taught Logic there

(a) John Faesolus, and Francis Robertellus.

there for the space of fifteen years, and afterwards Philosophy to the time of his death. He published several commentaries on Aristotle, which shewed that his genius was capable of clearing the greatest difficulties, and comprehending the most obscure questions [A]. Having been frequently deputed to Venice on important affairs, he harangued the Senate with great success. He refused the offers of Sigismund King of Poland, who invited him into his kingdom. He died at Padua in October 1589, and was buried in St Antony's church, where his funeral oration was pronounced by Riccobonus. He had bore the title of Count Palatine [B]. He had by his marriage with Elizabeth Cavacia, six sons and three daughters [C], and calculated the nativities of each of them. I know not how he succeeded in these calculations, nor for instance, whether he fore-told that the Senate of Venice should give him a thousand crowns, for the marriage of his youngest daughter (b). Authors differ in certain particulars concerning him, which ought not to be matter of dispute. Some say he was a handsome man, others, that he was ugly [D]. Some assert, that he had a very lively, quick, and ready wit; others, that he could not solve the objections of his disciples without asking time to consider them [E]. He is accused of holding some impious opinions

(b) Taken from James Philip Tomafin, Part. i. Elogior. pag. 136, & seq.

[A] He published several commentaries on Aristotle, which shewed, &c.] He published some Logical treatises in the year 1578. In these he treated copiously of method; and it was believed, especially in Germany, that on Logic he was the best guide that could be had (1). The following encomium is bestowed on the commentary which he published in the year 1582. Anno 82. edidit illa admirabilia commentaria in post. Annal. Aristotelis quibus omnibus Grecis, Arabibus, Latinis palmam in hoc divino Aristotelici ingenii opere illustrando præripuit (2). --- In the year 1582, he published his admirable commentary on Aristotle's Analytics, in which he has illustrated that divine work, worthy of the genius of Aristotle, far beyond all the Grecian, Arabian, and Latin commentators. Francis Piccolomini, his colleague, and rival, attacked him on the doctrine of Method. Zabarella published his reply in the year 1584. Imperialis observes, that Zabarella was inferior to Francis Piccolomini, in the faculty of discoursing (3); but when he took pen in hand, exceeded him in the force of argument: when he had occasion to ruin his adversaries hypothesis, he brought a multitude of arguments which crushed them: when he was obliged to maintain his own opinions, he did it with great skill and success. He scarce had his equal, either for overthrowing the adverse side, or defending his own. Neminem facile quis dixerit æquare Zabarellæ Scriptorum venustatem atque elegantiam, quibus accedit incredibile argumentandi robur & opinionum firmitas, quo nomine vix alius in evertendis aliorum placitis uberior, in austruendis propriis foelicior unquam est habitus (4). --- It may well be said that no author ever wrote with more beauty and elegance than Zabarella. Add to this his incredible force of reasoning, and his great talent in supporting his opinions. In this respect scarce any writer has been esteemed more copious in confuting the opinions of his adversaries, or more successful in maintaining his own. His book De Rebus naturalibus Libri XXX, quibus Quæstiones, quæ ab Aristotelis Interpretibus bodie tractari solent, accurate discutuntur, was printed in the year 1589. He dedicated it to Pope Sixtus V: the Epistle Dedicatory is dated at Padua, on the first of October, the same year. He had before published a small specimen of it in 1586, and dedicated it to that Pope's nephew. His commentaries on the three books of Aristotle de Anima, did not appear till after his death. His son Francis Zabarella published them in the year 1604.

(1) Kockerman. Præcognit. Logicor. Tract. ii. cap. vi. pag. m. 184. See also Tomafin. Elog. Part. i. pag. 137.

(2) Id. Ibid.

(3) See the remark [E].

(4) Imperialis, in Museo Histor. pag. 115.

(5) Ex Tomafino, Elogior. Part. i. pag. 139.

(6) Moreri had this from Mr Teiffier's addition to the Elogies, Tom. ii, p. 124.

[D] Some say he was a handsome man, others, that he was ugly.] His effigies in Tomafin represents his air to be very agreeable, and admirably confirms these words Vultu spectabilis (7): --- of a graceful aspect. But in Imperialis, the print of him expresses a gloomy, furly, and mean look, and very effectually proves the truth of these words, 'Nec subhæsitantibus lingue notæ vel TETRICA forte ORIS SPECIES ullas unquam fuz gloriæ maculas aspergere potuerunt' (8). --- Nor (9) Job. Imper. could a flammering be had in his speech, nor something still, in Museo Histor. p. 117.

Is it possible, that in things exposed to every body's view, authors should differ as much as white and black, as well in the strokes of their pens, as in those of the Painter's pencil? If the question was about the inclinations of the mind, I should not be surprized at this diversity of relations, for it is easy to fall into contrary determinations, with respect to those invisible objects, which only discover themselves by equivocal indications; but the question relates to the face: ought it not to be out of dispute whether his face was handsome or ugly?

[E] Some assert that he had a very lively . . . wit . . . that he could not solve the objections, &c. . .] This is another subject on which Historians ought not to oppose one another. They ought to agree on the question, whether Zabarella's genius acted in a quick or slow manner. He was Professor about twenty-five years in one of the most famous universities of Europe. This gave him a thousand opportunities of publicly discovering whether, when a difficulty was proposed, he wanted time to consider of it, or could solve it immediately. Why then should Tomafin express himself in this manner: 'Nactus est Mercurium feliciter stantem, quam ob causam CELERES ingenii motus, & ad quævis excogitanda FACILES ET EXPEDITOS, habuit in omni vita' (9): --- He is happily gifted with a ready wit, and accordingly his genius has during all his life been QUICK, EASY, and PENETRATING: and Imperialis, on the contrary, tells us? 'Carpebant in te plurimi memorie labem, & quendam in agendis TORPorem, quibus ad privata vel publica negotia minus reddebaris idoneus: SEQUIOREM te pariter quam ferret ingenii claritas in quæstionibus inopinate solvendis prædicabant, cum te Scholarium Teffibus nonnisi per INTERPOSITAS HORAS respondere solitum dicerent' (10): --- Many people blamed you for your want of memory, and for a slow manner: certain SLUGGISHNESS in acting, both which defects disqualified you for public and private affairs. They likewise said, that in solving difficulties, you was slower than was consistent with a clear genius; and that you did not answer the theses of your students, till you had taken AN INTERVAL OF SOME HOURS to consider of them? Some pages after he observes, that Zabarella stuttered, and that his words and deportment were rough and unpolished. In eo præsertim Jacobo Zabarellæ Collegæ suo (Franciscus Piccolomini) quod ipse facilitate quadam dicendi præditus, juncta comitati morum ac eximie humanitati, alter sermone durior, blasus, incomptus, civilibus in studiis inops potius quam redundans (11). --- Francis (11) Piccolomini had the advantage of his colleague James Zabarella in this, that the former had a certain facility of expressing his thoughts, together with a mild, a humane, and winning behaviour; whereas the latter . . .

opinions [F], as not believing the immortality of the soul; but he is praised for having led an exemplary life (c). I shall speak of the treatise in which he maintained * expressions of the latter were harsh, blunt, and unpolished, and he was rather deficient than officious in paying civilities and doing kindnesses.

(c) Quibus omnibus (filiis & filabus) . . . faciem prætulit incorrupte gloriæ, & virtutis vere, suo cunctis exemplo prælocens. Tomas. ibid. pag. 138.

[F] He is accused of holding some impious opinions.]

(14) These words of Moreri are taken from Mr Teissier, ubi supra.

(13) Imperial. ubi supra, pag. 212.

(14) Compare Tomasin's words at the end of the text of this article.

On this head Mr Moreri is faulty. He is accused by Imperialis, faith he (12), of having opposed the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and of having given several marks of impiety and Atheism in his writings. The last part of this accusation is not in Imperialis; and if the first is, it is not expressed as a thing affirmed by that author, but rather as a very uncertain rumour, which he in some sort refutes. His words run thus (13): 'Præterea impensius te aliquanto impugnasse immortalitatem animæ, deterrimam Alexandreorum sententiam palam professum: quos tamen de te rumores ut forte ab exulceratis animis excitos, ita vel elusit posteritas, vel admirabilis ac prope divina tuarum virtutum fama compensavit (14): præaltæ siquidem mentis lumen in scriptis diffusum tuis, nullam debet lumen temporis nullamque livoris noxam vereri. . . . Besides, they said that you too warmly attacked the immortality of the soul, and openly professed the abominable tenet of the Alexandrians: but these rumours concerning you, as they were, perhaps, raised by invidious persons, so they have either been neglected by posterity, or destroyed by the admirable and almost divine fame of your virtues: and that exalted understanding which shines through your writings ought to fear no injury, either from time or envy.' This calumny, if I am not mistaken, was only grounded upon this. There reigned in Italy, and chiefly at Padua, for above an age, a famous dispute about this question, whether it was possible to prove the immortality of the soul from Aristotle's principles. Some Professors who were looked upon as favourers of Alexander Aphrodisiensis defended the negative. Others maintained the affirmative. Pomponatius, our Zabarella, Cremoninus, &c. took the first side, whence a great number of such persons as are incapable of using distinctions when they are most necessary, peremptorily charged these Philosophers with teaching the mortality of the soul. This is the Sophism, à dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter: . . . From a particular case to draw a general inference. In a word, this is an injustice and wickedness which society ought not to tolerate: for there is a prodigious difference betwixt absolutely affirming that the soul is mortal, and maintaining that, according to the hypothesis of such a Philosopher, it is impossible to prove that it is not mortal. See the article of POMPONATIUS. The Inquisitors acted on a principle of equity towards Zabarella: for they contented themselves with his declaration, that by the power of the Divine grace, he was fully persuaded of the truth of the orthodox opinion, tho' natural reason, and Aristotle's principles seemed incapable of forming in him this excellent persuasion. He published a book, in which he maintained, that the existence of a first mover separate from the bodies which compose the universe, could be no otherwise proved than by supposing the eternity of motion. This was declaring, that a Christian Philosopher cannot produce any proofs of the existence of a first mover, whose nature is spiritual; for it is a doctrine of the Christian faith, that motion is not eternal. Zabarella asserted, that in order to believe this existence, which no natural reason can demonstrate, the grace of the Holy Ghost was necessary. The holy office found nothing unreasonable in this assertion, and gave their approbation to this Philosopher's book. This emboldened Berigardus to take the liberty of maintaining the same opinion. It is true he did not do so bluntly; for he introduced an Interlocutor opposing this thesis. Let us cite a pretty long passage out of his preface: 'Denique ut conflet ea que dicuntur in nostris Circulis permissa jam fuisse à S. Officio, libet pauca subjicere, maxime ne cui durum videatur quod introduco Aristoteli defendentem sententiam Jacobi Zabarellæ viri in hoc Lyceo celeberrimi. Hæc sententia libro de inventione æterni motoris approbato sæpius à S. Officio, decet unicum medium philosopho naturali ad demonstrandum dari primum motorem à materia

V O L. V.

abjunctum esse motus æternitatem, quæ quia non datur, ut fide divina certi sumus, sequitur primum motorem demonstrari non posse naturaliter, sed ad hoc opus esse Dei contactu peculiari. Neque propterea Zabarella putat eam quam vocat demonstrationem primi motoris ex motu æterno, esse veram demonstrationem, utpote cujus medium falsum est, sed loquitur ex falsis principiis Aristotelis, nempe si verus esset motus æternus, inde solum ostendi posse primum motorem. Hanc Zabarellæ opinionem jam permisissam si tuerer, id fortasse tutò facere possem; verum contrariam existimo magis esse consentaneam pietati, propterea illi oppono Charilaum qui Circ. II. & XVIII. contendit Deum verum cognosci posse naturaliter, & licet rationes ille seorsum acceptæ non videantur sufficere ad convincendos pertinaces Epicureos, ut concludit ultimis verbis, omnibus tamen simul instructis, ait intellectum rectè dispositum posse elevari ad hanc cognitionem naturaliter, sed abique merito gratiæ & gloriæ, ut sic inexcusabiles verè dicantur à Divo Paulo qui contemptis his rationibus ad falsas & irreligiosas opiniones delapsi sunt. Zabarella tamen sequi videtur Campanella cap. 9. n. 2. ubi ait religionem veram (ac proinde Deum) citra fidem cognosci non posse: quin etiam apud Philosophos plus valere fidem quam rationem (15). . . . To make it appear that what is advanced in the following work has already been permitted by the holy office; let us add a few things, especially lest it should seem strange to any person that I introduce Aristotle's defending the opinion of James Zabarella, a famous man of this university. You will find this opinion in his book on the Investigation of the first Mover, a book that hath been often approved by the holy office, in which it is asserted, that a Natural Philosopher can demonstrate the being of a first Mover separate from matter, upon no other supposition than that motion is eternal; and as we know, by revelation, that motion is not eternal, it follows, that the being of a first Mover cannot be demonstrated by natural reason, and that the supernatural assistance of GOD is necessary for that purpose. Nor does Zabarella therefore think that what he calls a demonstration of the being of a first Mover, is a real demonstration; as the supposition upon which it is built, is false; but he argues from the principles of Aristotle, that if motion was eternal, from thence only would it follow that there is a first Mover. As this opinion of Zabarella has already been permitted, I might possibly defend it with safety. But I think the contrary opinion is more agreeable to piety; wherefore to oppose it I bring in Charilaus, who maintains, that we may know the true GOD by the light of nature: and tho' natural reasons taken singly seem too weak to convince an obstinate Epicurean, as Charilaus concludes, yet when taken altogether, he says, a well disposed understanding may, by the light of nature, rise to the knowledge of the true GOD, tho' without meriting thereby the grace of GOD and eternal felicity; so that they may truly be said, by St Paul, to be inexcusable, who despising the light of nature, turn aside to false and ungodly opinions. However this opinion of Zabarella seems to be followed by Campanella, when he says that the true religion (and therefore GOD) cannot be known without the help of revelation; but that revelation is even to Philosophers more valuable than reason.

Till I can come at this book of Zabarella, which is very hard to be met with in this country (16), I shall make one reflexion. I am not satisfied with my conjectures on this Philosopher's way of reasoning. He asserted (17), that the consequence is right from the eternity of motion, to the existence of a first spiritual Mover, but that a motion which had a beginning is no manner of proof that there is a first Mover distinct from matter. In order to reason upon this matter, it is necessary to suppose it impossible that a material principle should act eternally (18), tho' it may be capable of acting for several ages. But I do not see on what this assertion can be grounded; for if Zabarella grants me that a material principle could produce motion, which, according to Moses's hypothesis, did not begin till six days before Adam, he must believe that this

(15) Claudius Berigardus, in problemo Circuli Philani, pag. 5, 6.

(16) The schoolmen are so much despised in this country, that one would be ashamed to buy their books, or even to enquire whether they are to be found in a library.

A REFLEXION upon the consequences from the eternity, or the beginning of motion, with respect to the existence of God.

(17) Thus Berigardus makes him reason.

(18) Berigardus, in Circulo, pag. 5, advances this proposition, Nulla virtus materialis æternum motum creare potest.

tained that the proof of a God drawn from the existence of a first mover, is defective, unless we suppose motion to be eternal [G]. I shall occasionally say that there this principle having been at rest from all eternity, was at last moved by itself, and that it shall once return to rest, since its materiality will never suffer it to do any thing eternal. But who doth not see the absurdity of this hypothesis? Every one clearly apprehends. 1. That all bodies which have been at rest from all eternity, would for ever continue so, unless they were put in motion by some external power. 2. That all bodies which might begin to move, and had continued in motion as long as the world has lasted, according to the Scripture, might also persevere eternally in that state. 3. That all bodies which might begin to move one hundred ages ago, might have begun twenty thousand years, an hundred thousand years, &c. sooner; for there is no more reason to fix the beginning of motion to one hour rather than another, unless we have recourse to the good pleasure of a spiritual cause: but if a body might have begun to move before any term assigned, it would follow that it might have been always in motion, and consequently motion might have been eternal without being produced by a cause distinct from matter. What I have just been saying shews, that we may very reasonably conclude, the existence of a first spiritual Mover, from this, that the motion of matter had a beginning, and that we could not make this conclusion, if we should once grant, that a motion which began might proceed from a material cause. Consequently I do not find that Zabarella reasoned well on this head.

Besides, it seems to me much easier to prove, that there is a first Mover distinct from matter, if we suppose motion to have had a beginning, than if we suppose it eternal. Let us suppose it had a beginning, and it will necessarily follow, either that all bodies began to exist, or that having existed from all eternity, they continued during an eternity in a state of rest. If all bodies began to exist, they must necessarily have been produced by a spiritual cause; and this is the first Mover which we are in quest of; for the spiritual principle, author of the existence of all bodies, will also be the principle of their motion. If all bodies are eternal, and yet their motion is not eternal, it follows that they have not in themselves the motive virtue; for if they had, they would have moved eternally. That motive virtue therefore does not reside in matter, it is therefore in a spiritual subject; and this again is the first Mover which we are in quest of. If it be the efficient cause of bodies (19), so much the better, for with much more reason will it be the efficient cause of motion. If it is not their efficient cause, if matter exists by itself, yet it will be the cause of their motion, since it is visible that a nature which hath been at rest during an eternity, does not begin to move itself, but must be drawn out of this state of rest by an external principle. On the other side, if we suppose that motion is eternal, it will be more difficult to maintain that it proceeds from an immaterial cause; for it may be urged, that the same necessity whereby matter hath eternally existed without having been created (20), hath made it move eternally without the help of an external principle, or spiritual mover. I cannot therefore comprehend the manner of arguing which Zabarella took; for whatever I conjecture on this head, tends to make me believe, rather that he diverted himself by broaching a paradox, than that he suffered himself to be seduced by specious reasons. Was he afraid that it should be urged against him that a spiritual Mover would not have left matter in a state of inactivity through all eternity, and that therefore the beginning of motion is a proof that the first Mover is not a spiritual being? But this objection is stronger against those who should maintain the materiality of the first Mover. Is it not more difficult to comprehend that a corporeal cause should act with liberty, and begin its actions at pleasure, than to comprehend the same thing of a spiritual nature?

[G] I shall speak of the treatise in which he maintained, that the proof of a GOD, drawn from the existence of a first Mover, is defective, unless we suppose motion to be eternal. All the former part of this article, and what is contained in the remark [H], was written in the month of March 1697. I read it over again in August 1701, in order to send it to the press; and whilst I was perusing it, I remembered that for two or three years past I had Zabarella's works by me. I therefore believed that I ought to examine what he said, and compare with that the conjectures which I had made when I had no other guide than a citation of Berigardus. This examination made it appear to me, that my conjectures do not come home to the point, and that the state of the question is different from what I imagined. Notwithstanding, I have published them without any alteration; they may afford matter of reflexion, and, at all events, they may serve as a proof of my ingenuity, and make it appear that I use no manner of artifice. There are a great many authors who, on the like occasions, would have corrected their manuscript, and yet would say, This is what we conjectured before we saw the book, and after we have read it, we have found our conjectures exactly conform to it. But I will act with more sincerity, I am willing that the reader should know the difference between what I thought of Zabarella's book before, and what I ought to say of it after I have read it. Accordingly I shall give a short analysis of that treatise.

It is intitled, De Inventionem eterni Motoris, and contains but eight pages and a half in my edition (21). The author's first thesis is, that it is impossible to discover any otherwise than by motion that there is an immaterial substance; but he protests that he confines himself to the knowledge which may be acquired by the light of nature, and that he excepts revelation. Hæc præmissa protestatione, nos hac de re secundum principia philosophiæ Arist. esse loquuturos, & illam tantum substantiarum à materia adjunctarum notitiam, quam via naturali adipiscimur, consideraturos, omnia penitus earundem cognitione, quam revelatione divina & lumine supernaturali accipimus; verissimam illam quidem, sed Arist. cujus dicta interpretanda suscepimus, profus abscindam (22). I first declare that I am to speak on this subject only according to the principles of Aristotle, and to consider that knowledge of substances abstracted from matter, which we attain by reason and the light of nature, setting aside entirely that knowledge of them which we have received from Divine revelation, and by supernatural light, which knowledge is indeed most true, but was utterly bidden to Aristotle, whose principles I have undertaken to explain. He embraces the opinion of Averroës, who rejected the other proofs which Avicenna pretended to find in Aristotle's books, these for instance: there is one being dependant on another, therefore there is a first being which doth not depend on any thing whatsoever; for otherwise we should be obliged to admit a progress in infinitum. But this first being is GOD, therefore, &c. there is one perfection and one goodness greater than another; there is therefore a supreme perfection and goodness. But the being which hath this perfection and this goodness is GOD, wherefore there is a GOD. Averroës answers, that all this proves only the existence of a nature independent of, and more perfect than, others, but not its immateriality. He adds, that the ancient Philosophers, who admitted nothing but matter, would say that this independent and most perfect nature, is nothing else but Heaven (23). Zabarella concludes, that in order to come naturally to the notion of an immaterial substance, we ought to argue thus: Heaven hath an incessant motion; every thing which moves is moved by another; whatever is corporeal is movable, and there is no progress in infinitum betwixt the movers and the things moved; wherefore there is a first mover distinct from matter.

He afterwards enquires whether motion, whatever it be, affords a proof of the existence of such a mover, and declares for the negative; for he concludes, that nothing but the eternity of motion can prove the existence of a Mover separate from matter. He examines the opinion of those who pretend that Aristotle maintained (24), that even motion, which had a beginning, is able to lead us to the knowledge of a first spiritual Mover. This Philosopher, say they, argued thus: Whatever moves, is moved by another, and there is no such thing, as a progress in infinitum; wherefore there

(19) Note, that several great Orthodox Philosophers maintain that a creature may be eternal.

(20) I suppose that Zabarella argued against some men, who did not believe the creation.

(21) It is thus of Frankfurt (supra) Liberum Laxum Zaccari, 1618, in 4to.

(22) Jacob Zabarella, de Rebus naturalibus, pag. m. 55j.

(23) Quæ illi philosophi, eorumque membra facit Plato in Symplicio, quæ præterea res corporeas de se habent, illi alia esse concedunt, eorumque membra & perfectionem, esse esse autem Cælum, nec ullum præter illud dari dicunt. Deum. li. vi. pag. 254.

(24) In lib. vi. Physic. Aristot.

there are more ambiguities than are imagined in the controversy concerning the eternity

there is a first Mover, which is immovable, and consequently incorporeal, for if he were a body, he must of necessity be movable. Zabarella answers, that this argument of Aristotle can only lead us to the existence of a Mover that is immovable in no other than a general sense, which may comprize the souls of beasts. Those souls, continues he, are immovable so far as they are not movable in themselves, but only by accident. But tho' they are accidentally movable, they are called the first movers, according to the order essential to moving things. Si hunc Aristotelis discursum consideremus, manifestum est, per eum nos non duci ad alium motorem immobilem, quam late acceptum, qui animas quoque animalium mortalium complectatur; immobiles enim sunt, quatenus non sunt per se mobiles, quum incorporeæ sint, sed tamen sunt per accidentis mobiles: neque per id fit, quin dicantur motores primi juxta ordinem movendum essentialem (25). He adds, that those whom he opposes being very sensible of the lameness of this argument, have supplied the defect of it, in this manner: Heaven moves; it is therefore moved by something else; therefore there is a first immovable Mover. But is this Mover eternal, or not? If it is, we have what we enquire for: the motion of Heaven, be it what it will, be it but of two days, leads us to the existence of a God. But if this Mover is not eternal, it will one day perish, wherefore there is something, which will destroy it; it is not therefore the first Mover, we must therefore deny it that quality, and transfer it to another being, who shall destroy that pretended first Mover. Yet we were come so far as the first Mover, and we argued on that hypothesis: what absurdity more ridiculous than to offer in answer what is contradictory to a supposition, of the truth of which the contending parties are agreed? But that thing, which shall occasion sooner or later the destruction of that, which we have considered as the first immovable Mover, must it not be the first Mover? And to be so, ought it not to be in such a station as nothing can be above it, which is able to produce any alteration in it? It is therefore eternal, it is therefore what we were to find by following the track of Aristotle's argument. Let us hear Zabarella's answer which turns solely on the solution of the following dilemma: The first Mover is or is not eternal; if it is, we have gained our point: if it is not, there is then another Mover which can destroy it, there is therefore a Mover superior to this first Mover. But this is absurd, and contrary to the supposition to which both parties agreed. He answers (26), that the first Mover which his adversaries have hit on is not eternal, but of the same nature with the soul of brutes, that it is the form of Heaven, and that Heaven being composed of four elements opposite to each other, had a beginning, and shall have an end, in like manner with other parts of the world; that from the destruction of Heaven will necessarily result the destruction of its moving soul (27); that it shall not perish by the act of a first Mover; and that therefore tho' it shall be destroyed it doth not follow from thence that there is a superior agent or efficient cause above it; it is sufficient that it be united to a body naturally corruptible, for the corruption of that body necessarily draws on the corruption of its form or of the soul, which in it performed the functions of a first Mover. Quando igitur bi dicunt, si primus motor universi est corruptibilis, ergo non est primus, forma materialis, negandum est consequens: ad probationem autem, quum dicunt, corruptetur à motore priore, hoc quoque est negandum; non enim ex eo quod est corruptibilis, requiritur motor prior, à quo corruptatur, sed quum sit incorporeus, et forma corporis, satis causa est ad ipsum interimendum corruptibilitatem corporis, cuius est forma; corpus autem ipsum, quum sit elementare, à suo contrario laedi et interiri potest (28). Wherefore, concludes he, motion in general proves no more, than the existence of a first Mover immovable in the same manner as the souls of brutes, are immovable and nothing but an eternal motion can prove an eternal Mover. Ex motu igitur absolute accepto absque consideratione eternitatis nil aliud ostenditur, quam dari primum motorem universi immobilem eo modo, quo animæ animalium brutorum sunt immobiles, hoc est, non per se mobilem: quod autem nec per se, nec per accidentis mobilis sit, proinde à materia abjunctus: et impartibilis, et infatiga- bilis, et sempiternus, id ea ratione non ostenditur; quapropter nullum aliud philosopho naturali medium relinquatur ad demonstrandum primum motorem æternum, nisi motus æternus; quando enim sumimus motum universi unum et eundem numero æternum esse, statim inferimus, eum ab uno tantum motore totum produci; quare necesse est, motorem illum esse infatigabilem, et sempiternum (29).

It would not be easy for the Peripatetics to refute Zabarella's reasons: for he argues ad hominem against them; he makes his advantage of their doctrine of substantial forms, and the motive and primitive virtue of the souls of animals. Most of the ancient Philosophers believed that self-motion was the essential character of the soul (30). Πάν γὰρ σώμα, says Plato, ὃ μὲν ἐξωθεν τὸ κινεῖσθαι, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὃ δὲ ἐνδὲθεν αὐτὸ ἐξ αὐτοῦ, ἐμ-λύχον. Omne enim corpus cui motus extrinsecus indicit inanimatum est. Cui vero intus ex seipso inest animatum *. The Moderns, who have justly rejected these principles, might confute him without any difficulty, and find nothing intricate in his objections. Observe, by the by, how pernicious and dangerous the consequences may prove of the Aristotelian hypothesis about the internal activity of forms distinct from matter. It is a principle which admits of almost an infinite number of first Movers, from whence it is easy to proceed so far as to reject a first universal Mover, or to assert that he is subject to death. The soul of each man and each brute is, in its kind, a first mover. It moves itself, and imprints motion on the body, of which it is the form. We may, in proportion, find the same principle in inanimate bodies. The form of heavy bodies hath no need of any external Mover to press them towards the center, nor that of light bodies to drive them from it; but is itself their first Mover in this respect. Now if this Aristotelian hypothesis be once admitted, a universal Mover of the Heavens will be no longer necessary, every planet will be moved by its form, the heavens and fixed stars will be moved by theirs, and none of these movers will be accounted incorruptible, but will be liable to the common destiny of forms, which cannot subsist after the dissolution of the matter united to them (31). Zabarella very clearly apprehending this consequence, asserted that the soul of the Heavens would one day perish, since the matter of the Heavens was composed of principles which clash with each other. It is so evident that matter is changeable, that the ancient Philosophers who believed that the genii were not entirely separated from matter, believed them mortal, not excepting the greatest of them all. An evidence of this is Plutarch's story, The great Pan is dead (32).

If Zabarella has been able to penetrate into the consequences of the common doctrine of the schools, he was not less in the right, when he asserted that in order to find a first eternal Mover, it was necessary to stop at one only cause which produced all motion. It is an advantage which we meet with in the Cartesian Philosophy; it ascribes to God all the moving and immediate power of the universe, and doth not divide it betwixt the Creator and the creatures. The multitude of Movers may infensibly lead to the most dangerous atheism, and from hence doubtless proceeds the atheism of the Chinese Philosophers (33). They first of all believed a superior, immaterial and infinite Deity; but attributing great natural powers to bodies, and chiefly to the celestial, they, by little and little, forgot the immaterial Divinity, and stopped at material principles. The visible and material Heaven is at present their great God (34).

For the rest, we ought not to be surprized that the Italian Inquisition permitted Zabarella to follow Averroës, in rejecting some proofs of the existence of a God. This sort of liberty is very great every where; and provided a man owns that this existence may be proved by other means, they give him leave to censure this or that particular proof. The Cartesians are not more annoyed on any head, than on Mr Des Cartes's demonstration of the existence of God. He was obliged to answer a vast number of objections. And we every day see the most orthodox people renewing this dispute. Mr Werenfels, Professor at Basil, maintained, in a printed tract, that this argument of Des Cartes is a meer paralogism. Mr Swicer, Professor at Zurich, answered

(29) Id. ibid.

pag. 257.

(30) See Aristotle de Anima, lib. i, cap. ii.

* Plato, in Phædro, pag. m. 1221, D.

(31) See, above, the comparison made in remark [I], of the article XENOCRATES, between the gods of Xenocrates, and the slaves called servi liberi.

(32) Plut. de Oracul. defectu, pag. 419. See also the remark [I], in the article CHRYSIPUS.

(33) See the remark [X], in the article SPIRONOZA.

(34) See several proofs of this in the apology for the Dominicans, printed at Cologne in 1699, pag. 79, & seq. See also the article SPIRONOZA, remark [X].

FACTS which prove that the Orthodox are allowed to dispute on the arguments for the existence of a God.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 255.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 256.

(27) Dicam itaque, ex interitu Cæli necessario fieri ut anima quoque motrix intereat, quia licet hæc contrarium non habeat, tamen ex subiecti corporis interitu ex necessitate deficiet, quum sit primus motor universi est corruptibilis, ergo non est primus, forma materialis, negandum est consequens: ad probationem autem, quum dicunt, corruptetur à motore priore, hoc quoque est negandum; non enim ex eo quod est corruptibilis, requiritur motor prior, à quo corruptatur, sed quum sit incorporeus, et forma corporis, satis causa est ad ipsum interimendum corruptibilitatem corporis, cuius est forma; corpus autem ipsum, quum sit elementare, à suo contrario laedi et interiri potest (28).

(28) Id. ibid.

eternity of the world [H].

- answered him; as did also Mr Jaquelot, a Minister at the Hague, whose answer is inserted in the History of the Works of the Learned (35) Mr Brillon, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, saw this answer, but not being satisfied with it, he published (36) a memoir to prove that Des Cartes's argument was a sophism, and not a demonstration. Father Francis Lami, a Benedictine Monk, refuted this memoir (37). Mr Jaquelot replied for himself (38). Mr l'Herminier, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, has lately published a book, in which he not only rejects Des Cartes's demonstrations concerning the existence of GOD, but also most others. 'Of five offered by St Thomas, which are also commonly made use of by Philosophers and Divines, this Doctor rejects four, and allows only one of them to be valid against the Atheists, for he looks upon it as a paralogism to prove the Deity by any of the following reasons. That all that exists cannot be contingent, and that there must be some being which necessarily exists of itself. That we cannot admit an infinite number of causes mutually subordinate, and that it is absolutely necessary to acknowledge a first cause on which all others are dependent. That matter cannot move itself, but that a first incorporeal Mover must necessarily exist, from which it mediately or immediately received it's moving impulse. That in those beings which exist, there appearing several degrees of perfection, as goodness, beauty, power, &c. there must undoubtedly exist a Being infinitely perfect, with respect to which they may be said to be less or more perfect in proportion to their approaching more or less to it's perfection. After having ranked these four demonstrations among the sophisms, the fifth which Mr l'Herminier looks upon as a real demonstration of the existence of GOD, is that drawn from the structure of the universe and the manner of its subsisting in such an excellent order of all it's parts, and with such a constant regularity of their motions (39). This is what we find in the journal of Trevoux, in the extract of Mr l'Herminier's book (40). It is long since a very famous school-man (41) declared, that all the proofs which reason can afford of the existence of GOD are only probable. This Doctor of the Sorbonne does not go so far.
- [H] There are more ambiguities than are imagined in the controversy concerning the eternity of the world. All Christians (42) are agreed, that nothing besides GOD hath eternally existed; but several assert that he might have actually created the world as soon as he formed the decree in order to it's production; from whence they conclude, that the world might have existed from all eternity, since the decree for it's production is undoubtedly eternal. Several also affirm that it is impossible for a creature to be eternal. Each of these parties is stronger in objections than solutions. But this dispute which is rendered so tedious and difficult, would soon cease, if the disputants of each side would but explain themselves clearly, and remove the ambiguities about eternity. The question ought to be put thus: Is it possible that GOD and his creatures may have always existed together. And then one would not so boldly take the negative side; for this term, the eternity of the world, a term which startles so many people, would not here make such an impression on the mind. And the better to remove this stumbling-block, it should be said that a creature which had always co-existed with GOD would not be eternal, for which this reason ought immediately to be alleged, that the duration of creatures is successive, and that eternity is a simple duration which essentially excludes the time past, and the time to come. By this essential difference betwixt the duration of GOD, and that of the creatures, we should put an end to almost all the dispute, and each party would find their account in it. We should grant to those who deny that a creature can be eternal, that they are in the right, and should not deny that it is possible for GOD and the creature to have always existed together, since it is certain that a cause doth not comprehend in it's idea a priority of time with respect to it's effect, and that this is especially true with respect to an omnipotent cause which needs only will in order to produce actually whatever it pleases. Mr Poiret hath very clearly apprehended the ambiguities which perplex this controversy, and render it in a manner a dispute about words. He judiciously observes that it is not true that the creature would be eternal, if their existence had no beginning, and tells us that those who affirm it have a wrong notion of eternity. 'Asserentibus (Platoni ut ajunt & Aristoteli) mundum existentie initio carere, fuit obiectum, si id ita se haberet, mundum igitur æternum fore. Ecce, homines isti sibi imaginantur Æternitatem, quasi esset infinitorum momentorum ordo principio atque fine carens, quæ vera æternitatis ignorantia est. Falsum est, mundum statui æternum si dicatur vel semper existisse, vel non posse affirmari in eo esse ali- quod momentum quod ab alio non fuerit præcessum: quamvis enim hoc esset, nihilominus mundus temporarius esset & dependens; neque hoc quicquam Dei Æternitati aut Potentiæ detraheret (43). --- (43) Petrus P. It was objected to those (Plato and Aristotle, as it is ret, Cogitat. Rationales de Deo, Anima, & M. lo, lib. iii, cap. xvi, num. 12, pag. 438, Edit. 1685, that if it was so, the world would be eternal. They who made this objection must have imagined that eternity is an order of succession of infinite moments of time, without beginning or end: but this shows that they know not what eternity is. It is false that the world would be accounted eternal, if we say either that it always existed, or that there is not any moment of it's time which is not preceded by another: for even if this was so, the world would only be temporary and dependent, neither would this derogate from the eternity, or the power of GOD. Observe by the by that this author doth three things. We have just now seen the first, which is the false consequence that the world would be eternal if it never began. In the second place he owns that the arguments commonly alledged against those who say that the world had no beginning are weak. He excuses those who not having the light of revelation, did not believe the beginning of the universe. He tells us that when he was writing that chapter he was persuaded it was not possible to find any good reasons against those of that opinion, tho' he had long searched after better proofs than all those which he had read, and which appeared weak to him. Postquam aliorum quæ occurrerunt rationes infirmas deprehenderem, alias diu in mente mea quæseram, putavi seposita revelatione non posse ex lumine nature demonstrari Mundum sic esse, ut prius non fuerit (44). 3. At last (44) he brings a proof which offered itself to his mind while he was writing, he brings it, I say, against these people. But observe, that an objection was made to him (45), to which he gave an answer (46), which doth not take off the force of it.

Here are other quibbles which prevail in this dispute. Those who say that the creatures did not always co-exist with GOD, are obliged to own that GOD existed before them. There was therefore such a thing as before, when GOD existed alone; it is not therefore true that the duration of GOD is an indivisible point: Time therefore preceded the existence of the creatures. These consequences make those gentlemen fall into a contradiction. For if the duration of GOD is indivisible, and without either time past or time to come, it follows that time and the creatures began together, and if so, how can we say that GOD existed before the existence of the creatures? That phrase is improper and contradictory. And the following are no less so, God might have created the world sooner or later than he did create it; he might have done it one hundred thousand years sooner, &c.

They do not attend to this, that by making eternity one indivisible instant, the hypothesis of the beginning of the creatures is weakened. How do you prove that the world did not always exist? Is it not from the argument, that there was an infinite nature which existed while the world did not exist? But can the duration of that nature set bounds to that of the world? Can it hinder the duration of the world from extending its self beyond all the particular beginnings which you would assign for it? You say that the creatures want only a point of indivisible duration to be without a beginning; for, according to you, they were only preceded by the duration of GOD, which is an indivisible instant. You will be answered, that they did not therefore begin, for if a stick wanted only one point (I mean a Mathematical point) to be four feet long, it would certainly have the whole extent of four feet. This is an instance that may be founded on the common definition of the duration of GOD (47), a definition much much more incomprehensible than the doctrine of Transubstantiation; for if it is impossible to conceive that all the members of a man should be contained distinct from each other within the compass of a Mathematical point; how shall we conceive that a duration without beginning or end, and which co-exists with the successive duration of all creatures, is comprized in an indivisible instant (48)?

(48) The Schoolmen take great pains to make this intelligible. See among others Caramuel, in his Philosophia rationalis & realis, lib. vii.

This hypothesis raises another difficulty in favour of those who assert that the creatures had no beginning. If the decree of the creation doth not comprehend a particular moment, it never existed without the creatures; for it ought to be understood under this phrase, I will that the world exist. It is visible that by virtue of such a decree the world must have existed at the same time with this act of the will of God. But since this act had no beginning, neither had the world any. Let us suppose then that the decree was conceived thus; I will that the world exist in such a moment. But how can we suppose that, if the duration of God is an indivisible point? Can this or that moment be chosen rather than any other in such a duration? It seems therefore, that if the duration of God is not successive, the world could not have a beginning.

(49) It is at pag. 675, 676, of his Cogitat. rationales de Deo, &c.

This objection was proposed to Mr Poirer in the year 1679 (49). He returned an answer (50) which no ways removes the difficulty, and even takes away all means of doing it; for he supposeth that it is not possible there should be any moments before the existence of the creatures: nay, he seems to suppose that the decree of the creation was only made at the very moment that the creatures existed. Let us cite his words: 'Nec poterat existere mundus, nec momenta ulla, sine alio decreto, nempe eo cum dixit Deus, Volo mundum existere; & tunc, (ut ait Scriptura,) dixit, & facta sunt, tunc existitit extemplo mundus: Et hoc fuit primum ejus momentum, & ante hoc nullum fuit de facto possibile momentum; estque contradicibus concipere ante mundum plura momenta ex quibus unum eligatur ad existentiā primam mundi, cæteris partim sine mundo præterlapſis: nam momentum est modus creaturæ quæ existit (51). . . . Neither could the world, or any moment of time exist, without another decree, namely that when God said, I will that the world exist, and then (as it is in the Scripture) he spoke and the things were made: then the world immediately came into being. This was the first moment of its existence; and before this, there was no possible moment. And it is contradictory to conceive, that before the first existence of the world, there were several moments of time, and that one of them was singled out for the first moment of its existence, while the rest passed away without any world: for time is a mode of a creature, considered as existing. For my part, I make a quite different supposition, and believe it solves the difficulty.

(51) Poirer, ibid. pag. 680.

I suppose that among the possible beings which God knew, before (52) he made the decrees of the creation, we ought to reckon a successive duration without beginning or end; and whole parts are as distinct from one another, as those of a possible extension, which God likewise knew before his decrees, as a Being infinite, according to the three dimensions. He left in the state of the things possible, part of this infinite duration, and made decrees for the existence of the other. He chose such a moment as he thought fit in this ideal duration for the first which should exist, and fixed to it the act, by which he decreed the creation of the world. This is the reason why the eternity of that act doth not prove the eternity of the world. Thus we see again, that the indivisibility of the real duration of God, doth not prove that the world did not begin. We have also in this ideal or possible duration, the true measure of time. Others look for it in vain, in the motion of the Heavens. Others yet more chimerically assert, that time is an Ens rationis, a manner of conceiving things, and that without motion, or the thought of man, there would be no such thing as time. A gross absurdity: for tho' all created spirits should perish, tho' all bodies should cease to move, there would still be a successive fixed and regular duration in the world, which would correspond to the moments of the possible duration known to God, and according to which he would preserve every thing more or less, for so many years. An extension which is at rest, requires no less to be created every moment of its duration, than an extension which moves. The conservation of creatures is always a continual creation, whether they move, or rest in the same situation. The true measure of the absolute quantity of things, either with respect to extension or time, is only to be found in the ideas of God. Man knows nothing of it; he is only acquainted with relative magnitude or littleness. The same space of time appears to him short or long, according as he passes it with pleasure or pain. The very hour which seems short to one, appears long to another.

(52) This word ought to be understood according to our way of apprehending things, and what is called in the schools, priority of nature, figura rationis.

Indivisible duration

relative time

ZAHURIS, is the common name bestowed on a certain sort of men in Spain, who, as it is pretended (a), are so sharp sighted, as to see veins of water, metals, treasures, and dead bodies under ground. Their eyes are very red. Martin Del Rio tells us that when he was at Madrid in the year 1575, he saw a little boy of this sort. It is remarkable that though this author is very ready to impute extraordinary effects to the devils, yet he doth not believe that the Zahuris discover subterraneous waters and metals by any magical contract, but believes that the vapours discover the water to them, and that they know the mines by the herbs which grow in those places. But as for treasures and dead bodies, he saith the Devil sheweth them to them; since they can mark out what treasures and corps they see, and are able to do it only on Tuesdays and Fridays. He doth not argue very consistently on what is related of these people (A); and all those who cite him do it not much to their honour (B): either they do not understand Latin, or they rely on falsified quotations. Gutierrez, a Spanish Physician, laughs at what is said of the Zahuris (C).

(a) Del Rio Disquisit. Magic. Tom. i, lib. i, cap. iii, 2^a q^a. 10.

[A] Del Rio doth not argue very consistently, on what is related of these people. For if it be once granted that the Zahuris see dead bodies and treasures, there is no reason to pretend that they do not see veins of water, and gold and silver mines. Why then doth del Rio grant the one, and deny the other? For he denies it, when he says that they know by the vapours and herbs, what lies hidden in a certain place of the earth. A knowledge which is acquired after this manner, is not what we call seeing. To argue consistently on this head, he ought to deny the facts, or explain them all by the same Hypothesis; for if the Devil is the cause of the two last, he may very well be so of the two former.

(1) See the Mercure Galant, for the month of February, 1693, pag. 235.

[B] All those who cite him, do it not much to their honour. One of those who wrote concerning the wand of Peter Aymar, alleges Martin del Rio, as an author who on the subject of the Zahuris, goes no further than natural causes (1). But this is visibly false, since of the four performances of these people, he atcribes two to the Devil. Here follows what that author makes him say: Del Rio relates that there are certain men in Spain, called Zahuris, by reason of their sharp sight. He saith that he saw one of them at Madrid, in the year 1575, and that those Zahuris were reputed to see through the thick surface of the earth, springs of water, treasures, and metallic mines; and tho' these effects seemed very surprizing, he informs us that he explained them naturally, and that several Philosophers also referred them to natural causes. I. He doth not say panie genus hominum quod vident (2). II. This author does not mention the seeing of buried bodies. III. Del Rio doth not say that he naturally explained those three effects; he saith, Mart. del Rio, that with respect to the two first, he perſists in the natural explanation which he had given elsewhere (3); but he attributes the other to the Devil.

[C] Gutierrez . . . laughs at what is said of the Zahuris. He calls them Zabories, and so much the more blames the popular credulity in this respect, because

(2) Norant Hist. panie genus hominum quod vident. Zahuris, nos Lynceus possumus nuncupare. Diff. Magic. lib. i, cap. iii, 2^a q^a. iv, pag. 35.

(3) Commentar. Medem Seneca, var. 231.

VOL. V.

7 M

cause they suppose these people to be born on Good-Friday, and that they enjoy this miraculous privilege by virtue of their birth-day. 'Eo magis isti damnan-
' di, quia ex supersticiosa hominum opinione admit' tantur putantes tali prerogativa hos impostores do-
' nari, quia nati fuerint die illa sacra, humano generi
' semper fausta ac felici, in qua celebratur apud Catho-
' licos memoria Passionis Domini Jesu-Christi, feria
' inquam sexta Judæorum perfidia crucifixi, & que-
' madmodum tunc terra commota atque monumentis
' apertis latitantia, ac sepulta corpora apparuerunt ho-
' minibus illa die, sic altera in qua recolitur felix illa
' memoria si natalis alicui hominum fuerit, illam vir-
' tutem videndi potentia tribuit, aut donat quæ ad
' interanea terrarum pertingere possit: Vide quam fu' tile ac irreligiosum commentum (4). - - - The Za-

(4) Joan. Lazarus Gutierrez Sepulchralis, in Academia Pincinae Medicinæ publicus Professor, Opusculo de Falcino, Dubio vi,
num. 16, pag.
143.

ZANCHIUS, or ZANCHUS (BASIL) one of the learned men of the XVIIth century, was of Bergamo. He took the habit of a regular Canon, and applied with an extreme ardour, not only to the study of Philosophy and Theology, but also to that of the Belles Lettres. The works we have of his are proofs of his erudition [A]. He acquired such an extensive knowledge, that he was thought worthy to be keeper of the Vatican library. He discharged that post with the greatest reputation, and to the satisfaction of the learned. He died very piously at Rome in the year 1560 (a). This I take from Ghilini's Teatro. I am sorry that I cannot find in it the circumstances of a particular which I have read elsewhere, I mean that Zanchius being persecuted and oppressed in a cruel manner, ended his days in misery [B]. He was cousin to Zanchius (b) who is the subject of the next article, and had two brothers who were regular Canons as well as himself (c).

(a) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, Part. 1,
pag. 26, 27.

(b) Hieron.
Zanchius, Epistol. lib. ii, pag.
445.

(c) Id. ibid.

[A] The works we have of his are proofs of his erudition. Ghilini represents him as a man who had thoroughly studied the Latin tongue, and had thereby acquired as much glory, as the most excellent Professors of that language. S'affaticò molto nell' acquisto della lingua Latina, dalla quale ne conseguì la maggior gloria, che dar si possi al più squisito professore di così necessaria favella (1). He improved, adds he, the Dictionary of Marius Galezinus. I believe he should have said that of Marius Nizolius. 'Assaiissimo li devono tutti i stu-diosi, e devono anco in gran parte riconoscere dal suo infaticabile intelletto la perfezione del fruttuoso Di-zionario de Mario Galefino, il quale fu aumentato,
' e ridotto al termine, che hoggidi si vede; che hà
' per titolo Verborum latinorum ex variis auctoribus,
' lib. i. Vanno anco attorno con molta commendat-zione del suo nome queste altre opere. Dictionary Poeticum, & Epitheta veterum Poetarum: de hortis sophie libri duo carmine conscripti: Adnotationes in divinos libros: Quaestiones in libros Regum, & Paralip-omenon: Poematum libri octo (2). - - - All men of ' letters are greatly indebted to him, and ought to own
' that the useful Dictionary of Marius Galezinus, which ' he enlarged and brought into the form in which it now ' appears, was perfected in a great measure by his inde' fatigable labour. It is intitled Verborum latinorum ex variis auctoribus, lib. i. There are likewise in ' the hands of the learned, these other works of his,
' which are greatly to his reputation. Dictionary Poeticum, &c. Add to this these words of Giraldus (3).
' Est & Petrus Zanchus Bergamas, qui mutato vitæ
' instituto à Sodalibus Bazilius vocatus est: vivit
' adhuc, à prima ejus adolescentia mihi cognitus Ro-
' mæ in studiis bonarum literarum versatus, nec minus
' in sacris bene eruditus: plurima ad hanc diem tum
' soluta oratione, tum pedestri & carmine perscripsit,
' inter quæ Romæ publicata in manus peritorum va-
' gantur duo libri versu heroico elaborati ad Petr. Bem-
' bum Card. qui inscribuntur Hortus Sophie, & præ-
' terea alia simul impressa: extat & laboriosum opus,
' Sylva vocabulorum ex optimis auctoribus linguae La-tinæ, item Nizolii ex Cicerone Paralipomena. - - -

(1) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. i,
pag. 26.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Lilius Gregor.
Gyrall. de Poetis
fleur. temporum, Dial. ii, pag.
169, Tom. ii,
Opr. Edit. 1696.

(1) Teffier,
Addit. aux Elo-ges, Tom. ii,
pag. 160.

ZANCHIUS (JEROM) one of the most celebrated Protestant Divines, was born at Alzano in Italy [A] on the second of February 1516. He entered into the congregation

[A] He was born at Alzano in Italy. The difference which Mr Teffier (1) has discovered betwixt Melchior Adam and Thuanus, is really no difference.
The former, saith he, writes that Zanchius was a native of Alzano, but Thuanus and Verheiden say he was born at Bergamo. I own these two last authors give him the epithet of Bergomas; but since it is not

' buris are so much the more to be condemned and exploded,
' as they are admitted only by the opinion of superstitious
' men, who imagine that these impostors are gifted with ' such a virtue, because they were born on that sacred ' day, ever blessed and happy to mankind, on which the ' Catholics commemorate the passion of our Lord Jesus ' Christ; the sixth day of the week, I say, on which he ' was crucified by the perfidy of the Jews: for, as the ' earth was then shaken, and the graves of the dead
' opened, many bidden and buried bodies, did on that day
' appear to men, so they think that the day on which
' this is commemorated, if it chanceth to be the birth-day
' of any person, imparts to him that virtue of seeing ' things which are in the bowels of the earth. What ' a silly and chimerical fancy is this!

Peter Zanchius of Bergamo, having changed his way of life, was by his companions called Basil: he is still living, I was acquainted with him at Rome, when he was very young; he has diligently studied the Belles Lettres, and is also very learned in Divinity: he writes even till this day, a great many good things, both in prose and verse. There are in the hands of the curious,
' two books of his written in heroic verse, inscribed to
' Cardinal Peter Bembo, and intitled Hortus Sapientie, ' together with other pieces printed at Rome. He ' has also published a laborious work, intitled, Sylva vocabulorum, a collection of words taken from the ' best Latin authors, and likewise Nizolius's Paralipomena, from Cicero.

[B] Zanchius . . . oppressed in a cruel manner, ended his days in misery. Paul Manutius deplors his sad fate in a letter to Gambara an intimate friend of the deceased. 'Basilii Zanchii, saith he (4), poetæ sum-
' mi, hominisque non vulgariter eruditi, miserabilis &
' indignissimus interitus hilaritatem mihi prorsus om-
' nem eripuit. quem, enim donare fumis præmiis ob
' excellentem virtutem; decorare honoribus ob singu-
' larem integritatem, atque innocentiam æquum fuit;
' eum tam ignominiose vexatum, tam acerbè, tam
' crudeliter extinctum, quis non ferat iniquissimè? e' quidem, ut audivi, etiam dolore tuo vehementer do-
' lui. nam & vixisti unà semper conjunctissimè, aliter
' alteri egregie carus. - - - The miserable and unde' served death of Basil Zanchius, has been a great af' fliction to me. He was a great Poet, and a man of un' common learning. Who would not be deeply concerned, ' that a man who merited the greatest rewards for his ' extraordinary virtue, and the greatest honours for his ' singular integrity and innocence, should be persecuted and ' oppressed with so much cruelty and ignominy, and end
' his days in misery? Indeed, when I heard of it, I ' greatly mourned on account of the grief it would give ' you: for you and Zanchius have lived together in the ' firmest union, and with the greatest mutual friendship.
' What follows in this Epistle of Manutius, is to be found above (5), look there for the elegies which he bestows on our Basil's verses.

(4) Paulus Ma-nutius, *Epist.
xxviii*, lib. iv,
pag. n. 116.

(5) In the remark [B], of the article
GAMBARA.

congregation of the regular Canons of Lateran, at the age of fifteen, and continued there about nineteen years. He at first applied to the study of Philosophy and of school Divinity; but after having heard Peter Martyr's Lectures at Lucca, on the Epistle of St Paul to the Romans, and the Psalms, he engaged himself in the more profitable study of the Scripture and Fathers. Every body knows that Peter Martyr, who was a Canon of the same congregation, communicated the Protestant doctrines to several of his brethren before he threw off the monkish habit. The impressions which he made on them were so strong, that in the space of one year, eighteen of the fraternity imitated him in abjuring Popery. Our Zanchius was one of them. He left Italy in the year 1550, and stayed some time amongst the Grisons, and afterwards at Geneva, whence he designed to go to London, being invited thither by Peter Martyr, who intended to procure him a place of Divinity Professor in England. But being intreated by the directors of the university of Strasburgh, to fill the vacant place of the deceased Gaspar Hedion, Divinity Professor there, he accepted that employment in the year 1553, and exercised it almost eleven years, reading now and then some lectures on Aristotle. The university required him to sign the Augsburg confession, but did not obtain it without some limitations which the directors agreed to. He was admitted one of the Canons of St Thomas in the year 1555. He was a lover of peace [B], and hated Theological civil wars; which nevertheless he could not avoid. He was accused of some errors, he defended himself, and this affair was carried on so warmly, that it was reduced to the terms either of his voluntarily retiring, or of the directors dismissing him. He did not find his account in this alternative; wherefore he stirred very much to maintain his post. A thousand expedients were fought after, and at last they fell upon that of obliging him to sign a formulary. He signed it with some restrictions [C]: but that did not hinder his adversaries from triumphing, nor from spreading the news of their victory every where. He designed to retrieve himself, and new proposals of accommodation were begun, when a favourable opportunity afforded him a handsome pretext to extricate himself out of this labyrinth. The church of Chiavenna, in the country of the Grisons invited him to be their minister, and he accepted that vocation. He surrendered his canonry, them no otherwise, than in expressing the native place of this great Divine more particularly: He calls it Alzanum (2), and saith that it is situated in the valley of Seri (3). Now it is certain, that Alzanum, and this valley belong to the Bergamasco (4). Mr Teiffier is again mistaken when he says that Alzano is a little town four leagues distant from Venice. If instead of four leagues he had put forty, he needed not have feared saying too much. Melchior Adam deceived him: he had read somewhere that our Jerom's father having received the news of his father's death, quitted his studies of the Civil-Law, and married. The care which he was obliged to take of his sisters, made him sensible that he would do much better to apply to his domestic affairs, than to follow the bar; nay, he left the city, and removed to Alzano, which was four miles distant (5); This he did like a good economist (6), that is, as I think, to live at less expence. This is what Melchior Adam found in some book (7). Upon this he falls to conjecturing, but is not happy in it; he says (8) in a marginal note, that in his opinion the city which Zanchius's father left was Venice. If he had been a good Geographer, he would never have entertained that thought, but would have known that the distance betwixt Alzano and Venice, is above forty leagues. His conjecture is turned into a downright affirmation by Mr Teiffier, who besides, translates quartum lapidem, by four leagues, though in the Latin style, they contain only four thousand paces. I take Bergamo, to be the city, from whence Zanchius's father departed, for reasons of economy. Quenstedt hath committed two gross faults: he says page 276 (9), that Jerom Zanchius was born at Alzano, in the valley of Seri, four miles from Venice; but in page 302, he makes him a native of the city of Bergamo.

- [B] Zanchius was a lover of peace. He was according to Melchior Adam (10), 'litium fugitans, concordia amans. . . . Modestie singularis, pacis Ecclesiarum studiosissimus' (11). - - - He shunned contention, loved concord, was a man of extraordinary modesty; and studied to promote peace in the churches. Others say (12), that very few surpassed him in learning, piety, and modesty. See the remarks in which I examine the narrative of Thuanus and Moreri.
- [C] Obliged him to sign a formulary. He signed it with some restrictions. We must know that there soon happened some broils betwixt him and John Marbachius, Minister, and Divinity-Professor at Stras-burgh. They differed on the doctrine of Predestination, and its dependencies; but the fire lay hid under the ashes till the year 1561, when Zanchius induced the magistrates to suppress a book of Tilemannus Heslusius, which had been reprinted at Strasburgh, but had the name of Magdeburg in the title as the place where it was printed. This book treated of the Real Presence in, cum, sub pane, - - - in, with, and under the bread, and had a preface which was injurious to Frederic III, Elector Palatine, to Melancthon, and several other excellent Divines. The author of this preface, accused of Heresy and Atheism, all those who did not approve his opinion concerning the Real Presence and Oral Manducation. Zanchius caused this book to be suppressed, not on account of its doctrine, which he left to the judgment of the Church, but for the calumnies of the preface. This displeased Marbachius, and the other zealous asserters of Lutheranism, and put them upon trying all ways to remove Zanchius. For this purpose they canvassed all his lectures, and the manuscripts he had dictated, and when they had extracted from them whatever they could, they accused him of Heterodoxy, with regard to Predestination and Perseverance, &c. The affair was vigorously debated; Zanchius consulted the Divines of several places of Germany, and offered a verbal conference with his adversaries. This proposal was rejected, and in the mean time they declaimed against him before the people, with great animosity (13). At last, the affair came to an arbitration; and the following persons were prevailed on to come to Strasburgh; from Tubingen, James Andreas; from Deux Ponts, Cuman Flinsbach; and from Basil, Simon Sulcerus, and Ulric Coccius; the arbitrators declared that there was no Heresy in Zanchius's opinions; but drew up articles which he signed in this manner, on the twenty-eighth of March 1563. Hanc doctrinam formulam ut piam agnosco, ita etiam recipio (14); that is, in as much as I acknowledge this formulary of doctrine to be pious, so I receive it; or, I acknowledge that this formulary of doctrine is pious, and so I receive it. The Latin words will bear both these senses, and I would not answer for Zanchius that he was not sensible of this ambiguity, and that he did not intend to take advantage of it some time or other. Be that as it will, his adversaries were yet more artful; they so dexterously slipped some ambiguities into the articles of the formulary, that they could explain every thing to their advantage: accordingly they did not fail to interpret every

(2) Melch. Adam. in Vite. Theol. Exter. pag. 148.

(3) In valle Seriana, Id. ibid.

(4) See Leander Albertus, Description. Ital. pag. 638.

(5) Ad quartum inde distans lapidem. Melchior Adam. ibid.

(6) Quod rebus suis consultus fore judicaret. Id. ibid.

(7) He might have found it in the second book of Zanchius's Letters, p. 444.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Of his book de Patriis illustrium Virorum.

(10) In Vita Theol. Exter. pag. 149.

(11) Idem, pag. 152.

(12) Sanderfon, de Obligat. conscient. Præf. ii, apud Pope Blount, Conf. Author. pag. 541.

(13) Clamoris ad populum concionibus traducebatur. Henricus Alting. Tool. Hiflor. pag. 293, 299.

(14) Taken from Henry Altingius, ibid. pag. 299.

(a) Fructuose quidem sed non abluce cruce.
Melch. Adam.
in Vit. Theol.
Exter. p. 151.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam,
ibid. pag. 148,
& seq.

canonry, desired leave to depart, and retired from Straßburg in November 1563. From that time to the year 1568, he was very serviceable to the church of Chiavenna; and met with some crosses there also (a). He was offered a Divinity Professor's chair at Heidelberg, which he accepted; and began the exercise of that function in February 1568. He was promoted to the degree of Doctor the same year, in the presence of Frederic III, Elector Palatine: at the solicitation of that Prince, he wrote a large book against the Antitrinitarians; and after the death of that Elector, refused the invitations of the university of Leyden, and of the church of Antwerp, chusing rather to stay at the college of Neustad, where John Casimir, Count Palatine, had got together the professors, whom the new Elector, a great favourer of Lutheranism, had obliged to leave Heidelberg. Upon the death of this Elector, the administration of the Palatinate fell into the hands of the same John Casimir, who re-instated the professors in their former posts; but Zanchius, by reason of his great age, was declared emeritus. He died at Heidelberg on the nineteenth of November 1590. He lost his sight some time before his death (b). It doth not appear by Melchior Adam's life of him, that he was ever married; but according to Thuanus, he left a numerous issue [D]. He composed several books, which doubtless are as good as those of more modern Divines, and yet no body reads them: they are sold almost for nothing in the auctions of libraries; and the Grocers more eagerly take advantage of the low price of them, than the students in Divinity, or the ministers. The fate of the works of other Divines, who made such a figure in the XVIth century, is very like this. We may justly censure Thuanus in some particulars [E],

and

(15) Quoniam in articulis involuta doctrina, adversariis omnia prose interpretanti-bus denuo enu-pit controversia:
que priusquam compereretur
Zanchius discipuli
Clavennam ad
Ecclesie ministerium evocatus.
Id. ibid. pag.
299.

(16) Persuasus tamen concordicausa, cum sine præjudicio doctrinae suae id factum in intelligenret, his verbis, ut sibi exeret subscriptis: Hanc doctrinae formulam, ut piam agnosco; ita etiam recipio; & sub-scripsit quidem a-liorum calidita-tem sua simplici-tate mensus.
Melch. Adam,
ubi supra, pag.
150.

(17) See the foregoing quotation.

(18) See the foregoing quotation.

(19) Hospin.
Historie Sacrament. Part. ii,
pag. 536.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Id. ibid.
pag. 543.

(22) Id. ibid.

every thing to his prejudice; thus revived the quarrel, but he left them and went to the Grisons (15). Thus Henry Altingius relates the affair. We may add to his narrative some particulars which he omits, and Melchior Adam furnishes us with. The accusations charged against Zanchius turned not only on the doctrines of Predestination, and of the perseverance of the saints; but also on the Eucharist, Ubiquity, Images, Antichrist, and the end of the world. The chapter of St Thomas, of which he was a Canon, tried several ways of accommodation; afterwards the dispute was laid before the Council of Thirteen. He went himself to consult the churches and universities of Germany, and published the decisions which he obtained from them. He deliberated some time about signing the formulary drawn up by the four arbiters, and excused himself out of fear of scandalizing the pious souls, and confirming erring men in their opinions. At last, being resolved to subscribe it for the sake of peace, and because he thought it would be of no prejudice to his opinion, he armed himself with a precaution in his manner of signing it, and measured the artifices of his enemies by his own candor (16). This we have from Melchior Adam; but for my part, I confess, I cannot discover this candor; for Zanchius's subscription is so ambiguous, and so liable to shifts and subterfuges, that it doth not appear he drew it up in that manner, without a further prospect. Is it not owned that he chose this phrase, rather than another, out of precaution (17)? If there was any artifice in this, it was of no service to its author, nor did it contribute to establish peace. 'Sed ne sic quidem bene coit gratia: cum statim post adventum de victoria jactitare, triumphare, & laureas in Saxoniam, atque alias regiones literas mittere (18). - - - But neither did this establish unity and peace: for immediately after his adversaries vainly boasted of their victory, and sent many triumphant letters concerning it into Saxony, and other parts.'

Thus far I had written without ever thinking of consulting Hospinian's Sacramental History. I have now consulted it, and have found in it a long relation of this dispute. I see there (19) that one of Zanchius's good friends broke with him, and took advantage of a letter which he had communicated to him. I see that (20) Marbachius and his adherents forbore speaking to him, and so much as saluting him after the disgrace of Heshulius's book. But what serves most to prove the certainty of my conjectures, is, that I there see that Zanchius, in his mind, put a very particular sense upon the expressions of his subscription. His mental reservation was this: 'Hanc doctrinæ formulam recipio quatenus illam piam esse judico (21). - - - I receive this formulary of doctrine, so far as I believe it to be pious.' His adversaries sent copies of what he had signed to all parts, without ever mentioning the terms of his subscription (22); they feared their triumph would not appear considerable enough to those who were capable of examining the equivocal words of Zanchius.

If we may rely on a letter which he wrote to David Chaillet, on the first of November 1563 (23), (24) it is in the they made use of many frauds. This letter deserves second book of to be read; he there makes his apology, and la. Zanchius's Let- ters, pag. 11, bours to prove that he did nothing against his con- & seq.

[D] According to Thuanus, he left a numerous issue [D] His words are: 'Scriptis multa . . . quorum partem, dum vixit, in lucem dedit, partem filii, quos PLU- RES reliquit, post mortem ejus publicavit (24). (24) Thuan. 'He wrote several things . . . some of which he pub- lished during his life, and others his sons, of whom there were MANY, published after his death.' This is somewhat hyperbolic; for the Epistle Dedicatory to Zanchius's letters signed by his heirs, mentions the names of only two sons, and that of his son-in-law. Here follows what I find concerning his marriages. His first wife was a daughter of Caecilius secundus Curis, by whom he had a daughter who did not live long. He afterwards married the sister of a gentleman, named Laurence Lumagius: the two twins of whom she was delivered in the year of her nuptials died soon after. The daughter who was born in the following year died at three years old. This is what Jerom Zanchius wrote to Lælius Zanchius, on the second of April 1565 (25). He there tells him that he had then two daughters.

[E] We may justly censure Thuanus in some particu- lars.] I. Peter Martyr left Italy in the year 1542, and Zanchius in 1550, wherefore the following words of Thuanus are not exact: 'Hieronymus Zanchius . . . paulo post Petri Martyris . . . discessum ob eandem causam Argentinam concessit (26). - - - Je- rom Zanchius, a little after the departure of Peter Martyr, removed to Straßburg, on the same account.' II. They are faulty in another particular; for Zanchius did not go to Straßburg till after having resided about nine months in the country of the Grisons, and as long at Geneva (27). III. Vermilio in Angliam evocato Anno 54. in munere successit. This Latin may signify that Peter Martyr went into England in the year 1554. But this is false, he went thither in 1547. However, not to take the expression in the strictest sense, let us grant Thuanus that the year he mentions concerns only the installation of Zanchius; yet we may justly censure him, since it is certain that Zanchius was installed in 1553, not in Martyr's, but Hedion's place. 'Successit ei (Caspari Hedion) in professione Hieronymus Zanchius Italus (28). - - - Caspar Hedion was succeeded in his professorship by Hierom Zanchius, an Italian.' 'Cum anno quinquagesimo tertio, in demortui Casparis Hedionis locum Theologus, qui in schola sacras literas doceret, esset sufficiens: ab amplissimo illius Reipubl. magistratu & scholarchis decretum est, Italum quendam, Marti- tyri non abisimilem, vocandum. Itum ergo primum est

(23) That letter is in the second book of Zanchius's Letters, pag. 11, & seq.

(24) Thuanus, Hist. lib. xix, pag. 379, et seq.

(25) Melch. Adam, ubi supra, pag. 149.

(26) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. Geneva, pag. 244.

(d) Donatus
Calvus is the author of it: It is intituled Scena Letteraria de Scrittori Bergamaschi.

(33) Amarior
eo Romanæ Ecclesiæ & Pontifi-cii nominis oppugnator Jacobus Andreanus.
Id. ibid.

Conclitiorum, saltem, scripturae thesaurus, quod cula interdu[m] volunt apertissimam herefese[m] suarum damnationem legunt, numquid non dissimulant, numquid non tergiversantur, numquid non argutantur?
 Audi domesticum testem Hieronymum Zanchium omnium Sacramentarium futilissimum: Legi librum (Pseudo-Evangelici nescio cuius) sed non fuit somnatio perlegi; cum nimirum viderem qualissem fit scribendi ratio, quā in Ecclesijs ex Evangelio reformatis (eo nomine Lutheri, Calvini, similiumque sectas appellat) permuli, ne dicam plerique omnes, utuntur: qui tamen Pastores, qui Doctores, qui Columnae Ecclesiae videri 7 N. volunt.

(37) Melch.
Adam, ubi supra, pag. 152.

[F] and Moreri alfo.] I. When he faith that Zanchius was an Apostate Monk of London, it is not his fault, but that of his Dictionary. The Printers have put de Londres (of London), instead of de l'Ordre (of the order), and I observe this to shew to what errors they expose the readers: for how many readers have believed from hence, that Zanchius stole out of a monastery at London, when he turned Proteothers there was one JEROM ZANCHIUS, who publish some Law-books. He was second cousin to our Divine (e). It will not be an unacceptable thing to the reader, if I say here that our Jerom had a servant named Frederic Sylburgius, who became a very learned man. He kept him four years (f), and then recommended him to Lælius Zanchius, that he might procure him a place at Padua (g). His letter of recommendation is dated on the second of April 1565.

VOL. V

(e) Zanch. Epistol. lib. ii, pag. 444.

(f) Id. ibid.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 448.

volunt. Statum causæ ne intelligant, de industria sepe numero tenebris involuimus: quæ sunt manifesta, impudenter negamus: quæ falsa, sine fronte asseruimus: quæ aperte impia, tamquam prima fidei principia obtrudimus: quæ orthodoxa, hæreses damnamus: Patres tuos ad nostra somnia pro libidine torquemus: Patres jactamus, cum nihil minus quam illorum doctrinam sequebamur: Sophisticari, calumniari, conviciari, qui velimus: nobis est familiare; modo causam nostram, sive bonam sive malam, quo jure, quaque injuria tuamur: reliqua omnia susque deque facimus. Hæc ille τὸ ἐξ αὐτῶν ἰδὼν αὐτῶν περὶ τῆς, ut de Epimenide Cretensi dixit Apostolus Paulus cap. 1. Epistolæ ad Titum, ἡ μαρτυρία αὐτῆς ἐστὶν ἀληθὴς (38). --- What shall I say of the other Ministers of the Lutheran and Calvinistical sects, who wobble they sometimes turn over the smaller works of the Councils, Fathers, and ancient writers, read the clearest condemnation of their own Heresies. What dissimulation, tergiversation, and shifting are they not guilty of. Hear the words of one of their own witnesses, Jerom Zanchius, the most subtle of all the sacramentarians. I have read the book (written by I know not what Heretic): but I could not peruse it without some indignation, when I observed what manner of writing prevails in the Churches reformed according to the word of God, (thus he calls the sects of Calvin, Luther, and the like) and is used by a great many, not to say almost all the Protestants; used by men who would be thought pastors, and doctors, and pillars of the church. To confound and perplex the state of the question we frequently involve our selves in darkness. The most manifest truths we impudently deny. Things which are false we affirm with effrontery. The most obvious impieties we intrude upon the people as the fundamentals of faith. Orthodox doctrines we condemn as heretical. The Scriptures we wrest at pleasure, in order to accommodate them to our own dreams. We boast of the Fathers, whilst there is nothing we mind less than their doctrines. Sophistry, calumny, and abuse, are familiar to us. If we do but maintain our cause, be it good or bad, no matter by what means: all other things are set at naught to serve that purpose. These are the words of one of themselves, even a Prophet of their own, As the Apostle Paul (chapter first of his Epistle to Titus) said of Epimenides the Cretan. This witness is true.

(38) Philippus Labbe, Dissert. de Script. Ecclesiast. Tom. i, p. 807, 808. Note, that he quotes none of Zanchius's treatises, which shows that he did not go to the fountain head, but relied upon the quotation of another man.

(a) An Episcopal city, in one of the isles of the gulf of Venice, in Latin Clodia, whence comes the Latin surname Clodienus, given to Zarlino.

ZARLINO (JOSEPH) a native of Chioggia (a) President and Director of the chapel of the Seignury of Venice, was one of the most excellent Musicians of the XVth century. He composed some airs which were sung and applauded at Venice, at the time that rejoicings were made in that city, for the victory of Lepanto, in the year 1571. He published several books which maintained and spread his reputation (b) [A]. He died at Venice on the fourteenth of February. 1599, at the age of fifty-nine years (c).

(b) Taken from Maffius Riccio, Hist. del Mondo, ad an. 1571, pag. 44.
(c) Thom. 83, 123, in fine.

(1) Pag. 55, of the second part.

[A] He published several books which . . . spread his reputation.] The catalogue of Thuanus's library (1) mentions two books of Zarlino, in folio; one intitled, Demonstrationi Harmoniche, printed at Venice in the year 1571, and afterwards, with additions, in 1573; the other printed in the same city, in the year 1588, and intitled, Supplementi Musicali. The Oxford catalogue mentions toute le Opere of Zarlino, in four volumes, printed at Venice in the year 1589, in folio, and besides that, a Latin treatise, De vera anni forma seu de rellia ejus emendatione, printed at Venice in the year 1580, in 4to. John Albert Bannius has highly commended the writings of this Musician. Josephus Zarlinus Clodienus, says he (2), Theoria instructissimus . . . doctissimis institutionibus, demonstrationibus, ac supplementis, lingua Italica editis (apud Venetos, anno 1580.) Musicam præ cæteris feliciter tradidit, & ab solvit. Prolixior nonnihil est, sed eruditione compensat fastidium: ex quo verior Musicæ eruditio haurienda. Ejus Compendium in Tabulas redegit Joannes Maria Artusius Bononiensis, Italico etiam idiomate: quibus breviter, clare & perspicue rem studiosius proponit. Scripserunt & alii; qui an Zarlinum æquent, nescio: saltem non superant. . . . Unus ergo instar omnium erit, sine quo nec veterum sententia expedire poterunt, nec perfecta hujus disciplinæ notitia facile obtinebitur. Ad perfectionem tamen Musicæ modernæ non accedit (3). . . . Unum Zarlinum præ cæteris commendavi; non quod aliorum scripta nullius momenti sint; cum multa præclara eruditaque dogmata contineant: sed unum Zarlinum coryphæum dixi. Cum enim Musica ab Authoribus descripta, in plerisque defectum patitur, magno studio, industria, ac lectione varia supplementum; unum aliquem commendare nequeo, ex quo hauriant studiosi (pauci etiam totam Musicam Theoricam ac Practicam simul intellexerunt & excusserunt) præter Zarlinum. Is, inquam, præ cæteris doctus, felicissimæ, & propemodum solus, rem

(2) Joh. Alb. Bannius, Dissertation. de Musica, pag. m. 675. Collection. de Sudis instituentis, Edit. Amstærd. 1645.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 676.

executus, meo judicio, videtur. Ordinariæ Praxi deservire præcipue potest Zarlini Compendium à Joannæ Maria Artusio Bononiensi, optima methodo doctissime confectum (4). . . . Joseph Zarlino of Chioggia was a great master of the theory of Music. . . . In his learned institutions, demonstrations, and supplements, published in Italian at Venice, 1580, he has explained and improved that science, with much greater success than any other author. He is somewhat prolix. But his learning makes amends for that prolixity. His writings contain the true knowledge of Music. Joannes Maria Artusius Bononiensis reduced his compendium into tables, which he wrote likewise in Italian. In these tables he sets forth the science of Music, in a short, clear, and perspicuous manner. There are others who have written on Music; whether they equal Zarlino or not, I do not know, at least they do not surpass him. . . . So that Zarlino alone will serve instead of all the rest: without him the opinions of the Antients cannot be understood, nor a perfect knowledge of this science be easily attained. But he does not come up to the perfection of the modern Music. I have commended Zarlino above all the rest, not because the writings of other men on this subject are of no value; for they contain many excellent and learned instructions, but I have called Zarlino the best writer on this subject. For most authors having given but an imperfect account of Music, and as this defect must be supplied by great study, industry, and various reading, I cannot recommend any one of them to those who study this art, except Zarlino. Besides few of them have at the same time thoroughly examined and understood both the theoretical and practical Music. Zarlino, in my opinion, has written on this subject with more learning and success than all the rest: and he is almost the only author who has succeeded in it. His Compendium, as it is drawn up by Joannes Maria Artusius Bononiensis in an excellent method, and with great learning, may be chiefly serviceable in the common practice of Music.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 685, 686.

ZENOBIAS

ZENOBIA, one of the most illustrious women that ever swayed a scepter, pretended to be descended from the Ptolomies and Cleopatras (a). She was married to Odenatus, a Saracen Prince (b), and contributed very much to the great victories which he obtained over the Persians [A], and which preserved the east to the Romans, when after the taking of Valerian it was very probable that Sapor would have wrested all that country from them. Accordingly she was honoured with the title of Augusta (c), when Gallienus in grateful acknowledgment of the services of Odenatus made him Emperor in the year of Christ 264. After the death of her husband she held the supreme power, and reigned in a very courageous and glorious manner. Her sons, by reason of their youth, enjoyed only the imperial name and honours (d). She did not only preserve the countries subject to Odenatus; but also conquered Egypt, and was preparing for farther conquests when the Emperor Aurelian made war against her (e). She lost two battles (f), and was forced to shut her self up in the city of Palmyra, where Aurelian besieged her. She defended her self very bravely; but seeing that in all probability the Emperor would take the city, she secretly went out of it. Aurelian being informed of this caused her to be so diligently pursued, that she was overtaken just as she was in the ferry going to pass the Euphrates (g). This happened in the year 272. The Emperor saved her life, and after making her an ornament of his triumph [B], presented her with a country seat near Rome, where she quietly passed the remainder of her days [C]. It is reported that upon her evidence Aurelian put many persons to death (h). She was beautiful, chaste, learned, valiant, and temperate, though on some occasions out of policy she would drink great quantities of wine [D]. If to these excellent qualities she could have added that of a good mother-in-law, she might have been

(a) Trebellius Pollio, in triginta Tyrannis, pag. m. 328.

(b) Procopius, pag. 97. Trebellius Pollio, ibid. pag. 298, calls him Princeps Palmyrenorum.

(c) See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, Tom. iii, pag. 976.

(d) Trebellius Pollio, ibid. pag. 325.

(e) Zosimus, lib. i.

(f) See Vopiscus, in Aureliano. Moreri quotes in Annal. that leads into a mistake; Vopiscus wrote no Annals.

(g) Palmyra, built by Solomon, was a day's journey distant from this river.

(h) Tillemont, ubi supra, pag. 1066. He quotes Suidas, in A'v'v' pag. 494.

[A] She contributed very much to the great victories which he obtained over the Persians.] This is testified by Aurelian in a letter which he wrote to the Senate. 'Audio P. C. mihi obici quod non virile munus impleverim, Zenobiam triumphando. Næ illi qui me reprehendunt satis laudarent, si scirent qualis illa est mulier, quam prudens in consiliis, quam constans in dispositionibus, quam erga milites gravis, quam larga quam necessitas posuisset, quam trilis quum severitas poscat. Possunt dicere illius esse quod Odenatus Persas vicit, ac fugato Sapore Ctesiphontem usque pervenit. Possunt asserere, tanto apud Orientales & Ægyptiorum populos timori mulierem fuisse, ut se non Arabes, non Saraceni, non Armeni commoverent (1). - - - Conscript Fathers, I bear it is objected to me, that I did not act a manly part in triumphing over Zenobia. Truly they who censure me would greatly commend me, did they know what kind of a woman Zenobia is, how prudent in her designs, how constant in her resolutions, with what dignity she behaved towards her army, how bountiful she is upon the necessary occasions, and how austere when severity requires it. I can ascribe it to her, that Odenatus overcame the Persians, and having put Sapor to flight, reached as far as Ctesiphon. I can affirm that she was so formidable to the Eastern people, and the Egyptians, that both the Arabians, the Saracens, and Armenians lay quiet.'

[B] Aurelian . . . made her an ornament of his triumph.] The letter which he wrote to the Emperor Aurelian, in answer to that which he had written to her, to summon her to surrender, shews that she designed to follow the example of Cleopatra, who chose rather to put an end to her life than to live without reigning (2); but she changed her resolution, and submitting to necessity, adorned Aurelian's triumph. There she appeared so overloaded with jewels, that tho' very strong, she was scarce able to support the weight of them. It is true, we must make a great allowance for the golden fetters which were fastened to her feet, and the golden chains which bound her hands. 'Ducta est igitur per triumphum ea specie ut nihil pompabilibus populo Rom. videretur. Jam primum ornata gemmis ingentibus, ita ut ornamentorum onere laboraret. Fertur enim mulier fortissima sepiissime restitisse quum diceret se gemmarum onera ferre non posse. Vincit enim præterea pedes auro, manus etiam catenis aureis: nec collo aureum vinculum deerat, quod scurra Persicus præferebat (3). - - - Zenobia was led in triumph with so much splendor that never any thing appeared more pompous to the people of Rome. She was adorned with exceeding large jewels, and laboured under the weight of her ornaments. For though she was a very strong woman, yet it is reported that she stopped very often, and declared that she could not bear the weight of the jewels. Besides there were golden fetters fastened to her feet, and her hands were bound with chains of the same metal. There was like-

'wife a golden collar for her neck, which a Persian buffoon carried before her.'

Father Pagi affirms that Zenobia was led in triumph in the year 274, two years after she fell into Aurelian's hands; and refutes some very learned Chronologists, who have misplaced the years of these two events. See his Dissertatio Hypatica towards the end.

[C] A country-seat, where she quietly passed the remainder of her days.] Let us continue to cite Trebellius Pollio. 'Huic ab Aureliano vivere concessum est. Ferturque vixisse cum liberis, matronæ jam more Romanæ, data sibi possessione in Tiburti, quæ hodieque Zenobia dicitur, non longe ab Adriani palatio, atque ab eo loco cui nomen est Conche. - - - Aurelian saved Zenobia's life. And it is reported that she lived with her children, like a Roman matron, having received a seat in the Tiburtine-country: That seat still bears the name of Zenobia, and is not far distant from Adrian's palace, and the palace called Conche.'

[D] She was beautiful, chaste, learned, valiant, and temperate, tho' on some occasions, out of policy, she would drink.] Pollio having spoken of the exercises of hunting, which ensured Odenatus to the greatest fatigues, adds, that Zenobia had acquired the same hardiness, and, according to the report of several people, was more vigorous than her husband. 'Non aliter etiam conjuge affueta, quæ multorum sententia fortior marito fuisse perhibetur: mulierum omnium nobilissima Orientalium feminarum, & (ut Cornelius Capitolinus asserit) speciosissima (4). - - - (4) Id. ibid. pag. 299. She was no less inured to fatigues than her husband; and, in the opinion of many people, was much stronger than he: she was the noblest of her sex, and, (as Cornelius Capitolinus affirms) the most beautiful of all the women of the East.' This last word would afford me a good proof, if it were certain that the author, who is cited, made use of it. But the manuscripts vary; some have it expeditissima, instead of speciosissima: wherefore we ought not to depend upon it: let us look for other evidences. The following description represents her of a deep brown complexion, but withal very charming, and as having the finest teeth in the world. 'Fuit vultu subaqualo, fusci coloris, oculis supra modum vigentibus, nigris, spiritus divini, venustatis incredibilis: tantus candor in dentibus, ut margaritas eam plerique putarent habere, non dentes (5). - - - She was of a dark brown complexion, had eyes exceeding sprightly, black, and divinely bright; 333. she was incredibly beautiful: her teeth were so white, that many people thought she had pearls set instead of teeth.' Her chastity was so extraordinary, that she made use of the liberty, which marriage allowed her, no farther than was necessary for the procreation of children. (6) Cujus ea castitas fuisse dicitur, ut virum suum quidem sciret, nisi tentatis conceptionibus. Nam quum semel concubuisse, expectatis mensibus continebat se, si prægnans esset; sin minus, iterum potestatem querendæ

(1) Trebellius Pollio, in triginta Tyrannis, p. 229, Vol. II. Hist. Augustæ Scriptores. Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1671.

(2) Deditionem meam petis, quasi nescias Cleopatram reginam perire maluisse, quam in qualibet vivere dignitate. Vopiscus, in Aureliano, p. 481.

(3) Trebellius Pollio, ubi supra, pag. 336.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 333.

(6) Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. Tom. iii, pag. m. 1041.

been placed among the most accomplished persons; but she was so far from having such a quality, that she was suspected of having consented to the assassination of her husband in the year 267, from a resentment of the tenderness which he shewed to his son Herod [E], whom he had by another wife.

She engaged in disputes concerning religion, and protected Paulus Samosatensis [F], who had been condemned by the council of Antioch: and her protection prevented quarrendis liberis dabat (7). This is what some rigid Casuists would impose upon all married people. And those who write for polygamy apply this morality to their pernicious design; for they pretend that a man should abstain from his wife during her pregnancy, and that if he cannot, he ought to have another who is not with child. A learned commentator on Tully's Offices observes, that if the age he lived in produced such women as Zenobia, there would be less danger in marriage for studious men, or those of a weak constitution; a sort of men, adds he, who have reason to fear either dishonour, continual janglings, or an immature death, with the squandering of their estates. His maxims are somewhat severe, read what follows.

(7) Treb. Pollio, ubi supra, pag. 330.

Cum . . . sacræ literæ omnes vagas libidines detestentur: in ipso etiam matrimonio hic finis ab ipsa natura destinatus, diligenter confideretur, & quantum vel naturæ imbecillitas, vel conjugii servitus (sinit) fervetur ne homo infra bestias sese abiciat: quarum pleræque non nisi certo anni tempore ad procreationem incitantur: & femellæ pleræque, conceptu foetu, marem non admittunt. Eadem etiam Zenobiæ Palmyrenorum reginæ continentia celebratur, quæ cum se gravidam sensit, Odenatum maritum in thalamum suum non admisit. Digna (ut quidam exclamat) quæ sine omni dolore pareret: cum in matrimonio non voluptatem, sed procreationem solum spectaret. Cujusmodi matronas si nostra ætas ferret, etiam studiosi homines, & non firmissima præditi valetudine, minore periculo uxores ducerent: quibus nunc aut infamia, aut rixæ perpetuæ aut immaturus obitus cum detrimentis rei familiaris sunt metuenda. Ridentur hæc scilicet à lascivis hominibus, & in lustris ac ganeis magis versatis, quam in Theologia & Philosophia: quibus nos hæc non præscribimus. Indulgeant illi genio: sed probus adolefcentis hominem se esse, non pecudem meminerit. Quod si verum est, quod ἀνδρῶν Ptolemæi scribit interpres, Ægyptios singulis mensibus semel tantum consuetudine uxorem usos; quod infantis concepti momentum deprehenderent: quid Christianis facere par est propter Deum, summam & continentiam & abstinentiam flagitantem (8). — — — As the holy Scriptures discover the greatest detestation for all manner of lust, so in matrimony the end of procreation, which nature itself hath appointed, ought to be carefully attended to, and as far as the frailty of the flesh, and the demands of a matrimonial life will permit, we ought to confine our selves to the answering of that end alone, lest man should become worse than the beasts: for most animals are not incited to procreation, but at a certain season of the year, and most of the females do not admit the male animal, after they have conceived. Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, is celebrated for the like continence, for from the time that she knew she had conceived, she refused to admit her husband into her bed.

(8) Hieron. Wolhus, Commentar. in Ciceron. de Offic. lib. 1, pag. m. 72, 73.

Behold, a woman, (as some person says in admiration of her) who deserved to bear children without any pain, since, in matrimony, she had no regard to her pleasures, but only to the procreation of children. If the age we live in produced women of this kind, how many men of learning, and of weak constitutions, might venture upon marriage without any danger, who are now in fears, either of dishonour, or of perpetual wrangling, or an untimely death, with the dissipation of their fortunes? Wanton men will laugh at all this, men who are more intimate in brothels, than conversant with Divinity and Philosophy. But I do not write for such persons. Let them indulge their passions; but let the virtuous youth remember that he is a man, and not a brute. If what an anonymous interpreter of Ptolemy wrote, be true, viz. that the Egyptians cohabited with their wives only once every month, for the sake of knowing the moment when their children were conceived, what doth it become the Christians to do for the sake of God, who exacts the greatest continence, and the greatest abstinence? It would be to no purpose to urge against Zenobia, that she had but very few maids in her service (9); for the rest of her domesticks were eunuchs, advanced in years: such servants were much fitter to attend a warlike Queen, than a number of chamber-maids. As for her learning it is sufficient to say that Longinus instructed her; that she spoke the Egyptian tongue in perfection, and understood the History of Egypt, and the eastern History so well, that she made an abridgement of it. She read the Roman History in Greek, and understood Latin, but durst not speak it. Ipsa Latini sermonis non usque quaque ignara, sed ut loqueretur pudore cobibita: loquebatur & Ægyptiacæ ad perfectum modum. Historiæ Alexandrinæ atque Orientalis ita perita ut tam epitomasse dicatur: Latinam autem Græcè legerat (10). I was willing to excuse her with respect to drinking; by urging that she drank glass for glass with her Generals and strangers, only to attack them, or bring them over to her side; but I own my supposition is very arbitrary, and the expression of the Historian (11) signifies that she overcame the Persians and Arminians in drinking. It is true he says she was otherwise sober.

[E] She was suspected of having consented to the assassination of her husband, from a resentment of the tenderness which he shewed to his son Herod. The Historian having represented the excessive complaisance of Odenatus to Herod, his son, by another marriage, adds, that Zenobia being animated with all the spirit of a step-mother against this young man, increased his father's love to him. This seems to hint that Odenatus had no great affection for Zenobia; for if he had loved her very tenderly, he would have favoured Herod less, than the children he had by her; and not have looked upon Zenobia's hatred as a great motive to redouble his tenderness for Herod. Erat circa illum (Herodem) Zenobia novitrali animo: qua re commendabiliorem patri eum fecerat (12). This author a little farther, speaking of Mæonius the murderer of Odenatus, says: 'Hic confobrinus Odenati fuit: nec ulla re alia ductus nisi damnabili invidia, imperatorem optimum interemit, quom ei nihil aliud obiceretur præter filii Herodis delicias. Dicitur autem primum cum Zenobia consensisse, quæ ferre non poterat ut privignus ejus Herodes priore loco quam filii, ejus Herennianus & Timolauus, principes dicerentur' (13). — — — This man, who was Odenatus's sister's son, prompted by nothing but an abominable envy, murdered that excellent Emperor, though he was charged with no other fault but the tenderness he bore to his son Herod. Mæonius was said to have beforehand agreed with Zenobia, who could not bear that her step-son Herod should take place of her two sons Herennianus and Timolauus. Judge from hence what persons of no virtue are capable of doing, since Zenobia, endowed with so many excellent qualities, sacrificed her husband to an ambitious tenderness for her children, and to the chagrin of a mother-in-law which continually preyed upon her.

[F] She protected Paulus Samosatensis. I can scarce believe that the reason why she favoured him was that which you are going to see in the words I extract from page 1040, of the third volume of Mr de Tillemont's History of the Emperors. * S. Athanasius faith that she was a Jew, [by religion without doubt] * which Abulpharagius after him tells us: † but * at least she followed many of the Jewish opinions; † and she is said to have been the cause why Paulus Samosatensis, Bishop of Antioch, † of whom the † was protectress, † fell into the Heresy of Artemon, † whole opinions concerning JESUS CHRIST, very nearly resembled those of the synagogue. To per- suade the world that she was of the Jewish religion, another sort of evidence ought to be produced. It is easy to conceive, that a Pagan Princess should take pleasure in stopping the course of a synodical decree, if it be ever so little intimated to her that the condemned person is worthy of her protection, and that the fomenting divisions amongst Christians tends

(9) In minibus Eunuchis gravibus ætate laborantibus, poëlis amicis raris. Treb. Pollio, ubi supra, pag. 335.

(10) Id. ibid. (11) Mith. super cum decibus, quom esset aliam solaria. Mith. e- tiam cum Persis ut con vinceret. Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid. (13) Id. ibid.

(13) Mith.

* Ath. 666. pag. 57. d.

* Abulph. pag. 81.

† Theod. her. l. 2. pag. 121. c.

† Ath. pag. 87. d.

† Theod. pag. 121. c.

prevented his being driven from his church. He was not driven from it till after this prince had been overcome by Aurelian. See Father Pagi's Dissertatio Hypatica towards the end.

to the advantage of Paganism. Some learned men believe that Paul Samosatensis was not condemned by the council of Antioch till after the fall of Zenobia; but Father Pagi hath solidly refuted them (14).

(14) Pagi, Dissert. Hypat. pag. 357, & seq.

ZENO of Elea, one of the most eminent Philosophers of antiquity, flourished in the LXXXIXth Olympiad (a). He was the disciple of Parmenides, and even according to some authors, his adopted son (b). He was a very handsome man. And some writers pretend that he was loved by his tutor to an unlawful degree [A]. Moreri informs us that he was the inventor of Logic [B]. He should have acquainted us also that he attempted to restore the liberty of his country, when labouring under the oppression of a tyrant, and that when the enterprise was discovered he suffered the most cruel torments with an extraordinary resolution. This affair is related with a thousand

(a) Diogen. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 29, pag. 566, Edit. Wetstein. 1692.

(b) Id. ibid. num. 25.

[A] He was a very handsome man. Some writers pretend that he was loved by his tutor to an unlawful degree. I mention elsewhere (1) that Apuleius was reproached with being handsome, and with dressing too well for a Philosopher. To which, among other things, he answered, that beauty had not always been separated from persons of his profession, and proved his assertion by the instances of Pythagoras, and Zeno of Elea.

(1) In the article of APULEIUS, remark [H].

(2) Apuleius, Apol. pag. m. 275, 276.

(3) See Menage in Diogenem Laërt. lib. ix, num. 28, where he shews that Zeno is the same town of Italy with Elea.

(2) Præterea, licere etiam Philosophis esse vultu liberali. Pythagoram, qui primum sese Philosophum nuncupavit, eum sui sæculi excellentissimæ formæ fuisse: item Zenonem illum antiquum Velia (3) oriundum, qui primus omnium dictionem solertissimo artificio ambifariam dissolverit, eum quoque Zenonem longè decorosissimum fuisse, ut Plato autumat. --- Besides, Philosophers may be allowed to be handsome as well as other men. Pythagoras, the first who took the name of a Philosopher, was the handsomest man of his age: and that ancient Zeno of Elea, the first who explained, with great art and subtilty, those expressions which bear a double meaning, that Zeno was also an exceeding handsome man, as Plato testifies.

Plato's citation is right, but there are certain particulars in this passage of his which every body doth not approve, and I take him to be justly censured for it. His words run thus: 'Εφη δὲ δὴ ὁ Ἀντίφων, λέγων τὸν Πυθαγόρην ὅτι ἀρίστον ποιεῖ εἰς Παναθηναίᾳ τὰ μεγάλα ζήνων τε καὶ Παρμενίδης: τὸν μὲν ἔν Παρμενίδην, εὖ μάλα ἡδὴ πρὸς αὐτὴν εἶναι, σφόδρα πολλὸν, καλὸν δὲ καὶ ἀγαθὸν τὴν ὄψιν, περὶ ἣν μάλιστα φάντε καὶ ἐξήκοντα. Ζήνων δὲ, ἔργος ἐτὼν τετρακκοῖα τότε εἶναι, εὐμήκη δὲ, καὶ χαρίεντα ἰδεῖν καὶ λυγροῦσαι αὐτὸν παιδικὰ τὰ Παρμενίδου γεγονότα. Dicebat ergo Antiphon, Pythodorum narrasse, Zenonem atque Parmenidem venisse quondam ad magnorum Panathenzorum celebritatem: & Parmenidem jam senem, atque canum, aspectu decorum fuisse, annos ferme quinque & sexaginta ætatis agentem; Zenonem verò annos penè quadraginta natum; procerò insuper & grato corporis habitu: dicebatur autem in deliciis Parmenidi fuisse (4). --- Antiphon said, that Pythagoras related that Parmenides and Zeno once came to the grand festival of Minerva; that the former was already pretty far advanced in years, was grey-haired, and of a beautiful, comely, aspect, being then about sixty-five years old; but that the latter, being then about the fortieth year of his age, was tall and handsome; and it is said, that Zeno served Parmenides in his pleasures.

(4) Plato, in Parmenide, pag. m. 1110, A.

Athenæus blames Plato for having unnecessarily blemished the manners of these two Philosophers. Those who desire to see his own words may be satisfied by the following citation. Παρμενίδην μὲν γὰρ καὶ ἐλθεῖν εἰς λόγους τῶ Πλάτωνος Σωκράτην, μάλιστα ἡλικία συγχωρεῖ ἔχ' ὡς καὶ τοῖς αἰσθητοῖς ἢ ἀκροῦσαι λόγους τὸ δὲ πάντων σχετιώτατον, καὶ τὸ εἰπεῖν ἐφευκτάς κατεπευγύσης χρείας, ὅτι παιδικὰ γεγονότα τῶ Παρμενίδου ζήνων ὁ πολὺς αὐτῶ. Parmenidem certè cum Socrate Platonis confabulatum fuisse ætas vix permittat, nedum hos vel illos sermones edidisse, aut audivisse. Quod autem indignissimum est, nullà compulsus necessitate scribere is non erubuit Parmenidi Zenonem civem suum in amoribus & deliciis fuisse (5). --- That the Socrates of Plato should have conversed with Parmenides, or that such conversation should have passed between them is what their respective

(5) Athenæus, lib. xi, pag. 305, F.

V O L . V .

ages will hardly permit. But for Plato to affirm, without the least necessity, that Zeno served Parmenides in his pleasures, was highly unbecoming.

[B] He was the inventor of Logic. Aristotle allows him that honour, as Sextus Empiricus (6), and Diogenes Laërtius (7) observe. But Zeno's Logic seems designed to perplex every thing, and not to clear a subject: he used it only to dispute against all comers, and silence his adversaries, whether they were right or wrong. Plutarch gives us this idea of him. Διηκούσε δὲ Περικλῆς καὶ Ζήνων τὴν ἑλεάτην, περὶ μαθημάτων περὶ φύσιν ὡς Παρμενίδης ἐλεγκτικὴν δὲ τινα, καὶ δι' ἐναντιολογίας εἰς ἀπορίαν κατακλίνουσιν ἐξασκήσαντο ἔξιν ὥσπερ καὶ Τίμων ὁ Φλιάσιος εἰρηκε διὰ τούτων.

(6) Sextus Empiricus adversus Mathematic. pag. 139.

(7) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 25.

Ἀμφοτερογλώσσον τε μέγα σθένος ἐκ ἀπάτηλον ζήνωνος, πάντων ἐπιλήπτορος.

Auduit Pericles Zenonem quoque Eleatem, de natura, Parmenidis more, philosophantem: qui impugnans quemlibet, usum paraverat quendam refutandi, qui deduceret ad perplexitatem. Quod Philastus Timon affirmat quoque, bis verbis.

Omnia pefringens, Zeno disceptat, utraque Et parte invictus, sed non fallax (8).

(8) Plutarch. in Pericle, pag. 154. The translation of these words may be seen below in the remark [E], citation (44).

These verses of Timon appear less mutilated in Diogenes Laërtius; I copy them from the Amsterdam edition.

Ἀμφοτερογλώσσον τε μέγα σθένος ἐκ ἀπατῶν ζήνωνος πάντων ἐπιλήπτορος, ἡδὲ Μελίσσου, πολλῶν φαντασμάτων ἐπάνω, παύρων γὰρ μὲν εἶσιν (9).

(9) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra.

Expressive Plato vires utriusque periti Lingua Zenonis, jurgatorisque Melissi, Phantasias, qui alius paucas, multasque subegit (10).

These verses represent a man who criticized every thing, overthrew several opinions, and kept very few for himself. If he was not the Palamedes mentioned by Plato, he perfectly resembled him. This Palamedes argued so subtilly, that he rendered the pro and con probable to his auditors: he shewed them that the very same things were like and unlike, that they were but one thing and different things, and that they rested and moved at the same time. Τὸν ἔν ἑλεάτην Παλαμῆδην λέγοντα ἐκ ὅσων τέχνη, ὥς δοκεῖν φαίνεσθαι τοῖς ἀκούσι τὰ αὐτὰ ὅμοια καὶ ἀνόμοια, καὶ ἐν καὶ πολλὰ, μινοντά τε αὐ καὶ φερόμενα. Enimvero Eleatem Palamedem artificio suo efficere solitum accepimus, ut eadem audientibus similia & dissimilia, unum & multa, manentia & fluentia viderentur (11). Diogenes Laërtius (12) saith that Zeno was called the Palamedes of Elea, in Plato's Sophist: but Mr Menage charges him with two errors. He shews that this Palamedes is not mentioned in that work of Plato, but in the dialogue intituled Phædrus; after which he proves, by the evidence of Quintilian, that this Palamedes was Alcidas the Rhetorician. Que non de Zenone Eleate, verum de Alcidasante intelligenda sunt, si fides Quintiliano. Ita enim ille

(10) This translation was thus made from a copy, in which the Greek had, ζήνωνος τε Πλάτωνος ἐπιλήπτορος, instead of ζήνωνος πάντων ἐπιλήπτορος.

(11) Plato, in Phædro, pag. 123.

(12) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 15.

thousand variations [C], as I shall shew in the remarks. I have only two faults to charge

(13) Menagius, in Diog. Laert. lib. ix, num. 25, pag. 403, col. 2.
libro III. institut. Oratoriarum capite I. ubi de Scripturibus Artis Rhetoricæ: Et Hippias Eleus, & quem Palamedem Plato appellat, Alcidas Eleates (13). - - - These things are not to be understood of Zeno Eleates, but of Alcidas, if we rely on Quintilian. For these are the words of Quintilian in his Institutions, speaking of the writers on the art of Rhetoric: And Hippias Eleus, and Alcidas Eleates, whom Plato calls Palamedes.

(14) Diog. Laert. ubi supra, num. 26.
[C] This affair is related with a thousand variations.] The Elean tyrant, whom he designed to destroy, was Nearchus, according to some, and Diomedon, according to other writers (14). Plutarch calls him Demylus, as we shall see hereafter: Tertullian names him Dionysius, and doubtless by a mistake in Chronology (15) takes him for the Syracusan tyrant, who so frequently occurs to us in authors, under the name of Dionysius: 'Zeno Eleates, saith he, towards the end of his apology, consulted à Dionysio, quidnam Philosophia præstaret, cum respondisset, contemptum mortis, impassibilis flagellis Tyranni objectus, sententiam suam ad mortem usque signabat. - - - Zeno of Elea being asked by Dionysius what Philosophy was good for, answered, to make a man despise death: whereupon the cruel tyrant having ordered him to be scourged, Zeno confirmed the truth of his answer even to death.' Here is one testimony of the admirable constancy of this Philosopher. I believe Tertullian placed the scene of all this (16) not at Elea, as he ought to have done, but at Syracuse. Others lay the scene in the isle of Cyprus, and are besides mistaken, both in the person tortured, and in the tyrant. 'Ducebatur intrepidus (Eusebius) temporum iniquitati insultans, imitatus Zenonem illum veterem Stoicum qui ut mentiretur quædam laceratus diutius, avulsam sedibus linguam suam cum cruento sputamine in oculos interrogantis Cyprii Regis impiegit (17). - - - Eusebius was still undaunted as he went to the place of execution, and continued to lash the iniquities of the times, imitating the ancient Stoic Philosopher Zeno, who being interrogated by the King of Cyprus, and kept longer in torture that he might be forced to invent lies, plucked out his tongue, and threw it with the bloody spittle in the tyrant's face.' Valefius's note on this passage of Marcellinus, will discover the errors of this Historian, and if you consult Mr Menage (18), you will find a very happy conjecture concerning the occasion of these mistakes. Zeno's action itself is differently reported. Some say, that being required to declare his accomplices, he affirmed that all the tyrant's friends had a hand in the conspiracy. This he did, in order to represent him as a person abandoned by all the world. After this general declaration he named some particular persons, and told the tyrant that he wanted to speak with him in his ear. The tyrant approaching, Zeno fixed his teeth so deep in his ear, and kept his hold so fast, that nothing but stabbing him with pricks could force him to let go. Εἶτα περὶ τινῶν εἰπὼν ἔχων τινὰ εἰπεῖν αὐτῷ πρὸς τὸ ὅς' καὶ δακῶν, ἐκ ἀνέκοντος αὐτὸν ἀπεκέντησεν, ταῦτ' ἐν Ἀλεξογειτονίᾳ τῷ τυραννοκτόνῳ παθόν. Deinde cum de quibusdam dixisset, quiddam sibi ad aurem loqui velle, eam mordicus apprehensam non ante dimisit quam stimulus foderetur, idem agens quod Aristogiton tyrannicida (19). Others say that he did bite off the tyrant's nose (20). And some affirm, that having declared his accomplices (21), and called the usurper the plague of his country (22), he addressed himself to the flanders-by, telling them that he was astonished at their cowardice, if the fear of being treated like him could oblige them to continue in slavery: after which, biting off his own tongue, he threw it into the tyrant's face (23); and that this so animated the citizens that they immediately stoned the usurper of their liberty. This is what Diogenes Laertius tells us. Plutarch observes, that Zeno, in biting off his tongue, and throwing it in a tyrant's face, practised his master's maxim, that great men dread dishonour, but that none but children, women, and cowards dread pain. Ζήνων τοίνυν ὁ Παρμενίδης γινώσκων, ἐπιδήμιον Διμήλων τῷ τυραννῶν, καὶ δυσυχίας περὶ τὴν παρῆσιν, ἐν πυρὶ τὸν Παρμενίδην λυγόν, ὥσπερ χρυσὸν ἀλλοτρίον καὶ δόκιμον παρῶν, καὶ ἀποδιδόναι ἔργοις, ὅτι τὸ αἰσχρὸν ἀνδρὶ μισγὰρ φοβερόν ἐστιν. ἀλγίστῳ δὲ, παίδεσ, καὶ γυναῖκα,

(15) Antiquior Zeno Eleates Dionysio Tyranno centum quinquaginta annis circiter. Menag. ibid. pag. 404.

(16) I mean that he thought the whole matter happened at Syracuse.

(17) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xiv, cap. ix, pag. 46.

(18) Menag. ubi supra, num. 26.

(19) Diog. Laert. ubi supra, num. 26, pag. 565; ex Heracleide in Satyri Epitome.

(20) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(21) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(22) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(23) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(24) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(25) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(26) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(27) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(28) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(29) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(30) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(31) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(32) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(33) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

καὶ γυναῖκα ἰσχυρὰς ἔχοντες ἀνδρες, δαδίας. τὴν γὰρ γλῶτταν αὐτὸς διατρώγων, τῷ τυραννῶν περὶ πύσσιν. Zeno Parmenidis discipulus, Demio tyranno infidatus, re infelicitate gesta, doctrinam Parmenidis, velut aurum in igne, illasam ac probam facto ostendit. Scilicet turpitudinem magno viro metuendam esse: dolorem a pueris & mulierculis, ac viris animum muliebrem gerentibus timeri. Linguam enim suam dentibus amputatam, in tyrannum expuit (24). Hermippus says (25) that Zeno was pounded in a mortar.

Valerius Maximus could not fail to mention the constancy of this Philosopher; but he is guilty of some faults: for instead of ascribing to Zeno of Elea what relates to the tyrant Nearchus, he ascribes it to another person; and besides supposes, that Zeno designing to deliver the Agrigentines from the tyranny of Phalaris, did, and suffered, what others relate with respect to the tyrant of Elea. 'Qui (Zeno Eleati) cum esset in dispicienda rerum natura maximæ prudentiæ, inque excitandis ad vigorem juvenum animis promptissimus, præceptorum fidem exemplo virtutis suæ publicavit. Patriam enim egressus, in qua frui securâ libertate poterat, Agrigentum miserabilis servitute obrutum petit, tanta fiducia ingenii ac morum suorum fretus, ut speraverit, & Tyranno & Phalaridi vesanæ mentis feritatem à se diripi posse. Postquam deinde apud illum plus consuetudinem dominationis, quam consilii salubritatem valere animadvertit: nobilissimos ejus civitatis adolescentes cupiditate liberandæ patriæ inflammavit. Cujus rei cum indicium ad tyrannum mansisset, convocato in forum populo, torquere eum vario cruciatu genere cœpit: subinde querens, quosnam consilii participes haberet: At ille nec eorum quempiam nominavit, sed proximum quemque, ac fidelissimum tyranno suspectum reddidit: increpitanque Agrigentinis ignaviā ac timiditatem, effecit ut subito mentis impulsu concitati, Phalaris lapidibus proflerentur. Senis ergo unius eculum impositi, non simplex vox, nec miserabilis ejulatus; sed fortis cohortatio totius urbis animum, fortunamque mutavit (26). - - - Zeno of Elea, as he had a great knowledge of the nature of things, and a very ready talent in animating and giving vigour to the minds of youth, so he openly confirmed the truth of his precepts by the example of his own virtue. For having left his native country, where he might have securely lived in liberty, he went to Agrigentum, which was then groaning under miserable servitude: relying with so much confidence on his own genius and virtuous life, that he hoped to subdue the stubbornness, and tame the outrageous cruelty of the tyrant Phalaris. When he afterwards found that the habit of tyrannizing was so prevailing with Phalaris, that the wholesome advice he bestowed on him had no influence, he inspired the noblest of the youth of Agrigentum with the desire of shaking off his yoke, and sitting their country at liberty. The tyrant having notice of this, summoned the people to the Forum, and began to put Zeno to torture in various manners, inquiring in the intervals who were his accomplices. Zeno named none of them, but rendered one of those suspected who were standing by Phalaris, and were the most faithful to him; and by often upbraiding the Agrigentines for their cowardice and fear, he animated them to that degree, that, being roused, as it were, by a sudden impulse of mind, they stoned the tyrant. Thus, it was not the supplications of an old man upon the rack, nor his lamentable wailings, but his vigorous exhortations, which changed the temper and fortune of a whole city.

After which he relates what follows. 'Ejusdem nominis philosophus, cum à Nearcho tyranno, de cuius nece consilium inierat, torqueretur, supplicii patriter atque indicandorum conficiorum gratia; doloris victor, sed ultionis cupidus, esse dixit quod eum secreto audire admodum expediret: laxatque eculum, postquam infidis opportunum tempus animadvertit, aurem ejus morfu corripuit, nec ante dimisit quam & ipse vita, & ille corporis parte privaretur (27). - - - A Philosopher of the same name, who had entered into a confederacy against the life of the tyrant Nearchus, was by his command put to the torture, both for his punishment, and in order to discover the rest of his confederates. Being victorious over the pain he endured, but desirous of revenge, he said that he had an affair to communicate to Nearchus, which it was of great

(24) Plot. ad verius Colotem, circa fin. pag. 1126. Vide etiam de Garrula, pag. 505.

(25) Apud Valerium Maximum, lib. ix, num. 25.

(26) Valer. Max. lib. ix, cap. 10, num. 25.

(27) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(28) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(29) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(30) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(31) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(32) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(33) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(34) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(35) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(36) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(37) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(38) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(39) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

(40) Id. ibid. ex Antisth. in Successionibus.

charge on Mr Moreri [D]. For the rest, the opinions of Zeno Eleates, were very near the same with those of Xenophanes and Parmenides concerning the Unity, Incomprehensibility, and immutability of all things. I cannot believe he asserted that there is nothing in the universe [E]; for how could he pretend that he, who maintained that principle, did not exist? How could he, who aimed at nothing but by his arguments

pro

(28) Oliverius
says so.(29) Diog. Laërt.
ubi supra, num.
29. Iohannes, de Scriptor. Histor.
Philos. pag. 116, rectum 15 Zeno's.(30) Ex uno Zenone Eleate
duos pariter facit. Henricus Valerius, Notis
in Ann. Marcellini, lib. xiv,
cap. ix, pag. 46.(31) Ut modo duorum Fabiorum res gestas uni eum adig-nasse contra Pighium probavimus, ita contraria plane culpa unius Philo-sophi facta, in duos ejusdem nominis dividit, lib. iii,
cap. iii. Nam
quam retulisset,
quam retulisset
Eleates Zeno
praestitisset, &c.
Jacobus Perizonius, Animadv.
Histor. pag. 85.(32) Mr Perizonius cites Cicero,
de Nat. Deor.
lib. iii, et Dio-genes Laërtius.(33) Car. Boyle, apud Acta Eru-ditor. Lipsien.
1696, pag. 102,
103. In the Abstract of Phalaris's Letters, printed at Oxford in 1695.

(34) Citat. (4).

(35) Chron. Euscii.(36) Iohannes, de Script. Hist.
Phil. pag. 116, places him in the LXXXVIIIth
Olympiad.(37) In the edition of Diogenes Laërtius, of 1692, he is placed in the LXIXth Olympiad.(38) I write this in the year 1696.(39) Nay, he supposes that he was very old at the time of the plot.

'great importance that he alone should bear; and the torture being abated for that purpose, when he found a proper opportunity for executing his design, he fixed his teeth so deep in the tyrant's ear, that he did not let him go, till he had left his life, and the tyrant a part of his body.'

Oliverius, who commented on Valerius Maximus, finds but one fault in this: he doth not blame Valerius Maximus for any thing but saying that Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, was put to death for endeavouring to destroy a tyrant. This censure is unjust; and it will be in vain to say that the same Zeno voluntarily killed himself at the age of ninety years (28), that will not convict Valerius Maximus of any error, since he doth not say that one of his two Zeno's was the head of the Stoics. Doth not Diogenes Laërtius say that there were eight Zeno's (29). It is not therefore necessary that he, who is distinguished from Zeno of Elea, should be the founder of the Stoics. Henry Valerius blames Valerius Maximus for making two Zeno's of one Zeno of Elea (30). One of our best Critics made the same observation, and besides pointed out what might have misled this ancient author (31). He observes that John Vorstius, making the same critical remark exposed himself to censure, by making Nearchus tyrant of the Liparitans. Vorstius grounded this opinion on Zeno's being examined concerning the arms, which, by his means, were brought to the isle of Lipara. He imagined that this Philosopher, after having delivered the Agrigentines from the tyranny of Phalaris, retired to this isle, and endeavoured to free it from the tyranny of Nearchus. But Mr Perizonius clearly proves (32) that it was the city of Elea which Zeno attempted to free from the tyranny of Nearchus. But to go further than this; I shall take the liberty to observe that these learned men let the greatest fault of Valerius Maximus pass uncensured. It lies in making Zeno of Elea enter into a plot against Phalaris: Chronology will by no means allow this. Let us suppose that Eusebius is mistaken in placing the twenty-eight years of Phalaris's tyranny betwixt the second year of the XXXIXth Olympiad, and the second of the XXXVIIIth. And let us prefer his placing this tyrant at the end of the LIIId Olympiad after an usurpation for sixteen years. Let us even suppose with several learned men (33) that Phalaris seized the sovereign authority in Agrigentum about the LIId Olympiad, and that he held it sixteen years according to some, or twenty eight according to others; it will nevertheless appear that he was dead before our Zeno was of age to undertake what Valerius Maximus relates of him. We have seen above (34), that Parmenides was about sixty-five years old when Zeno was but forty. But Parmenides flourished in the LXXXth Olympiad (35): judge then whether Zeno could make any figure in the fifty-ninth. But to deal plainly, I find some perplexity in the time when Parmenides is said to have flourished: for since Pericles, who died in the LXXXVIIth Olympiad, was Zeno's disciple, the flourishing time of Zeno ought to be placed about the seventy-sixth (36), and that of Parmenides, his master, a little higher (37). This is sufficient for my purpose. I should have examined all this more exactly, if I had given the article of Phalaris. I was ready to begin it, when I was informed that a worthy nephew of the most illustrious Mr Boyle had published the life of that tyrant. I inquired for that piece every where, but could not find it, and therefore I laid aside that article; I referred it till such time as I might have the advantage of that author's observations, and I do not yet know any more of his book (38) but what is extracted out of it by the journalists. However, we may believe that Valerius Maximus did not mention two Zeno's, without some sort of reflexion. He must have known that Nearchus lived after Phalaris; so that being mistaken in making the Zeno of Elea (39) cotemporary with Phalaris, he could not persuade himself that the same Zeno who designed to expel Nearchus, was he who contrived a plot against the tyrant of Agrigentum.

Observe, that several Critics will have it, that Seneca meant our Zeno of Elea, when he said, 'Notus est ille tyrannicida, qui imperfecto opere comprehensus, & ab Hippia tortus, ut conficiis indicaret, circumstantes amicos tyranni nominavit, quibus quam maxime caram salutem ejus sciebat. Et cum ille singulos, ut nominati erant, occidi jussisset, interrogavit: Ecquis superesset? Tu, inquit, solus: neminem enim alium, cui carus esses, reliqui. Effecit ira, ut tyrannus tyrannicidae manus commodaret, & praefidia sua gladio suo caderet (40). ----- That tyrannicide is well known, who being apprehended, before he could execute his design, and being put to the torture by Hippia, in order to discover his accomplices, named the tyrant's friends who were standing by, and to whom he knew the life and safety of Hippia was the dearest. When the latter had caused each of them to be slain, in order as they were named, he asked if there were any remaining: you alone, replied the other, for I have left no other person to whom you are dear. Such was the tyrant's anger, that he lent his hands to the tyrannicide, and slew his protectors with his own sword.' But for all Muretus and Justus Lipsius, I am apt to think, that Seneca meant one of those whom Hippia the son of Pisistratus, caused to be tortured. And though Seneca relates what others ascribe to Zeno of Elea, yet I do not believe that he had him in his eye. It is his custom, and that of several other authors, to apply to some persons, what has been said of others.

[D] I have only two faults to charge on Mr Moreri.] The first is his quoting Diogenes in the ninth book de Hist. Graec. & de Scit. Philos. Now it is not true that Diogenes wrote books on the Greek History, or concerning the Greek Historians, nor that his book is intitled de Scitis Philosophorum. It is intitled de Vitis, Dogmatis, & Apophthegmatis clarorum Philosophorum, Libri X. His second fault is saying that Diogenes speaks of seven other Zeno's, whose lives he hath not given us. For one of them is Zeno of Cittium, the head of the Stoics, whose life Diogenes hath written at large.

[E] I cannot believe he asserted that there is nothing in the universe.] I therefore suspect Seneca, who ascribes to him this opinion. Justus Lipsius also distrusts the truth of it. 'Audi, quantum mali faciat nimia subtilitas, & quam infesta veritati sit. Protagoras ait, de omni re in utramque partem disputari posse, ex aequo, & de hac ipsa, an omnis res in utramque partem disputabilis sit. Nauphianes ait, ex his quae videntur esse, nihil magis esse, quam non esse. Parmenides ait, ex his quae videntur, nihil esse in universum. Zeno Eleates omnia negotia de negotio dejecit, ait nihil esse. Circa eadem fere Pyrrhonius versantur, & Megarici, & Eretrici, & Academici, qui novam induxerunt scientiam, nihil scire. Haec omnia in illum supervacuum studiorum liberalium gregem conjice. Illi mihi non profuturam scientiam tradunt, hi spem omnis scientiae eripiunt: fatius est supervacua scire, quam nihil. Illi non praferunt lumen, per quod acies dirigatur ad verum: hi oculos mihi effodiunt. Si Protagorae credo, nihil in rerum natura est, nisi dubium: si Nauphiani, hoc unum certum est, nihil esse certi: si Parmenidi, nihil est praeter unum: si Zenoni, ne unum quidem. Quid ergo nos sumus? quid ista quae nos circumstant, alunt, sustinent? Tota rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax. Non facile dixerim, utrum magis irascar illis, qui nos nihil scire voluerunt: an illis, qui ne hoc quidem nobis reliquerunt, nihil scire (41). ----- Hear how great evil proceeds from too much subtilty, and how obnoxious it is to truth. Epist. lxxxviii, Protagoras says, that a man may dispute upon any subject equal advantage; nay, that he may dispute upon this, whether any subject whatever is disputable on either side. Nauphianes affirms, that the things which appear to be, nothing is more apparent than that they are not. Parmenides, that of these things which are seen, nothing exists.

Maya - Hindoo

(c) See Plutarch's words, towards the end of the remark [E].

pro and con to perplex all those with whom he disputed (c), and confound them so, that they should not know which way to turn themselves, be guilty of such a palpable inconsistency? Did not he see that it was easy to silence him, by asking whether nothingness could reason? He argued strenuously against the existence of motion. Some of his objections on that head are preserved in Aristotle's works [F], but it is probable that

'exists. Zeno of Elea throws down every thing, and maintains that there is nothing. Much the same opinions are held by the Pyrrhonians, the Megaricians, Eretricians, and Academics, who have introduced a new science, viz. that we know nothing. You must throw aside all these tenets into the class of superfluous learning. The former say that knowledge will be of no use to me; the latter take away all my hopes of attaining knowledge: it is better to have an useless knowledge than none at all. The former do not give me any light for the attaining of truth: the latter put out my eyes. If I believe Protagoras, every thing in nature is doubtful; if Nauphebanes, this alone is certain, that nothing is certain; if Parmenides, there is in nature but one Being; if Zeno, there is not even one Being. What are we then? What are those things which surround us, nourish and support us? All nature is a shadow, or nothing, or an illusion. I can hardly tell whether I am more angry with those who pretend that we know nothing, or those who will not even allow that we know nothing.' I have cited those words of Seneca somewhat at large, in order to display all the degrees of Scepticism, amongst which there is none so extravagant as our Zeno's notion. If he really maintained such a paradox as this, either he meant to divert himself, or he did not understand the word nothing in the same sense as others do, or he was raving. But we do not find the least symptom of madness in the rest of his opinions. Wherefore we ought rather to solve it by taking it for a witty conceit, or a particular notion of the word nothing. Let us pass the same judgment on Gorgias Leontinus's book, in which he maintained three assertions (42): first, that there is nothing; secondly, that if there is any Being, man cannot comprehend it; thirdly, that though man could comprehend it, he could not express it. Let us see Justus Lipsius's reflection on that passage of Seneca: 'Sententia est, Zeno Eleates molestia nos liberavit, & omni inquisitione: nam ait, Nihil esse. Sed hæc mira, & exitiæ fatua aut sapiens sententia, nec mihi nunc capienda. An ad contemptum rerum retulit, Nihil hæc (non tamen Nihil) esse? velim, & sic laudem, non solum tolerem. Si aliter, & de ipsa existentia; elletoro hæc egent. Ceterum Zeno Eleates nusquam tale, apud Laertium quidem, ubi Dogmata ejus diversa, sed nec alibi commemorari legisse. Viderit Seneca (43). . . . Zeno of Elea freed us from all trouble and all inquiry; for he said that there is nothing. But either this is a very surprising and foolish saying, or it is a very wise one, and such as I cannot comprehend. Did he use it in contempt of things, and mean that the things of this life were (not nothing, but) naught? I assent, and not only allow but commend it. If otherwise, and he spoke of the existence of things, he was surely mad. For the rest, Zeno of Elea says no such thing in Diogenes Laertius, who has related several of his opinions, nor do I remember to have read this anywhere else. Let Seneca answer for it.' What Plutarch relates of Zeno's character will doubtless be objected against me: Pericles, says he (44), was also a hearer and disciple of Zeno Eleates, who taught Natural Philosophy, like Parmenides. This Zeno opposed every thing, and had got a certain habit of objecting and refuting, by which he perplexed his adversaries, and reduced them to a nonplus: as Timon the Phliæan testifies in these verses.

Zeno with wondrous art could every thing dispute,
And every thing could critic and confute,
Would either side the question take, nor fail
Defending or opposing to prevail.

It will be objected against me, I say, that a Philosopher of this humour, was capable of quibbling to such a degree, as to maintain that every thing is nothing. I answer, that it is not probable that so subtle a disputant would have run into such extremities, out of which it seems impossible for him to have extricated himself.

But however incredible this may appear, let us say that the consequences of Pyrrhonism may have engaged people to assert a great many extravagant things, and let us moderate a little the asseverations we have read (45). Let us also say, that perhaps our Zeno maintained that there was nothing, only in arguing on those principles which he attacked. It may be that from an argument ad hominem, they concluded that he positively and absolutely taught that position, though he advanced it only as a doctrine which resulted from some hypothesis, the falsity of which he had undertaken to prove. We know that he argued thus: if there is one Being, it is indivisible, for unity cannot be divided; now that which is indivisible is nothing, for that cannot be accounted among Beings which is of such a nature, that being added to another, it will not increase it, and being taken from another, doth not diminish it: and therefore there is no Being. This argument is mentioned by Aristotle, who says it is ridiculous (46). Let us omit the Greek, and let down rather Fonseca's paraphrase, from which we learn that Zeno thus attacked a doctrine of Plato: 'Posterior ratio, quam assertit (Aristoteles) pro opinione naturalium contra Platonem, erat Zenonis Eleates, Parmenidis discipuli, qui hunc in modum argumentabatur. Ipsum unum separatum si datur, est omnino indivisibile, ergo nihil est; unde sequitur; non tantum illud, non esse substantiam rerum, sed neque omnino quicquam, quod ad eas pertineat. Consequentiam vero ex eo firmam putabat Zeno, quia nihil esse credebatur, nisi quod aliquam magnitudinem haberet: quam ob causam, sæpe utebatur hoc quasi Principio, Quod nec additum facit majus, nec detractum reddit minus, nihil est. Quocirca dicebat nihil esse, quod omni ex parte esset ens, nisi Corpus, quando quidem solum Corpus additum secundum quancunque dimensionem facit majus. Siquidem linea addita non facit majus, nisi secundum longitudinem; nec Superficies, nisi secundum longitudinem & latitudinem. Unde sequebatur Unitatem abstractam, qualem ponebat Plato, itemque Punctum, nihil omnino esse, quia nequeant rem ullam majorem facere (47). . . . The last argument which Aristotle alleges in favour of the opinion of the Naturalists against Plato, was that of Zeno Eleates, the disciple of Parmenides: he argued thus: if there is one separate Being it is indivisible, therefore it is nothing, from whence it follows that it is not only not the substance of things but also nothing belonging to them. Zeno imagined this consequence was just, because he believed there was nothing but what had some magnitude. Accordingly he often used this as a principle. That which being added to another thing, does not increase it, or being taken from another thing, does not diminish it, is nothing. He therefore said that there was nothing which in every respect was a Being, except body; since body alone, if added to another, makes a greater, according to its dimension: for a line added to a line makes not a greater but in length; nor doth a surface added to a surface make a greater but in length and breadth. Hence it follows that an abstract unity, such as Plato supposed, and likewise that a point, are nothing, because they cannot make any thing greater.'

[F] Some of his objections against the existence of motion, are preserved in Aristotle's works, where you will find four objections made by Zeno examined.

The first is (49). If an arrow, which tends towards a certain place, should move, it would move and rest at the same time. But that is a contradiction; therefore it doth not move. The consequence of the major is proved thus. The arrow is every moment in a space equal to it self. It is then at rest; for a thing is not in a space when it leaves it: wherefore there is no moment in which it moves; and if it moved in some moments, it would be at once in motion and at rest. To understand this objection the better, we must take notice of two principles which cannot be denied: one is, that a body cannot be in two places

(45) See, below, the explanation on the Pyrrhonians, cited [E].

(46) Aristotle, Metaphys. lib. iii, cap. iv.

(47) Fonseca in Archiepiscopi Med. phys. lib. pag. 473, 474.

(48) In the sixth chapter of the sixth book.

(49) I notice it the first, because Aristotle proposes and answers it at the beginning of the chapter; but afterwards he places it in the third rank.

(42) See Sextus Empiricus adv. Mathemat. lib. vii, cap. ii.

(43) Lipsius, Manuduct. ad Stoic. Philof. lib. ii, Diff. iv, sub fin. pag. m. 693, Tom. iv, Oper.

(44) Plut. in Vita Pericly, pag. 154. The words of the original may be seen above, in citation (8).

that he alledged several others, which perhaps were the same with those I shall mention below

THAT time is not divisible in infinitum.

at once; the other, that two parts of time cannot exist together. The first of these two principles is so evident, even without making use of any attention, that I need not explain it: but as the other requires a little more reflexion, in order to be understood, and comprehends the whole force of the objection, I will render it more obvious by an instance. I say then that what suits Monday and Tuesday with respect to succession, suits every portion of time whatsoever. Since then it is impossible for Monday and Tuesday to exist together, and that of necessity Monday must cease to be before Tuesday begins to be, there is no part of time whatsoever, which can co-exist with another; each must exist alone; each must begin to be, when the precedent ceaseth to be; and each must cease to be before the following can begin to exist. From whence it follows, that time is not divisible in infinitum, and that the successive duration of things is composed of moments, properly so called, each of which is simple and indivisible, perfectly distinct from time past and future, and contains no more than the present time. Those who deny this consequence, must be given up to their stupidity, or their want of sincerity, or the insurmountable power of their prejudices. But if you once grant that the present time is indivisible, you will be unavoidably obliged to admit Zeno's objection. You cannot find an instant when the arrow leaves its place; for if you find one, it will be at the same time in that place, and yet not there. Aristotle contents himself with answering, that Zeno very falsely supposes the indivisibility of moments. Τὸτο δὲ ἐστὶ ψεύδος· ἡ γὰρ συγκρίνεται ὁ χρόνος ἐκ τῶν νῦν ὄντων ἀδιαίρετων, ὥσπερ ὁ ἀλλο μέγεθος ἐδὲν. Hoc verò est falsum, cum tempus ex momentis indivisibilibus non constet, ut neque alia ulla magnitudo (50).

(50) Aristotle, Physic. lib. vi, cap. ix.

Zeno's second objection was this. If there be motion, what moves must pass from one place to another; for all motion comprehends two extremities, terminus a quo, and terminus ad quem, the place from whence it departs, and that to which it comes. But these two extremities are separated by spaces which contain an infinity of parts, since matter is divisible in infinitum; it is therefore impossible for the body that is moved to proceed from one extremity to the other. The intermediate space is composed of an infinity of parts, through which it ought to run successively, one after the other, without ever being able to touch that which is behind: so that to run through one foot of matter, I mean, to reach from the beginning of the first inch to the end of the twelfth inch, an infinite time would be necessary; for the spaces, which it is successively obliged to run through, betwixt the two extremities, being infinite in number, it is plain that they cannot be run through in less than an infinity of moments; unless it were pretended that the body which moves is in several places at the same time, which is false and impossible. To this Aristotle makes a wretched answer: he saith that a foot of matter being no otherwise than virtually infinite or infinite in power, may very well be run through in a finite time. I set down his answer with the perspicuity which the Conimbricarian commentaries have given it. Hic rationi satisfactum ab se jam ante Aristoteles ait, videlicet cum hoc libro docuit infinitum sectione, quod non actu, sed potestate infinitum est, tempore finito decurri posse. Enimvero cum tempus continuum sit, parique modo infinitum, eodem infinitatis jure, eisdemque partium divisionibus sibi mutuo respondebunt tempus & magnitudo. Nec contra naturam talis infiniti est hoc modo pertransiri (51): -- Aristotle says that he has already answered this objection, having shown in this book, that a body infinite in division, that is, not actually, but virtually so, may be run over in a finite time. For as time hath a continuity of parts, which are infinite in the same manner as the parts of body are infinite, time and body will answer to one another by the same laws of infinity, and in the same division of their parts. Nor is it against the nature of such infinite that body should be thus run over. You have here two particulars: I. That each part of time is divisible in infinitum; which is invincibly refuted above. II. That a body is only virtually infinite. Which signifies that the infinity of a foot of matter, consists in this, that it may be divided without end into smaller parts, but not in its actually undergoing that division. To urge this, is to impose on the world; for if matter is divisible in infinitum, it actually contains an infinite number of parts, and is not therefore an infinite in power, but an infinite which really and actually exists. The continuity of parts doth not hinder their actual distinction; consequently their actual infinity doth not depend on the division; but it subsists equally in a close quantity, and in that which is called discrete. But if we should grant this infinity in power, which by the actual division of its parts, would become an actual infinite, we should not lose any ground, for motion hath the same virtue as division. It touches one part of the space without touching the other, and touches them all one after another; is not this actually to distinguish them? Is not this to do the very same thing which a Geometrician performs on a table, when he draws lines which mark out all the half inches? He doth not break the table into half inches, but makes a division which expresses the actual distinction of parts: and I do not believe that Aristotle would have denied, that if an infinity of lines was drawn on an inch of matter, it would introduce a division which should reduce that to an actual infinity, which, according to him, was only virtually so. But what would be done, with respect to the eyes, by drawing lines on an inch of matter, is certainly done with respect to the understanding by motion. This may be confirmed by what the Geometricians say concerning the production of lines and surfaces. Mathematici ut nobis inculcent veram lineam intelligentiam, imaginantur punctum de loco in locum moveri: cum enim punctum sit prorsus individuum relinquatur ex isto motu imaginario vestigium quoddam longum expers latitudinis Mathematici ut nobis superficiem ob oculos ponant, monent ut intelligamus lineam aliquam in transversum moveri, vestigium enim relatum &c (52). --- The Mathematicians, in order to give us a clear idea of a line, imagine a point to move from one place to another, for as a point is indivisible, that imaginary motion would leave a certain long trace without any breadth. The Mathematicians in order to represent to us a surface, desire us to imagine any line moving across from one place to another, and the trace which that motion leaves, is a surface. We conceive that a body which moves by successively touching the parts of space, doth determine them as effectually as the chalk in the hand. But besides, when it may be said that the division of an infinite is ended, is there not then an actual infinite? Do not Aristotle and his followers assert, that an hour contains an infinity of parts? Wherefore when it is past, it must be owned that an infinity of parts have actually existed one after another. Is this a virtual, and not an actual, infinity? Let us then say that this distinction is null, and that Zeno's objection remains in full force. An hour, a year, or an age, &c. are each a finite time: A foot of matter is an infinite space; and therefore there is no body in motion that can ever reach from the beginning of a foot to the end of it. We shall see in the following remark, whether this objection may be eluded, by supposing that the parts of a foot of matter are not infinite. Let us content our selves in this place with observing, that the subterfuge of the infinity of the parts of time is of no service; for if there were in an hour an infinity of parts, it could never either begin or end. All its parts must exist separately; any two of them never do, nor can exist together: they must then be comprized between a first and last unity, which is incompatible with an infinite number.

(51) Conimbricenses, in Aristot. Physic. lib. vi, cap. ix, pag. m. 147, 148.

The third objection was the famous argument called Achilles (53). Zeno of Elea was the inventor of it, if (53) See, the we believe Diogenes Laërtius, who tells us nevertheless that Phavorinus ascribed it to Parmenides, and to several others. Οὐτὸς καὶ τὸν Ἀχιλλεῖα πρῶτον λόγον ἠρώσεις θαλασπίνου, δὲ καὶ Παρμενίδου, καὶ ἄλλος συγγενές. Hic & Achilles primus oratione argumentatus est; quamvis Phavorinus Parmenidem & alios complures profert (54). This objection hath the same foundation with the second, but it is more adapted to the declamatory stile. It tends to shew that the swiftest body in motion pursuing the slowest, can never reach it. Γίγνεται δὲ παρὰ τὸ αὐτὸ τῇ διχοτομίᾳ

(52) Clavius in Euclid. lib. i, num. 2, & 5.

(53) See, the article ACHILLES, remark [L].

(54) Diogenes Laërt. lib. ix, num. 19.

V O L. V. No. CXXXVI.

7 P

below [G], some of which are against the existence of extension, and seem much stronger than χρῆσις. ἐν ἀπορίῃσι γὰρ συμβαίνει μὴ ἀρῶννείσθαι πρὸς τὸ πᾶσι, διαμενέοντι πᾶσι τῷ μεγέθυ. ἀλλὰ πρὸς κεῖται ἐν τῷ ὅτι ἡδὲ τὸ τὰχῆρον τέλει γὰρ ἡμεῖς ἐν τῷ δῶκεν τὸ βεβδύττειν.

ὅς ἀνάγκη καὶ τὴν λύσιν εἶναι τὴν αὐτήν. Obidem autem evenit atque in divisione in dimidia. Nam in utroque accidit, ut ad finem non perveniat, quoquo modo magnitudine divisa. Sed in hac additur ne illud quidem, quod celeritimum est, (quod tragicè prolutum est) id quod tardissimum est attingere persequendo. Quamobrem solutio eadem sit necesse est (55). Suppose a tortoise to be twenty paces before Achilles, and limit the swiftness of the hero in proportion to that of the tortoise as one to twenty. Whilst he advances twenty paces, the tortoise advances one: she will then be before him still.
Whilst he proceeds to the twenty-first pace, she will gain the twentieth part of the twenty-second, and while he gains this twentieth part, she will go through the twentieth part of the twenty-first part, and so on.
Aristotle refers us to what he says in answer to the second objection: and we may refer him to our reply.
See also what shall be said in the following remark, concerning the difficulty of explaining wherein consists the swiftness of motion.

(55) Aristot.
ubi supra.

I proceed to the fourth objection, which shews the contradictions of motion. Suppose a table of four ells, and take also two bodies of the same measure, one of wood, and the other of stone (56). Let the table be immovably fixed, and bear the piece of wood according to the length of two ells westward, and suppose the piece of stone placed to the east, and only to touch the edge of the table. Suppose it to move on the table westward, and that in half an hour it goes the length of two ells; it will become contiguous to the piece of wood. Suppose that they touch one another only by their edges, and in such a manner, that the motion of the one towards the west doth not hinder the motion of the other to the east. At the moment of their contiguity, let the piece of wood begin to tend towards the east; whilst the other continues to tend towards the west; let them move with equal velocity. In half an hour the piece of stone will finish its course over all the table; and so it will move through a space of four ells, the whole length of the table, in an hour. But the piece of wood will run through the same space of four ells in half an hour, by reason that it touched the whole extent of the piece of stone by the edges: therefore it is true that two bodies moving with an equal swiftness go through the same space, one in half an hour, and the other in an hour; and therefore an hour and half an hour are equal times; which is contradictory. Aristotle saith, that this is a sophism, since one of those moving bodies is considered in reference to a space which continues at rest, meaning the table, and the other with respect to a space in motion, meaning the piece of stone. I own he is in the right to observe that difference, but this doth not remove the difficulty; for a thing, which seems incomprehensible, remains still to be explained, that is, that a piece of wood should at the same time move four ells on it's south-side, and but two on it's inferior surface.
But I shall illustrate this with a clearer instance. Suppose two books in folio of equal length, as two feet each. Place them on a table one before the other; move them at the same time one above the other, one towards the east, and the other towards the west, till the eastern edge of the one, and the western edge of the other touch one another: and you will find that the edges by which they did touch one another, are now four feet distant from each other; and yet each of the books hath moved but the space of two feet. You may strengthen the objection by supposing whatsoever body you please in motion, in the midst of several others, which are moving several ways, and in various degrees of swiftness; you will find that the same body will in the same time run through several sorts of space, double, triple, &c. to one another: consider well of it, and you will find that this is only explicable by Arithmetical calculations, which are only the idea of our mind; but that thing doth not seem practicable in the bodies themselves (57). For we ought to remember these three essential properties of motion. 1. It is impossible for a body in motion to touch the same part of a space twice successively. 2. It never can touch two of them at once. 3. It never can touch the third

(57) The same difficulties may be raised from the small wheels of a coach, running over as much ground as the great ones, in the same number of rotations about their center. The same thing may be said of a very small wheel and a very large one fixed to one and the same axis.

before the second, nor the fourth before the third, &c.
He who can Physically reconcile these three particulars with the distance of four feet betwixt two bodies, which have run through no more than the space of two feet (58), must be no ignorant person. Observe, that these three properties are as necessarily requisite to a body which goes over spaces, whose motion is contrary to it's own, as to one which passes through spaces where it meets with no resistance.

[G] The same I shall mention below.] I am apt to think that those who would revive Zeno's opinion, ought to argue thus.

1. There is no extension, therefore there is no motion. The consequence is good, for what hath no extension fills no space, and what fills no space cannot possibly pass from one place to another, and consequently move. This is incontestable: the difficulty is then to prove that there is no extension. Zeno might have argued thus: Extension cannot be composed either of Mathematical points, or of atoms, or of parts divisible in infinitum; therefore it's existence is impossible. The consequence seems certain, by reason it is impossible to conceive more than these three modes of composition in extension; wherefore the antecedent alone remains to be proved. A few words shall suffice as to Mathematical points; for a man of the meanest capacity may apprehend with the utmost evidence, if he is but a little attentive, that several no-thingnesses of extension joined together will never make an extension (59). Consult the first body of scholastical Philosophy that comes to hand, and you will there find the most convincing reasons, supported by many Geometrical demonstrations, against the existence of these points (60). Wherefore to say no more on that head, let us take it to be impossible, or at least inconceivable, that matter should be composed of them. Nor is it less impossible or inconceivable that it should be composed of the Epicurean atoms, that is, of extended and indivisible corpuscles; for every extension, how small soever, hath a right and left side, an upper and lower side: therefore it is a conjunction of distinct bodies; and I may deny of the right side what I affirm of the left, for these two sides are not in the same place: a body cannot be in two places at once; and consequently every extension which fills several parts of space contains several bodies. I know besides, and the Atomists do not deny it, that because two atoms are two beings, they are separable from one another: whence I conclude, with the utmost certainty, that since the right side of an atom is not the same being with the left side, it is separable from the left; and therefore the indivisibility of an atom is merely chimerical. Whence it follows that if there be an extension, it's parts are divisible in infinitum. But on the other side, if they cannot be divisible in infinitum, we ought to conclude the existence of extension impossible, or at least incomprehensible.

The divisibility in infinitum is an opinion embraced by Aristotle, and almost all the professors of Philosophy, in all universities for several ages.
Not that they understand it, or can answer the objections it is liable to; but because having clearly apprehended the impossibility of either Mathematical or Physical points, they found no other course but this to take. Besides, this opinion affords great conveniencies: for when their distinctions are exhausted, without being able to render this doctrine comprehensible, they shelter themselves in the nature of the subject, and alledge, that our understandings being limited, none ought to be surprized that they cannot resolve what relates to infinity, and that it is essential to such a continuity to be liable to such difficulties as are insurmountable by human reason. Observe that those who espouse the hypothesis of atoms, do not do it, because they comprehend that an extended body may be simple, but because they believe the two other hypotheses to be impossible. We may say the same of those who admit of Mathematical points. In general, all those who argue on extension, are determined in their choice of an hypothesis no otherwise than by the following principle: If there are but three ways of explaining a subject, the truth of the third necessarily results from the falsity of the other two. Whence, they do not believe themselves mistaken in the choice of

(58) For instance, the two folio books above mentioned.

OBJECTIONS against the existence of extension.

(59) See the Art of Thinking, Part. iv, ch. 1,
pag. m. 192,
and the remark
[D], of the following article towards the end.

(60) See among others, a book of Libertus Fro-mondus, Professor at Lovain, intituled La-ty-trias seu de compositis continuis. It is a much stronger book than the answer which James Chanceller (in Latin Cop-ules) Professor of Philosophy at Paris, made in the year 1654,
to two questions of Cardinal de Richelieu, de magnum in possib., &c.

than all the reasons which the Cartesians can alledge. I mean some Cartesians, who publicly of the third, when they are clearly convinced that the two others are impossible; and accordingly the impenetrable difficulties of the third do not stop them in the least: they comfort themselves with this consideration that they may be retorted, or with a persuasion that after all this hypothesis is true, because the other two are not so. The subtle Arriaga having proposed an unanswerable objection, declares that he will not therefore change his opinion; for, saith he, other sects cannot resolve it better. 'Video hæc adhuc urgeri argumento supra factò, quod à nemine vidi solutum, sed nec illud solvere præsumo: cum autem commune sit omnibus sententiis de continui compositione, non est cur propter illud aliquis à propria sententia discedat (61). . . . Quòd autem alia sententia Aristotelis difficilia valde sint, & quæ à nobis solvi non possint, non cogit nos hanc sententiam deferere: materis enim difficultas est talis, ut ubique aliqua nobis inexplicabilia occurrant. Malo autem aperte fateri me ignorare solutionem aliquorum argumentorum, quàm eam dare quæ forte à nemine intelligatur (62). . . . I see these objections are still urged in the foregoing argument: I have met with no person who could solve them; neither do I presume to do it. But as all opinions concerning the composition of continuity are liable to unanswerable objections, a man has no reason, upon that account, to depart from his own opinion. . . . 'Too' there are other great difficulties in this opinion of Aristotle, and such as we cannot solve, yet that doth not oblige us to renounce it: for so many difficulties occur on that subject, that some things are inexplicable to us every where. But I would rather own that I know not how to solve an objection, than to give such a solution of it, as, perhaps, no body could understand.'

(61) Arriaga, Disput. XVI, Phys. §. xi, num. 241, pag. m. 433.

(62) Id. ibid. §. xii, num. 256, pag. m. 435.

A Zenonist might tell those who chuse one of these three hypotheses; you do not argue right, you make use of this disjunctive syllogism.

Matter is composed either of Mathematical points, or of Physical points, or of parts divisible in infinitum.

But it is not composed of . . . nor of (63) . . .

Therefore it is composed of . . . The fault of your argumentation lies not in the form, but in the matter: you ought to lay aside your disjunctive syllogism, and make use of this hypothetical one.

If extension existed, it would be composed either of Mathematical points, or of Physical points, or of parts divisible in infinitum.

But it is not composed either of Mathematical points, or of Physical points, or of parts divisible in infinitum.

Therefore it doth not exist.

There is no fault in the form of this syllogism; the sophism à non sufficienti enumeratione partium is not in the major; the consequence is therefore necessary, provided the minor be true. To be clearly satisfied of the truth of the minor, we need only consider the arguments which those three sects alledge one against another, and compare them with their respective answers. When each of those three sects makes the attack, it overthrows, subdues, and triumphs; but when it is on the defensive, it is utterly overthrown and confounded in it's turn. To be convinced of their weakness, it is enough to remember that the strongest of them, that which best disputes the ground, is the hypothesis of the divisibility in infinitum. The school-men have armed it cap-à-pes with all the distinctions which their great leisure would allow them to invent: But all this only serves to afford their scholars matter for talk upon a public disputation, that their relations may not suffer the disgrace of seeing them mute. A father or a brother go away better satisfied, when the scholar distinguishes betwixt a categoric infinite, and a syncategorematic one, betwixt the parts communicantes, & non communicantes, proportional and aliquot, than if he had answered nothing. It was therefore necessary for the Professors to invent some jargon; but all the pains which they have taken, will never be able to obscure this notion which is as clear and evident as the sun: An infinite number of parts of extension, each of which is extended, and distinct from all others, as well with respect to it's entity, as with respect to the space it fills, cannot be contained in a space one hundred thousand millions of times less than the hundred thousandth part of a barley corn.

Here is another difficulty. An extended substance, if it did exist, must necessarily admit of an immediate contact of it's parts. According to the hypothesis of a vacuum, several bodies would be separated from all others, but several others must immediately touch. Aristotle, who denied this hypothesis, is obliged to own that there is no part of extension which doth not immediately touch some other parts in all it's exterior points. This is incompatible with the divisibility in infinitum; for if there be no body but what contains an infinity of parts, it is evident that each particular part of extension is separated from all others by an infinity of parts, and that the immediate contact of two parts is impossible. But when a thing cannot have whatever is absolutely necessary to it's existence, it is certain that it's existence is impossible: wherefore the existence of extension necessarily requiring the immediate contact of it's parts, and that immediate contact being impossible in an extension divisible in infinitum, it is evident that the existence of such an extension is impossible, and that this extension barely exists in the mind. What the Mathematicians acknowledge with respect to lines and superficies, with which they demonstrate so many excellent things, must be owned to be true with respect to bodies. They honestly own (64) that length and breadth without depth, are things which cannot exist any where but in our imagination. Let us say the same thing of the three dimensions. They cannot subsist any where but in our minds; they cannot exist any other way than ideally. Our mind is a kind of ground, where a hundred thousand objects of different colours, figures, and situation unite: for from an eminence we may see at once a vast plain covered with houses, trees, and flocks, &c. Whilst it is so far from truth, that all these things can possibly be ranged in this plain, that there are not two which can find room there; each would require an infinite space, since it contains an infinity of extended bodies. There should be infinite intervals left round each one, by reason that there is an infinity of bodies betwixt each part, and every other part (65). Let it not be said that God can do every thing; for if the most religious Divines venture to say, that in a right line of twelve inches, he cannot render the first and third inches immediately contiguous, I may very well say that he cannot make two parts of extension immediately touch one another, when an infinity of other parts separate them from one another. Let us therefore say that the contact of the parts of matter is only ideal; and that the extremities of several bodies no where unite but in our mind.

I shall now make a quite contrary objection. The penetration of dimensions is impossible, and yet it would be inevitable, if extension should exist; therefore the existence of extension is impossible. Put a cannon bullet upon a table, a bullet, I say, covered over with some liquid colour, make it roll upon the table, and it will trace out a line by its motion: you will then have two strong proofs of the immediate contact of the bullet and table. The weight of the bullet will shew you that it immediately touches the table; for if it did not touch it in this manner, it would remain suspended in the air, and your eyes will, besides, convince you of this contact by the track which the bullet hath left. Now I maintain that this contact is a penetration of dimensions properly so called. That part of the bullet which touches the table is a determinate body, and really distinct from the other parts of the bullet which do not touch the table. I affirm the same thing of that part of the table touched by the bullet. These two parts touched are each of them infinitely divisible in length, breadth, and profundity; they must therefore mutually touch one another according to their profundity, and consequently they penetrate one another. This is every day objected to the Peripatetics in their public disputes: they defend themselves by a jargon of distinctions, proper for no other use than preventing the displeasure of a scholar's relations, if they should see him silenced; and as for the farther use of these distinctions they have never served to any other purpose than to make it appear that the objection is unanswerable. Here

DIVISIBILITY in infinitum would hinder all manner of contiguity.

(64) Compare with this what is said towards the end of the remark [D], in the following article.

(65) This ought to be understood with the clause distributive sumpta.

DIVISIBILITY in infinitum would occasion the penetration of dimensions.

publicly assert, even in countries where the Inquisition prevails, that it is impossible to know is therefore a very singular thing: if extension existed, it would not be possible for its parts to touch one another, and it would be impossible that they should not penetrate one another. Are not these most evident contradictions in the existence of extension?

THE means of suspension made use of against the existence of extension.

Add to this, that all the ways of suspension which destroy the reality of corporeal qualities, overthrows the reality of extension. Since the same bodies are sweet to some men, and bitter to others, it may reasonably be inferred that they are neither sweet nor bitter in their own nature, and absolutely speaking. The modern Philosophers, though they are no Sceptics, have so well apprehended the foundation of the epoch with relation to sounds, odours, heat, and cold, hardness, and softness, ponderosity, and lightness, favours, and colours, &c. that they teach that all these qualities are perceptions of our mind, and do not exist in the objects of our senses. Why should we not say the same thing of extension? If a being, void of colour, yet appears to us under a colour determined as to its species, figure, and situation, why cannot a being, without any extension, be visible to us, under an appearance of determinate extension, shaped, and situate in a certain manner? Observe also, that the same body appears to us little or great, round or square, according to the place from whence we view it: and certainly, a body which seems to us very little, appears very great to a fly. It is not therefore by their proper, real, or absolute extension that objects present themselves to our mind: whence we may conclude, that in themselves they are not extended. Would you at this day argue thus: Since certain bodies appear sweet to one man, sour to another, and bitter to another, &c. I must affirm, that in general they are savoury, though I do not know the savour proper to them, absolutely, and in themselves? All the modern Philosophers would explode you. Why then would you venture to say, Since certain bodies appear great to this animal, middle sized to that, and very little to a third, I must affirm, that in general they are extended, though I do not know their absolute extension? Let us see what a celebrated Dogmatist acknowledges (66): 'It is clearly discernible

(66) Nicole, Art de penser, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. m. 387, 388. See also Rohault, Traité de Physique, Part. i, chap. xxvii, num. 6, pag. m. 293, where he mentions the various appearances of the same colours; he knew it by experience.

(67) Mallebranche, Recherche de la Vérité, liv. i, ch. vi, & seq.

(68) Lami, Connaissance de soi-même, Tom. ii, pag. 112, & seq.

GEOMETRICAL demonstrations alleged against the existence of extension.

My last difficulty shall be grounded on the geometrical demonstrations so subtly displayed, to prove that matter is divisible in infinitum. I maintain they serve for no other use than to make it appear, that extension doth not exist any where but in our minds. In the first place I observe, that some of these demonstrations are employed against those who affirm that matter is composed of Mathematical points. It is objected to them, that the sides of a square would be equal to the diagonal, and that amongst concentric cal circles, the least would be equal to the largest. This consequence is proved by making it appear that the right lines which may be drawn from one of the sides of a square to another will fill the diagonal, and that all the right lines which may be drawn from the circumference of the largest circle, will find room in the smallest circumference. These objections are not stronger against bodies being composed of points, than against their being divisible in infinitum; for if the parts of a certain extension are not more numerous in the diagonal line, than in the sides, nor in the circumference of the largest circle, than in that of the smallest concentric circle, it is clear that the sides of the square equal the diagonal, and that the smallest concentric circle equals the greatest. But all the right lines which can be drawn from one side of a square to another, and from the circumference of the largest circle to the center, are equal to each other: they ought then to be considered as aliquot parts; that is, as parts of a certain magnitude, and of the same denomination. Now it is certain that two extensions, whereof the aliquot parts and of the same denomination, as inch, foot, pace, are in equal number, do not exceed one another: it is therefore certain that the sides of the square would be as large as the diagonal line, if the diagonal line cannot be intersected by more right lines than the sides. The same thing may be said of two concentric circles. In the second place I affirm, that it being very true that if circles did exist, as many right lines might be drawn from the circumference to the center, as there are parts in the circumference, it follows that the existence of a circle is impossible. I am persuaded it will be allowed me that every being which cannot exist, without containing properties which cannot exist, is impossible: but a round extension cannot exist, without having a center, in which there meet as many right lines as there are parts in the circumference; and it is certain that such a center cannot exist: it must then be owned that the existence of this round extension is impossible. But that such a center cannot exist, I shall clearly prove. Let us suppose a round extension, whose circumference is four feet; it then contains forty-eight inches, each of which contains twelve lines; the circumference will then contain five hundred and seventy-six lines; which is the number of the right lines that may be drawn from the circumference to the center. Let us trace a circle very near the center; it may be so small that it will not contain above fifty lines; it cannot then give passage to five hundred and seventy-six right lines; therefore it will be impossible for these five hundred and seventy-six right lines begun to be drawn from the circumference of this round extension to reach the center: and yet if this extension exists, these five hundred and seventy-six lines must of necessity reach the center. What remains then to be said, but only that this extension cannot exist, and that accordingly all the properties of circles and squares, &c. are founded on lines without breadth, which cannot exist otherwise than ideally? Observe, that our reason and our eyes are equally deceived in this case. Our reason clearly conceives; I. That the concentric circle nearest the center is less than the circle which encompasses it: II. That the diagonal of a square is larger than the side. Our eyes see this without compasses, and more clearly with compasses; and yet the Mathematicians teach us, that as many right lines may be drawn from the circumference to the center as there are points in the circumference, and that from one side of a square to the other as many right lines may be drawn as there are points in the side. And besides, our eyes shew us that there is not in the circumference of the small concentric circle any one point, which is not a part of a right line, drawn from the circumference of the great circle, and that the diagonal of the square contains no one point that is not a part of a right line drawn from one of the sides of the square to another. Whence then can it proceed that this diagonal is greater than the sides?

This is what relates to the first proof, which I suppose Zeno might have made use of to refute the existence of motion. It is founded on the impossibility of the existence of extension. We shall see, below (69), mark (1), another know that there are bodies, any otherwise than by faith: our senses deceive us, say they, with respect to the qualities of matter, therefore we ought to distrust their evidence concerning the three dimensions. It is not necessary, add they, that any bodies should exist; for God can without that communicate to our mind whatever it feels, and whatever it

no. 625
see 1st

another reason for the same impossibility. I am willing to believe that what he might have said in the last place, by making use of Geometrical demonstrations, is easy to be refuted by the same means; but I am strongly convinced that the arguments taken from the Mathematics (70) to prove the divisibility in infinitum, prove too much: for either they prove nothing, or they prove an infinity of aliquot parts.

II. Zeno's second objection might have been this. Granting that there is an extension which is not merely ideal, but really exists (71), yet I say that it is immovable, motion is not essential to it, nor contained in the idea of it, and several bodies are sometimes in a state of rest. Motion is therefore an accident. But is it distinct from matter? If it be distinct, of what must it be produced? Doubtless of nothing; and when it ceases to be, it will be reduced to nothing. But do not you know that nothing is made out of nothing, and that nothing returns to nothing (72): Besides, must not motion necessarily be diffused on, and through, the body that is moved? The former will therefore be as much extended as the latter, and of the same figure; there will therefore be two equal extensions in the same space, and consequently a penetration of dimensions. But when three or four causes move one body, must not each of them produce its motion? Must not these three or four motions be penetrated together, both with the body, and amongst themselves? How then can each produce its effect? A vessel moved by the winds, tide, and rowers, describes a line which partakes more or less of these three actions, according as one of them is stronger than the others. Will you venture to affirm that infensible entities penetrated amongst themselves, and with the whole vessel, will have such a regard for one another as not to thwart themselves? If you say that motion is a mode which is not distinct from matter, you must then allow that whatever produces it, creates matter; for without producing of matter, it is impossible to produce a being which is the same thing with matter. But would it not be absurd to assert, that the wind which moves the vessel, produces a vessel? It doth not appear that these objections can be any otherwise answered than by supposing with the Cartesians, that God is the sole and immediate cause of motion.

III. Here is another objection. It is impossible to affirm what motion is; for if you say that it is to pass from one place to another (73): you explain one obscurity by a greater, obscurum per obscurius. I immediately ask you what you mean by the word place? Do you mean a space distinct from bodies? If so, you will involve your self in a labyrinth from which you will never be able to get out (74). Do you mean by it the situation of a body, among some others which surround it? But in this case you will define motion in such a manner, that it will be a thousand and a thousand times suit with bodies that are at rest. It is certain that hitherto the true definition of motion hath not been found. That of Aristotle is absurd, and that of Des Cartes is wretched. Mr Rohault, after much pains in endeavouring to find one which might rectify that of Des Cartes, produces a description which may agree with bodies, of which we conceive very distinctly, that they do not move at all (75); wherefore Mr Regis thought himself obliged to reject it (76). But that which he hath given is not capable of distinguishing motion from rest (77). God, the only mover, according to the Cartesians, must do with respect to a house, the same thing as with respect to the air, which flies from it in a high wind: he must create the air every moment with new local relations, with respect to that house: and he must also every moment create that house with new local relations with respect to that air. And certainly according to the principles of these gentlemen, no body is at rest, if an inch of matter is in motion. All then that they can say centers in explaining apparent motion, that is, explaining those circumstances which make us judge that one body moves, and another doth not.

VOL. V.

But all this is useless labour; every one is capable of judging of appearances. The question is to explain the very nature of things which exist independently of our minds; and since in that respect motion is inexplicable, one had as good say that it doth not exist but in our minds.

IV. I shall now offer an objection very much stronger than the foregoing. If motion can never begin, it doth not exist; but it is impossible for it ever to begin; therefore, &c. I prove the minor thus. It is impossible for a body to be in two places at once: but it could never begin to move without being in an infinity of places at once; for though it advance ever so slowly, it would touch a part divisible in infinitum, and which consequently corresponds with infinite parts of space; therefore, &c. Besides, it is certain that an infinite number of parts doth not contain any which is first; and yet a body in motion can never touch the second before the first: for motion is a being essentially successive, of which two parts cannot exist together: wherefore motion can never begin, if matter is divisible in infinitum, as doubtless it is if it exists. The same reason demonstrates that a body in motion, rolling on a sloping table, could never fall off the said table; for before it falls, it must of necessity touch the last part of the table. And how will it touch that, since all those parts which you will pretend to be the last, contain an infinity of parts, and an infinite number hath no part which can be last? This objection obliged some scholastic Philosophers to suppose, that nature hath intermixed Mathematical points with the parts divisible in infinitum, to the end that they may serve to connect them, and compose the extremities of bodies. They thought by that means to answer also the objection of the penetrative contact of two surfaces: but this evasion is so absurd, that it doth not deserve to be refuted.

V. I shall not much insist on the impossibility of circular motion, though that would supply me with a strong objection. I say only in one word, that if there was a circular motion, there would be a whole diameter at rest (78), whilst all the remainder of the globe moved very swiftly. But conceive this if you can in matter. The Chevalier de Mére did not forget this objection in his letter to Mr Pascal (79).

VI. Lastly. I say that if motion existed, it would be equal in all bodies; there would be no Achilles nor tortoises; the hound would never reach the hare. Zeno objected this (80); but it seems he went only upon the divisibility of matter in infinitum; and perhaps, some will say, he would have set aside that objection, if he had dealt with adversaries who admitted either Mathematical points or atoms. I answer, that this objection equally strikes at all the three systems; for suppose a road composed of indivisible particles; place the tortoise in it one hundred points before Achilles, and if he goes on, he will never reach her: Achilles will go but one point every moment, since if he went two he would be in two places at the same time. The tortoise will advance one point each moment: which is the least she can do, nothing being less than a point (81). The true reason of the swiftness of motion is inexplicable: the most happy thought on this head is, that no motion is continued, and that all those bodies which seem to us to move, stop by intervals. That which moves ten times faster than another, rests ten times to the others hundred. But however well contrived this subterfuge appears, it is of no use; it is confuted by several solid reasons which you may see in all the bodies of Philosophy (82). I content my self with that which is drawn from the motion of a wheel. You may make a wheel of so large a diameter that the part of the spokes the farthest distant from the center will move one hundred times swifter than the part fixed in the nave. And yet the spokes remain always straight: an evident proof that the lower part doth not rest, whilst the upper moves. The divisibility in infinitum of the particles of time, rejected above (83) as visibly false and contradictory,

7 Q

(78) To wit the axis.

(79) I shall speak of this letter, in the remark [D], of the following article.

(80) See the third objection of the foregoing remark.

(81) As it is plain that the atoms of Epicurus are divisible in infinitum, since they have the three dimensions, and that no body can deny this as to the space they fill up, I have not applied this objection to them.

(82) See Arriaga, Disp. xvi, Physic. §. xi. He follows the hypothesis of the morale, or interruptions of motion: he answers the objections very ill, and owns that of the wheel to be unanswerable: Ovidio in his body of Philosophy, Tom. i, pag. 357, & seq. strives mightily to resolve it, and believes he has found out a new solution of it. Cordani noti di nuova solutio, says he.

(83) In the remark [F], first objection.

(70) There are very fine ones in the Art of Thinking, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. 394. See also Rohault's Physic. Part. i, chap. ix.

(71) Take this for a dato non concessio.

(72) Zeno might have said it boldly, for all the ancient Philosophers admitted this maxim of Lucretius, Res . . . non posse creari De nihilo, neque item genitas ad nil revocari . . . Lucret. lib. i, vv. 266.

(73) Migratio de loco in locum.

(74) See the remark [I].

(75) Motion, says he, Physic. Part. i, ch. x, mm. 3, pag. m. 62, consists in the successive application of all the external parts of a body to the several parts of the bodies that are immediately near it.

(76) See his Physic. book i, Part. i, ch. i, pag. 42, of Tom. ii, at Lyons, 1691, in 12mo.

(77) Motion, says he, ibid. pag. 43, is the successive active application of all the external parts of a body, to several parts of the bodies, which immediately touch it.

it knows; and consequently the proofs of the existence of matter which reason affords us, are not evident enough to form a good demonstration on this point [H]. As for the objections which may be grounded on the distinction of a Plenum and a Vacuum, and which (84) Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. is of no force against this sixth argument. You will find some other very subtle objections in Sextus Empiricus (84).

Thus, or in a manner very like it, we may suppose our Zeno of Elea to have argued against motion. I will not affirm that his reasons persuaded him that nothing moved; he might be of another opinion, though he believed that none could refute them, nor elude their force. If I should judge of him by my self, I should affirm that he as well as other men believed the motion of matter; for though I find my self very incapable of solving all the difficulties which we have just now seen, and though the Philosophical answers which may be made to them do not seem to me very solid, yet that doth not hinder me from following the common opinion. Nay, I am persuaded that the proposing of these arguments may be of great use with respect to religion: and I say here with regard to the difficulties of motion, what Mr Nicolle said of those of the divisibility in infinitum. The advantage which may be drawn from these speculations is not merely to acquire this sort of knowledge, which in it self is very barren; but to learn to know the limits of our understanding, and to force it however unwilling to own that some things exist, though it is not capable of comprehending them: for which reason it is proper to fatigue the intellect with these subtilties, in order to subdue its presumption, and deprive it of the assurance of ever opposing its faint light to the truths which the church proposes, under pretext that it cannot comprehend them: for since all the force of human understanding cannot comprehend the smallest atom of matter, and is obliged to own that it clearly sees that such an atom is infinitely divisible, without being able to conceive how that can be: is it not plain that the man acts against reason, who refuses to believe the wonderful effects of God's omnipotence, which is of it self incomprehensible, because our minds cannot comprehend these effects (85).

[H] The proofs of the existence of matter which reason affords us, are not evident enough to form a good demonstration on this point. There are two Philosophical axioms which teach us, one that nature does nothing in vain (86); the other, that things are done in vain by more means which might have been as commodiously done by fewer (87). By these two axioms the Cartesians, whom I am speaking of, may maintain that no such thing as matter exists; for whether it doth or doth not exist, God could equally communicate to us all the thoughts which we have. To say that our senses assure us, with the utmost evidence, that matter exists, is not proving it. Our senses deceive us with respect to all the corporeal qualities, not excepting the magnitude, figure, and motion of bodies (88), and when we believe them, we are persuaded that out of our mind there exists a great number of colours, favours, and other beings, which we call hardness, fluidity, cold, heat, &c. yet it is not true that any such thing exists out of our mind. Why then should we rely on our senses with respect to extension? It may very well be reduced to appearance in like manner with colours. Father Mallebranche having given all these reasons to doubt of the existence of bodies, concludes thus: 'It is therefore absolutely necessary, in order to be positively assured of the extraneous existence of bodies, to know God, who makes us sensible of them, and to know that being infinitely perfect he cannot deceive us. For if the intelligence which gives us the ideas of all things, would, if I may so say, divert itself by representing bodies to us as actually existing, tho' there were none; it is evident that this would be no very difficult thing to it' (89). He adds, that Mr Des Cartes could find no other immovable foundation, than this reason, that God would deceive us, if there were no bodies; but he owns that this reason cannot pass for demonstration. To be fully convinced of the existence of bodies, faith he (90), it must be demonstrated to us not only that there is a God, and that God is no deceiver, but also that God hath assured us that he hath really created bodies: and this I do not find proved in Mr Des Cartes's works. God speaks to the mind, and obliges it to believe only two ways, by evidence and by faith. I grant that faith obliges us to believe that there are bodies; but as for evidence, it is certain that it is not full, and that we are not invincibly induced to believe the existence of any thing else besides God and our own soul. Observe that when he affirms, that God doth not invincibly induce us by evidence to believe that bodies exist, his design is to teach us that the error in which we should be in this respect, ought not to be charged on God. This is rejecting Mr Des Cartes's proof, and saying that God would be no deceiver, even tho' not one body should exist in the nature of things.

Michael Angelo Fardella, a Sicilian, published a book of Logic at Venice in the year 1696, in which he asserts the same principles with Father Mallebranche; as appears by the following extract of his book. He (91) particularly labours to prove, that it is very possible that objects should not be conform to their ideas. He says, he very clearly conceives that the Author of nature might so dispose our senses that they might represent to us those objects as existent, which really do not exist. Yet (92) when he defines the sensations in the second part, pag. 96. he says, that they arise in the mind from the impression which outward bodies make on the extremity of the nerves. When it is objected to him, that if the evidence of the senses is not infallible, JESUS CHRIST imposed on the Apostles, when to convince them that he had a real body, he said, Palpate & videte, quia spiritus carnes & ossa non habet, - - Handle me, and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones; he answers, that the ways of arguing, which the Scripture most commonly makes use of, are rather drawn from a Logic accommodated to the capacity of the vulgar, than from a real Logic: whence he concludes, that JESUS CHRIST, in order to persuade the Apostles that he was no phantom, but a real man, made use of that sort of reasoning which was best adapted to vulgar intellects, and by which men use to satisfy themselves of the existence of things. He adds, that GOD is not obliged to teach us infallibly that bodies exist, and that if we have more than a moral certainty of it, we owe it only to faith. Father Mallebranche's reasonings are certainly very strong, but I may venture to say, that they are much weaker than those we have seen above (93). I should be glad to know how Mr Arnauld would have refuted this, no person being more capable than he to find out a solution. By his examination of Father Mallebranche's opinion, he hath discovered that he understood the art of attacking the foundation. He hath struck at the basis of his adversary's doctrine; for he hath shewn, that if there are no bodies, we are forced to admit some things in God which are utterly contrary to the Divine Nature, as that of being deceitful, or subject to other imperfections, which the light of reason evidently makes appear to us, cannot be in God (94). He makes use of eight arguments, which Father Mallebranche calls good proofs but very bad demonstrations (95). I believe, continues he, that matter exists, but I believe it as well proved and ill demonstrated. Nay, I believe it as demonstrated, but presupposing faith. He proposes an objection which he grounds on the wicked and impious thoughts of the mind (96), and answers, 'That it is certain that the body doth not immediately act upon the mind, and therefore that God alone immediately puts into the mind all the good and evil thoughts, as it is he alone who moves the arm of an assassin, or impious wretch, as well as the hand of the alms-giver, and that the only thing which God doth not do is the sin, that is, he does not cause the consent of the will. It is true, God doth not infill into the mind of man vain and ill thoughts any otherwise than consequentially to the laws of the union of the soul and body, and to sin which hath changed this union into a dependance. But how will Mr Arnauld demonstrate, I mean really demonstrate that he did not commit some sin ten or twenty thousand years ago; and that it is not for the punishment of that sin that he is afflicted with these uneasy thoughts, by which God chastises him, and designs to make him deserve his recompence, by opposing what he calls the motions of concupiscence? Will Mr Arnauld demonstrate, that God who could per-

(85) Nicolle, Art de penser, Part. iv, ch. i, pag. m. 394.

(86) Natura nihil frustra facit.

(87) Frustra fit per plura quod eque commode fieri potest per pauciora.

(88) Mallebranche, ubi infra, pag. 70. See above, citations (86), (87).

(89) Mallebranche, Eclaircissements sur le I. Livre de la Recherche de la Vérité, pag. 64, Paris 1678.

(90) Id. ibid. pag. 68, 69.

(91) Journal des Savans, le 20 de July 1696, pag. 559.

(92) Id. ibid. pag. 559.

(93) The author of the Journal is mistaken here. He is in the wrong to pretend that Mr Fardella contradicts himself: It is no contradiction to say that there are bodies, and that it were possible there should be none, and yet that we should have the same sensations we have now. The author of the Journal might have made a better objection, which is, that supposing Christ accommodated himself to the popular Logic, it cannot be proved by the Scripture that there are bodies. How then can we be sure by faith, that there are bodies.

(94) In the remark [G], where the last objection is proposed.

(95) Arnauld, Traité des vrais & des fausses idées, pag. 104.

(96) Mallebranche, Réponse au Livre des vrais & des fausses idées, pag. 104.

(97) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(98) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(99) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(100) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(101) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(102) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

(103) Id. ibid. pag. 104.

which might prove very puzzling to the modern Philosophers, I think it is very likely that he did not forget them [I]. Not being cotemporary with Diogenes the Cynic it was not his lecture that was refuted by walking. Every body admires the method which that Diogenes made use of to confound the arguments of the Philosopher whom he heard mit fin and all it's consequences, which, by the natural laws, he hath established, oblige him to put into the mind so many filthy thoughts and impious inclinations, could not permit that he himself should have sinned twenty thousand years ago? Will he demonstrate that God could not without the help of a body give him disturbing thoughts; and that in consequence of the laws of the union of the soul and body, which he forefaw, and which he can follow without having formed any one body? But let him argue as much as he will, I shall easily break the chain of his demonstrations, by telling him that God may have had designs which he hath not imparted to him (97). Mr Arnauld offers a great many things in his reply, and particularly this, that there are in Father Mallebranche's answer some extravagant propositions, which, strictly taken, tend to the establishment of a very dangerous Pyrrhonism (98). His proof may be seen in the following passage (99): 'I beg of him to tell me, what he meant, when he granted that this proposition might be taken for an evident principle: God is no deceiver, and it is not possible that he should take pleasure in deceiving me.'

Doth he pretend that the evidence of this principle is absolute, or doth he think it restrained by this condition, if I should not have committed some sin ten or twelve thousand years ago, for the punishment of which God might take pleasure in deceiving me? If he answers that it is absolute, what he saith of the sin I might have committed ten or twenty thousand years ago is foreign to the purpose. And if he saith that this principle is not absolute, but restrained by that condition, nothing can be easier than to shew him, that it cannot be asserted without overthrowing both the Divine faith, and all human sciences. For he affirms, that not only the Divine faith, but whatever we know by ratiocination, is grounded on this principle, That God is no deceiver . . . (100) But this principle, that God is not a deceiver, will be utterly useless, if he who makes use of it was obliged to prove that he hath not committed some sin ten or twenty thousand years ago. I will say no more: The consequences of this chicanery are so horrible and impious, that it is even dangerous to dwell too long upon them. . . . (101) Is it necessary that God should impart all his designs to us, that we may be assured he doth not intend to deceive us? If so, none can be certain of it: and thus there will be no Divine faith, no human sciences, according to the author himself, as I have just shewn.

It was requisite, for several reasons, that I should recite some passages of the dispute of these two illustrious authors, and that, in general, I should insert in this remark what I find in that dispute. For in the first place I was obliged to prove, that there are stronger objections than those of Father Mallebranche. In effect, if it was true that the actual existence of matter implies contradictions and impossibilities, as (102) has been set forth above (103), it would be absolutely necessary to recur to faith in order to be convinced of the existence of bodies. Mr Arnauld, who hath found other refuges, would be obliged to have recourse to that only. In the second place, the article of Zeno of Elea, required a large account of the difficulties which this Philosopher might have proposed against the hypothesis of motion. 3. It is of use to know that a Father of the Oratory, as illustrious for his piety, as for his Philosophical learning, has asserted, that nothing but faith can truly convince us of the existence of bodies. Neither the Sorbonne nor any other tribunal ever gave him any trouble on this occasion. The Inquisitors of Italy never disturbed Mr Fardella, who asserted the same thing in a printed book. This ought to teach my readers, that they must not be surprized when I sometimes shew them, that with respect to the most mysterious evangelical subjects reason puts us to a stand, and that then we ought to be fully satisfied with the light of faith. 4. Lastly, a great part of the things, which I have inserted in this remark, may serve as a supplement to another place in this Dictionary (104).

(97) Id. ibid. pag. 590, 591.

(98) Id. ibid. pag. 592.

(99) Id. ibid. pag. 593.

(100) Id. ibid. pag. 594.

(101) Id. ibid. pag. 595.

(102) Id. ibid. pag. 596.

(103) Id. ibid. pag. 597.

(104) Id. ibid. pag. 598.

[I] I think it is very likely that he did not forget the objections which may be grounded on the distinction of a Plenum and a Vacuum. Melissus, who studied under the same master with him (105), denied motion, and made use of this proof: If motion exists, there must of necessity be a vacuum (106), but there is no vacuum, therefore, &c. This shews that in Zeno's time there was a great Philosopher, who did not believe motion and a plenum to be consistent together. Wherefore since Zeno denied a vacuum (107), I cannot persuade my self that he did not make use of the same proof with Melissus, against those who admitted motion. He made it his business to oppose them, and used several arguments for that purpose. Would he have forgot the argument which the asserters of a vacuum have so often employed? He might have turned it otherwise than they, but not less speciously. If there was no vacuum, said they, there would be no motion; but motion exists, therefore there is a vacuum. He would have argued on the contrary foot, agreeing with them in this principle, that motion cannot exist in a full space; for, from this position, common to them and himself, he might have drawn a consequence diametrically opposite to theirs. His syllogism ought to have run thus: if there was any motion, there would be a vacuum; but there is no vacuum, therefore there is no motion. Observe, that when I say his manner of arguing would not have been less specious than theirs; I mean this only with respect to Philosophers very capable of comprehending the reasons against a vacuum; for I know very well that to the vulgar it is almost as strange a paradox to deny a vacuum, as to deny motion. Anaxagoras found the vulgar so possessed with the existence of a vacuum, that he had recourse to some trivial experiments to destroy this false prejudice. Aristotle (108) in the chapter where he mentions this, alleges some of the arguments which were made use of to prove a vacuum. They are not of any force, and he refutes them pretty well in the following chapter. Gassendus hath given all possible force to the experiments and arguments which favour the hypothesis of Epicurus concerning a vacuum (109); but he hath said nothing really convincing, and the weakness of it is fully exposed in the Art of Thinking (110). However, I believe our Zeno rendered himself formidable on this topic: such a subtle and vehement Logician as he, could very dexterously perplex this subject, and it is not probable that he neglected it.

But if he had known what several excellent Mathematicians (111) say in this age, he might have made vast ravages, and given himself airs of triumph. They assert that a vacuum is absolutely necessary, and that without it the motion of the planets, and the consequences thereof are things inexplicable and impossible. I have heard a great Mathematician (who hath reaped great advantages from the works and conversation of Sir Isaac Newton) say, that it is no longer a problem whether motion be possible, supposing a plenum; that the falsity and impossibility of that proposition hath been not only proved, but Mathematically demonstrated, and that henceforth to deny a vacuum will be to deny a point supported by the utmost evidence. He maintained that vacuity takes up incomparably more room than matter in the most ponderous bodies; and so that in the air, for instance, there are not more corpuscles than there are great cities on the earth. Thus we are doubtless highly obliged to the Mathematics: they demonstrate the existence of what is contrary to the most evident notions of our intellect; for if there be any nature with whose essential properties we are clearly acquainted, it is extension: we have a clear and distinct idea of it, which informs us that the essence of extension consists in the three dimensions, and that its inseparable attributes and properties are divisibility, mobility, and impenetrability. If these ideas are false, deceitful, chimerical, and illusory, is there a notion in our mind which we ought not to take for a vain phantom, or matter of distrust? Can the demonstrations which prove a vacuum remove our distrust? Are they more evident than the idea which shews us that (105) That is, under Parmenides. See Diogenes Laertius, lib. ix, num. 24, 25.

(106) Aristotel. Phys. lib. iv, cap. vii, Textu xxi.

(107) Diogen. Laert. lib. ix, num. 29.

(108) Aristotel. ubi supra, Textu li.

(109) Gassend. Phys. §. i, lib. ii, cap. iii, Opera Tom. i, pag. 192, & seq.

(110) Art. de penser, Part. iii, ch. xviii, num. 2. pag. m. 329, & seq.

(111) Mr Huygens, Sir Isaac Newton, &c.

ARGUMENTS against a Vacuum.

heard endeavouring to prove that there was no motion. He walked about in the auditory, thinking that was sufficient to shew the falsity of all the Professor had been saying :

a foot of extension may change its place, and cannot be in the same place with another foot of extension? Let us search as much as we please into all the recesses of our mind, we shall never find there any idea of an unmovable, indivisible, and penetrable extension. And yet if there is a vacuum, there must exist an extension, essentially endued with these three attributes. It is no small difficulty, to be forced to admit the existence of a nature of which we have no idea, and is besides repugnant to the clearest ideas of our mind. But there are a great many other inconveniencies which attend this. Is this vacuum, or immovable, indivisible, and penetrable extension, a substance, or a mode? It must be one of the two, for the adequate division of being, comprehends but these two members. If it be a mode, they must then define its substance: but that is what they can never do. If it be a substance, I ask whether it be created or uncreated? If created, it may perish, while the matter, from which it is really distinct, may not cease to be. But it is absurd, and contradictory, that a vacuum, or a space distinct from bodies, should be destroyed, and yet that bodies should be distant from each other, as they may be after the destruction of the vacuum. If this space distinct from bodies is an uncreated substance, it will follow either that it is God, or that God is not the only substance which necessarily exists. Which part soever you take of this alternative, you shall find your self confounded: the last is a formal, and the other at least a material impety; for all extension is composed of distinct parts, and consequently separable from each other; whence it results, that if God was extended, he would not be a simple, immutable, and properly infinite, Being, but a collection of beings, ens per aggregationem, each of which would be finite, though all of them together would be unlimited. He would also be like the material world, which, in the Cartesian hypothesis, is an infinite extension. And as to those who should pretend that God may be extended without being material or corporeal, and alledge, as an argument, his simplicity, you will find them solidly refuted in one of Mr Arnauld's books, I shall cite only these words from it: 'So far is the simplicity of God from allowing us room to think that he may be extended, that all Divines have acknowledged after St Thomas, that it is a necessary consequence of the simplicity of God not to be capable of being extended' (112). Will they say with the schoolmen, that space is, at most, no more than a privation of body; that it hath no reality, and that, properly speaking, a vacuum is nothing: but this is such an unreasonable assertion, that all the modern Philosophers who declare for a vacuum, have laid it aside, however convenient it was in other respects. Gassendus carefully avoided having recourse to such an absurd hypothesis (112); but chose rather to plunge himself into the most hideous abyss of conjecturing, that all beings are not either substances or accidents, and that all substances are not either spirits or bodies; and of placing the extension of space amongst the beings which are neither corporeal nor spiritual, neither substances nor accidents. Mr Locke, believing that he could not define what a vacuum is, hath yet given us clearly to understand that he took it for a positive being (114). He was too knowing not to discern that nothingness cannot be extended in length, breadth, and depth. Mr Hartsoeker hath very well apprehended this truth. There is no vacuum in nature, saith he (115), this ought to be admitted without any difficulty, because it is utterly contradictory to conceive a meer nothingness, with all the properties which can only agree to a real Being. But if it is contradictory that nothingness should be endued with extension, or any other quality (116), it is not less contradictory, that extension should be a simple being, since it contains some things, of which we may truly deny what we may truly affirm of some others which it includes. The space filled up by the sun is not the same space taken up by the moon; for if the sun and the moon filled the same space, those two luminaries would be in the same place, and penetrated with one another, since two things cannot be penetrated with a third, without being penetrated among themselves (117). It is most evident that the sun and moon are not in the same place. It may then be truly said of the space of the sun, that it is penetrated with the sun, and it may as truly be denied of the space penetrated with the moon: here are then two portions of space really distinct from one another, since they receive two contradictory denominations, of being penetrated, and not being penetrated with the sun. This fully confutes those who venture to assert, that space is nothing but the immensity of God; and it is certain that the divine immensity could not be the place of bodies, without giving room to conclude that it is composed of as many parts really distinct, as there are bodies in the world. It will be in vain for you to alledge that infinity hath no parts, this must necessarily be false in all infinite numbers, since a number essentially includes several unities: nor will you have more reason to tell us, that incorporeal extension is wholly contained in its space, and also wholly contained in each part of its space (118); for not only we have no idea of it, and it thwarts all our ideas of extension, but besides it will prove that all bodies take up the same place, since each could not take up its own, if the Divine extension was entirely penetrated with each body, numerically the same with the sun, and with the earth. You will find in Mr Arnould a solid refutation of those who say that God is diffused throughout infinite spaces (119).

By this specimen of the difficulties which may be raised against a vacuum, my readers may easily apprehend, that our Zeno would, at this present time, be much more formidable than he was in his own age. It is no longer to be doubted, would he say, that if all is full, motion is impossible. This impossibility hath been Mathematically proved. He would be far from disputing against those demonstrations, but admitting them as incontestable; he would solely apply himself to prove the impossibility of a vacuum, and would reduce his adversaries to an absurdity. He would confute them on whatsoever sides they turned; he would plunge them into perplexities by his dilemmas; he would make them lose ground wherever they retired; and if he did not silence them, he would at least force them to confess, that they neither understood nor comprehend what they say. If any one ask me (they are Mr Locke's words) (123), what this space I speak of, is? I will tell him when he tells me what his extension is. . . . They ask whether this space be body or spirit? To which I answer by another question, Will you tell me what there can be only bodies and minds. If it be body, I will tell him what body is. If it be spirit, as (usually it is) Whether this space, void of body, be substance or accident, I shall readily answer, I know not: nor shall I be ashamed to own my ignorance, till he has answered that question, shew me a clear, distinct idea of substance (121). Since such a great Metaphysical vacuum, after having for well studied this subject, is not able to answer the questions of the Cartesian otherwise than by asking other questions which he thinks yet more obscure and perplexed than theirs, may judge that the objections which Zeno might propose, could not be answered; and we may certainly conjecture that he would speak thus to his adversaries: You shelter your felves in the hypothesis of a vacuum when you are driven from that of motion in a plenum; but you cannot hold out in this hypothesis the impossibility of it is demonstrated. Learn for a better way to come off by; for by that which you better already chosen you avoid one precipice, and throw yourselves into another. Follow me, I will shew you a better way: do not conclude, from the impossibility of motion in a plenum, that there is a vacuum, but rather conclude from the impossibility of a vacuum, that there is no motion, I mean real motion, but only an appearance of motion, or an ideal and intellectual motion. The Antients were so perplexed in their disputes about a vacuum, that some maintained that a vacuum and place were the matter of bodies. οὗτοι τινες εἶναι τοῦ κενῶ τῶν σωμάτων οὐκ οἶπες καὶ τόποι τοῦ αὐτοῦ τῶτο λεγόμενος, qui vacuum esse corpus materia dicunt, qui quidem etiam hoc idem afferunt esse (122).

From what has been said, let us deduce a few

I. The first is, That Zeno's dispute could not be wholly useless: for if he missed his main design, which

(118) Tota in toto & tota in singulis partibus.
This is what the school-men say of the presence of the soul in the human body, and of the presence of Angels in certain places.

(119) Arnault, Letters viii, to, to Father Malbranche. See particularly pp. 171, & pp. 171 & pp. 110 & pp. 110 of a book of Petit, a Physician of Paris, entitled de extensione animæ & rerum inoporeum natus; and Ifr de la Chambre's opinion published at Paris in the year 1666 in 4to, with the title, De l'extension de l'ame. All the respones allegées in extension and spirituality of may exist in as if trough, they only only fore flows the falling of his effort

we (120) Locke,
ro- ubi supra, p.
nly 188.

f a (121) 14 3
and 22, 189.

els, ome row you but ntelodies.

vidam
fr. lo-

W CO- Phys. Lib.
cap. viii.

not be design, saying; but it is certain that an answer of that nature is more sophistical than our Zeno's arguments [K]. I do not believe, what some affirm of him (d), that he taught that matter is composed of Mathematical points: I should rather think he asserted that it could not be composed of them (e). I must not forget that he was less firm and resolute in suffering detraction, than in suffering the tortures exercised on his body. He was very

(d) See below, citation (135).

(e) See Aristotle, Metaphys. lib. iii, cap. iv.

which was to prove that there is no motion, he would, however, have the advantage of strengthening his hypothesis of the acatalepsia, or incomprehensibility of all things. The demonstrations of our modern Mathematicians, to prove a vacuum, have convinced them that motion in a plenum is not comprehensible. They have therefore admitted the supposition of a vacuum, not because they did not find it surrounded with several inconceivable and inexplicable difficulties; but being obliged to chuse one out of two incomprehensible systems, they preferred that which least shocked them. They chose rather to satisfy themselves on the Mechanical, than the Metaphysical part, and even slighted the Physical difficulties which annoyed them; this, for instance, it is not possible to give a reason for the resistance of air and water, if there be but such a small quantity of matter, and so much vacuity in those two parts of the world. Other Mathematicians (123) deny a vacuum still, not but that they are sensible of the difficulties which obliged others to admit it; but they are more sensibly touched with the dismal perplexities they find in that supposition; they do not think it reasonable, on account of those difficulties, to renounce the clearest ideas which we have of the nature of extension. Observe, that some Philosophers of the first rank (124), do not believe that we know either what extension or substance is; they cannot talk otherwise as long as they believe a vacuum. This affords no small occasion of triumph to Zeno and all other Acataleptics: for while it is disputed whether we know, or are ignorant of the nature of substance and matter, it is a sign that we comprehend nothing, and that we can never be sure that we hit the mark, or that the objects of our mind resemble the ideas we have of them.

(123) Mr Leibniz, and Mr de Volder, a famous Professor of Philosophy and Mathematics in the university of Leyden.

(124) See, above, in citat. (120), Mr Locke's words.

The system of Spinoza is incompatible with a vacuum.

II. I shall observe by the way, that the hypothesis of a vacuum is the most proper in the world to overthrow Spinoza's system. For if there are two different extensions, the one simple, indivisible, and penetrable, the other compounded, divisible, and impenetrable; there must be more than one substance in the universe. This is the more easy to be inferred, by reason that the impenetrable substance would not be a perfect continuity, but a collection of corpuscles entirely separated from each other, and surrounded by a large incorporeal space. The Spinozists would not deny that each of these corpuscles is a particular substance distinct from that of all others. And thus by their own axioms, they must renounce their system, if they own that there is a vacuum.

A new proof against the real existence of extension.

III. The last consequence which I would draw, is that the disputes concerning a vacuum, have afforded a plausible reason to deny the real existence of any other than an ideal extension. They have perceived, in arguing against the Cartesians, who deny the possibility of a vacuum, that extension is a being which cannot be limited. It must then follow that there is no such thing as body in nature, or that there is an infinity of bodies. One of them cannot be destroyed without annihilating all the rest, nor can the smallest be preserved without preserving them all. Yet we know, by evident ideas, that when two things are really distinct, one of them may be preserved or destroyed without the preservation or destruction of the other; for as whatever is really distinct from a thing is accidental to it, and as each thing is capable of being preserved without that which is accidental to it, it follows that the body A, really distinct from the body B, may continue in being, without the body B subsisting, and that the preservation of the body A, doth not at all infer the preservation of the body B. Συμπεσυχός ἐστιν ὃ γίνεσθαι καὶ ἀπογίνεσθαι χωρὶς τῆς τῷ ὑποκειμένου φύσεως. Ἀccident est quod adest atque abest sine subiecti interitu (125). If this be true of accidents, which are the modes of a substance, as Porphyrius understands it here, it is truer still of an accidental substance with respect to others, as it is distinct from their essential attributes. Take notice that the school-men raise a great difficulty here on pretence that blackness cannot be separated from an Ethiopian. Wherefore they recur to the distinction between a mental and a real separation. This is a meer illusion; for the subject of the blackness of an Ethiopian is matter, which would not be destroyed, if the body of that man was calcined. This consequence which appears so clear and consistent with evident notions, cannot however agree with the subject of which we speak; and you cannot suppose, that all the bodies included in a chamber should perish, and the four walls be preserved; for in this case there will remain the same distance betwixt them as before; but this distance, say the Cartesians, is nothing but a body. Their doctrine then seems to infringe the sovereign liberty of the Creator, and his due unlimited power over all his works. He ought to enjoy a full right of creating few or many, according to his good pleasure, and of preserving or destroying this or that, as it seems good to him. The Cartesians may answer, that he may destroy each body in particular, provided he make another of the same magnitude; but is not this setting bounds to his liberty? Is not this imposing on him a sort of slavery, which necessarily obliges him to create a new body every time that he pleaseth to destroy another? These are difficulties which cannot be answered on the supposition that extension and body are the same thing; but they may all be retorted against those who propole them to Des Cartes, if at the same time they acknowledge a spacial extension really existent and distinct from matter. This extension cannot be finite, one part cannot be destroyed without the production of another, &c. But if the nature of penetrable or impenetrable extension draws along with it such a large train of inconveniencies, the shortest way is to assert that it hath no other existence than in our mind.

(125) Porphyry, lib. cap. v.

[K] An answer like that of Diogenes is more sophistical than our Zeno's arguments.] Πρὸς τὸν σιγῶντα ὅτι κινῆσις οὐκ ἐστὶν ἀνεύχως πειρατάται. Dicente sibi quodam non esse motum, exurgens ambulabat (126). (126) Diog.

--- When a certain person told him that there was no motion, he arose and walked. This is all we find on this head in Diogenes Laërtius. You see he relates the fact with great simplicity: but the Moderns have a little amplified it. 'Vulgo etiam fertur Diogenes, cum negari à Zenone motum localem audisset, illico surrexisset, & ita redituque aliquoties magnâ festinatione replicata inambulasset, & rogatus, quis cum subito enthusiasmus perculisset, respondisset: Zenonem refello (127). - It is also commonly reported that Diogenes, bearing Zeno deny local motion, immediately started up, and walked up and down several times with great speed; and being asked what sudden enthusiasm had seized him, he replied, I am refuting Zeno.' They have named the Philosopher who denied motion, they have embellished the circumstances of the practical answer, they have made it a subject of declamations for young Rhetoricians. I am surprized that Sextus Empiricus should not vouchsafe to name the person, who thus refuted the objections against the existence of motion. What he saith more particular is, that a Cynic made use of this way of refuting those objections: Ταῦτά τοι καὶ ἐρωτῆεις φιλόσοφε, τὸν κατὰ τῆς κινήσεως λόγον, σιωπῶν πειρατάτην. Ideoque cum proposita esset Philosopho oratio motum negans, tacitus ambulare cepit (128). --- This Philosopher bearing a discourse against motion, made no answer, but walked about. In another place he expresses himself thus: Διὸ καὶ τῶν Κυνικῶν τις ἐρωτῆεις κατὰ τῆς κινήσεως λόγον, ἵδεν ἀπεκρίνατο, ἀνίστη δὲ καὶ ἐβάδιον. ἔρχομαι καὶ διὰ τῆς ἐνεργείας παύσαι, ὅτι ὑπαρκτή ἐστιν ἡ κίνησις. Ideoque quidem ex Cynicis, cum ei proposita esset contra motum oratio, nihil respondit; sed surgens ambulare cepit, opere & actu ostendens existere motum (129). --- One of the Cynics, bearing a discourse against motion, made no answer; but arose, and began to walk; shewing, by experience, and in fact, that there is motion. It is better not to name the person, than to affirm that Diogenes, the (126) Diog. Laërt. lib. vi, num. 39.

(127) Libertus Fromondus, de compositione continui, pag. 6.

(128) Sextus Empiricus Pyrrhon. Hypotypos. lib. ii, cap. xiii, pag. 104.

(129) Id. lib. lib. iii, cap. viii, pag. 124.

very angry with a man who abused him; and when the world was surprized at his indignation,

(130) Diogenes the Cynic lived a long time after Zeno of Elea.

(131) Cosimbri-
cones in Phil.
Aristot. lib. vi.
cap. ii, pag. m.
218.

(132) Ibid. in
cap. viii, pag.
245.

(133) Franciscus
de Ovidio, Physic. Controvers.
xviii, pag. 334,
col. 1.

(134) Arist. Metaph. lib. iii,
cap. iv.

(135) Arriga, and many other Spanish school-men, call those men Zenonists who hold that matter is composed of indivisible and unextended parts. A very different opinion from that of the Atomists.

(136) Derodon, Disput. de At-omis, pag. 4, 5.
He quotes Sextus
Empiricus, lib.
ix, adv. Ma-them. § Arist.
Met. lib. i, de Generat. Text.
vii.

(137) Sext. Em-
pir. Pyrrh. Hy-pocy. lib. iii,
cap. viii, pag.
104.

the Cynic, and Zeno of Elea were the actors. This chronological error is inexcusable (130): the Jesuits of Coimbra have ascribed it to Simplicius without refuting it. And, in this particular, they fell in with the vulgar error. 'Certè, say they (131), hæc Zenonis tam absurda opinio nullo melius quàm experientie ipsius argumento refellitur. Quod Diogenes Cynicus fecit, ut refert Simplicius hoc in libro commento 53. & lib. 8. comment. 25. Nam cum Zenonis rationes aliquando audisset, surrexit, nec aliter quàm coram ambulando respondit. --- Certainly this absurd opinion of Zeno could not be refuted by a better argument, than that of experience itself. This was done by Diogenes the Cynic, as Sulpitius relates. For having once heard Zeno arguing against motion, he arose, and made him no other answer, but by walking before him.' They have avoided the other vulgar error; they do not believe that Zeno, who denied motion, and whose arguments Aristotle examined, was the founder of the Stoics; they have expressly named him Zeno of Elea (132). The passage which follows is full of faults: 'Continuum ex partibus indivisibilibus constare contra Aristotelem constanter defendebat Zeno Stoicorum Principes, quem ducem sunt sequuti ex Philosophis Democritus, & Leucippus. Ex Theologis Antiquis May-in 2. diff. 2. quest. 5. Gerardus apud Tantaletum hoc lib. quest. 1. & Aegidius discipulus D. Thom. lib. 1.
de generat. quest. 8. citatus à Veracruz 6. Physic.
speculat. 1. (133). -- Zeno, the chief of the Stoic Philosophers, constantly maintained against Aristotle, that matter was made up of indivisible parts. In this opinion he was followed by the Philosophers Democritus and Leucippus, and by the ancient Divines, Mayx, & Gerardus, and Aegidius the disciple of St Thomas.
There is no room to doubt that the author in this passage designed to speak of the same Zeno, whom Aristotle refuted in the ninth chapter of the sixth book of his Physics. But it doth not appear that Zeno of Elea taught that matter was composed of indivisible parts. He contented himself with talking advantage of the contrary doctrine, to shew the impossibility of motion. Nay, he asserted, that an indivisible body did not differ from nothingness (134); and I will make it appear below, that he did not admit of a composition in the universe. Notwithstanding, he is looked upon as the author of the sect which maintained, that matter is composed of Mathematical points (135). It would be more reasonable to ascribe this opinion to Pythagoras and Plato, as Derodon hath done, relying, with regard to Pythagoras, on the testimony of Sextus Empiricus, and, with relation to Plato, on that of Aristotle (136). But what a blunder is it to make the founder of the Stoics to be the guide of Democritus and Leucippus! Leucippus preceded Democritus, and both of them preceded the head of the Stoics by several Olympiads. Besides, their atoms formed a system very different from that which is attributed to the Zenonists about the composition of matter.

However it be, the answer of Diogenes the Cynic to the Philosopher who denied motion, is the sophistry which the Logicians call ignotatio Elenchis. Diogenes swerved from the state of the question; for the Philosopher did not deny apparent motion; he did not deny that it appeared to men that there is such a thing as motion; but he asserted that nothing did really move, and proved it by very subtle and perplexing reasons. See what Sextus Empiricus says of the Sceptics:
'Ὅσον μὲν γὰρ ἐπὶ τοῖς φαινομένοις δοκεῖν εἶναι κίνησιν, ὅσον δὲ ἐπὶ τῷ φιλοσόφῳ λόγῳ μὴ ὑπάρ-χειν. Quantum ad apparentia quidem videri esse mo-tum, sed quatenus quis Philosophicam rationem sequatur non esse (137). -- In appearance there is motion, but, according to Philosophy, there is none. What does it then make against this assertion, to walk, or cut a caper? Is it proving any thing besides the appearance of motion? and was that the subject in dispute? Did the Philosopher deny that appearance? Not in the least; he was not fool enough to deny ocular Phænomena, but he asserted that the evidence of the senses ought to be sacrificed to ratiocination. Consult Aristotle; he will inform you that several ancient Philosophers, who having found reasons for absolutely denying the plurality of parts, the divisibility, and mobility of the world, afterwards made no account of the testimony of the senses. 'Εκ μὲν ἔν τῶν τῶν λόγων, ὑπερβαίνον τὴν αἰσθησιν καὶ παρὰ τὴν αὐτὴν, ὡς τῷ λόγῳ δὲον ἀπολαύειν, εἶναι οἷον τὸ παῦν ἐν, καὶ ἀκίνητον, καὶ ἀπερὶον ἐνιοι. Ob hoc ce igitur rationes nonnulli sensum prætereuntes, despicen-tesque quasi rationem sequi ducem oporteat, universum ip-sum, unum & immobile & infinitum esse afferunt (138). (138) Aristotle.

de Generat. & Corruptione, lib. i,
cap. viii, pag. m. 255.

Parmenides and Melissus are the ancient Philosophers of whom he speaks. It must be believed that Zeno of Elea retained the substance of the doctrine of Parmenides, his master. Plutarch having said, that Parmenides admitted the eternity and immutability of all things, adds, that Zeno of Elea did not particularize any thing, but seemed to float in uncertainty. 'Ἰδὼν μὲν ἔδεν ἐξέθετο, διηπόρησε δὲ περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ αἰσίοις.
Nihil hoc in genere singulare vulgavit, sed anticipi free dubitationis æstu fluctuavit (139). But others declare (140) that with Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Melissus, he taught the unity and incorruptibility of all things, and the imperfection of the evidence of the senses. He was not humble enough to continue in his master's principles without any alteration: we see his innovations in a book (141) ascribed to Aristotle.
They do not hinder his believing that there was no generation: so that by a necessary consequence of his principles, he was obliged to deny the motion, di-visibility, composition of matter, &c. We have already seen in the article XENOPHANES, that the author of the Art of Thinking, hath censured Aristotle, in favour of Parmenides and Melissus. And attempts have long since been made to give their opinion a favourable sense, and a great air of conformity to the principle of the orthodox, concerning the nature of God. But, in all appearance, Aristotle doth not deserve censure here; for he very well apprehended, and exactly related what they taught, and consequently we must believe their system to be a sort of Spinozism.
There is no room for imagining (142) that they expressed themselves by riddles or emblems; for the particular doctrine of the unity and immutability of all things was a consequence of several clear and evident principles. See above the article XENOPHANES, towards the beginning of remark [L]. So NES, towards the beginning of remark [L]. So that it was in good earnest, and as a systematical doctrine, and not as a witty conceit, that they denied motion, and asserted that its existence was barely mental.
Here follow the names of some apologists for those Philosophers (143): 'Si prædicti Philosophi suum illud dogma ad hujus tam recondite veritatis intelligentiam retulere (144), non modo reprehendendi non sunt, sed magnopere etiam commendandi. Certe Parmenidem defendit, atque interpretatur Simplicius, hoc in libro ad textum 6. Bessarion, 2. Libro contra Calumniatorem Platonis, capite 3. & Nicolaus Cusa, in lib. de filiatione Dei. Lege etiam pro eodem re Eugubinum, lib. 3. de perenni Philo-sophia cap. 6. & 7. F. Mirandula lib. 6. de examine vanitatis, cap. 1. -- If the above-mentioned Philosophers, in that opinion of theirs, had regard to this hidden truth, (viz. That all things are contained in the Divine goodness in an unmeasurable degree, and solely as every member is uniformly contained in the unity, and as all lines joining together in one center from which they proceeded, are contained in that point) they are not only not to be censured, but they deserve highly to be praised. Certainly Simplicius, in that book, defends and explains the opinion of Parmenides; Bessarion, in his second book against the calumniator of Plato, and Nicolaus Cusa, in his book on the Filiation of GOD, do the same thing. Read also on this subject Eugubinus's eternal Philosophy, and Mirandula's examination of Vanity.'

The result of all this is, that Diogenes's answer was sophistical, tho' it was proper to gain the applause of the company; it was a scoffing answer, but I believe also that the Philosopher whom it concerned did only despise it. Perhaps he heartily laughed at it; being a thousand times happier than the sophist Diodorus, who was not in a laughing humour, when his lectures against the existence of motion, were attacked by a malicious irony.
Having put his shoulder out of joint, he applied to He-rophilus, the Physician, to have it set: How, said the doctor? Your shoulder dislocated! that cannot be; for it is neither removed out of the place where it was, nor where indignation, he answered if I was insensible of calumny, I should be likewise insensible of praise (f). This answer is unworthy of a Philosopher.

(f) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 89, pag. 566.

where it was not. This was one of the sophist's reasons against motion. If a body moves, said he, it must move either in the place where it is, or in the place where it is not. But it doth not move either in the place where it is, (for if it is there, it doth not depart) or in the place where it is not, for it can neither act nor suffer where it is not. Therefore, &c. Diodorus being then very little disposed to relish this Logic, intreated Herophilus not to remember his discourses, but to give him the necessary remedy (145).

(145) Sextus Empiricus, ubi supra, lib. ii, cap. xxii.

Z E N O, an Epicurean Philosopher, a native of Sidon, gloriously maintained the honour of his sect; for he acquired a great reputation (a). Amongst other disciples he had Cicero and Pomponius Atticus [A], whence we may judge of the time when he lived. Vossius is mistaken on that head [B]. Zeno is represented as a Philosopher who

(a) See the remark [A], citation (6).

[A] Among other disciples he had Cicero and Pomponius Atticus. Mr Menage's words are: 'Zenonem Sidonium & Cicero & Atticus Athenis audiverunt, ut indicat ipse Cicero libro II. & V. de finibus, & lib. III. Tuscul. Quest. & libro I. Academ. ---' Both Cicero and Atticus heard at Athens the lectures of Zeno the Sidonian, as Cicero himself intimates in his second and fifth book de Finibus, and in his third book of Tusculan Questions, and in his first book of Academical Questions. I found the passage in the third book of the Tusculan Questions, and as it contains one of our Zeno's opinions, I shall set it down. 'Solent isti negare nos intelligere quid dicat Epicurus. Hoc dicit, & hoc ille græculus me audiente Athenis fenex Zeno istorum acutissimus contendere, & magna voce dicere solebat, eum esse beatum, qui præsentibus voluptatibus frueretur, consideretque se fruturum aut in omni, aut in magna parte vite, dolore non interveniente: aut si interveniret, si summus foret, futurum brevem: si productior, plus habiturum jucundi quam mali. Hæc cogitantem fore beatum, præsertim si & ante præceptis bonis contentus esset, nec mortem, nec deos extimesceret. Habes formam Epicuri vite beatæ verbis Zenonis expressam, nihil ut possit negari (1). --- These people are wont to deny that we understand the meaning of Epicurus. This is what he means, and it is what the old man Zeno the Greek, the most acute of all the Epicurean Philosophers, used to maintain and solemnly affirm, when I heard his lectures at Athens, viz. That the man is happy who enjoys the present pleasures, and who is confident that he shall continue to enjoy them during all, or the greatest part of his life, without any intermission of pain; or if pain should intervene, and be acute, that it shall be but of short continuance, or otherwise that it shall have more good than evil in it; that the man who lives in these thoughts shall be happy, especially if he is furnished with good precepts, and is not afraid either of death, or of the gods. Here you have a description of Epicurus's happy life, expressed in the words of Zeno's so that no part of it can be denied. I have also found the passage in the first book of the Academical Questions: it is as follows: 'Carneades nullius philosophiæ partis ignarus, & ut cognovi ex iis qui illum audierant, maximeque ex Epicureo Zenone (2) qui quum ab eo plurimum dissentiret, unum tamen præter ceteros mirabatur, incredibili quadam fuit facilitate (3). --- Carneades was skilled in all the parts of Philosophy, and had an incredible facility in imparting his knowledge; as I have been informed by those who have heard his lectures, and especially by Zeno the Epicurean, who tho' he differed greatly from Carneades in his opinions, yet was a greater admirer of him than of any other Philosopher.' I have not found the passage in the second book de Finibus (4), but I have found this in the first book. 'Hic mihi Phædrum, inquam, mentitum, aut Zenonem putas, quorum utrumque audiui, quum mihi nihil sanè præter sedulitatem probarent. Omnes mihi Epicuri sententiæ satis notæ sunt, atque eos quos nominavi cum Attico nostro, frequenter audiui, quum miraretur ille quidem utrumque, Phædrum autem etiam amaret, quotidieque inter nos, ea quæ audiebamus, conferebamus: neque erat unquam controversia quid ego intelligerem, sed quid probarem (5). --- In this matter, either Phædrus, or Zeno, you think, have imposed upon me. I attended the lectures of both these Philosophers: but indeed they recommend nothing to me besides application and diligence. All the opinions of Epicurus are well known to me, and I, and our friend Atticus have frequently heard the lectures of these two Philosophers. He was an admirer of them both, and had even a great affection for Phædrus. We used daily to confer together on what we heard, nor did ever any dispute arise concerning what I understood, but what I approved. Let us add to these three passages, that wherein the Pontif Cotta, Cicero's cotemporary, acknowledges himself to have been a disciple of this famous Epicurean: 'Zenonem, quem Philo noster coryphæum appellare Epicureorum solebat, quum Athenis essem, audiebam frequenter, & quidem ipso autore Philone, credo ut facilius judicarem, quàm illa bene refellerentur, quum à principe Epicureorum accepissem quemadmodum dicerentur. Non igitur ille ut plerique, sed isto modo ut tu, distincte, graviter, ornate. Sed quod in illo mihi usu sæpe venit, idem modo quum te audirem acciderat, ut molestè ferrem tantum ingenium (bona venia me audies) in tam leves, ne dicam in tam ineptas sententias incidisse (6). When I was at Athens, I frequently heard the lectures of Zeno, whom our friend Philo used to call the chief of the Epicureans. And, indeed, it was Philo who advised me to attend these lectures, in order, I believe, that I might be the better able to judge whether these opinions were well refuted, when I should have heard them in the words of the chief of the Epicureans. Zeno did not express himself like most of his sect. His expressions were, like your's, distinct, weighty, and eloquent. But what often happened to me with regard to him, the same thing occurred when I heard you, I was grieved that so great a genius should have fallen (permit me to say so) into such slight, if not foolish and idle opinions.'

(6) Idem, de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxi.

(7) Gassendus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. ii, cap. vi, pag. m. 187. He quotes Cicero, lib. i, de Nat. Deor. (but 'tis Cicero was an auditor of Zeno, for 'tis Cotta who speaks) & lib. v, Epist.

Mr Menage hath not, like Gassendus, referred us to one of Cicero's letters to Atticus, to find the great friendship which these two illustrious Romans had for our Zeno. 'Quando Cicero & ipsum audivit & de eodem ad Atticum scribens: Zenonem, inquit, tam dilige quam tu (7). --- Cicero, who was a disciple of Zeno, writes thus of him to Atticus, I love Zeno as much as you do.' Gassendus seems to me to be mistaken. This letter of Cicero was written in the year of Rome 702. What probability is there that Zeno was living at that time, since he was very old when Cicero was present at his lectures in the year of Rome 674 (8)? Is it probable, if he was then living, that we should not find some particular concerning his great age, in the Epistle of Cicero, cited by Gassendus, nor in the preceding letter, where he mentions the same man? Observe, that in the best editions, for instance, that of Mr Gravii, this Philosopher is not called Zeno but Xeno. Manutius's conjecture on this head is incomparably better than that of Corradus. According to Corradus the Epicurean Philosopher is meant there (9); but, according to Manutius, Cicero speaks of an agent of Pomponius Atticus (10). Observe, that it is believed by several authors, that Lucetius was a disciple of our Zeno (11), and see what I have remarked (12) against the memoir, wherein the Baron des Coëturs was censured for having advanced that Zeno was the honour of the Epicurean sect.

(8) Zenonem Athenis Cicero & Atticus A. U. DCLXXIV. Olymp. CLXXV, se nem audiverint. Jonius de Script. Hist. Philo. pag. 183.

(9) Corradus in Ciceronis Epist. xi, Libri v, ad Atticum, pag. 497, Edit. Græv.

(10) Manutius in x Epistolam Ciceronis ad Atticum, lib. v, pag. 151, Edit. Græv. See the same Cicero, Epist. xxxvii, lib. xiii, ad Atticum, & ibi Manutium, aliquo comment.

(11) See the remark [M], in the article LUCRETIVS.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Vossius, de Hist. Græci, lib. i, cap. xvi, pag. 105, & lib. iv, cap. x, pag. 466.

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. x, num. 25.

(1) Cicero, Tuscul. Quest. lib. iii, cap. xviii.

(2) There is in my edition of Epicurus & Zenon, which is a fault.

(3) Idem. Acad. Quest. lib. i, in fine.

(4) Fabricius, in Vita Ciceronis, ad an. 674, quotes also the second book, de Finibus.

(5) Cicero, lib. i, de Finibus, cap. v.

who treated his adversaries with a great deal of contempt, and very harshly [C]. There is scarce any greater proof of his boldness than the book which he wrote against the Mathematics [D]; a work which is lost, as well as that written by Posidonius to confute

Epicurus died in the second year of the CXXXVIIth Olympiad, and Cicero heard Zeno in the 674th year of Rome, that is, the first year of the CLXXVth Olympiad, it is impossible that Zeno should have been instructed by an auditor of Epicurus. There are above one hundred and ninety years betwixt the death of Epicurus, and the year when Cicero heard Zeno's lectures. See Jonsius (15), who hath taken notice of this mistake of Vossius. Mr Menage has adopted it (16).

(15) Jonsius, ubi supra, pag. 184.

(16) Menage in Laert. lib. vii, num. 35, pag. 279.

(17) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxiv, pag. 135, Edit. Lefcaloperii.

(18) See Laert. Divin. Instit. lib. iii, cap. xii, pag. m. 201.

(19) 'Από τοῦ ἐπὶ Ζηνῶν, quod est aliquod exenatrat.

(20) Proclus, pag. 55, apud Barrow, Lect. V Mathem. pag. 76.

(21) Menag. in Laert. lib. vii, num. 35, pag. 279, col. 1.

(22) Huetius, Demonstr. E. num. 3, pag. 6, Edit. Lips. 1694.

(23) See Huetius, ubi supra, Arithm. iv, pag. 28, 29.

[C] He treated his adversaries with a great deal of contempt, and very harshly. Cotta attempting to prove that the Epicureans were slanderous, alleges our Zeno. (17) Zeno quidem non eos solum qui tum erant Apollodorum, Syllum, ceterosque fagebat maledictis, sed Socratem ipsum parentem philosophiae latino verbo utens scurram Atticum fuisse dicebat (18). Chrysippum nunquam nisi Chrysippum (19) vocabat. Zeno not only railed against Apollodorus, Syllus, and the other Philosophers of that time, but he said that Socrates himself, the parent of Philosophy, was an Athenian buffoon, and he always called Chrysippus, Chrysippus [that is a bitten fellow].

[D] The book which he wrote against the Mathematicians. We are informed of this by Proclus (20), who adds that Posidonius refuted it. Mr Menage cites some of Proclus's words: Eum (Zenonem) integro volumine refutavit Posidonius Apamensis; alias Rhodius; teste Proclo libro III. ad 1. Euclidis. Ζηνων, inquit, ὁ Σιδωνίῳ, τῆς Ἐπικύρου μετέχων αἰρέσεως, πρὸς ὃν καὶ ὁ Ποσειδώνιος ὅλον γέγραψε βιβλίον, δεικνύς σαφὲν αὐτὸ πᾶσαν τὴν ἐπινόειαν (21). Huetius having told us that Epicurus rejected Geometry, and the other parts of the Mathematics, because he believed, that they, being founded on false principles, could not be true, adds, that Zeno attacked them another way. This was by alleging that in order to render them certain, some things should have been added to their principles which were not joined to them. Alia via adversus Geometriam grassabatur Zeno Epicureus, imperfecta ejus esse docens initia, unde nihil effici posset, nisi alia quaedam adicerentur, quae in iis praetermissa sunt: quam ejus sententiam toto libro confutare conatus est Posidonius (22). The Mathematics are the most evident and certain of all human sciences, and yet they have met with opposers. If our Zeno had been a great Metaphysician, and followed different principles from those of Epicurus, he might have composed a book not very easy to be refuted, and cut out more work for the Geometricians than they imagine. All sciences have their weak side; nor are the Mathematicians free from that defect. Indeed very few people are able to oppose them well, because to succeed in this engagement it is requisite not only to be a good Philosopher, but also a very profound Mathematician. But those endued with the latter quality are so ravished with the certainty and evidence of their inquiries, that they never think of examining whether there be any illusion in them, or whether the first foundation be well established. They rarely think of suspecting any deficiency in them. But what is very certain is that several disputes prevail amongst the most famous Mathematicians. They refute one another, and answers and replies multiply among them as well as among other learned men. We observe this among the Moderns, and it is certain that the Antients were not more unanimous (23). It is a proof that there are in this road several dark paths, and that a man may wander and lose the track of truth. This must of necessity be the lot of one side or the other, since one affirms what the other denies. It may be urged that this is the fault of the Artificer, but not of the art, and that all those disputes proceed from some Mathematicians mistaking that for a demonstration which is not so; but that very thing shews that there are some obscurities in this science. Besides, the same thing may be urged, with respect to the disputes of other learned men. It may be said, that if they closely followed the rules of Logic, they would avoid the wrong consequences, and false assertions which mislead them. Nevertheless we must confess, that there are many Philosophical subjects, concerning which the best Logicians are incapable of coming to a certainty, by reason of the want of evidence in the object; but the object of the Mathematics is free from this inconvenience. Be it so; yet there is in this object a very great and irreparable defect; for it is a meer chimera which cannot possibly exist. Mathematical points, and consequently the lines and surfaces, globes and axes, of the Geometricians are fictions which never can have a being: they are therefore inferior to those of the Poets; for the latter commonly contain nothing that is impossible, but have at least probability and possibility. Gassendus made an ingenious observation. He says that the Mathematicians, and especially the Geometricians, have established their empire in the land of abstractions and ideas, where they walk at their ease; but that when they get into the country of realities, they soon meet with an invincible resistance. Mathematici, imprimisque Geometrae, quantitate abstrahentes à materia, quoddam quasi regnum sibi ex ea fecerunt quamlibetimum; quippe nullo factu à materie crassitie, pertinaciae impedimento, Quare & supposuere imprimis in ea sic abstracta ejusmodi dimensiones, ut punctum, quod foret proprius immune partibus fluendo lineam, longitudinemve latitudinis expertem crearet, &c. . . . Atque ita quidem suppositiones sunt, ex quibus Mathematici intra purae, abstractae Geometriae cancellos, & quasi regnum consistentes suas illas praclaras Demonstrationes texunt (24). . . . Uno igitur verbo Mathematici sunt, qui in suo illo abstractionis regno ea indivisibilia supponunt, quae sine partibus, sine longitudo, sine latitudine sint, ac eam multitudinem, divisionemque partium, quae ad finem nequam perveniat; non item verò Physici, quibus in regno materiae versantibus tale nihil licet (25). . . . The Mathematicians, and especially the Geometricians, by abstracting quantity from matter, have erected for themselves a sort of empire, where they enjoy the greatest liberty, as they never meet with any obstacle from the grossness and stubbornness of matter. Accordingly they have, in the first place, supposed that in quantity thus abstracted, there are such dimensions as a point, which hath no parts, and a line, or length without breadth, generated by the flowing of a point, &c. . . . Such are the suppositions, by virtue of which the Mathematicians retire within the limits of pure and abstract Geometry, and as it were into a separate kingdom, where they compose their famous demonstrations. . . . In a word, it is the Mathematicians, who in this their empire of abstractions, suppose those things to be indivisible, which are without parts, without length, or breadth, and that where there is a division of parts, it may be carried on in infinitum. It is not thus with the natural Philosophers, who having to do with the material world, and living, as it were, in the empire of matter, cannot take such liberty. He gives an instance of the vanity of their pretended demonstrations, in two subtle Mathematicians who attempted to prove that a finite and an infinite quantity are equal. Nuper Viri praecleari Cavalierius, & Torricellius ostendunt de acuto quodam solido infinito longo & cuipiam latitudine parallelepipedo, cylindroque finito equali (26). Others prove that there are infinite quantities bounded on each side (27). If they find evidence in demonstrations of that kind, ought it not to be suspected, since after that kind, all, it doth not over balance the evidence with which common sense informs us, that what is finite can never be equal with what is infinite, and that infinity as infinity cannot have any bounds? I add, that it is not true, that evidence can accompany those gentlemen quote an author who is very well acquainted with their subtilties. 'It were to be wished, saith he (28), that the analysis of infinitely small quantities, which is pretended to be so admirably fertile, should carry in its demonstrations that evidence which is, and of right ought to be expected in Geometry. But when they argue on the infinite, on the infinite of infinity, &c. they argue on the infinite of infinity, and so on, without ever finding terms to stop them, and when they apply to finite magnitudes, these infinites of infinites, those whom they would either instruct or convince, have not confute it. There are some who more regret the loss of these two books, than that of twenty

(39) Ibid. pag. 430.

EXTRACTS from a letter, written by the Chevalier de Méru, to Mr
Pascal.

'not always the penetration requisite to see clearly in: to such profound abysses . . . (29) Those who are accustomed to the old ways of reasoning in Geometry, do not easily quit them to follow such abstract methods; they choose rather not to go so far than to engage in the new paths of the infinite of infinite of infinite, where one doth not always see very clearly about one, and where it is easy to go astray without perceiving it. For it is not sufficient, in Geometry, to conclude, we must evidently see that the conclusion is just.'

It is a pretty good prejudice against the Mathematics, that Mr Pascal despised them even before he gave himself up to devotion. He had been passionately fond of the Mathematics, and had made extraordinary progress in them. He was, besides, endued with a very solid judgment, and very few people were capable of knowing the value of things better than he. It was not by his conversion to the only thing necessary, that he became disgusted at these sciences which had so charmed him. It was the examination of the thing itself; and the reflexion he made on the discourse of a layman, which cured him of his prepossession. It would be foolish to imagine that the Chevalier de Méru attacked him with pious reflexions. He undoubtedly made use of no other than Philosophical considerations: Let us see the effect of them, and cite the beginning of a letter from him to Mr Pascal. 'Do you remember you told me once that you were no longer so fully persuaded of the excellency of the Mathematics. And now you write to me that I have wholly undeceived you, and discovered to you some things which you had never seen, if you had not known me. But yet, Sir, I do not know whether you are so much obliged to me as you think. For you still retain a habit, which you have got from that science, viz. of not determining on any thing whatsoever, otherwise than by your demonstrations, which most frequently are false. The tedious ratiocinations drawn from line to line perplex you in a more sublime knowledge which never deceives . . . but you will continually remain in those errors into which the false demonstrations of Geometry have plunged you, and I do not believe you entirely cured of the Mathematics, as long as you affirm that the little bodies, concerning which we disputed the other day, may be divided in infinitum (30).' The Chevalier de Méru makes him afterwards several objections on the divisibility of matter in infinitum. Some of them are pretty good, and others very bad, and look rather like pleasantry than ratiocination; it is truly surprising that the same letter should be mixed with so many unequal things. The author, nevertheless, boasts of a prodigious ability in the sciences of which we are speaking. You

(30) Lettres de Mr le Chevalier de Méru, num. 19, pag. 60, Dutch Edit.

(31) Ibid. pag. 63.

(32) It should be Fermat.

(33) Hoetius, ubi supra, Axiom. xv, num. 3, pag. 31.

(34) Ibid. num. 2, pag. 23, & seq. See also from page 14, to page 19.

Another passage of the Chevalier de Méru's letter runs thus: 'I put you in mind that besides this natural world, which falls under the cognizance of ourselves, there is another invisible, and that it is in the latter that you may attain to the most sublime knowledge.

V O L. V.

'Those who only consider the material world, commonly judge very ill, and always grossly, like Des Cartes, whom you so highly esteem, who did not know the space of places otherwise than by the bodies which fill them But without undertaking to convince him of this error, know that it is in this invisible world, of an infinite extension, that we are enabled to discover the reasons, and principles of things, most hidden truths, the fitness, exactness, and proportion, and the true originals and perfect ideas of all that we search (35).' This is the conclusion of his letter to Mr Pascal: I beg leave to say that I do not apprehend what he drives at; for his expressions are so loose and indefinite, that one may draw conclusions from them, which would be quite contrary to what he must have thought and represented. His design was to cure Mr Pascal entirely of the fondness he had for the Mathematics: he therefore intended to point out to him another object than that of this science, to point it out to him, I say, as the source and seat of those truths after which we aspire; and yet he describes to him an object which very nearly resembles that of the Mathematics: For they do not consider this world which falls under the cognizance of our senses, but that invisible world, of an infinite extension, where we may discover the fitness, proportion, &c. I believe he intended to recommend the Philosophy of ideas, the most subtle Metaphysics, which only tend to the contemplation of spirits, and the intelligible world which is in the mind of God: but the characteristics, which distinguish that science from the Mathematics, have not been considered by him; nor did he remember that the Mathematics have this principal property of considering extension as separated from matter and every sensible quality. Extension, or intelligible matter, is their object as sensible matter is that of Physics (36). Their excellency, according to the Ancients, consists in disengaging us from perishable corporeal things, and raising us to those which are spiritual, immutable, and eternal. Thence it proceeded that Plato disliked the conduct of some Mathematicians who attempted to verify on matter their speculative propositions (37). I shall here transcribe a most excellent passage of Plutarch, which turns on a saying of Plato, that God is continually employed in Geometrical exercises (38). 'This saying . . . intimates . . . what he himself has often mentioned, when he praised Geometry as a science that takes men off from sensible objects, and fixes their thoughts on such as are intellectual and eternal, the contemplation of which is the end of all Philosophy, as the viewing of mysteries is the end of mystical religion: for of all the mischiefs

(35) Chevalier de Méru, ubi supra, pag. 68, 69.

which arise to us from that sympathy in pain and pleasure which fastens the soul to the body, this is the greatest, that it renders sensible things more evident to us than intellectual, and forces the understanding to judge, rather according to passion than reason: for man being accustomed by his feeling of pain or pleasure, to regard the mutable and uncertain nature of bodies as a thing actually subsisting, grows blind, and loses the knowledge of that which really subsists, and destroys that instrument and light of the soul, which is worth a thousand bodily eyes, and by which alone the Deity can be discerned. Now in all the other Mathematical sciences, as in plain and smooth mirrors, the images and marks of the truth of intellectual objects appear, but Geometry chiefly, as being the parent of all the rest, withdraws, and, as it were, purifies and sets loose the understanding from the thoughts of sensible objects: and therefore Plato himself reprehended Eudoxus, Archytas, and Menechmus, for endeavouring to reduce the doubling of the cube to Mechanical operations, as if it was impossible to find out two lines which could be demonstrated to be mean proportionals. For he objected to them that all that was good in Geometry would be lost and corrupted, if it was made to fall back again to sensible things, instead of rising higher and contemplating those immaterial and immortal images, to which God was always attentive, and of which he was also the cause (39). Several passages of Aristotle (40) inform us, that quantity, as disengaged

(36) Hec est illa quantitas, que dici solet materia intelligibilis ad differentiam materie sensibilis que ad Physicum spectat; illa enim ab hac per intellectum separatur, ac sola intellectu percipitur. Biancanus, de natura Mathematicarum, pag. 6.

(37) Plutarch, in Marcello, pag. 305.

(38) Τὸν θεὸν δὲ διὰ τὴν γεωμετρίαν Deum semper geometriam tractare. Plut. Sympos. lib. viii, cap. ii, pag. 718. Note, that the Moderns, who doubt of the existence of bodies, might make use of this maxim, and say, that the action of God upon our minds, whereby he communicates to us the ideas of extension, and those of numbers, and motion, and of the relations of swiftness to space and duration, &c. is only a Geometrical work.

(39) Ibid.

(40) Vossius, de Scient. Mathematicis, pag. 4, & lib. quinta them.

7 S

twenty or thirty dramatical pieces, or that of the best Historians of antiquity.

from whatever falls under the senses, is the object of the Mathematicians. And the greatest part of the Mathematicians own, that this object exists no where but in the mind. Dr Barrow disapproves the granting this (41). His censure falls expressly on the Jesuit Blancanus and on Vossius; but it is certain that Blancanus was in the right, and ought not to have been censured for any thing besides asserting the possibility of the existence of the globe and triangle &c. of the Geometricians: 'Ultimo dici potest: hæc entia esse possibilia, quis enim neget Angelum, aut Deum esse posse efficere (42)?' ----- In the last place it may be said that these are possible Beings; for what man will pretend that an Angel, or that GOD cannot produce them? There is no need of a long discourse to shew it impossible that this globe, or that triangle, &c. should really exist; we need only remember that such a globe placed on a plane, would only touch it in one indivisible point, and that rolling on the plane, it would touch it always in a single point. From whence it will result, that it must be wholly composed of unextended parts; but that is impossible, and manifestly includes this contradiction, that an extension would exist and not be extended. It would exist according to the supposition, and it would not be extended, since it would not be at all distinct from a being not extended. All Philosophers agree that the material cause is not distinct from its effect; wherefore what would be composed of unextended parts, would not be distinct from them: but whatever is the same thing with an unextended being, is necessarily an unextended thing. Our Divines, when they teach that the world was produced out of nothing, do not mean that it is composed of nothing: the word nothing doth not signify the material cause of the world, material ex qua; but the state antecedent to the creation of the world, which they call terminum à quo, and they acknowledge that taking the word nothing in the first sense, it is absolutely impossible that the world should have been made of it. Now it is not more extravagant to assert, that the world was made of nothing as of its material cause, than to affirm that a foot of extension is composed of unextended parts (43). It is not therefore possible that either an Angel, or God himself, should ever produce the triangle, the plane, the circle, &c. of the Geometricians; and therefore Blancanus deserved on this head to be censured.

I leave my readers to determine whether my censure of the last passage of the Chevalier de Mézière is well grounded.

(41) Compare with this what has been said above, at the beginning of the remark (C), in the foregoing note.

ZEUXIS, a very famous Painter, flourished four hundred years before CHRIST, towards the XCVth Olympiad [A]. What we know of his country is a little confused

[A] He flourished towards the XCVth Olympiad.] Mr Moreri is guilty of a fault in saying only that Zeuxis lived in the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad

(1) for he ought to have known that Pliny, who exactly specified the time when this Painter lived (2), namely in the fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad (3), refutes those who have placed it in the LXXXIXth. I am surprized that Scaliger hath not observed this in his note on the place of Eusebius, which makes Zeuxis to flourish in the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad. Eusebius deserved to be censured; since it is undeniable, without contradicting almost all those who speak of Zeuxis, that he was very intimately known to Archelaus King of Macedon. But there were two of the name of Archelaus, and the first not having begun his reign, according to Eusebius's chronology, before the beginning of the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad, Zeuxis must be arrived at a very remarkable old age, if the time of his flourishing fell on the LXXXVIIIth Olympiad, and if nevertheless he painted at Archelaus's court. I own these things are not incompatible; but let that be as it will Eusebius was too forward; he ought to have referred Zeuxis to the reign of this Macedonian King. I shall observe by the way, that the manner in which the Ancients place the chronology of illustrious men, may tend to confusion. The year of their birth and that of their death ought to be specified, and not the time when they flourished; for that is indefinite and uncertain, it is early or late in a man's life, according to tempers and opportunities: some are at the highest pitch of their reputation at the age of thirty. Others do not reach it till sixty. This makes me recollect the proof which Pliny uses against those who place Zeuxis in the LXXXIXth Olympiad. He refutes them by this reason, that it is an Olympiad wherein we must necessarily place the Painter who taught Zeuxis. This reason may pass, considering the time when Zeuxis appears in Pliny: but if we change in the text the LXXXIXth Olympiad into the LXXIXth, as Father Hardouin hath done on the authority of the manuscripts, Pliny's reasoning will hardly appear just; he will refute those, who say that Painter flourished in the LXXIXth Olympiad, he will refute them, I say, by shewing that to be the time where the master of Zeuxis ought to be placed. But why must this time be assigned to him? Because Zeuxis did not signalize himself before the end of the XCVth Olympiad. This is a weak reason. Must not a Painter grow famous till sixty years after his apprenticeship? I would therefore prefer the common reading of Pliny to that of the manuscripts in the king's library. I do not impute to fo learned a man as Father Hardouin, what I am going to say; his Printers must have left out some numbers. He pretends that Suidas agrees with Pliny on the time of Zeuxis, since Suidas, relying on Aristotle, places the birth of this Painter in the LXXXVth Olympiad, and makes him flourish in the time of Ilocrates. A little after he refutes the vulgar reading of Pliny, concerning the LXXXIXth Olympiad, by reason that it is evident even from what he had just before cited out of Suidas, that Zeuxis died in the LXXXIXth Olympiad. I am sure that if my eyes do not deceive me, Father Hardouin's Printers have confounded the numeral letters of the original.

As for the rest I would not depend too much on the time specified by Pliny; it seems to me to be wrong. 'Ab hoc (Apollodoro) artis fores apertas Zeuxis Heracleotes intravit, Olympiades nonagesima quinte anno quarto, audentemque jam aliquid penicillum (de hoc enim adhuc loquimur) ad magnam gloriam perduxit, à quibusdam falso in octogesima nona Olympiade positus, cum fuisse necesse est Demophilum Himeræum, & Neseam Thasium, quoniam utrius eorum discipulus fuerit, ambigitur (4). ----- (4) Plin. lib. 36, cap. 19. Apollodorus having discovered the first rudiments of this art, Zeuxis of Heraclea improved it in the fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad, and from that infancy of glory in which it then was, brought it to the highest perfection. Some authors falsely place him in the LXXXIXth Olympiad: whereas Demophilus Himeræus, and Neseas Thasius, must have flourished at that time, it being doubted of which of these two Painters he was the disciple.' There is no need of being very nice about the time of the reputation of a great man, and it were easy to prove, from this author's own words, that he had been more exact, if he had marked the chronology somewhat more generally. For what doth he mean by this fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad? Does he mean that before this year Zeuxis lived in obscurity, and did not begin to make himself known till then? But this is not a proper way of specifying the time when any person flourished; it ought to be specified with respect to a reputation of some continuance; and if Pliny had done otherwise with regard to Zeuxis, he would have been very much mistaken. In effect, he informs us that this Painter did not give his pieces for nothing, till after he was exceeding rich. But when he gave them away Archelaus was living; for the present of his Pan to Archelaus is one of the examples of his liberality related by Pliny. He had therefore acquired vast riches and a great reputation by painting before the death of the last Archelaus, of the XCIVth that is, before the end of the XCVth Olympiad (5); and (41) Isaac Barrow, Lect. V, pag. 85.

(42) Blancanus, ubi supra, p. 7.

(1) Mr Hofman has committed the same fault.

(2) Mr Felibien, pag. 56, of his 1 Entretien sur les Vies & sur les Ouvrages des Peintres, places Zeuxis in the XCVth Olympiad; but the Printer has committed a fault in making this Olympiad answer to the year of the world, 583. It should be 3583. Vossius, de IV Art. popul. places him also in the XCVth Olympiad.

(3) I do not mean with the utmost exactness. See the following citation.

(5) Edition places the death of Archelaus, in the third year of the XCIVth Olympiad.

confused [B]. Painting was then in the first degree of its lustre : From that beginning of reputation to which Apollodorus had brought it, he raised it to a great perfection. Some authors tell us, that it was he who invented the manner of disposing lights and shadows (a) [C] ; and it is agreed on all hands that he excelled in the art of colouring. Aristotle (b) found fault with his pictures for not expressing the manners or passions ; yet Pliny observes the contrary, with regard to his picture of Penelope, in which, faith he, Zeuxis seems to have painted her manners (c). He acquired immense riches (d) ; and once made a shew of them during the celebration of the Olympic games, where he appeared in a cloak embroidered with gold letters expressing his name. After he became so rich, he would no longer sell his works ; but gave them away, and said very frankly, that he could not set a price on them equal to their value. Before this time he made people pay for the sight of them ; and none were admitted to see his Helen but for ready money ; whence in gallery the Wits called that picture, Helen the Courtesan (e). He made no scruple of placing under her portrait the three verses of the Iliad, where Homer relates that honest Priam, and the venerable old men of his council, agreed that the Greeks and Trojans were not to blame for exposing themselves during so long a time to so many evils for the sake of Helen, whose beauty equalled that of the goddesses (f). I cannot well determine whether this Helen of Zeuxis was the same which was at Rome in Pliny's time, or that which he drew for the inhabitants of Crotona, to be placed in Juno's temple (g). It will not be improper to relate here what Zeuxis required from the Crotonians with respect to that picture. They had by great sums of money prevailed on him to come to them, in order to get many of his paintings, with which they intended to adorn their temple ; and when he acquainted them that he intended to draw the picture of Helen [D], they were very well pleased, because they knew his principal excellence lay in painting of women. He then asked them what beautiful virgins they had in their city, and they conducted him to the place where young lads learned their

(a) Luminum umbrarumque invenisse rationem traditur. Quint. lib. xii. cap. x.

(b) De Poët. cap. vi.

(c) Plin. lib. xxxv. cap. ix. pag. m. 199.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Ælian, lib. vi. cap. xii.

(f) Valerius Maximus, lib. iii. cap. vii.

(g) The same author says, that Zeuxis's Marlysa bound up, was to be seen in the temple of Concord. Zeuxidis manus vidi, says Petronius, nondum versutatis injuria victas.

(6) In the Life of Pericles.

(7) Lib. xxiv. cap. viii.

(8) Chiliad. VIII, Histor. cxcvi.

(9) Lib. ii. de Inventione.

(10) Plin. lib. xxxv. cap. ix.

(11) Var. Hist. lib. iv. cap. xii. & lib. xiv. cap. xvi. & xvii.

(12) Harduin. in Plin. Tom. v. pag. 199. Jacob. Proust in Cicero. lib. ii. in Invent. Note, that the Antients, who were contented to call him Heracles, have done worse than if we should now-a-days denote a man's native country, by saying that he was born at Clermont.

(13) See Plutarch's passage concerning Apollodorus, in the remark [C].

(14) La Mothe le Vayer, Lett. ix. in the tenth volume of the Edit. in 12mo. pag. 76.

(15) Pliny not quoted by La Mothe le Vayer, informs us of it, lib. xxxv. cap. ix. Deprehenditur tamen Zeuxis grandior in capitis articulo : This last word he should have translated joints and not members.

(16) La Mothe le Vayer quotes lib. xii. Inft. cap. xvi. but it should be cap. x.

and consequently Pliny would have been strangely mistaken, if he had placed the beginning of his reputation in the fourth year of the XCVth Olympiad. For my part, I believe that a medium ought to be taken betwixt Eusebius and Pliny, the rather because we read in Plutarch (6), that this great Painter flourished when Pericles caused a great number of public edifices to be built, and made Phidias the surveyor of them. But without alledging that Pliny (7) places Phidias in the LXXXIVth Olympiad, it is certain that Pericles caused these edifices to be built several years before his death, which happened in the LXXXVIIth Olympiad. Wherefore it doth not appear that Pliny had a great deal of reason to refute those who placed Zeuxis in the LXXXIXth Olympiad, and to make him then but a young disciple.

[B] What we know of his country is a little confused. For though the testimony of Tzetzes (8), who makes him a native of Ephesus, should not make us doubt that he was born at Heraclea, since Cicero (9), Pliny (10), and Ælian (11) agree, in affirming it ; it is not a little perplexing to choose out of such a great number of cities which had the name of Heraclea, that where Zeuxis was born. Some conjecture that it was Heraclea, near Crotona in Italy (12).

[C] Some authors tell us, that it was he who invented the manner of disposing lights and shadows (13). The glory of invention being that on which men set the highest value, Moreri should have informed his reader of that passage in Quintilian. Whereas he assures us, that the art of shading, in the fine pieces of Zeuxis, was beyond any price. Thus on one side he forgets the principal part, and on the other he stretches the thing too far. He forgot to tell us, that Zeuxis was the inventor of the mixture of lights and shadows in pictures ; and, without any ground, he saith, that it was the art of shadowing which rendered Zeuxis's pieces inestimable. His mistake happened thus. He had read in an author (14) from whom he took several things, that it was observed of Zeuxis that though his pieces, wherein the art of shading appeared first of all, were beyond any price, yet he was guilty of the fault of giving them gratis ; yet he was guilty of the fault of representing the heads larger than they really were, as he did also most of the members (15) : In this Quintilian (16) observes that he did no more than imitate Homer, whose beautiful ladies are robust, and in good case : Moreri, I say, had read this, and did not know how to make use of it. He ought to have extracted out of it what was blamed in the works of Zeuxis ; but above all, he should have taken this observation that the art of shading was the invention of this Painter. At least, after having left it out, he should not have connected the words that go before it with those that come after ; for by this means he hath falsified the passage of la Mothe le Vayer, which wanted to be mended instead of being falsified. What makes me say so, is, that this famous writer lays down for a certainty, that the true reason why Zeuxis discontinued the selling of his pieces, was because it was not possible for any person to pay the true value of them. This is taking that Painter's words too literally (17), he probably did not think as he spoke : and if he had really believed it, he had been the most extravagant braggadocio in the world ; and consequently his rodomontade should not be alledged as a just reason. It is very probable that the pieces which he presented after his being very rich, were not better than those which he formerly sold ; for it is not customary to finish what one has a mind to give gratis, more than what one designs to sell at a dear rate. To which purpose I remember it is commonly said, that an Abbot's sermons are better whilst he is aspiring after a bishopric than after he hath obtained it. And therefore if Zeuxis's reason had been true, he should have left off selling his works sooner than he did. I was surprized not to find Quintilian's observations amongst those which Felicien hath given us concerning Zeuxis. Mr Hofman hath translated Moreri's expression somewhat ambiguously ; for the words, Donare opera sua, inter quæ Umbra eminebant, instituit, as he has turned them, seem to signify, that there was one of Zeuxis's pieces in which he had painted the shadows, which picture was the most excellent of his works. Besides, the word eminebant doth not seem designed for umbra in the Painters stile ; for no places appear to have less relief in painting, than those expressed by shadows (18).

[D] To draw the picture of Helen. It is an inexcusable omission in Charles Stephens, in Lloyd, Moreri, and Hofman, to have said nothing of the picture of Helen, but that Zeuxis painted it, tho' the Antients have related so many remarkable particulars concerning it. Charles Stephens hath only cited Pliny, who spoke of it by the by ; he should have quoted Cicero and Ælian, who have touched on the circumstances. Lloyd and Hofman only cite, properly speaking, in the same manner as Charles Stephens : for tho' they refer us to Cicero, it is plain that it is with regard to Zeuxis in general, and not with respect to Helen's picture ; this, I say, is plain, because they refer us also to Plutarch, in the life of Pericles, where he doth not treat of this picture. By the Printer's errors we find Cicero cited in Mr Lloyd's Dictionary thus ; 2. de Juventut. and in that of Mr Hofman also, lib. 2. de Juventut. instead of lib. 2. de Invent. which is enough to make several

(17) Postea donare opera sua instituit, quod ea nullo satis digno pretio permutari posse diceret. Plin. ubi supra.

(18) See Vossius de Graphice, pag. 69.

(b) Quorum nomina multi poetæ memorie tradiderunt, quod ejus essent judicio probatæ qui verissimum pulchritudinis habere judicium debuisset. Cicer. lib. ii. de Invent.

(i) Tantus diligentia ut Agrigantini facturus tabulam quam in templo Junonis Lacinie publice dicarent, inspexerit virgines eorum nudas & quinque elegerit, ut quod in quaque laudatissimum esset pictura redderet. Plin. lib. xxxv. cap. ix.

(f) Id. ibid. cap. x.

(19) De Græphice, pag. 69, in libro de IV Artib. popular.

(20) Cælius Rhodiginus, Antiq. Lect. lib. xix. cap. xxvii. pag. m. 1086.

exercises. This gave him the most favourable opportunity possible of seeing if they were beautiful, and well shaped throughout; for they were stark naked; and he appearing very well pleased, they gave him to understand, that he might judge thereby whether they had beautiful virgins in their city, since they had the filters of those young lads whom he most admired. He then desired to see the most beautiful, and the council of the city having ordered all the virgins to come together to the same place, that Zeuxis the city having ordered all the virgins to come together to the same place, that Zeuxis might have his free choice, he selected five; and by taking from each of them what was most charming in her, he formed the picture of Helen. These five maids were highly extolled by the Poets on account of their beauty which had obtained the approbation of the man who was the best judge of it (b) [E], and accordingly their names did not fail of being consecrated to posterity: however I do not believe there is now any trace of these names. Cicero, who informs us of all these particulars, hath left his reader to guess, that the Painter desired to see those five young beauties stark naked: but Pliny expressly affirms it; nay he says that before Zeuxis chose these five, he had seen all the Crotonian virgins in that condition (i). It is true he affirms, that Zeuxis painted for the Agrigantines, and not for the Crotoniates, and doth not name the picture: excepting this, it is plain he relates the same story with Cicero. I must not forget that Zeuxis disputing the prize of Painting with Parrhasius lost it (k) [F], in the following manner. Zeuxis had painted some grapes so extremely well, that the birds flew down to peck at them. And Parrhasius painted a curtain so artfully, that Zeuxis taking it for a real one, drawn before his antagonist's work, asked with the utmost confidence, why they did not immediately draw that curtain in order to shew what Parrhasius had done. Having found several readers believe that Cicero wrote de Juventute as well as de Senectute. Vossius (19) hath censured Bulengerus, for saying in his book of Painting, that it was Venus and not Helen whom Zeuxis painted, from the five living originals placed before him: but in correcting this fault, Vossius himself hath committed another; he says that Pliny mentions as expressly as Cicero, that Zeuxis painted Helen. But it is not true that Pliny mentions it; he speaks in general of a picture. Observe, that Cælius Rhodiginus, speaking of the picture of Helen, the courtesan, has committed a gross solecism (20). Zeuxis, saith he, pictura nobilem, inter cetera ejus artificii, baud parum multa quæ circumferuntur, & hominum desideria vix expleat. Helenam quandoque ab eo expictam ferunt, cui tantum sanè attribuerit, ut non temere nec quemlibet, ac (ut Græci dicunt) ὡς ἑταίρα, spectatum admitteret, ni πῦρ ἀπὸ πυρρός, id est propositam pecuniæ quantitatem erogasset. The like faults in language have escaped the best authors.

[E] These five maids were highly extolled. . . on account of their beauty, which had obtained the approbation of the man who was the best judge of it. One might very well doubt whether the five maids whom Zeuxis chose, were each of them handsomer than those whom he did not chuse. The reason of this scruple is, that he designed only to unite in one body, the particular beauties which he found separated in those five maids: to which purpose there was no necessity that they should be all very beautiful; it was sufficient that some of them had the beauties which the others wanted. But who can deny that there are some women of indifferent beauty, who if you only compare one single part with the same in another, will, in that, surpass the greatest beauties. Wherefore it doth not appear that Cicero, or the Poets of whom he speaks, were necessarily in the right to prefer those five Crotonian maids, chosen by the Painter of Helen, to those who were passed by. Perhaps the Painter rejected some, who wanted very little to render them perfect beauties; but who were not at all for his purpose, because he found the same beauties they were endued with, in a more eminent degree in one of the five: after which it was enough for another of the five, tho' but indifferently handsome, to have that very small thing which was wanting in those whom he refused. The question, as every body sees, is not important, it may be laid aside; and if any person should assert that Zeuxis chose the finest five of them all, not by reason of it's being necessary to his design, but to enjoy a more agreeable sight, I will not oppose him. One of the chief grounds of this story is what is commonly said, that nothing in the world is perfect. And this holds true especially in relation to beauty. I appeal to the criticisms which handsome women pass upon one another, and yet they do not see every thing, as Zeuxis did, being, without doubt, resolved not to follow the method of which Horace speaks in his second satire of the first book.

Ne corporis optima lyncæis
Contemplerè oculis, Hypsæa cæcior, illa
Quæ mala sunt spectes. O crus! O braccia! verum Dèpygis, nasuta, brevi latere ac pede longo est (21).

Be not too eagle-eyed to view a grace;
And blind, as Hypsæa is, to spy a fault;
For such as judge by faults are often caught.
How neat her arm! her leg! 'tis true, but stay,
Her waste is short, her feet are splay.

CREECH.

The truth is, this Painter had no need of any thing, besides his own imagination, to draw the picture of a compleat beauty; for it is certain that our ideas go beyond nature. 'Ego sic statuo, nihil esse in ullo ge- nere tam pulchrum quo non pulchrius id sit unde illud ut ex ore aliquo quasi imago exprimitur, quod neque oculis, neque auribus, neque ullo sensu percipi potest, cogitatione tantum & mente complectimur. . . . Nec verò ille artifex (Phidias) quum faceret Jovis formam aut Minervæ, contemplantur aliquem quo similitudinem duceret, sed ipsius in mente intuens, in eaque defixus, ad illius similitudinem fidebat species pulchritudinis eximia quædam, quam artem & manum dirigebat (22). . . . In my opinion, there is not any thing, of whatever kind, so beautiful as that idea from which it is expressed, and of which it is only, as it were, an image or representation; an idea which is not the object of the eye, or ear, or of any other of the senses, but of our thoughts alone, and can only be perceived in the mind. . . . Phidias, when he made the statue of Jupiter, or that of Minerva, did not set up for his pattern any particular person: but he had in his mind a certain noble and exalted idea of beauty, which he regarded steadfastly, and attentively followed as the model of his work.' It would not be more impossible to find men as accomplished as the heroes of romances, than it would be to find as beautiful women as the heroines of the same fabulous country. This is so true, that when authors would in few words represent any one perfectly beautiful, they content themselves with saying, that the person surpasses the ideas of Poets and of Painters (23).

[F] Zeuxis disputing the prize of Painting with Parrhasius, lost it. The fact relating to the birds which Zeuxis deceived by his painted grapes, is commonly related after a very confused manner. But if Pliny was well consulted, authors would not fall into that confusion; for they would there see that Zeuxis drew two several pictures which related to this fact, and that each had it's particular adventure. I do not take

(21) See ibid. Robert and Henry Chenevix Trenchard, Remarks on the State of Virginia, in the North American Review, 1789, p. 100. Noting can be more beautiful.

Tout ainsi ce qui est le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

Le corps d'un homme.

found his mistake, he confessed himself outdone, since he had only deceived birds, whereas Parrhasius had imposed on the very masters of the art. Another time he painted a boy loaded with grapes, and the birds flew also to this picture; this displeased him, and he ingenuously owned that his work was not sufficiently finished, since if the boy had been as naturally expressed as the grapes, the birds would have been afraid of him. We are told that he wiped out the grapes and only kept the figure, in which he had least succeeded (1). Archelaus King of Macedon employed Zeuxis to adorn his palace with paintings; on this occasion we have in Ælian a fine reflexion of Socrates (m). One of this Painter's best pieces was a Hercules strangling some dragons in his cradle in the sight of his affrighted mother: but he himself preferred his Athlet, or wrestler, before all the rest, and under it placed a verse which afterwards became famous (n) [G]. It is

(1) Senec. Contr. v. lib. v.

(m) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. xiv. cap. xxvii.

(n) Adeo tibi in illo (Athleta) placuit ut verum subiceret celebrem ex eo, invisorum aliquem facilius quam imitatorum. Plin. ubi not supra.

notice of what several authors relate, that Zeuxis himself attempted to draw Parrhasius's curtain; for Pliny doth not tell the story so: but this is an alteration of circumstances too inconsiderable to say any thing more of it. There is much more reason to think it strange, that Moreri's Dictionary should say nothing of the challenge or wager of these two Painters, and that Lloyd and Hofman have given but a very small hint of it. As for what relates to the other piece, wherein the boy carried grapes, Mr Moreri hath mentioned it in a manner which is not much to his honour, since he hath omitted the principal circumstances, not having given the least hint of the judgment which Zeuxis himself made of this piece; Mr Hofman hath not forgot this, but he makes use of a phrase which he ought entirely to have suppressed; eadem ingenuitate, saith he, proffit (Zeuxis) iratus operi ac dixit. These words are Pliny's, and are extraordinary proper in the original, where they relate to the story of the wager, that is to say, to Pliny's narrative, with what ingenuity Zeuxis owned that he was outdone. But when, in an article where there is nothing of this ingenuity, they tell us that Zeuxis acknowledged with the same ingenuity, &c. they throw us into impenetrable obscurities, and we can only conjecture, that the author gives us an imperfect passage. Most abbreviators are subject to this fault (24). Mr Hofman is on this head much more excusable than Mr Lloyd; for the latter having retained the phrase, eadem ingenuitate proffit, which he found in Charles Stephens, might easily think that it concerned a particular to which the reader of Charles Stephens was referred. But Mr Lloyd hath suppressed this reference, and by this means hath increased the obscurity of his article. Not that I pretend wholly to excuse Charles Stephens, for his ut in Parrhasia supra vidimus, could not give him a right to make use of these words, eadem ingenuitate proffit, because he had not been speaking of the success of the wager. The article of Zeuxis is much better in Calepin (25), than in all the Dictionaries which I have just mentioned. But I have not found any author who hath worse expressed the dispute betwixt these two Painters, than he who makes the greatest figure in the commentary variorum on Valerius Maximus (26). He affirms that Parrhasius painted some birds on a cloth, so very naturally, that Zeuxis fearing the judgment of the birds, with a modest ingenuity gave up the cause. I am very much mistaken if his phrase, Zeuxis altum judicium timens is not a corruption of Pliny's words, Zeuxis altum iudicio timentis; and if so, what greater instance can there be of the alterations made in thoughts of authors?

(24) Some instances of it may be seen in Gronovius's book de perinde Jude. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, 1684, for May, Art. vi.

(25) The quotation out of Pliny, ought to be mended. It should be lib. liii, instead of xxvii. Charles Stephens, and Father Cancelli, in his Valerius Maximus, in usum Delph. quote, lib. iv.

(26) His name is Oliverius. See Valerius Maximus Variorum, of Leyden, 1655, pag. 314.

(27) Secondo Lancelotti da Perugia Abbate O. lietoano, l'Hogidi Part. ii, Distingano, xv, pag. 308.

Let us remember that Lancelotti of Perugia, takes all that is said of these two pictures to be fabulous. He doth not believe that the birds pecked at Zeuxis's vine, nor that Zeuxis mistook for a real curtain that of Parrhasius. It is thus that he clears himself of the objection, which this affords to those who have a mean opinion of the Moderns; he denies the fact; a very convenient way of solving difficulties. 'Oh, Zeusi con l'uva dipinta, dite voi, trasse gli uccelli à beccarla, il che non habbiamo d'alcuno de' nostri mentovati di sopra. Già io hò dato dentro con un libro di Farfalloni contra gli antichi Historici, & hocci rotto, come suol dire il Volgo, un paio di scarpe, intendina come vogliono i presenti o' posteri bell' Ingegneri, e però non temo, che sono millanterie della Grecia, e Farfalloni di Plinio, e quello dell'uva, e quelli de gli animali, che dessero segno di riconoscimento altri della loro specie fatti di colore per naturali (27). - - - But Zeuxis, you will say, painted grapes so well that he incited the birds to fly down, and peck

VOL. V.

at them: and this is not related of any of the Moderns. 'I have already published a book, wherein I expose the idle stories of the ancient Historians. . . . Let the present, or succeeding, Virtuoso's understand this as they please, yet I doubt not but that the story of the grapes, and that of the animals, who mistook a picture for living creatures of their own species, are nothing but the vain boasts of Greece, and the idle stories of Pliny.' Mr Perrault, full as zealous for the Moderns as Lancelotti, hath hit upon a more solid answer; for he alleges the like performances of a fresh date, which also prove that the nicety of painting doth not consist in that. His words are (28): It is said that Zeuxis represented some grapes so naturally, that the birds flew down to peck at them. But what is surprizing in this? A great many birds have killed themselves against the Heaven of Ruel's perspective, by attempting to pass beyond it, without any person being surprized at it, and even this has not been much insisted upon in praising of that perspective. . . . (29) Some time since, going by the English men, I was an eye-witness of an adventure full as honorable to the art of painting, as the story of Zeuxis's grapes, and much more diverting. A new painted picture was set to dry in Mr le Brun's yard, the door of which was open; in the fore-part of the piece a great thistle was perfectly well represented. An honest country-woman went by with her ass, which seeing the thistle, suddenly ran into the yard, threw down the woman, who in vain strove to hold him in by his halter, and if a couple of lusty young fellows had not each of them bestowed on him fifteen or twenty blows with a cudgel to force him to retire, he had eaten the thistle, I mean, that it being newly painted, he would have licked off all the painting with his tongue. . . . Pliny also relates, that Parrhasius so naturally counterfeited a curtain, that Zeuxis himself was deceived by it. The like deceptions happen every day, whilst the pieces which deceive are not at all esteemed. Cooks have a hundred times laid bold of partridges and capons naturally represented, in order to spit them; and what followed? The company laughed, and the picture remained in the kitchen.

(28) Perrault, Parallèle des Anciens & des Modernes, Tom. i, pag. 136, Dutch Edit.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 137.

[G] Under it be placed a verse, which afterwards became famous.] If we believe Plutarch (30), this verse was placed under the pieces of Apollodorus. He doth not say that Apollodorus himself put it there, as Vossius (31), and Father Hardouin (32) affirm; he saith, in general, that it was written on the works of Apollodorus, ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις ἐπιγράφεται, μνησται τις μάλλον ἢ μιμήσεται. Cujus operibus inscriptum fuit, Facilius hæc culpabit quis quam imitabitur. . . . It was inscribed on the works of Apollodorus, It is easier to blame this picture than to imitate it. This is not the only thing Plutarch ascribes to Apollodorus, instead of attributing it to Zeuxis, as others do; he will have it also that Apollodorus invented shadows in Painting, ἀνδράπων πρῶτον ἐξερῶν ὁμοῦν καὶ ἀπὸ ῥασιῶν σκιάς. Primus hominum invenit colorum temperationem diversorum & umbræ coloribus exprimenda rationem. The whole passage runs thus: Apollodorus, the first inventor of the tempering of colours, and of the art of expressing shadows, was an Athenian, on whose works was written,

(30) Plut. de Gloria Atheniens. pag. 346.

(31) De Graphicis, pag. 79.

(32) In Plin. Tom. v, pag. 200.

One may more easily blame, than imitate this picture.

A French Poet (33) shewing the like assurance, faith of his Franciade in the following verses, (33) Ronfard: see his Life.

Un lit ce livre pour apprendre,
L'autre le lit comme envieux:
Il est bien aisé de reprendre,
Mais mal aisé de faire mieux.

7 T

Some

not improbable that he highly valued his Alcmena (o), since he presented it to the Agrigentines. He did not value himself on quickly finishing his works [H]. It is said that having painted an old woman, he fell into such an excessive fit of laughter at the sight of that picture, that he died of it. This is what Verrius Flaccus relates (p) [I]. There is in Lucian a description of a picture of Zeuxis which deserves to be read: that picture represented a female centaur. I had collected several particulars for this article, which I suppress, on account of the publication of Junius de Pictura Veterum (q) [K]. I shall here insert a remark which was in the additions to my project: it relates to a book of Carlo Dati [L]. I shall not forget the first remark which I made in the article Zeuxis of my project. It points out some general defects in Moreri's Dictionary [M].

*Some read my book to learn, some to condemn,
'Tis harder to write better than to blame.*

[H] He did not value himself on quickly finishing his works. Plutarch relates that Zeuxis being informed that Agatharchus boasted of painting with ease and great dispatch, said, that as for his own part, he valued himself upon his slow performance, because that was the way to make his works of a long duration (34). The same Plutarch, in another book (35), relates the story, as if Zeuxis owned to some people who blamed his slowness, That it is true he was long in painting his pieces, but they were designed for a long time. All writers make him answer, that he painted for eternity: and thus this thought has lately been applied to the Dictionary of the French Academy, in the preface to that of Furetiere. It is the business of those, who amplify the boasting of this Painter, to see what authority they have for it.

[I] This is what Verrius Flaccus relates. He adds two verses which allude to this adventure,

*Nam quid modi facturus risu denique,
Ni pictor fieri vult qui risu mortuus est?*

*He sets no bounds to his immoderate laughter,
Thinking who laughs to death must be a Painter.*

But if it be true that Zeuxis died in this manner, how is it possible that so few authors should mention it? Was there any thing so remarkable in all his life as this extraordinary death? However, among the many Antients who have mentioned Zeuxis, only Verrius Flaccus informs us of this uncommon particular. And that by chance, and so improperly, that he is reprimanded by his abbreviator Pompeius Festus, for inserting such a thing in a work wherein he designed to treat of the signification of words. I wish we had the passage of Verrius Flaccus entire: what remains of it, was in the most deplorable condition in the world, before Joseph Scaliger applied his divining criticisms to it. Had Moreri and Hofman known this, they would doubtless have mentioned it, as they should have done, and then they had given us the two Latin verses a little more intelligible. Honeft Ravilius Textor (36) hath not inserted our Painter in his catalogue of those who died of laughing: which is doubtless an involuntary omission.

Observe, that Simon Majolus, Bishop of Volturara, is very much mistaken in relation to this fact. Zeuxis Pictor, saitb be (37), deformissimam spectans quandam picturam solutus in risum expiravit. Verrius alter pictor quod Anum quandam deformissimam pinxisset eandem mortem in risum solutus obiit, Rhodigino teste lib. 4. cap. 18. - - The Painter Zeuxis, at the sight of a very deformed picture, fell into such an excessive fit of laughter, that he died of it. Verrius, another Painter, having drawn a most deformed old woman, fell into the like fit of laughter, and also died of it, as Rhodiginus testifies. There is a very considerable omission in what he saith of Zeuxis, and a very great mistake in the rest: for this pretended Painter Verrius, who died of laughter, is a chimerical person: besides, Rhodiginus is very ill cited. See the margin (38); you will admire the metamorphosis of the thoughts transcribed by some compilers, which is sometimes as surprising as those of Ovid.

[K] On account of the publication of Junius de Pictura Veterum. I had rather refer to the excellent and learned collections of Junius, than heap up things which are to be found there. I take this opportunity to observe, that this work of Junius, printed at Rotterdam by Reinier Leers, would, perhaps, have yet lain hid in some study, if the Abbot Nicaise (39) had not made a thousand efforts to procure the edition of it. They forgot to acquaint the public of this in the preface. This excellent work is dedicated to the Abbot Bignon, one of the most illustrious protectors which the sciences at present have, and who by his wit, eloquence, and extensive learning, worthily maintains the glory of the name which he bears. Read that Epistle Dedicatory (40).

[L] It relates to a book of Carlo Dati. Here is the last piece of the additions to my Project: 'Since the printing of this article I have met with a book, which would have saved me a great deal of labour, if I had had it sooner. It is the life of Zeuxis, written in Italian by Carlo Dati, and printed at Florence in 1667, together with those of Parrhasius, Apelles, and Protogenes. The author hath collected whatever he found relating to those four Painters in the works of the Antients, and hath very exactly connected the whole; besides, he hath added to each life, several remarks, full of very fine and curious erudition. Those which relate to the life of Zeuxis would afford me a great deal of matter, if I was not in the last page of my Project. I shall only observe that they have informed me of a particular of which Vossius was ignorant; that is, that Bullingerus was not the first who said that Zeuxis painted Venus and not Helen, from the living originals which he selected out of the beautiful maids of the city. Volaterranus, and John della Casa, before him, mistook the one for the other; and what is more, Lippius hath somewhere said (41), that it was Juno and not Helen that Zeuxis painted. I observe by the way, that Carlo Dati hath censured Pliny without good reasons. He believes, that because the temple of Juno Lacinia was near Crotona in Calabria, the Agrigentines did not employ Zeuxis to paint a piece in order to be consecrated in that temple. But were not the temple of Delphi, and that of Jupiter Olympius filled with the gifts of all sorts of people, as at present our Lady of Loretto is filled with Ex Voto's from all Catholic countries?'

When I published what you have just read, I did not know that Tassoni fell into the same error, with Justus Lippius. Questi fu colui, saith be (42), speaking of Zeuxis, che chiamato da gli Agrigentini, o Tassoni, Poeti diversi, si come hanno altri voluto da i Protoniati (43), a fare il ritratto di Giunone, il copiò dalle fattezze più belle di cinque vergine da loro elette fra un numero infinito, che ne vide d'ignude. - - Zeuxis was the Painter, who, being desired by the Agrigentines, or, as tells an error of others will have it, by the Crotoniati, to draw the picture of Juno, copied it from the most beautiful features and shapes of five of their naked virgins, who had been singled out from an infinite number of others. The Italian is not less liable to ambiguities than the dead languages: if a Frenchman should place his words as they are in Tassoni, one would think, with reason, that he said that Zeuxis saw naked an infinite number of virgins, and that out of this great number, the inhabitants of Agrigentum chose five to serve as an original for this Painter. But the circumstances of this picture should not be related after this manner.

[M] Some general defects in Moreri's Dictionary. I shall set down another piece of my Project, transcribed from pag. 387. 'I do not pretend to propose this article as a perfect model: the world will do me sufficient justice, if they find it exempt from some faults which prevail in Moreri. That author's manner of citing books, is certainly a great fault;'

(o) Mr Felibien, pag. 66, says Ambalanta instead of Alcmena.

(p) At the word Pictor.

(q) It was printed since my Project in the year 1694.

(34) Plut. in Vita Pericli, pag. 159.

(35) Idem, de Multitudine A-micorum, pag. 94.

(36) See his Officina, or Theatrum Historicum, lib. ii, cap. lxxxvii.

(37) Simon Majolus, Dierum Canicularium, Colloq. iv, pag. 165. Edit. Romanæ, 1597.

(38) Zeuxis pictorem risu e-mortuum prodidit Verrius, dum animum à se pictam ridet affluentius. - - Verrius relates that Zeuxis died of laughter, at the picture which he had drawn of an old woman. Cælius Rhodiginus, lib. iv, cap. xviii, pag. m, 207.

(39) Concerning his good offices to authors, and his zeal for the promoting of learning, see Mr Nicaise's preface against the Que-tists.

(40) It is very well written, and ascribed to Father de la Basse.

(41) Lipp. Moreri. Politi. lib. i, cap. 11.

(42) Alessandro Tassoni, Poeta diversi, lib. x, cap. xxi, pag. 414.

(43) It is likely that the poet Tassoni had the poet Tassoni in his eye.

'fault; he heaps up all his quotations at the end of each article, without letting us know that such a thing was said by this, and such a thing by that author; he therefore gives his reader a great deal of trouble, since he is sometimes obliged to knock at five or six doors before he can find the person with whom he would speak. This is a predominant fault in several other books, the consequences of which were well known to a very able and judicious writer, who hath lately given us the History of the Roman Emperors (44). To this I add, that Mr Moreri advances a thousand things, which we either do not find at all in his citations, or which he confirms by no evidence, or which are curtailed by the omission of certain circumstances, which are the most material parts of a fact, and afford the greater pleasure. To conclude, I say, he doth not always represent persons by what is most remarkable in them. And I think those faults will not be discovered in my article of Zeuxis.'

(44) Mr de Tillemont. The first volume of his book was printed at Paris, in 1690. (See Mr de Beauval's Journal, for the month of June 1691.) His manner of citing in that work, is extremely exact.

Z I A, or Z E A, an island of the Archipelago, one of the Cyclades, was antiently called Ceos, or Cea. It is ten thousand paces from the promontory of Attica, formerly called Sunium (a), and at present Capo delle Colonne. It was antiently part of Eubœa, but the sea separated it, and afterwards washed away almost one fourth part of its length, which was five hundred stadia, or sixty two thousand five hundred paces (b) [A]. In Strabo's time, the four cities which had been in the isle of Cea, were reduced to two, one of which was called Julis, and the other Carthæa (c). One of the two ruined cities bore the name of Careffus, and the other that of Pæcessia. There was in the neighbourhood of these two last towns a temple dedicated to Apollo Smintheus; and betwixt the ruins of Pæcessia and this temple, was that of Minerva Nedusia, which Nestor consecrated after his return from Troy (d). I have elsewhere mentioned (e) the names of some illustrious personages born in the isle of Cea, and (f) whatever relates to it with respect to Aristæus the inventor of honey. I must add here, that a woman of this island invented the art of spinning the production of the silk-worms, and of weaving it into stuffs [B]; and that it was the custom of the inhabitants to poison themselves as soon as they were arrived at a certain age [C]. The port of Zia is one of the securest harbours in the Mediterranean, besides, the ships there take in fresh water, biscuit and wood (g). The island

(a) Plinius, lib. 10, cap. xii, pag. m. 453.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Strabo, lib. 10, pag. 335. See also Pliny, ibid.

(d) Strabo, ibid.

(e) In the article Julis.

(f) Above, in the first article of ARISTÆUS.

(g) Guillet, Athenes ancienne & nouvelle, pag. m. 85.

pays

[A] Its length was five hundred stadia, or sixty-two thousand five hundred paces. Pliny affirms it: Mr Baudrand is therefore mistaken in asserting, on the testimony of this author, that the circuit of the isle of Cea was formerly sixty thousand paces (1). There is a great difference betwixt the circuit and the length of an island; however, he ought to have followed the account of his author without any diminution. He adds, that at present the circuit of this island is scarce forty thousand paces, the sea having swallowed up a part of it.

(1) Baudrand. Geograph. Tem. i, pag. 251.

[B] A woman of this island invented the art of spinning the production of the silk-worms, and of weaving it into stuffs. Pliny and Solinus affirm it. 'Ex hac (insula) profectam delicatorem feminis vestem, auctor est Varro (2). . . . Varro relates that the fine garment worn by the women, came from this island.' 'Ceos que ut Varro testis est, subtilioris vestis amacula arte lanificæ scientiæ prima in ornamentum feminarum rite dedit (3). . . . Ceos, which as Varro testifies, first produced, by the art of manufacturing wool, the fine garments which the women wear for ornament.' What follows is more exact. 'Telas araneorum modo textunt (bombyces) ad vestem luxumque feminarum, quæ bombycina appellatur. Prima eas redordiri, rursumque texere invenit in Ceo Mulier Pamphila, Latoi filia, non fraudanda gloria excogitata rationis, ut denudet feminas vestis (4). . . . The silk-worms spin webs in like manner as spiders: these webs serve for the luxurious apparel of the women, which are called silken garments. The art of first spinning, and afterwards weaving, these webs was invented in the isle of Ceos, by a woman named Pamphila, the daughter of Latous: she must not be deprived of the glory of having invented this garment, which makes the women's shapes appear to greater advantage.' Aristotle (5) furnished Pliny with this particular. Salmasius pretends that Aristotle's words ought to be understood of the isle of Cos, and that Pliny is mistaken in understanding them of the isle of Ceos (6). His pretension is not utterly groundless, but it is not incontestable.

(2) Plinius, lib. 10, cap. xii, pag. m. 453.

(3) Solin. cap. vii, pag. m. 23.

(4) Plin. lib. 10, cap. xii, pag. 515.

(5) Aristot. Hist. Animal. lib. 9, cap. xix, pag. m. 649.

(6) Salmas. in Solin. pag. 144.

[C] It was the custom of the inhabitants to poison themselves as soon as they arrived at a certain age. It is pretended that they were obliged to this by a law. Strabo, on this subject, cites two verses of Menander, and believes that the persons who had passed the age of sixty, were obliged to conform to that law, that a sufficient store of provisions might be left for the rest of the inhabitants. Παρά τούτοις δὲ δοκεῖ τεθῆναι νότος νόμος, ὃ μὲν μάλιστα Μινέρδης:

Καλὸν τὸ Κάϊον νόμιμον εἶναι Φανία
Ὅ μὴ δύναμεν ὅτι καλῶς, ἢ ζῆ κακῶς

Προσέταττε γὰρ ὡς τοῖκεν ὁ νόμος τὰς ὑπὲρ ἑξήκοντα ἔτη γεγονότας κοινάζεσθαι, τὸ διαρκεῖν τοῖς ἄλλοις τὴν τροφήν. i. e. Apud hos lex posita aliquando videtur, cujus meminit etiam Menander:

Optimum Ciorum institutum est Phania
Qui non potest vivere bene, non vivat male.

Jubeat enim, ut videtur, lex, eos qui sexaginta annos excessissent, cicutam bibere, ut aliis victus sufficere (7). (7) Strabo, lib. 10, pag. 335. There seems to have been once a law among this people, which Menander mentions,

Brave edict of the Cean commonweal,
Let not the man live ill, who can't live well.

It therefore seems that this law enjoined that those who exceeded sixty years should drink hemlock juice, to the end that a sufficient quantity of provisions might be left for the rest of the inhabitants. He also says it was reported that the inhabitants of this isle being besieged by those of Athens made a decree, by which they condemned to death all the old men whereupon the Athenians retired. The Greek word κοινάζεσθαι in Strabo ought to be changed into κοινεάζεσθαι which signifies to drink the juice of hemlock. This is Casaubon's conjecture (8), which he confirms by two passages, one out of Heraclides, and the other out of Ælian. The first of these authors saith that the air of the isle of Cea is so good, that men, but more especially women, might live there to a great age; but that they do not make any advantage of this favour of nature, and before they suffer the infirmities of a frail old age, they dispatch themselves out of the world some by the use of poppy, and others by that of hemlock. Οὐσὲς δὲ ὑγιαίνουσιν τῆς νήσου, καὶ εὐχάρων τῶν ἀνθρώπων, μάλιστὰ δὲ τῶν γυναικῶν, ἢ περιμένονσι γῆραι τοῖς λαυτῶν, ἀλλὰ πρὶν ἀσθενῆσαι, ἢ ἀπρωθῆναι τι, οἱ μὲν μύκωνι, οἱ δὲ κωνεῖν ἑαυτοὺς ἐξάγουσι. Quam salubri celo fruatur hæc insula, ex- tremam senectam attingere ibi hominibus datur, præsertim feminiis, non expectant tamen provecere ætatis qui sunt, sed illud anteverunt priusquam vel imbecillitas accedat, vel parte aliqua manci fiant, ita ut hi celeriter seipsum quidem papaveri, illi vero cicutæ sibi ipsi vitam eripiant. (9). As for Ælian, he affirms that those who by the reason of a decrepit age found themselves incapable of law.

(8) Casaub. Comment. in hunc locum Strabonis, pag. m. 165.

(9) Heraclides, de Politia, pag. m. 20. Note that Berkelius, in Stephani Byzantinum, sæmimis, non expectant tamen provecere ætatis qui sunt, pag. 431, falsè fatum suum, sed illud anteverunt priusquam vel imbecillitas accedat, vel parte aliqua manci fiant, ita ut hi celeriter seipsum quidem papaveri, illi vero cicutæ sibi ipsi vitam eripiant. (9). As for Ælian, he affirms that those who by the reason of a decrepit age found themselves incapable of law.

doing

(b) Spon, Voiage,
Tom. i, pag.
149, Dutch Edition.

pays to the Turk seventeen hundred piastres for the Caracab, and two thousand five hundred by way of tenth (b). The Bishop of Thermia passes half the year in this island (i): it hath at present a large city and a ruined castle. Consult Moreri's Dictionary at the word Zea. He should have referred the reader to this word, rather than to that of Cea, when he set down the word Zia.

doing service to the public, assembled together at a festival and drunk the juice of hemlock. Νόμος ἐστὶ Κεῖαν, οἱ πάντες παρ' αὐτοῖς γεγραμμένους, ὡς περ ἐπὶ ξενία παρακαλοῦντες αὐτοῦ, ἢ ἐπὶ τινα ἱερῶν καὶ θυσιῶν ἀνελθόντες, καὶ σεβασάμενοι, πίνουσι κύνειον, ὅταν αὐτοῖς συνέδωκον, ὅτι πρὸς τὰ ἔργα τὰ τῇ πατρίδι λυσιστελοῦντα ἀχρηστοὶ εἰσιν, ὑποληψάμενοι ὅτι αὐτοῖς καὶ τῆς γυναικὸς διὰ τὸν χρόνον. Consuetudo est apud Ceos, ut ii, qui senio plane confecti sunt, tanquam ad convivium se mutuo invitent, aut ad quoddam solenne sacrificium conveniant, & coronati cicutam bibant: quum sibi ipsi confecti sunt, se ad promovenda commoda patriæ inutiles amplius esse, animo jam ob ætatem delirare incipiente (10). Pinedo (11), Kuhnii (12), and Berkellius (13), approve of Casaubon's correction, and there is no room to doubt of it's being a good one. Scaliger (14) citing the passage of Strabo reads κνωιδέσθαι, and not κνωιδέσθαι. Here is another of Casaubon's conjectures: he believes that Stephanus Byzantinus (15), who relates the same particular with Strabo, but instead of telling us that the old men drank hemlock juice, faith that they fought duels together, ἀγωνίζεσθαι, in certamine dimicare, made use of a copy of Strabo where the reading was κνωιδέσθαι or κνωιδέσθαι in arenam descendere, and not κνωιδέσθαι. Berkellius rejects this conjecture on pretence that it is contrary to the practice of the old men of Ceos, and to the testimony of Historians (16); but he did not in the least apprehend Casaubon's thought; he fancied that Casaubon supposed that this word might be that of Strabo, whereas he should have known that Casaubon supposed the copy of Stephanus Byzantinus to be corrupted. Mr Kuhnii offers another conjecture, which is that the reading in Strabo was ἀκνωιδέσθαι to drink aconite or wolf-bane (17): the change of that word into ἀγωνίζεσθαι might very easily happen. Pighius had before him told us that the text of Stephanus ought to be corrected in that manner (18).

We must now examine whether this practice of the old men of Cea was founded on a decree of the state or barely on one of those customs, which being once linked with the notions of a greatness of soul, are almost as strictly observed as the legal decrees. We have seen that Strabo was of opinion that there was an edict, which obliged them to kill themselves after having passed the age of sixty years. But very probably he is mistaken, for since the air of this isle was very healthful, and the inhabitants lived very long (19), the common-wealth would have been deprived of several robust subjects, who were still capable of serving their country, had they been forced by the authority of the laws to poison themselves at the age of sixty one years. And observe that the expressions of Heraclides insinuate rather a voluntary custom than an obligatory law. Observe also that Ælian's words very clearly specify decrepit persons, and not those who had attained the age of sixty-one. All this tends to refute the opinion of Strabo. If it was true, we could at least prove that this edict was not in force in the isle of Cea in Tiberius's time. The proof which Valerius Maximus hath given us of it, will let us into the true state of the case. Wherefore it will be proper here to consider the circumstances of that writer's narrative: they will make it appear that the public authority did not interpose any farther than to permit those who were weary of living to poison themselves, but not to command those who had passed a certain age to do it. Valerius Maximus before he gives an account of what he saw in the isle of Cea, relates that at Marfeilles a poisoning liquor was kept by the public, and given to those who offered satisfactory reasons to the Senate why they desired to rid themselves of their lives. The Senate examined their reasons with a certain temperance, which neither indulged a passionate and rash inclination to die, nor opposed a reasonable desire of death, whether they wanted to deliver themselves from the persecutions of ill fortune, or would not run the risk of being forsaken by prosperity. This was the rule of the Senate, they forced no body to poison himself, but granted a permission to do it when they judged it proper: none could kill himself in the due form, and canonically, without being authorized by the sovereign. Venenum cicuta temperatum in ea civitate publice custoditur, quod datur ei, qui causas Sextentis (id enim Senatus ejus nomen est) exhibuit, propter quas mors si illi expetenda: Cognitione virili benevolentia temperata, quæ nec egredi vitæ temere patitur, & sapienter excedere cupienti celerem fati viam præbet; ut vel adversa, vel prospera nimis usi fortuna (utraque enim finiendi spiritus, illa ne perferret, hæc ne destituit, rationem præbet) comprobato exitu terminetur (20). The author adds, that in his opinion this practice at Marfeilles was borrowed from Greece (21); for I have observed, faith he, that it is also in use in the isle of Cea. Upon this he relates that going into Asia with Sextus Pompeius, and passing through the city of Julius, he was present at the death of a lady aged above ninety years. She had declared to her superiors the reasons which induced her to depart this life, after that, she kept her self ready to drink the poison; and as she thought that Pompey's presence would add a great lustre to the ceremony, she caused him to be most humbly supplicated to be present. He granted the favour, and with the most pressing instances eloquently exhorted her to consent to live, but all in vain. She thanked him for his kindness, and prayed that he might be rewarded not so much by the gods whom she was going to, as by those whom she quitted (22). She declared that she had been always favoured by fortune, and would not expose her self to the reverse of it. Ceterum ipsa bilarum Fortunæ vultum semper experta, ne aviditate lucis tristem intueri cogar; reliquias spiritus mei prospero sine, duas filias & septem nepotum gregem superstitum reliqua, permuto (23). She left two daughters and seven grandchildren, and having exhorted them to a mutual agreement and concord, &c. with an undaunted courage she took the glass which contained the poison, and after recommending her self to Mercury to obtain a happy and successful passage, she greedily drank off the mortal liquor. Cobortata deinde ad concordiam suam, distributo eis patrimonio, & cultu suo sacrificiis domesticis majori filiae traditis; poculum, in quo venenum temperatum erat, constanti dextra arripuit. Tum defusus Mercurio delibamentis, & invocato numine ejus, ut se placido itinere in meliorem sedis inferna deduceret partem; cupido hausit mortiferam traxit potionem (24). I omit the rest of the relation; and would not have cited so much, had it not been very rare to find in the heathen writers, the manner of their recommending themselves to the gods at the point of death. I do not remember to have ever observed that they asked the pardon of their sins. Nor do we see that this lady of the isle of Cea put up such a petition.

Let us observe by the way that the heathens admired less those, who killed themselves in their misfortunes, than those who did so, when they were under prosperous circumstances, and only in order to escape the inconsistencies of fate. A man was no sooner possessed with the maxims of the Stoicks, but he looked upon those as cowards who were fond of life during bodily infirmities or disgraceful misfortunes. In such cases death was accounted the only remedy which one ought to have recourse to without murmuring or complaining, and it was pretended that none, but those who loved life, would accuse the gods and men. Orho when dying made use of this maxim. Plura de extremis loqui, pars ignaviae habet, quod de destinationis meae documentum habet, quod de nemine queror; nam inculcare deos vel homines, ejus est, qui vivere velit (25). To say much of this death is an indication of cowardice. I die with this resolution, to complain of no body: for to accuse the gods, or men, is the part of a man who desires to live.

(i) Boadicea, Geogr. Tom. i,
pag. 251.

(10) Valer.
Maximus, lib. i,
cap. vi, num.
7, in Ext. pag.
m. 180.

(11) E. Grecia
transitum inde exilium, quod illam CEA in insula Cea ferre ri animadverti
lib. lib. num. 1.

(12) The
quidam, inquit, Sen.
Pompeii Dis
magis, quoniam quæ, quoniam peto, quoniam ferat: quia nec horatæ vice meæ, nec mor-tis spectare de finitur. lib. 1.
pag. 181.

(13) lib. lib.

(14) lib. lib.

(10) Ælian.
Var. Hist.
lib. iii, cap.
xxxviii.

(11) In Steph.
Byzant. pag.
332.

(12) In Ælian.
ubi supra.

(13) In Steph.
Byzant. p. 421.

(14) Scaliger, in Varronem de Ling. Lat. lib.
vi, p. m. 118.

(15) Steph. By-zant. voce 'Ιουλιαί.

(16) Hæc quan-
quam speciosa videntur, minime approbanda judico, cum anti-quæ ritui & Historiarum plane sint contraria. Berkell.
ubi supra, pag.
421.

(17) Kuhnii in Ælian. ubi supra, pag. 233.

(18) Pighius in Valerium Maximum, lib. ii,
cap. vi.

(19) See the quotation out of Heraclides, above, num. (9).

ZIEGLER

ZIEGLER (JAMES) professor of Divinity, a Mathematician and Cosmographer, flourished in the XVIth century. He was born at Landshut in Bavaria [A]. He is said to have been a Mathematical professor in the university of Upsal (a). Paul Jovius thought him a Swede, probably because Ziegler wrote some books concerning that country [B]. But that proof will be scarce sufficient to those who should only say that he resided there some time; for he declares himself that he composed his book concerning Scandinavia from memoirs communicated to him while he was at Rome [C]. The Bishop of Passau (b), a very learned prelate, was his Mécenas, and erected a tomb to him in his episcopal city (c). Ziegler had retired to this prelate's court, when the terror of the Ottoman armies obliged him to leave Vienna where he had taught a long time (d). He died in August 1549, and not in 1559, as Moreri says. The reading of some of his books hath been prohibited by the Inquisition; and that of others permitted only on condition that some things be corrected in them, and that the note of condemned author be always placed by the word Ziegler (e). Some Protestant authors acknowledge him as their brother (f). In the year 1523, he was strongly inclined to turn Protestant, as appears by a book which he wrote at Rome in favour of Erasmus against James

(a) Caspar Brufchius, de Laureaca & Patavio Germanico, lib. ii, pag. 273, 274, & in Epitaphio Jacobi Ziegleri, ibid. pag. 322.

(d) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. m. 118.

(e) See the Index Librorum prohibitorum, pag. 546, Edition 1667.

(f) See Mollerus Hypomn. ad Sueciam Literatam, pag. 441.

(a) Schefferus, in Suecia Literata, pag. m. 273. He quotes Mel-senius in Sueo-pentap. cap. vi.

(b) His name was Wolfgang, and he was of the house of the Counts of Salm.

(1) Teiffier, Ad-dit aux Eloges, Tom. i, pag. 20, Edit. 1696.

(3) In the year 1699.

(3) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. 118, Edit. Francof. 1625.

(4) Gefner, in Biblioth. fol. 367.

(c) Page 34, of his Dissertation de Rebus Sueco-Gothicis, apud Mollerum Hypomn. ad Sueciam Literatam, pag. 441.

(6) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. cxxxviii, pag. m. 281.

(7) Scheffer, in Suecia Literata, pag. 273, Edit. 1699.

(8) Gefner, in Bibl. fol. 367, veris.

[A] He was born at Landshut in Bavaria. And not at Landau, as we are told in the French translation of Thuanus cited by Mr Teiffier (1). The same thing is asserted with an additional error in Moreri's Dictionary; for it is there specified that James Ziegler was born at Landau in the Lower Alsatia. The Dutch editions, and that of Paris (2), have corrupted this place instead of correcting it; for they have changed the Lower Alsatia into the Lower Germany. Thuanus called him Lindavus (3), which rather signifies that Ziegler was of Lindau than of Landau. However that be, we ought to believe that when Gefner (4), and several others call him Landorum Bavarum, they mean that he was born at Landshut. Paul Jovius is mistaken in making him a Swede. I shall give his own words in the following remark. His error was followed by some authors, as Mr Mollerus observes in his additions to John Scheffer's Suecia Literata page 441. The learned Mr Schurtzschleich (5), does not follow Jovius, but he affirms that our Ziegler was originally a Swede. I do not know any more than Mr Mollerus whether he is in the right.

[B] Paul Jovius thought him a Swede, probably because he wrote some books concerning that country. He quotes with great encomiums what Ziegler wrote concerning the cruelty of King Christian II. 'Quis eo Latinas literas, quo Romana arma penetrare nequierint, pervenisse non miretur? Hic enim in terra Gothica natus, ac educatus, adeo exacte, puriter & facundè, Christianni Danicæ, atque Norvegicæ Regis immanitatem, neque ipsi sanguinario Tyranno diu lætam, neque demum Diis ultoribus neglectam perscriptam, ut eruditus gentibus pudori esse possit; quod Latine facundie fruges, sub Cimmerico cælo penè felicibus ac uberius, quam sub hac benigniore, ac temperatioris plagæ proveniant (6). - - - - Is it not very surprising, that the Latin tongue should reach that country, whether the Roman arms could never penetrate. For James Ziegler, born and educated in a Gothic land, has with so much accuracy, purity, and elegance, described the cruelties of Christian King of Denmark and Norway, in which the blood thirsty tyrant did not long triumph, nor at last escape the avenging band of Heaven, that learned nations may well be ashamed that Roman eloquence, planted in a northern soil, should thrive and prosper better than in this more benign and temperate climate.' Schefferus observes that this book of Ziegler was printed at Strasburg by Wendelin Rhiel in the year 1536 (7). Gefner saith the same thing, but observes that it was printed with some other books of the same author, and with a description of the Holy Land written by Wolfgang of Weissenburg: 'Terræ sanctæ, quam Palæstinam nominant, Syriæ, Arabiæ, Ægypti, & Schondie doctissima descriptio, unâ cum singulis tabulis earundem regionum topographicis. Item, Holmiæ planè regie urbis calamitosissima clades ab eodem descripta: cujus libri & hic titulus est: Christianni secundi regis Danmarciæ crudelitas perpetrata in proceres Sueciæ & populum Holmensem. Volumen impressum Argentorati apud Wend. Rhielium, 1536 in folio cum alia descriptione Terræ sanctæ juxta ordinem alphabeti, ad scripturam proximè directâ, auctore Wolfgango Weissenburgio (8). - - - - A learned description of the Holy Land, called

'Palestine, of Syria, Arabia, Egypt, and Scandinavia, together with Topographical maps, of each of these countries. Likewise the calamitous overthrow of the royal city of Stockholm, described by the same author, in a book intitled; The cruelties perpetrated by Christian II King of Denmark, on the Nobles of Sweden, and the inhabitants of Stockholm. This volume is printed at Strasburg by Wend. Rhiel in the year 1536, in folio, together with another description of the Holy Land in alphabetical order, designed for the understanding of the Bible, by Wolfgang Weissenburg.' This History of the cruelties of Christian is inserted in the second tome of the Scriptores historiæ Germanicæ, printed at Basil by the care of Schardius in the year 1574. It was joined by Wolfius, with Ziegler's Scandinavia, to Albertus Krantz's Historia Regnorum Septentrionalium, of the Francfort edition in 1583. The index Librorum prohibitorum (9) informs us that the description of the Holy Land, &c. was printed at Strasburg apud Petrum Olipionem in the year 1532. Gefner knew not of this edition.

[C] He declares that he composed his book concerning Scandinavia, from memoirs communicated to him while he was at Rome. I shall set down a piece of his preface, extracted out of Gefner's Bibliothecæ in the 368th leaf. 'Ego qui de locis Septentrionalibus, veteri historiæ incognitis, commentarium æditurus sum, atque ita ut illa loca rebus his, unde regiones beatæ dicuntur, affluentia sim ostensurus, ut hac plena fide apud auditorem reponam, necessario quoque præfabor quibus auctoribus confectum susceperim opus. Romæ dum essem, fuerunt in urbe continuo tempore, duo archiepiscopi Nidrosiensis regni Norduegie, prior quidem gente Danus, &c. Post hujus mortem substitutus ei Olavus Romam venit, quem frequenter conveni, & didici reliqua Norduegie, quanta tradi ab uno potuerunt. Gothiam vero, Sueciamque, & Finlandiam, supraque has ad Boream Laponiam extensam, sed etiam Gronlandiæ Chersonesum & insulam Tylen accepi à reverendis episcopis, Joanne Magno Upsalieni, & Petro Aoroseni Gothi, tunc in urbe privatis amicis, & mecum conjunctissime conversatis. Et quidem Upsalienis in commentario Schondie scribendæ antea fuerat, permiseratque id censure nostræ, &c. - - - - As I am going to publish a book concerning the northern countries, which were unknown to ancient historians, and to make it appear that those parts abound in such things as denominate a country happy; in order to gain credit with my readers, I shall give a prefatory account of my vouchers. While I was at Rome, there lived in that city two Archbishops of Drontheim in the Kingdom of Norway, one a Dane &c. After his death his successor Alaus coming to Rome, I frequently visited him, and learned of him the other matters concerning Norway, as much as could be related by one single person. What concerns Gotthland, Sweden, and Finland, and Lapland lying to the north of these countries, and also of Greenland, and the island of Iceland, I had from two reverend Prelates both born at Goth land, who lived at Rome in private friendship and great intimacy with me. And indeed the Bishop of Upsal, one of them, had been formerly employed in writing a book concerning Schoonen, and had submitted it to my amendments &c.'

(9) Page 546, of the edition 1667.

[D] A

7 U

V O L . V .

(g) Remark
[C], of the article AVENTI-NUS.
(h) See the Epi-tome of Gefner's Bibliothèque,
pag. m. 355.

Stunica [D], and which was printed at Basil by John Froben in the same year. What he wrote on Astronomy is not amiss [E]. There are several other authors called ZIEGLER; some of whom are in Mr König, but not JEROM ZIEGLER professor of Poetry at Ingolstadt in the XVIth century. He published Aventinus's Annals, as I have said (g), and wrote several dramatic poems which are published (b).

[D] A book which he wrote at Rome in favour of Erasmus. The title of it is, 'Libellus Jacobi Ziegleri Landavi Bavari adversus Jacobi Stunica maledictum, pro Germania. The Printer Frobenius faith of it: Commodum à Roma missus est Libellus Jacobi Ziegleri Landavi Bavari, quo promittit perpetuam rerum gestarum seriem ex quatuor Evangelis contextam, & obiter Stunicam pro ipsius dignitate tractat. . . . Videtur hic Landavius homo multæ reconditæque lectionis, ingenio festivo, magno judicio, filo non neglecto, denique toto pectore Germaniam spirans indolem. . . . The book of James Ziegler of Landshut in Bavaria was sent from Rome, at a very seasonable time: in this book he promises to give a continued History from the four Evangelists; and he occasionally takes to task Stunica, in a manner suitable to his deserts. This Bavarian seems to be a man of extensive and curious learning, of a facetious humour, and of great judgment: he seems not to be wanting in stile, and to have all the accomplishments of a German.'

[E] What he wrote on Astronomy is not amiss. At Basil in the year 1536, was published in 4to his book, de constructione solidæ Sphære, cum Scholiis in Opusculum Procli de Sphæra, & de canonica per Sphæram operatione, & de hemicyclo Bersi memorato à Vitruvio (10). Adjunctis Arati phenomenonis Græci, cum Commen-tariis Theonis. His Commentary on the second book of Pliny; quo diffcultates Pliniana, præsertim Astronomica, omnes tolluntur: item Organum quo catholica siderum, ut apud Plinium est, mira arte docetur, was printed at Basil in 1531. Of this James Milichius speaks honourably in the Preface to a book which he published on that subject in the year 1534, in 4to (11). 'Ex tant, faith he (12), in hunc librum (secundum Plinium) Cigleri hominis docti, Commentarii, erudite & subtiliter scripti, sed neque integrum librum interpretantur, & à scholarum consuetudine nonnulli recedunt. Quare spero eum boni consilium esse, quod Amicis morem gessi, qui mihi autores fuerunt, ut hæc ad utilitatem juventutis collecta ederem. Adeo enim nihil de ipsius exultatione detraho, ut libenter profitear, me ab ipso sæpe adjutum esse. . . . There are extant on this second book of Pliny the Commentaries of the learned Ziegler, which are written with great erudition and acuteness, but they do not explain the whole book, and depart a little from the usages of schools. I hope therefore he will take it in good part that I comply with my friends, who have advised me to publish this commentary for the use of youth. And so far am I from derogating from the merit of Ziegler, that I willingly own I have been frequently assisted by him.'

(11) Father Hensdun, Pref. in Plinium, mentions that edition. I have not seen it, see that of the year 1538, Hæle Swenson, in 4to, mentioned by Gefner; but I have seen that of 1543, in 4to, and that of Leipsic, typis Wargianis, 1573, in 4to. (12) Jacobus Milichius Præf. in Commentarii in II Librum Plinii, Ed. b. 1573.

(10) Lib. ix, cap. ix.

ZOROASTER, King of the Bactrians, was vanquished by Ninus, and passed for the inventor of Magic [A]. Eusebius places this victory of Ninus in the seventh year of Abraham, and several authors make Zoroaster much antienter. There are also some who

[A] He was vanquished by Ninus, and passed for the inventor of Magic. The following words of Justin inform us that this was the last victory of this conqueror, and that Zoroaster philosophized very judiciously on the principles of the universe, and the motion of the stars. Postremum illi (Nino) bellum cum Zoroastre rege Bactrianorum fuit, qui primus dicitur artes magicas invenisse, & mundi principia, siderumque motus diligentissime spectasse. Hoc occiso, & ipse decessit (1). Some (2) ascribe to Semiramis the glory of having vanquished Zoroaster. They doubtless mean somewhat more than what we read in Diodorus Siculus (3), viz. that being gone to her husband at the siege of Bactra, she advised and made an attack, which ended in the reduction of the city. After which Ninus married her. I believe they mean that one of the wars which the gloriously terminated after the death of that great monarch, was that in which Zoroaster lost his dominions. An Historian (4), cited by Syncellus, treats of the birth of Semiramis and of that Magician, after having related the actions of Ninus (5). It is therefore to Semiramis rather than Ninus, that he ascribes the victory of which we are speaking, and I cannot tell whether to confirm this, we might not take advantage of the following Latin Verbes.

Perfarum statuit Babylona Semiramis urbem,

Justit & imperio furgere Bactra caput (6).

Semiramis

Rais'd Babylon, the Persian town, . . .

and had

The Bactrian city rise her empire's head.

Mr Stanley (7) faith, that Zoroaster, according to Eusebius, was cotemporary with Semiramis; but it is certain, that, according to Eusebius, he was vanquished by King Ninus. If what Arnobius faith be true, that magical secrets were used on both sides in this war betwixt the Assyrians and Bactrians, it will be difficult to believe that Zoroaster was the inventor of that art; for it must be supposed that these secrets quickly passed into Chaldaea, and that they grew to such a great perfection in a very short time, that Ninus's Magicians were able to contend with, and overcome, the inventor. I do not lay this down as an impossibility. But Arnobius's words runs thus: 'Ut inter Assyrios & Bactrianos Nino quondam Zoroastre ductoribus non tantum ferro dimicaretur & viribus, verum etiam magicis & Chaldeorum ex reconditis disciplinis, invidia nostra hæc fuit (8). . . . Antiently the Assyrians and Bactrians, the former under the conduct of Ninus, and the latter under that of Zoroaster, fought against each other, not only with armed men, but also by the help of Magical arts, and the strict discipline of the Chaldeans. Ammianus Marcellinus will have it, that Zoroaster was only the augumenter of the Magical secrets of the Chaldeans (9). Some authors inform us that Azonaces was Zoroaster's instructor, and consequently Azonaces must be considered as the inventor of Magic: 'Hermippus qui de tota ea arte diligentissime scripsit, & vicies centum millia versuum à Zoroastre condita, indicibus quoque voluminum ejus positis explanavit, præceptorum, à quo institutum diceret, tradidit Azonacem, ipsum vero quinque millibus annorum ante Trojanum bellum fuisse (10). . . . Hermippus, who hath written with great care on every thing relating to this art, and explained twenty thousand verses composed by Zoroaster, who was the person who initiated him in this art, and that he lived five thousand years before the Trojan war.' St Augustin (11) and Orosius (12) have followed the tradition mentioned by Justin. Apuleius, in his catalogue of the most famous Magicians of antiquity places Zoroaster in the first rank, and makes him the most antient of all. 'Si quamlibet medicum emolumentum probaveritis, ego ille sum Carinondas, vel Damigeron, vel Moyses, vel Jannes, vel Apollonius, vel ipse Dardanus, vel quicumque alius post Zoroastrem & Hostanem inter Magos celebratus est (13). . . . If you will prove that it is of any advantage, then let me pass for Carinondas, or Damigeron, or Moyses, or Apollonius, or Jannes, or Dardanus himself, or for any other celebrated Magician.' SINCE THE TIME OF Zoroaster and Hostanes.

Observe, that Diodorus Siculus (14), who very amply relates the war betwixt Ninus and the Bactrians, calls

(1) Justin. lib. i, cap. i.

(2) Theo, in Progm. cap. ix, pag. m. 112.

(3) Diodor. Sicul. lib. ii, cap. vi.

(4) Called Cephalon. He lived under Hadrian. See Marston, ubi infra.

(5) Syncellus, pag. 167, apud Marston. Chron. Can. ad Sæcul. ix, pag. m. 144.

(6) Propert. Eleg. X, lib. iii.

(7) Thomas Stanley, Hist. Philof. Orientalis, lib. i, cap. iii, pag. 10, ex verbatim Jo. Clerici.

(8) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 5.

(9) Orosius (10) Plinius, lib. xxi, cap. vii, pag. m. 374.

(11) Augustin. lib. xxi, cap. vii, pag. m. 75.

(12) Orosius, lib. i, cap. i.

(13) Arnob. lib. i, cap. vii.

(14) Diodor. lib. ii, cap. vi.

who make him of a much later date: all authors are full of variations on this part of the History of this famous person [B], and scarce agree better on the rest. My readers therefore ought not to expect here any thing besides a heap of uncertainties, and an odd medly

the king of the latter not Zoroastrea but Oxyartes, nor doth he mention any Magic. Yet he relates what he had read in Ctesias, an Historian sufficiently inclined to spread such stories (15). Vossius (16) and Henry Valesius pretend that Justin says that Zoroaster defended himself against Ninus, not only by force of arms, but also by that of Magic. But Justin hath no such thing. The same Vossius affirms, that Justin's relation was taken from the first book of Ctesias, as Arnobius asserts. But this is a new falsity. Arnobius's words are very confused (17), and this fact doth not appear there.

[B] All authors are full of variations concerning the time of Zoroaster. We have seen that he was made contemporary with King Ninus, who, according to Eusebius, died about eight hundred twenty-five years before the taking of Troy. We have also seen (18) that Zoroaster, according to the opinion of Hermippus, preceded the Trojan War five thousand years. Hermodorus, the Platonist, followed the same chronology with Hermippus (19), and Plutarch mentions it as being the most commonly believed (20): but, according to Suidas, the interval betwixt Zoroaster and the Trojan war was but five hundred years. Some very great authors have said that Zoroaster lived six thousand years before the death of Plato: 'Eudoxus, qui inter sapientie sectas clarissimam, utilissimamque eam (Magicam artem) intelligi voluit, Zoroastrem hunc sex millibus annorum ante Platonis mortem fuisse prodidit. Sic & Aristoteles (21). --- Eudoxus, who would have the art of Magic to be accounted the noblest and most useful of all the branches of knowledge, relates that this Zoroaster lived six thousand years before Plato's death. The same thing is affirmed by Aristotle.'

Others, as Xanthus, the Lydian (22), do not make him above six hundred years more ancient than Xerxes's expedition. Others say that he must be looked upon as the same with a Pamphylian, whose name was Er, and who was the son of Armenius, and being risen again twelve days after his death, related what he had seen in the other world (23). His narrations seem to prove that he had read Homer's Iliad, and are at least a demonstrative proof that he lived after the siege of Troy. You will find them in Plato in the tenth book of his Republic (24). It is Clemens Alexandrinus who supposes that this man was the same with Zoroaster, which he proves by this, that the latter declares himself the son of Armenius, and a Pamphylian by birth (25), and divinely instructed in several things in Hell (26). But since Arnobius observes that this Pamphylian, the son of Armenius, was the favourite of Cyrus, we have here a tradition according to which Zoroaster appeared in the world much later than it is believed. Armenius Zoftriani nepos, & familiaris Pamphilus Cyri (27), are the words of Arnobius. Valesius observes that Armenius is there taken for filius Armenii (28); the word Cyri seems to him suspicious, he rather inclined to have it Nini, because, faith he, the person spoken of is one Zoroaster mentioned in Ctesias's first book. But Ctesias did not begin to speak of the King of Persia till his seventh book; and his six preceding books were employed in relating the actions of the Assyrians and Medes. I answer, it is not at all certain that Arnobius pretends that Ctesias spoke of this son of Armenius. Observe, that several Critics pretend that Ostani, or Hofani, should be read instead of Zoftriani; but they are not aware that they impute a very gross anachronism to Arnobius, for Ostanes having followed Xerxes in the expedition to Greece (29), it is not possible that he should have been grand-father to a friend of Cyrus.

Agathias, who lived in the reign of Justinian, informs, that according to the Persians of that time, Zoroaster, and Hytaspes were contemporary. But they did not say whether this Hytaspes was the father of Darius, or any other. Sir John Marsham positively decides, that it ought to be understood of Darius's father (30), and grounds his opinion on this, that one of the elegies engraved on his tomb, make him the instructor of the Magi; and that the same Historian who affirms that Hytaspes excelled in Magic, styles him the father of Darius (31): 'Deinde (post Zoroastrem) Hytaspes Rex prudentissimus Darii pater. Qui cum superioris Indiae secreta fidentius penetraret, ad nemorosam quamdam venerat solitudinem, cujus tranquillis silentiis præcelsa Brachmanorum ingenia potiuntur: eorumque monitu rationes mundani motus & siderum, purisque sacrarum ritus quantum colligere potuit eruditus, ex his quæ didicit, aliqua sensibus Magorum infudit: quæ illi cum disciplinis præfertiendi futura, per suam quisque progeniem, posteris ætatis tradunt. Ex eo per sæcula multa ad præsens unâ eademque profapia multitudo creata, Deorum cultibus dedicatur (32). --- After the time of Zoroaster, reigned Hytaspes, a very prudent king, and the father of Darius. This prince having boldly penetrated into the most remote parts of the upper India, came at last to a solitary forest, where there dwelt a silent and awful tranquility which the Brachmans enjoy. In this solitude these sublime genius's instructed him in the knowledge of the motion of the earth, and that of the stars; and from them he learned as much as he could acquire concerning the purest rites of religion. Part of this knowledge he communicated to the Magi, which, together with the art of predicting future events, they delivered down to posterity, each in his own family. The great number of men who have sprung from these families, ever since that age down to the present, have all been set apart for cultivating the worship of the gods.' Ammianus Merceulinus was in the wrong to say, that this father of Darius was a king, and perhaps he committed this fault upon having read in general, that one King Hytaspes was a great Magician, and believed that there was no other Hytaspes than the father of Darius. But it is beyond dispute, that a certain Hytaspes elder than the foundation of Rome, and a great prophet, is mentioned by authors. 'Hytaspes quoque, qui fuit Medorum rex antiquissimus, à quo annis quoque nomen accipit qui nunc Hytaspes dicitur, admirabilis omnium, sub interpretatione vaticinantis pueri ad memoriam posteris tradidit, sublatum iri ex orbe imperium, nomenque Romanum; multo ante præfatus, quam illa Trojana gens conderetur (33). --- Hytaspes also, the most ancient King of the Medes, and from whom the river Hytaspes derives its name, is the most admirable of them all: for under the interpretation of the prophecy of a boy, he informed posterity that the Roman empire, and even the Roman name, should be utterly destroyed; and this he predicted a long time before the establishment of that colony of that Hytaspes, Trojans.' It ought to be read Hytaspes and not Hytaspes in this passage of Lactantius. Thus some good Critics have corrected two places, where Justin Martyr mentions this Pagan prophet; one of them informs us that he predicted the conflagration of all perishable things; and in the other, he observes, that the reading of his writings was prohibited on pain of death, because they discovered the truths which the Pagans persecuted (34). Κατ' ἐνέργειαν δὲ τῶν θαύλων δαιμόνων, δάνατον ὤρισθε κατὰ τὴν τὰς Τεσσάρων, ἢ Σιγγλλῆς, ἢ τῶν περὶ τὴν βίβλου ἀναγινωσκόντων, ὅπως διὰ τὸ εὖ ἀποστέλλωσιν ἐν ἰσχυρῶν τὰς ἀνθρώπων τὴν καλὴν γνώσιν λαβεῖν, αὐτοῖς δὲ δαλεῖν τὰς κατ' ἐκείνους. ὅπερ εἰς τέλος ἐκ ἰσχυρῶν πρᾶξαι. Opera autem & instinctu malorum dæmonum mortis supplicium adversus librorum Hytaspis aut Sibyllæ aut prophetarum lectores constitutum est: ut per timorem homines ab illis, quò minus scripta ea legentes rerum bonarum noticiam percipiant, sed in servitute eorum retineantur, absterreantur (35). --- For by the powerful influence of the evil spirits, it was decreed, that whoever should read the books of Hytaspis, of the Sibyl, or of the Prophets, should be put to death: This decree was made in order to deter men from reading those books which might lead them to the knowledge of the truth, and in order to keep them in subjection to those evil spirits. I shall observe, by the by, that these books (36), as well as (37) See in what manner Clemens Alexand. Strom. lib. vi, pag. 636, D, speaks of them.

(31) Porphyry, ἐπεὶ ἀποχρεῖ, lib. i, num. 15, apud Marsham, ibid. Valesius, ubi supra, pretends that his elegy was engraved upon Darius's tomb, and not on that of Hytaspes.

(15) Henr. Valesius in Amm. Marcell. lib. xiii, pag. m. 374.

(16) Vossius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 33.

(17) Arnob. lib. i, pag. m. 31.

(18) In the foregoing remark, citat. (10).

(19) Apud Diogen. Laert. in Proem. num. 2.

(20) Plut. de Iside, pag. 369.

6000

(21) Plinius, ubi supra.

(22) Apud Diogen. Laert. ibid.

2

recta

(23) Plato, de Republ. lib. x, pag. 361.

(24) Pag. 361, & seq.

(25) Clem. Alexandr. Strom. lib. vi, pag. 599.

(26) Compare what has been said of PYTHAGORAS, remark [F], of his article.

(27) Arnob. lib. i, pag. 31.

(28) Henr. Valesius, ubi supra.

(29) Plin. ubi supra, pag. 726.

(30) Marsham. Chron. Can. ad Sæcul. ix, pag. m. 145.

(31) Porphyry, ἐπεὶ ἀποχρεῖ, lib. i, num. 15, apud Marsham, ibid. Valesius, ubi supra, pretends that his elegy was engraved upon Darius's tomb, and not on that of Hytaspes.

inaccurat

(33) Lactant. lib. vii, cap. x, pag. m. 492. In the xviiith chapter of the same book he quotes a passage of that Hytaspes.

(34) Justin. Apolog. II, p. 66.

(35) Id. ibid. pag. 82.

pious frauds

(a) Riffle eodem die, quo genitus esset, unum hominem accepimus Zoroastrem. Eidem cerebrum ita palpitasse, ut impostam repelleret manum, futuræ præfatio scientiæ. Plin. lib. vii, cap. xvi, pag. m. 35.

(b) Id. lib. xi, cap. 42, pag. 592.

(c) Dio Chrysostomus. Orat. Boethienica.

(d) Cedrenus, and Suidas.

(e) Clemens Recognitionum, lib. iv, apud Bochart. Geog. Sacre, lib. iv, cap. i, pag. m. 231.

(f) Id. ib. apud Huetium, Demonstr. Evang. Prepos. iv, cap. v, pag. m. 156.

(g) Id. ibid. apud eund. ibid. pag. 152.

(h) See, above, remark [B], of the article CHAM.

medly of stories. We are told (a) that Zoroaster laughed on the very day he was born, that he is the only person to whom this happened; and that the palpitation of his brain was so strong, that it repulsed any hand laid upon his head, which was a preface of his knowledge. It is added (b), that he passed twenty years in the deserts, and that he there eat nothing but a kind of cheese which never grew old (c); that the love of wisdom and justice obliged him to retire to a mountain to live there in solitude; that when he descended from thence there fell a celestial fire upon it which perpetually burned; that the King of Persia accompanied with the greatest lords of his court approached it in order to put up prayers to God; that Zoroaster came out of these flames without being damaged; that he comforted and encouraged the Persians, and offered sacrifices as if God had accompanied him to that place; that afterwards he did not live indifferently with all sorts of men, but only with those born for truth, and who were capable of the knowledge of God, which kind of people the Persians called Magi; (d) that he wished to be struck with thunder, and consumed by fire from Heaven, and that he ordered the Persians to collect his bones after he was burnt in this manner, and to keep and venerate them as a pledge of the preservation of their monarchy; that they really paid a great veneration to his relics, but that in process of time having neglected them, their monarchy fell to ruin. The chronicle of Alexandria adds, that after having held this discourse with them, he invoked Orion, and was consumed by a celestial fire. Some writers say (e); that Mizraim the son of Ham was instructed in Magic by his father, and (f) that he was burned alive by the Demon whom he too frequently importuned (g); that the Persians adored him as a favourite of God, and a saint whom a thunderbolt served as a vehicle to mount up to Heaven, and as a living star, whence it came, that after his death he was called Zoroaster. Gregorius Turonensis relates very near the same thing of Cuth, the eldest son of Ham [C]. Others will have it that Ham himself was the Zoroaster of the eastern nations, and the inventor of Magic (h). Mr Bochart very well refutes this falsity (i). Cedrenus observes that Zoroaster, who became so famous an Astronomer among the Persians, was descended from Belus. This imports that he was descended from Nimrod. Some authors have taken him for Nimrod himself (k); others for Assur or Japhet. All the ancient Persians believe Zoroaster antecedent to Moses, nay some Magi affirm that he is the same with Abraham, and frequently call him Ibrahim Zerdashti, as much as to say, Abraham the friend of fire (l). The eastern Christians say that Zoroaster began to flourish in the reign of Cambyfes, and that he was a native of the Province of Media; but others make him an Assyrian, and pretend that he was a disciple of the Prophet Elijah (m). Ben Sebnab faith, that he was a disciple of Ezra, and that Hyftaspes, the father of Darius; wherefore it is true that Zoroaster and this Hyftaspes lived at the same time (37). Valefius the younger affirms (38), that according to the testimony of Agathias, some said that Hyftaspes, the doctor of the Magi, was much more ancient than Darius's father. It is certain that Agathias doth not say this, but on the contrary complains, that the Persians did not say whether their Hyftaspes was the father of Darius, or not. I mention this only to shew that the citations of the most judicious authors frequently deceive us, and consequently that prudence obliges us to examine quotations, by whomsoever alleged. I here repeat this observation, though I remember to have made it in other places.

I should never have done, if I should censure all the mistakes of our authors, and mention all their variations, with relation to the chronology of Zoroaster. But what farther confirms Sir John Marsham's opinion is this. It is affirmed that Pythagoras was Zoroaster's disciple, under the reign of Cambyfes, the son of Cyrus. I have elsewhere cited (39) the words of Apuleius, which inform us of the fact. Some understand them as if Pythagoras, having been made a slave in Egypt, was transported into Persia. Others will have him transported into Babylon, and there instructed by Zoroaster the Babylonian, whom they distinguish from the Persian. Hicse (quingue Zoroastri) addi potest Sextus Zoroaster, sic enim ab Apuleio vocatur, qui Babylone vixit, quo tempore Pythagoras captivus à Cambyse eo deductus est. Idem scriptor eum vocat, omnis divini arcanum antistitem, eoque magistro præcipue usum esse Pythagoram dicit. Videtur idem esse ac Zabratu, à quo Diogenes affirmat Pythagoram purgatum esse omnibus prius vitæ fordibus, & edoctum, quarum rerum probos expertes esse oporteret, uti & Phycam. Idem quoque erit Nazaratas Assyrius, quem Alexander, in libro de Pythagoricis Symbolis, affirmat magistrum fuisse Pythagoræ. Hunc eundem Suidas vocat Zarem, Cyrillus Zaranem, Plutarchus Zaratan (40).

† In Floridis.

‡ Porphyry. Vit. Pythagoræ.

(40) Thomas Stanley, Hist. Philosophiæ Orientalis, lib. i, cap. ii, p. 8, 9.

tioned by Apuleius. This Zoroaster lived in Babylon, at the time when Pythagoras was brought thither a captive by Cambyfes. The same writer calls him the chief interpreter of all divine mysteries, and says, that Pythagoras was instructed principally by him. He seems to be the same with Zabratu, by whom, as Diogenes affirms, Pythagoras was purged from all the filth of his former life, and instructed in what good men ought to know, and in Natural Philosophy. He is also the same with Nazaratas the Assyrian, whom Alexander, in his book concerning the Pythagorical symbols, affirms to have taught Pythagoras. The same person Suidas calls Zares, Cyrillus Zaranem, and Plutarch Zarates. These words are taken out of Mr Stanley's book: I do not know what he means when he observes that Apuleius makes use of the expression Sextus Zoroaster, which I do not find in the book he cites. Nor am I more certain on what he grounds his assertion, that Pythagoras was brought prisoner to Babylon by King Cambyfes. The words of Apuleius plainly import that he was sent into Egypt with the prisoners of that prince (41). In order to understand this perfectly well, Herodotus should be consulted (42), who relates, that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, intending to put to death some persons which he suspected to be hatching a rebellion, entreated Cambyfes to ask some troops of him; in which Cambyfes accordingly desiring, Polycrates sent him into Egypt forty sail of ships, in which he embarked these persons, and prayed him not to let them return. Apuleius meant, no doubt, that some persons then delivered by Polycrates to Cambyfes. He doth not speak of the transportation of Pythagoras, either to Persia or to Babylon.

[C] Gregorius Turonensis relates very near the same thing of Cuth the eldest son of Ham. The eldest son of Ham, saith he (43), was named Cuth. The latter was the first inventor of the art of Magic by the suggestion of the devil, and whith the first beginner of idolatry. He was the first who, moved by a diabolical suggestion, made a small statue to be adored:

(i) Bochart. ubi supra, pag. m. 231, & seq.

(k) See Huetius, ubi supra, pag. 150.

(l) Hieronimus, Bibl. Orientalis, pag. 911.

(m) Id. ibid. et Anabaptismi.

(41) Inter captivos Cambyse regis, Ægyptum cum Polycrate (Pythagoras) delatus. Flor. pag. m.

(42) Herodotus, lib. iii, cap. xlv.

(43) Gregorius Turonensis, ubi supra, lib. i, cap. v.

that this Prophet laid his curse on him, on account of his maintaining some opinions very opposite to the Jewish law; that he became leprous by way of punishment for his impiety, and that being expelled Jerusalem on that account, he retired to Persia, where he set up a new religion (p). Some have taken him for the Prophet Ezekiel (o), and it cannot be denied that they ground their assertion on the agreement of numerous particulars which belong to the one, and are related of the other (p). George Hornius imagines that Zoroaster is the false Prophet Balaam (q). Huetius shews that he was the Moses of the Jews, and mentions an infinite number of particulars, in which the account we have of Moses agrees with the Pagan stories of Zoroaster (r). There are scarce any people who do not believe that there were several Zoroasters, as well as several Jupiters and Hercules's. See Dr Thomas Stanley's treatise which Mr le Clerc hath translated into Latin (s); and you will there find (t) a Chaldean, a Bactrian, a Persian, a Pamphilian, a Proconnesian, and a Babylonian Zoroaster (u). They are in the wrong who believe that Zoroaster taught a diabolical Magic; for his Magic was only the study of the Divine nature, and of religious worship, as Plato expressly declares [D]. But though it is easy to clear him from this accusation, it is difficult to excuse him with regard to the doctrine of two principles, so strong is the presumption that he actually taught that there are two co-eternal causes, one of good, and the other of evil things [E]. Dr Hyde in his excellent

(n) Ibid. pag. 932.

(o) Huetius, ubi supra, pag. 251.

(p) Id. ibid. pag. 458.

(q) Hornius, Histor. Philol. lib. II, cap. IV, pag. 79, 80.

(r) Huetius, ubi supra, pag. 149, & seq.

(s) Intituled, Historia Philosophiae Orientalis.

(t) In the second chapter, of the first book.

(u) See the remark [B], towards the end.

adored: he made men believe that he had power to bring down the stars and fire from heaven. He went to the Persians, who called him Zoroaster, that is, a living Star. Having also learned of him the custom of worshipping fire, they adored him as a god, after he had been divinely consumed by fire.

[D] His Magic was only the study . . . of religious worship, as Plato expressly declares. There are four chosen persons, faith he, appointed to educate the eldest son of the King of the Persians. They choose the wisest, the most just, the most temperate, and the bravest man that can be found. The wisest man instructs him in Zoroaster's Magic, that is, the worship of the gods; besides, he teacheth him the art of government. Ἄνδρες μὲν μαγίαν τε διδάσκει τὴν Ζωροάστρου τῷ Ὀρμαζδῇ (ὅστις δὲ τὸ τοῦ θεοῦ διακρίσις) διδάσκει δὲ καὶ τὰ βασιλικά. Quorum primus magiam Zoroastri Oromasti filii docet, est autem illa Deorum cultus; atque idem tradit instituta regia (44). Observe that Zoroaster is called the son of Oromastus, and that Oromastus is the name which he and his followers gave to the good God, or good principle. Whence to call him the son of Oromastus should seem to be the same, as calling him the Son of God. Dr Stanley conjectures, with great probability, that this last title was really bestowed on him. Hinc colligas verba Platonis esse intelligenda de Mago Persa, qui propter inusitatam eruditionem figuratè, aut fabulose dicebatur filius Dei, aut alicujus boni Genii, quo honore affecti sunt Pythagoras, Plato, alique praestantissimi viri (45). . . . From hence we may infer that Plato's words must be understood of that Persian Magus, who, on account of his uncommon learning, was in an allegorical or fabulous manner, styled the Son of God, or of some good genius: and this honour was also paid to Pythagoras, Plato, and other learned men. Those who desire to see a great many passages which testify, that the Magic of the Persians, instituted by Zoroaster, was the study of religion and morality, need only read Briffonius (46) and Bullingerus (47). Nor is any person ignorant that Gabriel Naudé hath learnedly and solidly justified our Zoroaster against the accusation of the black art (48). He mentions several authors who may be consulted.

(44) Plato, in Alcibiade I, pag. 441, C.

(45) Stanley, ubi supra, pag. 21.

(46) Briffonius, de Regno Persarum, lib. II, pag. 178, & seq. Edit. Comel. 1595.

(47) Jul. Caesar Bullengerus, Eclog. ad Arnobium, pag. 346, & seq.

(48) Naudé, Apologie des grands Hommes, pag. 234, & seq.

(49) Plut. de Iside & Osiride, pag. 369.

(50) What is omitted here may be seen above, in the article MANICHEES, remark [C], at the first paragraph.

(51) That is, the Persians.

to the good God, and others to the evil demon; and likewise they think, that land animals, such as dogs, fowls, and hedge-hogs, belong to God, and water animals to the evil demon; for which reason they account him happy who kills the greatest number of them. However, these men relate a great many fabulous stories concerning these gods. They say, for instance, that Oromazes sprung from the purest light, and Arimanius from darkness; that they are at war one with another, and that Oromazes made six gods, the first of whom is the god of Benevolence, the second of Truth, the third of Justice, the fourth of Wisdom, the fifth of Wealth, and the sixth of Pleasure which accrues from good actions; and that Arimanius likewise made the like number of demons, all opposite and enemies to the former.

After this, Oromazes having first trebled his own magnitude, mounted up as far above the sun, as the sun is above the earth, and so bespangled the heavens with stars, among which he established one (called Sirius, or the Dog-Star) as a mistress or guide to all the rest. After having made twenty-four gods more, he placed them in an egg-shell. But those who were made by Arimanius (being also of the like number) grated and raised this egg-shell to such a degree, that they pierced it; and ever since that time bad things have been promiscuously mingled and confounded with good. But the fatal and predestinated time will come, when Arimanius, who brought plagues and famines upon the earth, shall be ruined and utterly destroyed by the good gods; at which time, the earth shall be plain, smooth, and level, and there shall only be one manner of life, and one form of government among men, who shall all speak the same language, and live happily. Theopompus also writes, that according to the Magi, one of these gods shall be victorious for the space of three thousand years, and shall be vanquished during as long a time, and that for three thousand years more, they shall contend and fight one against the other, and destroy each others works; till at last Pluto shall fail and utterly perish, then mankind shall be happy, and neither need food nor yield a shadow; and that the god, who has wrought all these things, doth, for some time, take his repose and rest; but that this time is not too long for a god, and would not seem considerable to a man asleep. These are the fables invented by the Magi.

It was not a needless thing to set down this whole passage, since it contains somewhat at large the opinions and precepts of Zoroaster; and we may observe from thence, that the asserters of two principles, involved themselves in several absurdities, when they descended to a particular explanation of their system. I have observed the same thing when speaking of the Manichees (52). But since, according to the most common tradition, Zoroaster must pass for the founder of the Magi, and it appears by a great number of authorities that they admitted a good god, whom they called Oromazes, or Oromafdes, and an evil god whom they named Arimanius; it is very probable that he really asserted this doctrine (53).

6 +

6 triple long

24

24

3+3=6

sleep

300

(52) Above, remark [B], of the article MANICHEES.

(53) See Diog. Laërt. in Proemio, num. 8, and Agathias Histor. lib. II.

Let

7 X

V O L. V.

excellent treatise on the religion of the ancient Persians, cites some authors who clear him

(54) Ἡ μὲν
ἐν μαγίᾳ μυθολογία τοῦτον ἐνεῖ τρέπον.
Hoc modo se habent magorum fabule. Plut. de Isid. pag. 370,
B.

(55) See, above,
the article MA-NICHEES, remark (C); the article PAULI-CIANS, citation (85); and the article PE-RICLES, citation (71).

(56) Plut. ibid.
pag. 370, F.

(57) Plut. de
creat. animæ,
p. 1014, 1015.
Note, that of the four summaries at the margin of this quotation, the three last were made by Simon Goulart.

natur stine

WHAT chaos is,
according to Plato, as explained by Plutarch.

Or the substance of body, and the soul of the world, and what they are.

Let us observe, that Plutarch having recited what we have seen above, adds, these are the fables invented by the Magi (54). If we should infer from thence that he rejected, in general, the whole hypothesis of two principles, the one good, and the other evil, we should mistake his sentiments. He might indeed very well condemn the particular explications of Zoroaster's followers, but doubtless he admitted the whole foundation of their system, that the god whom they called good, is not the cause of any evil. I have cited several passages of his works, wherein he declares himself very clearly on this head, and yet they do not discover the whole foundation of his doctrine (55). Wherefore I shall add here some passages which will more clearly explain it to us. I believe that it agreed very well with the opinion he ascribed to Plato. 'That Philosopher, saith he (56), admits two souls of the world, one good, and the other evil; and also acknowledges, betwixt these two, a third cause, which is not without either soul or reason, nor immovable of itself, as some think, but adjacent, and adherent to the other two, yet always desiring and pursuing what is best . . . because the generation, composition, and constitution, of this world, is intermixed with contrary powers, which are not however equal, for the best prevails and is strongest, but it is impossible that the worst should utterly perish; so firmly is it settled in the body and soul of the universe, where it is perpetually at war with the good principle.' In another place he more amply sets forth this doctrine of Plato, and informs us that the original of evil is not lodged in an insensible, inanimate, matter, utterly void of action and qualities, and which is capable of receiving all imaginable forms; but in a matter which moves and is united to a soul, the disorders of which cannot be wholly and entirely corrected. I shall hereafter declare why I cite such a long passage.

(57) The world, saith Heraclitus, was neither created by a God, nor by a man: as if he had been afraid, that, in case we denied that God is the Creator of the universe, we should be obliged to own that man was the architect of it. But, according to Plato's opinion, it is far better to own that the universe was created by God, and in our songs of praise to ascribe the glory of this structure to him, the frame itself being the noblest masterpiece, and God the most excellent architect, and the best of all causes; yet that the substance and matter of the universe were not created, but always subject to the ordering and disposal of the builder, so as to be made as like himself as possible. For the creation was not out of nothing, but out of matter wanting beauty and perfection, like the rude materials of a house, a garment, or a statue lying first in shapeless confusion. For before the creation of the world the universe was a chaos, that is, a confusion or disorder of things: yet this chaos was neither without a body, without motion, nor without a soul: but the corporeal part was without form or consistence, and the moving soul was rash and inconsiderate, without reason or conduct. God did not make a body of that which was incorporeal, nor a soul of that which was inanimate; as the Musician doth not make the voice, but only renders it sweet, tuneful, and melodious, or as the dancer doth not make motion, but only renders it graceful and well-timed: thus God did not make the tangible solidity of bodies, nor the imaginative or moving faculties of the soul; but having found these two principles, the one obscure and dark, the other turbulent and extravagant, both imperfect, disordered, and confused, he so ordered and disposed them both, that of these two principles he made the noblest and most excellent of all animals. Therefore the substance of body is no other than what Plato calls the nature susceptible of all things, and the seat and nurse of all created beings. As to the substance of the soul, in the book intitled Philebus, he calls it infinity, or the privation of all number, measure, and proportion, admitting neither of more nor less, greater nor smaller, like nor unlike. As to that substance which he says, in his Timæus, is mixed with the indivisible nature, and becomes divisible in bodies, we must not understand it to be a multitude in unity, or length and breadth in points; for these are qualities more proper to bodies than to the soul; but it is that unlimited principle, moving both itself and other substances, that, which in several places of his writings he calls necessity, and in his treatise of laws he openly styles the disorderly, evil, and mischievous soul. For such was the soul of itself; but at length it was endowed with understanding, ratiocination, and harmony, that it might become the soul of the world. Thus that all-receiving and material principle had both magnitude, space, and distance, but was void of beauty, form, and proportion; however, all these it obtained, when it came to be formed into seas and land, the heavens, the stars, and that infinite variety of plants and living creatures. Now as for those who attribute to matter, supposing and not to the soul, that which Plato in his Timæus calls Necessity, in his Philebus Infinity, and the privation of measure and proportion, they cannot maintain it to be the cause of evil, because Plato always supposes that this matter is void of form or figure, or any other quality or virtue, and compares it with oils that have no scent; such as the Perfumers use in composing their perfumes. For Plato could not possibly suppose that to be the cause and principle of evil, which of itself is sluggish, without any active quality, motion, or inclination; and at the same time give this infinity the epithet of wicked and mischievous, and call it Necessity, which, in several cases, is repugnant to, and rebellious against, God. For this Necessity, which defeats heaven (as he says in his Politics) and overturns it, together with that concupiscence which is born with us, and that confusion of ancient nature, which was void of order, before it was formed into its present beautiful shape, whence came they to be conveyed into the various forms and beings, if the subject, which is the first matter was void of all quality whatever, and deprived of all efficient cause? The architect being in his own nature good, intended a frame the nearest approaching to his own perfections. For besides these two, there is no third principle, and if we admit that there is evil, without any precedent cause or principle that produced it, we must fall into the difficulties and perplexities of the Stoics: for of those principles that have a being, it is not possible that either the good one, or the other which is void of all quality, should produce evil. But Plato did not act like those who came after him, who not having perceived and understood the third principle and third cause which is between God and matter, fell into the most strange and absurd proposition imaginable, affirming that the nature of evils came forth casually, and by I know not what accident, or came forth of itself: yet they will not allow a single atom of Epicurus to shift ever so little in its place; for this, say they, would infer that there is motion without any prior cause. Nevertheless they affirm, that vice and wickedness, with a thousand other deformities and imperfections of bodies arise by consequence, and without any other efficient cause (58). But Plato does not say so, for denying that the first matter hath any quality, and removing from God, as far as is possible, the causes of evil, he has written thus concerning the world in his political discourses. The world, says he, received from its maker all things beautiful and good; but as to things evil, wicked, and unjust, in heaven, they proceeded from its exterior habit, and former disposition, and it conveys them to the several animals on the earth. A little lower, in the same treatise, he adds, In process of time, when oblivion encroaches upon the world, the distemper of its ancient confusions prevails more and more, and the hazard is, lest being dissolved, it should again be sunk and plunged into the immense abyss of its former confusion. . . . Plato does indeed give to matter the titles of mother and nurse; but the cause of evil he makes to be the moving force residing within it, and which in body is divisible, a motion not governed by order and reason, though not without a soul, which in his treatise of laws, he expressly calls the soul repugnant, and contrary to that two principles of things, viz. the Artist and the first matter, he endeavours to explain the cause of evil: but he lets himself, being ignorant of what the holy Scripture says on this subject.

In order to illustrate what is said above, he supposes a third principle between God and matter, and afterwards sets forth Plato's opinion concerning the cause of evil.

(58) See, above, remark (7), of the article CHRYSIPPUS, the Philosopher; and remark (12), of the article PAULICIANS.

him on this head. I shall examine whether they deserve credit [F]. It is even affirmed that

* that other which is the cause of all good. For tho' the foul be the cause and principle of motion, yet it is the understanding which is the cause and principle of the order and harmony of motion: God therefore hath not rendered matter sluggish, but prevented it from being any longer troubled and disordered by an extravagant and inconsiderate cause: neither hath he infused into nature the principles of mutation and passion; but when it was under the pressure of all sorts of passions, and disorderly mutations, he removed all the disorders and irregularities, making use of symmetry, proportion, and number, as the most proper instruments for that purpose.*

This explication of Plato's doctrine concerning the creation of the world, and the original of evil, is one of the most beautiful passages in Plutarch; and though this doctrine is not true, it deserves to be read with attention, and contains several excellent ideas, and sublime conceptions, of a surprising fertility, with regard to those who know how to make good use of consequences. This is the reason which engaged me not to curtail this passage. How many people who shall read this, would not take the pains to recur to Plutarch, if I had only mentioned the pages of the author? Another reason prevented my being contented with this: I here find some particulars, which I shall make use of below (59).

[F] Dr Hyde . . . cites some authors who clear him . . . I shall examine whether they deserve credit.] Those who have read Mr Bernard's journal (60), need not be informed that the Historia Religionis veterum Persarum, published by Dr Hyde (61) at Oxford, in the year 1700, in 4to, is one of the most excellent pieces that can possibly be written on such a subject. The idea which the learned journalist hath given of this performance is sufficient to convince us, that it contains a very curious erudition, and profound discussions, which disclose several uncommon particulars, and discover a country which we scarce knew any thing of before. But to come to the matter. Dr Hyde affirms (62), that the ancient Persians acknowledged no more than one sole uncreated principle, which was the good principle, or, in one word, God: and that they looked upon the evil principle as a created being. One of the names which they gave to God was Hormizda, and they called the evil principle Ahri-man. And this is the original of the two Greek words Ωρεμωδης and Αρεμωδης: one of which was the name of the good, and the other that of the evil principle, as we have seen above (63), in a passage of Plutarch. The Persians pretended that Abraham was the first founder of their religion (64). Zoroaster afterwards made some alterations in it, but it is said that he made no manner of change, with relation to the doctrine of one sole uncreated principle; but that his innovation in this particular, was only the giving the name of light to the good principle, and that of darkness to the evil one (65). Of which here is an evidence (66). Zerdust affirmavit Lucem & Tenebras esse . . . duo Principia sibi invicem contraria: & sic esse Yezdan & Abreman, qui fuerunt . . . initium eorum quæ inveniantur in Mundo: ex eorum mixtione [scu combinatione] extitisse Compositiones; & ex variis Compositionibus productas fuisse formas. Et quæ Deus qui creavit Lucem & Tenebras, utriusque Autor unicuique sit, sine Socio, sine Pari aut Simili; nec ei referenda sit . . . existentia Tenebrarum, sicut dicunt Zervanite: sed Bonum & Malum, Integritas ac Corruptio, & Puritas ac Spurcitas exiverunt ex mixtione [scu compositione] Lucis & Tenebrarum: & nisi hæc duo commissa fuissent, non extitisset Mundus. Et hæc duo contra se invicem inurgebant & de victoria contendebant, donec Lux vinceret Tenebras, & Bonum Malum. Tum postea saluum evasit Bonum ad mundum suum, & Malum devorabit ad Mundum suum: & sic fuit causa Liberationis. Cumque Deus excelsus hæc duo temperaverat & miscuerat pro arbitrio suo, eoque in Compositione viderat, tum instituit Lucem ut originale quiddam, & indixit existentiam ejus ut existeret. Sed Tenebræ secutæ sunt sicut umbra personam. Nam cum videret eas quodammodo existere, sed non realiter existere, tum planè produxit Lucem, & acquisitæ sunt Tenebræ per consequentiam: nam ex necessitate extitit contrarium, quippe cujus existentia fuit necessaria, sc. ut contingens in creatione, non autem ex primâ intentione, secundum exemplum quod adduxi-

mus de Personâ & Umbra. These words clearly express, that, in Zoroaster's hypothesis, the two principles, one of good, and the other of evil, Oromazes, Arimanius, or light and darkness, were, properly speaking, no more than second causes, and did not strictly deserve the name of principles: they were the effects of another cause, and the productions of God. There arise several absurdities in the particular explication of the doctrine of this Magus; for he asserted, on the one side, that God alone had produced darkness; and on the other, that its existence ought not to be referred to God. He said, that God mixed the light with darkness, because without this mixture the world could not have been produced; that good and evil, purity and impurity, proceeded from this mixture; that there was a sharp engagement betwixt light and darkness till the latter was overcome; that after its defeat it retired into its own world, and light to its proper world also; that God having mixed these two contraries together, established an original light, and made it exist; that darkness resulted from it as a shadow from a body; for God seeing that darkness existed in some sort, though not really, gave a plenary existence to light, and so to darkness by an inevitable consequence, and not according to the primitive and direct intention of the Creator (67). This chaos of thoughts is incomprehensible to us western people. None but the eastern nations accustomed to a mystical and contradictory language can bear such excessive nonsense without disgust and horror. But be it how it will, may they reply to me, Zoroaster is thus cleared of the principal accusation, and it must no longer be pretended that he acknowledged two uncreated principles, or an Arimanius essentially evil and self-existent. This is what remains to be examined.

I. I answer, in the first place, that it is unquestionable, that the Greek authors, who have ascribed to Zoroaster the opinion of two principles, designed to attribute to him a doctrine contrary to the common Theology, as well as to the principles of the Aristotelians and Stoics: those two sects agreed with the people on this head, that the same God who pours down good upon the earth, pours down evil also; and that if he punishes on one side, he rewards on the other, &c. But if they had asserted that Zoroaster and the Magi were of a contrary opinion to that, they must have believed that these Magi taught that the principle which distributed good, is personally distinguished from the principle which does the contrary, and that these two principles are independent of each other, and the one co-eternal with the other (68).

II. This is confirmed by reason, that this hypothesis was resorted to on no other account, than in order to shun the perplexity (69) which they met with in the supposition, that the same Being, which is the cause of good, is also the cause of evil. But this difficulty had not been avoided, if Arimanius had been allowed to have been a production of the good God; for the question would have turned, how Arimanius, the evil principle, could have been produced by a cause infinitely good. It is obvious to all men, that to assert that God himself produced all evils, or that he produced Arimanius, who consequently is the necessary author of all evils (70), amounts to the same thing, quod est causa causæ est causa causati. . . . that which is the cause of a cause, is also the cause of its effect. So that Zoroaster could not escape the force of any one objection, if his doctrine had been what Shahrîstâni says it was (71). Therefore let us grant that the Greeks have not without ground charged him with admitting two eternal principles.

III. I am not ignorant that it may be urged that the Grecians were very imperfectly acquainted with the opinions of the Philosophers whom they called Barbarians, and that what they wrote of the Jewish nation, and the antiquities of Egypt is very inaccurate. But let this be repeated as often as you please, I shall answer, the Arabian writers are not more credible, when they speak of a Philosopher so remote from their own time as Zoroaster was.

IV. I conjecture that his followers for their own interest have done him the favour to ascribe to him the creation of the evil principle, and that they did it

(67) Compare what has been said in the article CHRYSIPUS, the Philosopher, remark [T]; and in the article PAULICIANS, remark [I], at the third paragraph.

(68) Dr Hyde owns that this doctrine was taught by those whom Plutarch mentions. See, below, citation (75).

(69) See Plutarch, in the passage which has been cited in the article MANICHEES, citation (28), and in the foregoing remark of this present article.

(70) Light and darkness, are causes acting necessarily and without any liberty.

(71) Above, citat. (66).

(59) In the following remark.

(60) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for February, 1701, Art. iii, and for March 1701, Art. i.

(61) Professor of the Oriental languages, in the university of Oxford.

(62) Thomas Hyde, Hist. Religionis veter. Persarum, cap. ix, pag. 161.

(63) In the remark [E], citation (50).

(64) Id. ibid. ap. xxi, pag. 175.

(65) Id. ibid. ap. xxii, pag. 190.

(66) Shahrîstâni, apud Hyde, ubi supra, pag. 299. have left out the Arabic words which are in this and the following passages of Dr Hyde, and in the room of them have put blanks.

that he was no idolater, either with respect to the worship of fire, or that of it since the time that they were subjected to the severe domination of the Mahometans who abhor them, and call them idolaters and worshippers of fire. Being unwilling to expose themselves still more to their hatred, and insults, under pretext that they acknowledged an uncreated nature sovereignly wicked, and independent of God, they thought fit to varnish over this part of their system with another interpretation: they could not absolutely deny that Zoroaster admitted of two principles, since it is too well known that he acknowledged them. The Tarikh Montekheb faith, that Zoroaster, author of the sect of the Megiouch, or Magi, was also the first who taught the doctrine of two principles of all things, and that the firm name of Megiouch, bestowed on them, is a word corrupted by the Arabians, from the Persian word, Meikhoufch, which signifies sharp-sweet, by reason of the two principles, good and evil, which he established (72). Here is an author who ascribes to Zoroaster the first establishment of this opinion;

(72) Herbelot, Bibl. Orientale, pag. 931, col. 1,

(73) This seems to signify that Zoroaster put an end to those things.

(74) Ibn Shahnâ, in libro de Principiis & Postremis apud Hyde, ubi supra, cap. ix, pag. 163.

but Dr Hyde alleges a passage which makes this system of a much older date, and besides seems to hint that Zoroaster only reformed it: 'Quod Persarum gentem . . . ei est Religio pervetusta: & in eâ Docti vocantur Keiomarfi. Isti statuunt aliquid Deum æternum quem vocant Yezdan, eo designantes τὸν Θεόν: & alium deum creatum ex Tenebris, quem nominant Ahreman, designantes Diabolum. Magnificiunt Lucem, eo usque dum colant Ignem: & cavent sibi à Tenebris. Nec destiterunt sic facere (73), donec prodit Zerdusht jactans prophetiam. Asserunt itaque Deum Creatorem, quod scilicet creavit Lucem & Tenebras; eumque esse Unicum, nec habere Socium. Et quod Bonum & Malum, & Probitas & Improbilas conquiritur sunt ex mixture Lucis & Tenebrarum: & quod si hæc duo non fuissent mixta, non extitisset Mundus: & quod hæc duo hoc modo mixta non definent, donec Bonum approprietur Mundo suo & Malum Mundo suo: [i. e. utrumque horum tandem concedet ad Mundum sibi proprium, scilicet in fine Mundi.] . . . Et hanc esse Religionem Magorum (74). . . . There was a very ancient religion among the Persians; and those who were learned in it, were called Keiomarfi. They held that there is an eternal Deity, whom they call Yezda, meaning GOD, and that out of darkness was created an other god, whom they name Ahreman, by which word they denote the Devil. They highly esteem light, inasmuch that they worship fire; and they have a great aversion to darkness. They continued in this practice, UNTIL Zerdusht appeared, who pretended to prophecy. Thus they affirm that GOD is the creator of the universe, because he created light and darkness, that there is but one GOD, who is without any equal: that good and evil, probity and wickedness, sprung from the mixture of light and darkness: that if these two had not been mixed together, the world would not have had a being: and that they will not cease to be thus mixed, till good and evil be appropriated each to its own world, [that is, till each of them retires to the world proper to it, namely, at the end of the world.] This is the religion of the Magi.

V. Lastly, I say that Dr Hyde owns that there are yet some sects, which by acknowledging God and the Devil to be two co-eternal natures, agree with the assertors of Zoroaster's Oromazes and Arimanus. His words are: 'Dualistæ Diaboli coeternitatem asserunt. Sunt enim ex Indo-Persis & Dualistis Manichæis alique Hæreticis (ut quidem sunt in omni Religione,) qui opinantur Diabolum à seipso processisse, ut loquantur, i. e. æternum fuisse, & malos Angelos sibi creasse: sed est Hæretica opinio, eaque ignorantium quorundam hominum qui peculiariter vocantur . . . Thanavîa, i. e. Dualistæ seu . . . Domini duorum, scilicet. Assertores seu Auctores duorum principiorum; qui (inquit Shahrîstânî,) Lucem & Tenebras seu Deum & Diabolum statuunt duo Principia coeterna, in contrarium Magorum qui Lucem æternam & Tenebras creatas putant. Isti tales fuerunt, qui Oromazen & Arimanum duos esse Deos asserbant ut Plut. lib. de Isid. & Osir. (75) . . . The Dualists assert the co-eternity of the Devil. For there are some Indian Persians, and Manichean Dualists, and other Heretics

(75) Id. ibid., pag. 164.

(as there are some in all religions) who imagine that the Devil proceeded from himself, as they term it, that is, that the Devil is eternal, and created the evil angels: but this is an heretical opinion, and held only by some ignorant men, who are distinguished by the name Thanavia or Dualists, or assertors or authors of the two principles, who affirm (says Shahrîstânî) that light and darkness, God and the Devil, are two co-eternal principles, in contradiction to the Magi, who believe that light is eternal, and that darkness was created. Such were they who asserted, as Plutarch informs us, that there are two gods, Oromazes and Arimanus. There are some particulars which are very singular and extravagant concerning the system of the Zoroastrian Magi in the book of a Mahometan. I shall cite from it what relates to the Dualists, who hold still the co-eternity of the Devil, and with great importunity ask whence evil could proceed, if the evil principle was not eternal?

Addit Shahrîstânî, Quod Magus peculiaris fit . . . Dualitas, adeo ut statuunt . . . Duos . . . seu Gubernatores duos æternos, qui dividuntur in Bonum & Malum, & Probitem ac Improbitem, Emolumentum ac Nocumtum. Horum unus nominatur Lux, & alter Tenebræ. Sc. Yezdan seu Deus, & Ahreman seu Diabolus. Eorumque Religionem esse sec. hanc divisionem seu distinctionem: & quod omnes Magorum Questiones vertantur super duobus Cardinibus, quorum unus est Explicatio Misionis Lucis & Tenebrarum, & alter est Explicatio Liberationis Lucis à Tenebris. Et quidem, quod Misionem statuunt . . . Initium seu statum à quo, & Liberationem . . . Rediitum seu statum ad quem. . . . The Magi alone, addit Shahrîstânî, believe a duality, and that there are two eternal chiefs, or governors, who are divided into good and evil, probity and wickedness, advantage and hurt. One of these is called light, and the other darkness, the former is Yezdan, or GOD, and the latter Ahreman, or the Devil: and their religion is founded on this division or distinction: all the questions of the Magi turn upon these two points, one of which is to explain the cause of the mixture of light and darkness; and the other to explain the deliverance of light from darkness. And they hold that this mixture was the beginning of things, or condition from whence they proceeded, and that this deliverance is the return of things, or condition into which they are to be brought. I shall further cite what follows: 'Supradictus Shahrîstânî pergit narrare, quod Magi statuunt . . . Principia duo, sicuti dixerat: sed quod . . . Magi originales non existimant expedire ut ambo sint . . . coeterna ab initio; sed quod Lux sit . . . æterna ab initio, & Tenebræ . . . productæ. Et quod tum, differant de modo seu causâ productionis ejus; cum à Lucē producitur tantum Lux, quæ non producit ullum Malum; & quomodo ergo productum Principium Mali aut alius cujusvis rei, cum nihil adjunctum (seu par fuerit) Luci quoad primam ejus productionem & æternitatem (76). . . . The same (76) Id. ibid. Shahrîstânî continues to relate, that the Magi lay down two principles; as he had said before; but the original Magi, says he, do not think that both must be co-eternal; they hold that light alone is eternal, and darkness created: then they differ concerning the manner and cause of the production of darkness; since from light nothing can proceed but light, which doth not produce any evil, how then was the principle of evil, or of any other thing produced, since nothing was joined with light, (or equal to it) as to its first production and eternity. Some of the Magi assert that Arimanus, or the evil principle, was created by an evil thought which arose in the Divine intellect. This thought was, what will happen, if I meet with no opposition? What can be said more detestable? Would it have been more blasphemous to allow this Arimanus to be eternal, than to ascribe such an original to him? Asserentes Yezdân fuisse . . . sine initio æternum, & Ahreman fuisse . . . productum & creatum. Yezdan cogitasse secum. Nisi fuerit mihi contraria, quomodo erit? Hancque cogitationem pravam naturæ Lucis minus analogam, produxisse Tenebras dictas Ahreman, qui naturâ dispositus ad malum & diffidium & improbitatem & noxam & omnia

Ym
hls

(76) Id. ibid. cap. xxi, pag. 165, seq. Shahrîstânî & Religio of Mithra [G]. What appears least uncertain among so many things which are related of him, is that he was the introducer of a new religion into Persia, and that he did it about the reign of Darius the successor of Cambyfes. He is still in great veneration amongst those Persians, who are not of the Mahometan religion, but retain the ancient worship of their country. They call him Zardhuft, and several people believe that he came from China, and relate a great number of miraculous things on that head. You may see a specimen of them in Mr d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale (*), and in the History of the religion of the Banians, written in English by Mr Lord, and translated into French by Mr Briot (y). Consult also Huetius's Evangelical Demonstration (z), and Dr Hyde's book. Several authors believe that all the works which have gone under the

(*) At the word Zerdashti.

(y) That translation was printed at Paris in the year 1666, in 12mo.

(z) Pag. 152, & seq. and pag. 458, 459.

(77) Id. ibid.

documenta: & prodiens contra Lucem, eam opposuit tam naturā (seu factō) quā dictō (77). ----- They affirm that Yazdan is eternal without beginning, and that Abreman was produced and created: that Yazdan thought with himself, what will happen, if I meet with no opposition? And that this evil thought not being analogous to the nature of light, produced darkness, called Abreman, which, being naturally disposed to evil, discord, wickedness, and all manner of mischief, came forth against light, and opposed it both in word and deed. They add, that a war arose betwixt the army of light, and that of darkness, which at last ended in an accommodation, of which the Angels were the mediators, and the conditions were that the inferior world should be wholly left to Arimanius for the space of seven thousand years, after which it should be restored to light. Before the peace Arimanius had extirpated all the inhabitants of the world. Light had called men to its assistance whilst they were yet but spirits: which it did either to draw them out of Arimanius's territories, or in order to give them bodies to engage against this enemy. They accepted the bodies, and the fight, on condition that they should be assisted by the light, and should at last overcome Arimanius. The resurrection shall come when he shall be vanquished. This, they conclude (78), was the cause of the mixture, and shall be the cause of the deliverance. The Greeks were not ignorant that Zoroaster taught a future resurrection (79).

(78) Eiusmodi fuisse causam Mithonis, hanc verò causam liberationis. Id. ibid. pag. 296.

(79) See what Diogenes Laërtius, in Proemio, num. 8, relates concerning the doctrine of the Magi.

(80) Hyde, ubi supra, cap. i, pag. 5.

(81) Id. ibid. pag. 10.

[G] It is affirmed that he was no idolater either with respect to the worship of fire, or that of Mithra. Dr Hyde affirms (80) that the followers of the ancient religion of the Persians deny that they ever paid Divine adoration to the stars. They maintain that they do not adore the sun, but only turn towards it when they pray to God. He has found amongst Zoroaster's precepts that we ought to salute the sun, and bestow praises on him, but not that we ought to serve him with religious worship. He proves that their ceremonies might very justly pass for civil honours, and to this purpose he makes some exceeding curious observations. He applies to the fire what he says of the sun; the bowings and prostrations of the Persians before the holy fire were not a religious adoration, but only a civil one: 'Idem quoque dicendum est de eorum cultu Igne, quem (ut supra tetigimus) imitando Judæos in Pyreis servarunt. Nam quamvis ei exhiberent Reverentiam quandam, eamque per Prostrationes, hæc tamen non fuerunt Adoratio divina, sed tantum civilis, prout se habet mos Orientis erga quosvis Magnates, & olim fuit erga Angelos tanquam Dei Legatos ejus personam representantes; cujus rei exempla affatim suppetunt non tantum in Vet. Test. sed & in Novo, ubi femine ad veram Fidem conversæ (visis apud Christi sepulchrum Angelis,) adorarunt procidentes faciebatur in terram: idque quamvis probè scirent non esse Deum, sed Angelos, ut constat ex verbis earum prostrationem se vidisse visionem Angelorum (81). ----- The same thing must be said of their worshipping fire, which, as I have mentioned above, they kept in their Pyrea in imitation of the Jews. For though they paid a certain reverence to the fire, and that by prostration, yet this was not a religious, but only a civil, worship; as it is the custom of the eastern people to prostrate themselves before any great man, and as it was antiently the custom to fall down before Angels, as being the messengers, and representatives of GOD. There are many examples of this kind of worship not only in the Old Testament, but also in the New, where the women who had been converted to the true Faith, (upon seeing the Angels at the sepulchre of Christ), fell with their faces to the ground, and worshipped. Yet they well knew that it was not GOD they saw, but his Angels, as appears from their own words, we have seen a vision of Angels. He concludes (82) with observing that they are wrongfully called idolaters, and worshippers of fire, and will have it that Zoroaster was an instrument to oblige them to persevere in the true faith (83). He was a man educated in the knowledge of the true God, whom he peculiarly worshipped in a natural cave, in which he placed several symbols representing the world. Mithra, representing the sun, filled the master's place. But it was not to Mithra, but to the true God, that he paid his adorations: 'Is cum esset insignis Philosophus, Religione austera, & totius Matheseos peritissimus, hac ratione Persas sui admiratione perculit, & sue Doctrinæ attentos reddidit. Præsertim coluit Deum in naturali quodam Antro, quod ille Mithriacum effecit & mirificè ac mathematicè comparavit, ubi scilicet Mithra præfidebat, hæc inferiora Regio modo regens, eaque imprægnans ferebat: adeo ut omnes postea non tantum in summis Montium jugis antiquissimo more Deum colebant, sed & subinde illius exemplo, Sacra sua Mithriaca in tali Antro præstare & peragere didicerunt. In eo erant Mithræ & hujus Mundi Symbolica philosophicè & mathematicè spectanda & contemplanda, non autem colenda; quæ itaque in re falluntur Autores: nam Persæ tunc talia Simulachra non colebant (84). ----- As he was an eminent Philosopher, strict and austere in his religion, and greatly skilled in all the parts of the Mathematics, he struck the Persians with an admiration of him, and rendered them attentive to his doctrine. He worshipped GOD chiefly in a certain natural cave, which he consecrated to Mithra, and adorned in a wonderful and regular manner, placing in it several symbols which represented the world. There Mithra presided, as the sovereign of all earthly things, which he governed and impregnated: so that afterwards they all worshipped GOD not only on the tops of the mountains, after the antient custom; but also from his example they learned to perform their mithriatic rites in the like caves, where they placed symbolical figures of Mithra and of the world; these figures were to be beheld and contemplated in a Philosophical and Mathematical manner, but were not to be worshipped: so that in this point authors are mistaken: for at that time the Persians did not worship these images.' Consult this learned man in the fourth chapter of his work, where besides other learned passages, you will find these words of Porphyry: 'Referente Eubulo, Zoroastres primus omnium in montibus Persidi vicinis Antrum nativum, floridum, fontibusque irriguum in honorem Creatoris, & omnium Patris Mithræ, consecravit: ita ut Antrum conditi à Mithrâ Mundi figuram ei representaret: ea verò quæ intra Antrum, erant certis invicem intervallis disposita, ut Elementorum Climatesque mundanorum symbola seu figuras gererent (85). ----- Eubulus relates that Zoroaster was the first who, in the mountains nigh Persia, consecrated a natural cave, adorned with flowers, to Mithra the creator and parent of all things. This cave represented to him the figure of the world, created by Mithra; and the things which were within it, were disposed at certain distances, in such a manner that they were the figures, or symbols, of the elements and climates of the earth.'

We may here observe that in this book of Dr Hyde there are some particulars which may be serviceable to the Jesuits, on account of the charge brought against them concerning the honours paid to Confucius, which they affirm to be purely civil. Father le Comte who hath been so much blamed for asserting that the true religion

(82) Id. ibid. pag. 14. See also pag. 22.

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 160.

(84) Id. ibid.

(85) Porphyry de Nympharum antro, apud Hyde, ibid. cap. 10, pag. 118.

the name of Zoroaster, some of which are yet in being, are supposititious. Dr Hyde is not of that opinion [H].

religion, or the knowledge of the true God, hath lasted in China for several ages (86), will find a very good assistant in this learned Oxford Professor.

[H] Several authors believe that all the works which have gone under the name of Zoroaster . . . are supposititious. Dr Hyde is not of that opinion.] Suidas affirms that there were extant four books of Zoroaster περί φύσεως de natura - - concerning nature; a book περί λίθων τιμίων de gemmis - - concerning precious stones; and five books of judiciary Astrology, Αστρονομικά ἀποτελεσματά, prædictiones ex inspectione stellarum. It is very likely that what Pliny relates as quoted from Zoroaster (87) was taken from those books. Eusebius (88) cites a passage, which contains a magnificent description of God, and gives it as the very words of Zoroaster, ἐν τῇ ἱερᾷ συναγωγῇ τῶν Περσικῶν, in sacro Persicarum rituum commentario - - in his sacred commentary on the Persian rites. I know no body who doth not believe that Clemens Alexandrinus says, that Prodicus's followers boasted of having Zoroaster's secret books (89). But perhaps his words are taken in another sense, and mean that they boasted of having the secret books of Pythagoras. They have been lately printed, with the verses of the Sibyls at Amsterdam in the year 1689, according to Oporopæus's edition, Oracula magica Zoroastrii cum Scholiis Pletbonis & Pselli. Those pretended magical oracles make but two pages. Here follows the opinion of Huetius concerning all the books in general which go under Zoroaster's name. He calls them all supposititious. * Ex cujus (Zoroastrii) fama & exiti-

* Nicol. Damasc. Hist. l. 7. in Exc. Conf. Porphyry.

† Euseb. Præp. Ev. l. 1.

† Clem. Alex. Strom. 1.

† Suidas, in Ζωροάστρου.

 Auct. Recog. l. 4, c. 27.

matione provenit eorum fallacia, qui sub ejus nomine Oracula quædam magica Græce scripta incautis obtruserunt. Edita illa sunt cum Pselli & Pletthonis scholiis: sed si naves admoveris, fraus subolebit. Vetusiora quidem illa sunt, nihilo tamen γνησιώτερα (superiora) Oracula, quæ Cræci temporibus extitisse narrat Nicolaus Damascenus. Infinceros quoque eos dixerim libros, quos Chaldaice scriptos, & Chaldaice commentariis illustratos, & effata ac sententias complexos Johannem Picum habuisse ferunt; infincorum & librum Zind, mihi de nomine solum cognitum, quo ritus magicos, & ignis colendi disciplinam ajunt contineri. . . . Infinceros & quos Hermippus, Plinio teste, ducentis versuum millibus sub Zoroastrii nomine conditos indicibus quoque positus explanavit. Ex iisdem fallariorum incudibus profectus est supra memoratus Persicarum Legum codex Zundavastaw, quem vetustissimum tamen tunc, & eundem fortasse, qui ab † Eusebio Collectio sacra Persicarum rerum appellatur. Indidem profectus & quem se in arcanis habere jactabant, qui Prodicus Philosophi doctrinam sectabantur, ut est apud † Clementem Alexandrinum; indidem & quos commemorat † Suidas; & qui de Magia, Zoroastrii nomine, scripti circumferebantur, ut habet  Auctor Recognitionum; & quem tradit Auctor Astrologiæ cujusdam Persicæ, Ebraice reddite, ab eo lucubratum, & Regnum Dei fuisse inscriptum, & manibus Persarum afficte gestari esse solitum (90). . . . (90) Hæc est The same and reputation of Zoroaster encouraged certain men fraudulently to impose upon the unwary some magical oracles written in Greek, as the genuine works of this Philosopher. They are published with the commentaries of Psellus and Pletton: but upon a slight examination, you perceive the fraud. These oracles which, as Nicolaus Damascenus says, were extant in the time of Cræsus, are indeed much antienter, but not more genuine than the former. I may likewise call supposititious those books written in the Chaldaic tongue, illustrated with Chaldaic commentaries, and containing the wise sayings and opinions of this Philosopher, which they say were in the possession of John Picus. I also take to be supposititious the book of Zind, which I know only by the title, and is said to contain the Magic rites, and the manner and form of worshipping the fire. . . . The same thing may be affirmed of those two hundred thousand verses, which went under the name of Zoroaster, and were, as Pliny testifies, explained by Hermippus. Zundavastaw, the above-mentioned book of the Persian laws, is of the same stamp: yet in my opinion it is very antient, and the same with what Eusebius calls the sacred Collection of the Persian Affairs. To these we may add the book which the followers of the Philosopher Prodicus boasted they had secretly in their possession, as we learn from Clemens Alexandrinus. The books mentioned by Suidas are likewise forged, as also those on Magic, which went about under the name of Zoroaster, as the author of the Recognitiones, says; and that which the author of a certain book on Persian Astrology, translated into Hebrew, mentions as the composition of Zoroaster, and which he says was intitled the Kingdom of God, and was continually in the hands of the Persians. Huetius adds (91), that Porphyry (92) reproached the Christians with the forgery of several books, and boasted of having proved that the apocalypse of Zoroaster was one of those supposititious pieces.

Dr Hyde acknowledges that the ancient Heretics falsely alledged, under the name of Zoroaster, some supposititious prophecies concerning JESUS CHRIST; but he saith that they had not presumed to do it, if they had not known that there were extant genuine works of Zoroaster in which were contained such prophecies (93). He believes (94) that God revealed to Zoroaster the coming of the Messiah, and that Zoroaster inferred this wonderful revelation in his works. He takes the Zundavastaw, which Huetius rejects, to be an authentic piece: he gives us the true title and analysis of it, and is persuaded (95), that this author's works were written in the ancient Persian language, and are preserved to this present time.

(91) Hist. lib. l. 1, c. 10, p. 160.
(92) Porphyry, in Vita Plotini.
(93) Hyde, vii. l. 1, c. 1, p. 10.
(94) Hyde, vii. l. 1, c. 1, p. 10.
(95) Hyde, vii. l. 1, c. 1, p. 10.

ZUERIUS BOXHORNII (MARK) Professor at Leyden, the son of James Zuerius Minister at Bergen-op-Zoom, and of Anne Boxhorn the daughter of a Minister at Breda, of whom I shall speak below [A], was born at Bergen-op-Zoom in September 1612 (a). He was but six years old when his father died. Some time after he followed his mother to Breda, and there was educated by Henry Boxhornius, his grand-father by his mother's side, till the Spaniards became masters of that city in the year 1625. Then he was carried to Leyden by Henry Boxhornius, who having no male issue desired him to take his name. This young scholar made to great and speedy a progress, that he published some very good Poems in the year 1629, on the taking of Boileduc,

[A] He was grandson to a Minister at Breda, of whom I shall speak below.] His name was HENRY BOXHORNII, or BOXHORN, and he was born in Brabant. He went through his studies at Louvain, and after having there obtained the decree of Licentiate in Divinity, he was promoted to the Deanry of Tillemont, and expressed such a warm zeal for the Romish religion that he was made Inquisitor. But he changed his opinion, and embraced the Reformed religion. He was first of all a Minister in the duchy of Cleves, afterwards at Woerden in Holland, and at last at Breda (1).

He left this last town, when the Spaniards took it in the year 1625, and retired to Leyden, where he took care of the education of his grandson (2), who is the subject of this article. Henry Boxhornius wrote some books of controversy. His antagonist was Henry Cuyckius, who accused him of falsely pretending to be of the family of the Boxhorns. This Cuyckius, Professor of Philosophy at Louvain, Grand-Vicar and Official to the Archbishop of Mechlen, and at last Bishop of Ruremonde, published in the year 1596, an Epistola Parænetica, in which he exhorted Henry Boxhorn

(1) Taken from the Anti of Mr. Baillet, Tom. i., pag. 158, 159.

(2) Jacobus Boxhornius, Episcopus Mechliniensis, in Vita Marci Zuerii Boxhornii.

Boileduc, and some other victories obtained by the Dutch. He was then only seventeen years of age. He was but twenty when he published several considerable works [B]. This acquired him so great a reputation, that, in the same year 1632, the curators of the university of Leyden conferred on him the Professorship of Eloquence. He made so great a figure in this post that Chancellor Oxenstiern, then Ambassador-Extraordinary from Sweden in Holland, offered him an honourable employment, by order of Queen Christina [C]: but Boxhornius preferred the post he enjoyed in his own country to all those honours [D]; and continuing as well by his lectures as books to give frequent proofs of his learning, and exact knowledge in Politics, and History, he was made Professor of those two sciences in the room of Daniel Heinfius who was declared emeritus. He discharged this office in a manner very advantageous to his auditors, and very glorious to himself. He was for some time at variance with Salmasius; but that quarrel which obliged him to take pen in hand against that formidable Critic, was at last composed [E]. He freely communicated his knowledge to other authors, as Valerius Andreas confesses in his Bibliotheca Belgica. He died after a tedious sickness at Leyden on the third of October 1653. Aged forty-one years. He wrote on various subjects [F], and particularly

(3) See Mr Baillet, ibid. pag. 158, & seq.

(4) Pag. 153.

(5) In four volumes in 12mo. Moreri is mistaken, when he says that this work, Pliny's Panegyric, Justin, and some satirical Poets were published by Boxhornius in the year 1631. Valerius Andreas has committed the same fault, as to the Historia Augusta.

(6) Omnium apud laus lectos fuisse non semel audivi. Jacob, Bailei, in eius Vita.

(7) Suetonius tanto omnium favore exceptus est, ut clarissimi huius Acad. Profess. ad linguæ Græcæ perfectionem quæ jam vacat adigere me voluerint. Boxhornius, in Epist. pag. m. 15, Edit. Francof. His letter is dated on the 29th of September 1631.

(8) As Valerius Andreas does. Hankius de Romanar. Rer. Script. pag. 295, has transcribed most of his faults.

(9) In Apologia pro Commentario ad Agricola Taciti adversus Dialogum.

(10) See the article THO-MÆUS, citat. (6).

(11) Ab Axelio Oxenstierna regni Cancellario Fœderis Germanici Directore, ad Fœderatos Belgas legato extraordinario Regine & eorundem Procerum nomine ad amplissimas dignitates in Sueciam evocatus fuit. Bailei, ubi supra.

Boxhorn to return into the pale of the Church. To which Boxhorn answered that he would have nothing to do with such a corrupt Church. Cuyckius returned to the charge: and Boxhorn replied by an Anti-Cuyckius, printed at Leyden, in the year 1598. Boxhorn was attacked on his nobility: for Cuyckius would not admit his pretension of being descended from the Boxhorns, a noble family in Brabant (3). See the history of the siege of Breda (4).

[B] He was but twenty years of age when he published several considerable works. As Theatrum Urbium Hollandiæ; Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ cum Animadversionibus ac Notis (5); Poëtæ Satyrici minores cum Commentariis; Plinii Panegyricus. He deserved a place among the illustrious youths, of whom Mr Baillet hath drawn up such a curious catalogue; for to say nothing of the verses which he published at the age of seventeen, and which were very much applauded (6), it is certain that in the year 1631, he published an edition of Suetonius with notes, which induced the Professors of the university to advise him to put in for the Greek Professorship, which was then vacant (7). He was therefore an author at the age of nineteen. How many considerable books did he publish in the following year? There was no occasion for an officious lie to make him an early author: the strictest truth was sufficient for it; I wish therefore Valerius Andreas had rigorously adhered to it, and had not said that Boxhornius published books at the age of sixteen, and that he was made professor of Eloquence, and of the Belles Lettres, before he was nineteen years of age. The first of his productions appeared in the year 1629, and he was not Professor before 1632. Add to this, that he was thirteen years old when he left Breda to go to Leyden: wherefore they are mistaken by one year who make him but twelve years old when he was matriculated at Leyden (8). It happened to Boxhornius as to several others; when age increased his learning he grew somewhat ashamed of his first productions, and accordingly discovered some desire to disown them. Nevertheless it appears that he had still a tenderness for them, since whilst he seemed to disown them, he took care to publish the praises which Salmasius gave them in his letters to him. 'Claudius Salmasius juveniles hocce conatus sibi adeo probari tum temporis literis ad Boxhornium datis significavit, ut maxima quæque ab ipso non tantum sperare, sed sibi & eruditorum orbi & quidem ex vero promittere adeoque præfagire fuerit ausus: quæ illius Herois verbis ipsis publice alibi (9) leguntur, eo nempe loco quo Boxhornius ipse postmodum hæc ipsa aliaque juvenilia damnavit, ac proinde inter scripta sua vix numeravit. . . . Claudius Salmasius, in his letter to Boxhorn, says, that he was then so well pleased with these juvenile essays, that he not only entertained the greatest hopes of him, but also ventured to promise to himself, and to the learned world, nay, to preface the greatest things of him. These are the expressions of Salmasius, which are published in that place where Boxhorn himself afterwards disapproved of these, and other, his juvenile performances, and accordingly would hardly reckon them among his writings.' This we find in Boxhorn's life. It puts me in mind of what Grotius wrote to Scribnerius (10).

[C] Chancellor Oxenstiern offered him an honourable employment by order of Queen Christina (11).]

The author of Boxhornius's life doth not mention in what year this Chancellor came into Holland; had he taken the pains to express it, he would have avoided an error in Chronology: he would not have said that some time after Boxhorn had refused to go to Sweden, he refused to go to Dort, whither he was invited by the magistrates to teach in the college which they re-established in the year 1634. 'Non diu posthæc cum Reip. Dordracenæ proceser illustre suum & vetustissimum à Reformatione in fœderato Belgio Gymnasium anno quidem unde octogesimo superioris seculi erectum sed collapsum restaurarent an. 1634, omnium calculis Boxhornius dignus judicatus & habitus est cui res literaria in eo promovenda committeretur. . . . Not long after, in the year 1634, when the magistrates of Dort were re-establishing their illustrious college, which was as ancient as the Reformation in the United Provinces, being erected in the year 1579, they unanimously chose Boxhorn, as a person worthy to be intrusted with the promoting of learning in that college.' The dates are confounded here; for it is certain that the Chancellor of Sweden did not come into Holland before the year 1635. The magistrates of Dort offered Boxhorn a better pension than he had at Leyden, yet he did not accept their offers; which procured him an augmentation of his salary at Leyden. This is the usual consequence of refusals of this kind, when men either are willing, or know how to make the best of them.

[D] Boxhorn preferred the post he enjoyed in his own country to all these honours. Before the author of his life published this fact, Valerius Andreas spoke of it: How then comes Moreri to say that Boxhornius went into Sweden, where his merit procured him considerable employments? Is it thus that these words ought to be translated? Evocatus superioribus annis à Suecorum ad Ordines fœderatos Legato, Regine & Procerum nomine ad amplissimas dignitates in Sueciam illi septentrioni amorem prætulit patriæ (12).

[E] That quarrel with Salmasius was at last composed. This must be understood with some distinction: The acts of hostility ceased, they did no longer openly profess themselves enemies to each other, but their hearts remained the same, and could not suppress their fallies and eruptions on all occasions. Boxhornius a year before his death, when already seized by his mortal distemper, disdainfully received the visits of strangers recommended by Salmasius. 'Eos qui à Salmasio venerant fastidiosè excipiebat, jam tum nimio tabaci usu correpta valetudine quæ altero post anno eum cum vitâ destituit. . . . He disdainfully received the visits of those who came from Salmasius: his health was already impaired by an immoderate use of tobacco: he died two years after.' These two facts I find in the funeral orations of John Caspar Lentzius (13). And what relates to tobacco puts me in mind of what I have heard, that Boxhorn had a hat with a hole in the brim to hold his pipe, so that he could smoke both whilst he was studying and writing.

[F] He wrote on various subjects. He must not only have been very laborious, but also have known a great many things, and have been endowed with a very great facility in writing; for without that a life so short as his would not have sufficed for all the works, which he published. I have already mentioned

(12) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 641. Bailei add, Quare eas recu- suos mediocri in conditione esse maluit, quam apud exteros alto in fastigio collo-

(13) In Theatre Pauli Freheri, pag. 1180.

particularly on the invention of Printing [G]. On that subject he advanced an opinion very different from that of Mallinkrot, and yet his dissertation procured him the friendship of that learned man. He very carefully studied the antiquities of Gaul [H], which led him to dive into the Scythian tongue, and the antiquities of that nation, on which he wrote very ingeniously both in Dutch and in Latin. He had also composed an Historical account of women, illustrious for their learning, and writings; but this book never appeared [I]. Some have pretended that the Dutch were not pleased with the publication of a small treatise which he had dictated to his scholars, and wherein he explained the constitution of the Republic of the United Provinces (b) [K]. His Sacred

(b) Ex ejus Vita, conscripta à Jacobo Balemio, quæ extat in limine Epistolæ Boxhornii.

tioned some of his commentaries on the ancient authors, but have said nothing of his notes on Justin, Tacitus, and Pliny's epistles, nor of his commentary on the life of Agricola published in the year 1642, and a little while after defended against the attacks of an anonymous writer. I have not mentioned his annals of Zeland and Holland, which he published in Dutch with large additions, and better digested; those of Zeland in the year 1644, and those of Holland in 1650. He endeavoured to obtain the title of Historiographer of Zeland (14), and afterwards that of Historiographer of all the United Provinces (15): but I believe he obtained neither; for if his requests had succeeded, the author of his life would have touched on this point: now I do not find that he said one word of it. The Index to his letters mentions that he obtained his request with regard to Zeland; but when one consults the page to which it refers, nothing like it appears. His history of the siege of Breda is written in good Latin. He wrote several treatises on political subjects, as an apology for the navigations of the Hollanders. Dissertatio de Trapezitis vulgo Longobardis qui in fœderato Belgio fœnebres mensas exercent: Dissertatio de successione & jure primogenituræ adeundo principatu ad Carolum II, magnæ Britannię Regem: De majestate liber singularis adversus J. B. Cogitationes subitaneas in præcedentem dissertationem. It appears by this last piece that what he published in favour of Charles II King of England, when fled from his kingdom, had displeased some republicans. There is a collection of his Disquisitiones politice, id est, 60. casus politici ex omni historia selecti, printed in the year 1651 in 12mo. He published a great number of Orations on several subjects, and after his death came out his Idæ orationum ex selectiori materia moderni status politici desumptæ, his Institutiones politice, and his Latin Letters and Latin Poems. This last printed in the year 1659, was reprinted in Germany in 1679, with a preface written by James Thomasius, Professor at Leipzig, which very well deserves to be read.

[G] And particularly on the invention of Printing.] He asserts that the glory of this invention is due to the city of Haerlem, and not to Mentz, as he formerly believed. Cujus inventæ gloriam Harlemenses, non Moguntini, ut olim, nunc denuo assertum inus (16). His dissertation on this subject was printed in the year 1641.

[H] He very carefully studied the antiquities of Gaul.] Of this the author of his life gives us the following account. 'Nunc hîc finem imponerem, nisi paucis dicendum esset de iis, quæ super Dea Nehalemia (17) 1647 primum in Walachriæ oris inventa est commentatus, & inde ad Scythicæ gentis linguam, antiquitatem, & mores indagandos multa ingeniosè fane scripsit & scripturavit non vernacule modo, prout inceptorat, sed & Latine: nominatim librum originum Gallicarum (18), in quo Gallos à Germanis ortos ex veteri ipsorum lingua asserere conatur, qui tamen non nisi à morte auctoris & alia ejusdem, prodijt in lucem, obfetricante Georgio Hornio in professione Historiarum non indigno successore.

(14) Boxhorn. in Epistol. pag. 219, 226.
(15) Ibid. pag. 308.
(16) Epistol. pag. 167.
(17) He wrote two tracts in Dutch upon that goddess: one of them was printed in the year 1647, and the other in 1648.
(18) That book is intitled Originum Gallicarum Liber in quo veteris & nobilissimæ Gallo- rum Gentis Origines, Antiquitates, Mores, & Lingue aliæque erant aut illustrantur. Cui accedit antiquæ Lingue Britannicæ Lexicon Britannico-Latinum, inserta explicatque passim Adagii Britannici. Prodiit Amst. apud J. Janff. 1654, in 4to.

----- I shall conclude, after I have said something concerning the observations he made on the goddess Nehalemia, who was first found on the coasts of Walchern, and concerning what he afterwards ingeniously wrote, and intended to write not only in Dutch, as he had begun to do, but also in Latin, in order to discover the language, antiquity, and manners of the ancient Scythians, especially concerning his book on the antiquities of Gaul; where he endeavours to maintain, that the ancient Gauls were descended from the Germans, and to prove it by their ancient language. Yet this, with some other of his books did not appear till after the author's death, being published by George

Hornius, his worthy successor, in the professorship of History.' It appears by Boxhornius's letters that his Origines Gallicæ were in the press in the year 1648

(19): and continued so in 1652 (20). He speaks of it only as of a small piece (21), but he had a good opinion of his system. He hoped to prove that the Greeks and Romans owed all to the ancient Frieslanders (22). His treatise de Scythicis originibus was finished in the year 1647 (23), but he had a hundred things to add to it; for in a letter written to Mr de Zuilychem in the year 1652. He speaks thus: 'De originibus nostris & sepultis hæcenus Scythicis Antiquitatibus (nam & de iis querere dignatus es) hoc est, ut ego accipio, Asia totius & Europæ, superbius forte & jactantius respondeo. Multa excussi diligenter, conquisivi multa, multa meditatus sum, multa etiam ignorata, feliciter, nisi fallor, tandem deprehendi; quæ aliquando publicis judiciis filtrare ac exponere tuo imprimis, quod scio esse & gravissimum pariter, & æquissimum, audebo (24). - - - - You are pleased to inquire of my book on the antiquities of the Gauls, and those of the Scythians, which are as yet unknown, being, as I take it, the antiquities of all Asia and Europe. I answer with confidence, and perhaps with some vanity, that I have very diligently examined, collected and reflected on a great many things, and have at length, if I mistake not, made several happy discoveries, which I may some time lay before the judgment of the public, and before your's in particular, which I know to be of great weight, and very impartial.' He published a Latin discourse in the year 1650, to shew the affinity betwixt the Greek, Latin, and German languages.

[I] He had composed an historical account of women, illustrious but his book never appeared.] Valerius Andreas is to blame for inferring in the Catalogue of Boxhorn's works, Bibliothecam eruditionis ac scriptum illustrium seminarum; and doubtless it was owing to him that several authors imagined, and even published, that Boxhorn put out this curious treatise. Voglerus affirms it as positively as if he had read the book (25), and is not censured for it by Meibomius (26). What is certain is, that Boxhorn had this project in his head: he had good collections on this subject, which he offered to Isaac Pontanus (27), who had some thoughts of an undertaking of this nature (28); but if you think no more of it, added he, and will be pleased to transfer to me this commission, I beg of you to send me your memoirs. Ernestus Brinchius communicated to him a list of learned women. Velim scribere Vobiscum nobili viro Ernesto Brinchio gratias meo nomine agi, ob transmissum Syllabum eruditarum seminarum. In quarum gratiam Bibliothecam meam, & amicorum scriinia super excussi. Deprehendi autem non paritendum earum numerum, quæ vulgo ignorantur. Si tibi animus sit pergere exco- in eo, quod aliquando cepisse te intelligo, lubens qualem acunque mea transmittam, si vero tibi visum lampada mihi tradere, ut tua non deneges, unice rogo. I shall here occasionally say that Father Jacob, a French Carmelite, had composed a book of the like nature; which many authors cite and refer to, and yet it never was printed, nor ever will, for the manuscript is lost.

[K] Some have pretended that the Dutch were not pleased, &c.] Sorbieri writes this to Patin: pag. 157. his words are: 'I have sent you a curious little book intitled Commentariolus de Statu Provinciarum fœderati Belgii, the publication of which has very much displeased in these provinces, because it gives a very clear and distinct idea of the government of this Republic, and this ought to remain inter Arcana Imperii. Boxhorn had made this commentary for his scholars in politics, and had dictated it to them in private; but the secret took wind, and there have been many copies of it handed about, that at last

(19) Epistol. Boxhorn. pag. 291.

(20) Ibid. pag. 315.

(21) Sub prelo jam est excussum Originum Gallicarum. Ibid. pag. 315.

(22) Ibid. pag. 319.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 314.

(25) Similiter place ad astrum latissimum

deducere opus est argumentum & grege tradere Marcus Zuili- Boxhornius 221.

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

17 Bibliotheca eruditionis: x

and Profane History, which extends from the birth of JESUS CHRIST to the year 1650, is well esteemed: it is but one volume in 4to. The best part of it is that of the XVIIth century, and the beginning of the XVIIth. Boxhorn was somewhat ugly, and so swarthy, that he was one day taken for a Spaniard [L]. Upon that occasion he made an answer full of zeal for his country (c); but let the Casuists determine whether it be conformable to the Spirit of the Gospel [M]. Sorbieri seeing him somewhat angry with Grotius had the equity to excuse him; and besides, to suggest that this language was conformable to the laws of Policy [N].

Some learned Germans had no great opinion of his learning, and have observed several errors in his works. He had notice of this, and resolved to revenge himself by a satire [O]: I cannot tell whether he executed his design.

...

- (19) Sorbieri, Letter lxxii, pag. 438.
- (20) Bafelin, in ejus Vita.
- (21) With this title Nouvelle Héresie dans la Morale touchant la Haie du prochain, prêchée par Mr Jurieu, &c.
- (22) Note, that the mischief which soldiers do to the enemy by wounding or killing them, and the mischief which a private man should do them by giving them a drought, that occasions a Fever, &c. are different things. The first is not brought into question here, but is supposed without any difficulty.
- (23) See the Entretien sur la Cabale chimérique, pag. 87, & seq.
- (24) He reckons among the propositions complained of several consequences, which the accuser says might be drawn from the Heresies charged upon him; but he does not say that the minister preached those consequences. It is therefore a base trick to complain that he is accused of having preached those consequences.
- (25) Intitulé, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. 207, & seq.
- (26) Invisi Boxhornium juvenem annorum triginta... doctum sine, & multis, ne nimis dicam, libris notum. Sorbieri, pag. 44, Dutch Edit.
- (27) a Bookseller put it to the press without placing his name to it; and the impression was sold before the public had time to find fault with it (29). I do not certainly know whether Sorbieri was in the right to say this, but I know that this small treatise was printed at the Hague for John Verhoeve, in the years 1649, and 1650, and that the edition of 1650, was revised and enlarged. There were also other editions. I have seen the sixth, printed at the Hague by Adrian Vlacq, in the year 1659.
- (28) [L] He was so swarthy that he was one day taken for a Spaniard. This was in the year 1637, when the Spanish garrison left Breda according to the capitulation. Boxhorn being then in the Prince of Orange's camp, and seeing that garrison pass, heard a Dutch soldier take him for a Spaniard: You mistake, said he, do not judge of me by my hair and my aspect; if you knew the candour of my heart, you would not doubt of my being a true Hollander. And if I were able, I would immediately throw the King of Spain into a fever, fix him so close to his bed, and so terrify him, that he should never more unjustly attack our liberty. Those who had rather read the original Latin, shall soon be satisfied. Statura corporis ipsi fuit longa & erecta, & quam cum subfusca facie crines efficiebant qualescunque deformem: nigredinem eam candore animi sui albicantem reddere solebat. Unde cum Breda capta inter exeuntium Hispanorum spectatores & ipse esset, & a nostrate quodam milite ipso audiente pro Hispano ob dictam nigredinem habitus, illi homini faciem non minus quam verè respondebat, Tu me ex vultu & crinibus Hispanum judicas, sed male: nam si candorem animi Belgici mei nosset, qui tam magnus est ac nigri sunt mei crines, & in mea esset potestate, pro amore in communem patriam vel bodie Hispaniarum Regem febri affigerem ledoque alligerem, & metu sic terrem, ut imposterum abstineret ab injusta liberorum Belgarum oppressione & oppugnatione (30).
- (29) [M] Let the Casuists determine whether this answer was conformable to the Spirit of the Gospel. The accusation which appeared in a loose sheet in March 1694 (31), if just, would prove, that Boxhorn might easily obtain his absolution, and even a full approbation of the Casuists, who should be like the preacher who is accused; for we are told that he preached that the precept of loving and blessing the persecutors of the Church, doth not engage us to any more than to wish and promote their heavenly felicity. The temporal mischief (32) which Boxhorn would have done to the King of Spain, would not have prevented his wishing the conversion of that Prince. Besides, a disease is no assassination; but the said preacher hath told us in one of his books, that except assassination, all other means are allowable and fair against a declared enemy (33). He hath made so lame an answer to the accusation, and that with such perplexed and sophistical turns (34), that his answer, together with the industrious care he took to withdraw his sermons from the press, have convinced all reasonable men, that he was very justly accused. Consult Mr Saurin's book (35).
- (30) See, below, the remark [P].
- (31) [N] Sorbieri had the equity to suggest that this language was conformable to the laws of Policy. Boxhorn was thirty years of age when Sorbieri went to visit him, and was known then by a great many, and perhaps too many books (36). By degrees he grew warm against Grotius in this conversation, and blamed him not only for his method of re-uniting Christians, but also with respect to the political affairs of Holland. Is visus est tunc magis Grotio minus amicus; nam sensim procedente, ut fit, sermone ad quaestiones tunc V O L. V. No. CXXXVII.
- (32) temporis volitantes docta per ora virum & nupera scripta, non solum dissentire (quod faciunt multi boni & amici Grotio) se falsus est circa initium conciliationis modum & tributum nimium Rom. Pontifici auctoritatem, sed ipsum insimulatus est circa politica patriae negotia, una cum ceteris Remonstrantibus (37). - - - He seemed not to love Grotius; for the conversation, as it usually happens, gradually falling upon the questions at that time among the learned, and upon the new books, Zuërius not only confessed that he differed with Grotius (which many of his good friends own they do) as to his manner of reconciling Protestants and Papists, and the too great authority ascribed to the Pope; but also blamed him, and the rest of the Remonstrants, with regard to the political affairs of Holland. Sorbieri excused Boxhorn, because it would not have been prudent in a professor, who intends to be successful in his affairs, and use his endeavours for the advancement of his domestic prosperity, to expose himself to the displeasure of the ruling party. Quærens apud me rationem qua excusarem Boxhornium; aut quia junior res gestas audierat ab aliis non probata fidei testibus: aut quia professorum munus exercens conductum mercede se putabat à Calvinianis, quorum exciderat gratia, clavum Reipubl. tenentium, non est hominis bene rem familiarem gerere quaerentis. Perhaps there lurks a malignity in these excuses; but since Sorbieri doth not deny that Boxhorn might speak according to his persuasion, we ought not to suppose that he applied to him the saying, beneficium accipere libertatem vendere est: a well paid salary prevents speaking one's thoughts.
- (33) [O] Some learned Germans... have observed several errors in his works, he... resolved to revenge himself by a satire. This appears in a letter from Rupert to Reinefius. Videtur Boxhornius nimium tribuere ingenio suo, & ante tempus togâ brachium exerere. Quum olim vidissem Florum ejus, occurrerant multa valde putida; quæ privato studio notata, sed postea nescio quâ fraude in vulgus sparsa, in ipsius Boxhornii manus venisse dicuntur. Etiam Satyram, ut audio, minatus est in literis ad quemdam Dresdensem; quasi pro meis agnoscere debeam universa, quæ inimica manus transmissit: Vivimus enim hic in Viperina societate. Sed quicquid velit, agat, & typographica tubâ proprium dedecus infonet in eruditæ aures: ego nullus trepido, quamvis illud poetæ infusurrare quispiam possit.
- (34) Occursare Capro, cornu ferit ille, caveto (38).
- (35) Epist. xxi Reinefii ad Hoffmannum & Rupertum, pag. 64, 65.
- (36) Boxhornius seems to be full of himself, and to show his parts before they are ripe. Some time ago when I read his Florus, I met with several very bad things; these I noted for my own use; but afterwards, by I know not what fraud, these notes became public, and it is said, even fell into the hands of Boxhornius himself. I am informed, that in a letter to a certain person at Dresden, he threatens me with a satire; as if I ought to acknowledge all these to be my writings, which his enemies publish against him: for here we live together like vipers. But let him do as he pleases; let him proclaim to the world his own disgrace. I am not afraid; though somebody may whisper the saying of the Poet:
- (37) Avoid the goat, who pushes with his horn.
- (38) Reinefius, in a letter to Hoffman, hath these words: Tragocrotem Batarum qui nescio quid Ruperto nostro minatus fuerat, confidentissimum Criticum esse & in Antiquitate videre præ calore parum, offendam ex ejus

(39) Ibid. Epist. xxvi, pag. 99.

(40) Ibid. pag. 111.

AN important digression on the accusation of a new Heresy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour.

ejus Quæstionibus Romanis, ubi circa Inscriptiones nonnullas pueriliter hallucinatur (39). - - - As for that formidable Dutchman, who has threatened I know not what against our Rupert, I shall shew that he is a most audacious Critic, and very shallow in the knowledge of antiquity, being hurried away with his passion. This I shall prove upon him from his Quæstiones Romanæ, where, explaining some inscriptions, he blunders like a child. See also the 27th letter of the same Reinefius (40); where he treats Boxhorn with a great deal of contempt.

[P] Having here an occasion to speak of this accusation of a new Heresy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour, I shall make a digression, which I think very important. I am persuaded that a compiler of facts is wanting in his duty, if he neglects to engage the attention of his readers to those accidents which are somewhat singular. Now there is not any thing more capable to gain their attention, than the pains which an author takes to reflect on those accidents, and observe such circumstances of them as discover uncommon passions. All this furnishes the reader with an ample matter of reflexion, with the art of judging of men, and of avoiding being surprized into a rash credulity.

This is what engages me to make some remarks here on the consequences of the accusation; and as most of my readers may not know the contents of that loose sheet, and cannot now have a writing of that nature from the Bookellers, it is fit that the groundwork of my digression should be an abstract of that little piece.

The accuser first relates the doctrine which had been preached, and secondly he shews the pernicious consequences of it.

He affirms, that the doctrine of Mr Jurieu, the Minister accused, amounts to this: I. That the sentiments of hatred, indignation, and wrath, are allowable, good, and commendable, against the enemies of GOD, that is, as he himself explained it, against the Socinians, and the other Heretics of Holland, against the superstitious, idolaters, &c. II. That we ought to shew this hatred and indignation, by breaking off all correspondence with those people, neither saluting them, nor eating with them, &c. III. That we must not only hate the Heretics and bad qualities of such people, but that we ought to hate and detest their persons. One of the objections which he started to himself, and rejected with the most disdainful air, is this, that we are bound to war against error and vice; and yet to have charity for the person of the sinner. After these general propositions, to which the doctrine of the accused person is reduced, he is charged in particular with having objected to himself the history, or parable, of the Samaritan, the example of JESUS CHRIST, who conversed with people of a bad life, the command he gives us to love our enemies, to bless those who curse us, to pray for those who persecute us, and in general all that is usually represented to a Christian people, in order to make them renounce the spirit of revenge: The Minister, I say, is charged with having raised all these objections to his doctrine, and of having slighted and despised them. He pretended that these passages are not well understood; nay, he asserted, that the sermons of our Saviour on the mount, are a hard doctrine which must needs be softened, by taking it not in a literal, but in a figurative sense, and that by the persecutors for whom our Saviour commands us to pray, we are not to understand those who persecute the Church, but such private and personal enemies as a man may have in the place of his residence; that, for the rest, we may fulfil the command of blessing those who curse us, provided we wish them spiritual happiness, though we hate their persons, and wish them temporal evils. Whereupon, addressing himself to his audience, he declared to them, that they might and ought to hate the King of France, and wish him ill; not, added he, because he has taken your goods and estates from you; but because he persecutes your religion.

These are the tenets imputed to Mr Jurieu: I have given the very words of the person who accuses him in their full extent, because I was afraid least an abridgment of them should not be faithful. This is his first point; the second is as follows.

The accuser having set forth the Heresy which had been preached, strongly exhorts the pastors and confidantes to censure it; and, in order to animate them the more, he points out the fatal effects it may produce, if it should pass unpunished. He represents to them the ascendancy which Mr Jurieu has over the people, and how easily they are persuaded into what flatters their passions, and adds, that the strongest and most natural passion of the heart of man is that of revenge and hatred of our enemies; that nothing is so grating to our corrupt nature, as not to be allowed to bear an ill will to those who have tormented us on account of religion; that it would be a very great consolation for a man, whom a Priest or Captain of dragons has persecuted, in order to make him go to Mass, to be allowed, without any scruple of conscience, to wish that such a person had the plague, or the gravel, or was in the gallies, &c. and to load him with imprecations and abuse; and that nothing is more irksome than what we read in those treatises, which are commonly perused by way of preparation for the Sacrament, that he who presents himself at the table of the Lord, with a heart full of resentment or hatred against any person whatsoever, communicates to his own damnation. But Mr Jurieu, continues he, removes all those pious scruples. He allows us (41) to (41) Observe, communicate with hatred in our hearts, and imprecations that he especially in our mouths, against those who persecuted the Refugee. He desires us to hate them, and forbids us to wish them temporal felicity. The accuser affirms, that according to these doctrines it would not be allowable to procure temporal happiness to our persecutors, and would be an unjustifiable action to relieve them in sickness, or if their houses took fire, to assist in extinguishing it. He expressly exhorts the Synod of the Walloon Churches (42), to prevent the bad consequences of these false doctrines, he alledges several arguments to induce them to it, and tells them, among other things, that the Heresy which he attacks, is incompatible with the prosperity of the State; For, says he, what distractions would not ensue, if the Protestants should neither salute those of a different religion, nor eat with them, nor trade with them; what if it was a thing allowed and commendable in them to hate all the Papists, all the Arminians, Menonites, &c. what if the gospel obliged them only to wish the spiritual felicity of such people, but not to wish them any temporal good, nor to help them out of a ditch, if they saw them in one, nor to give them an alms, if they saw them in want? Could this country prosper upon the foot of such maxims? For the rest, he declares that he does not desire the Synod to give credit to his accusation, that his sole view is to induce them to inform themselves of the fact, and oblige Mr Jurieu to publish the two sermons such as they were preached. (42) It was to meet soon after in the city of Torgow.

We must remember that these two sermons were preached on the twenty-fourth of January, and the twenty-first of February 1694; and that this accusation appeared in the month of March of that same year, at a time when the audience had fresh ideas of these sermons. This circumstance is remarkable.

Let us now take a view of the accused Minister's conduct. As soon as he knew that several of his hearers were shocked at his doctrine, he sent these two sermons to be printed. They were already in the press, and would have appeared soon after: but as Jurieu put a stop to the printing of them, and took other measures. He published remarks on this loose sheet, he affirmed that it was full of falsehoods; for it is false, these are the terms of the author of the remarks,

1. That Mr J. said, that the sentiments of hatred are good and commendable against any person whatever, if hatred is taken for a human passion which has its principle in self-love.
2. It is false that he asserted absolutely that we ought to shew this hatred against Heretics, by not saluting them, nor eating with them. What he advanced on this point is what St Paul and St John have affirmed, with the restrictions which will appear in these sermons.
3. It is false that he asserted that we ought to break off all the commerce of civil society with Papists, Menonites, Arminians, &c. that is to say, that

* that we ought neither to give to the Jews, nor take from them bills of exchange. An impertinence which he neither advanced nor imagined.

* 4. It is false that he rejected this maxim, Love the person of a sinner, but hate his vices, as a dangerous or false one, he rejected it as being too subtle, as being not very intelligible, and, in short, as not being applicable in all cases. These sagacious gentlemen, no doubt, understand very well how it is possible to afflict the person of a parricide with the most horrible torments, with burning irons, melted lead, the rack, tearing him limb from limb, and at the same time love that person. But they ought to excuse those who cannot comprehend this.

* 5. It is false that Mr J. said, directly or indirectly, in part, or in whole, that by the persecutors, for whom our Saviour commands us to pray, we must not understand those who persecute.

* 6. It is false that he addressed himself to his audience to tell them that they might and ought to hate the King of France, and wish him ill. What was said on that head will appear in these sermons.

* 7. It is false that he allowed of any man communicating with hatred in his heart, and imprecations in his mouth.

* 8. It is false that Mr J. forbade to do good, or to wish temporal felicity to our persecutors, and said that we were not obliged to procure any temporal good to the Papists, Mennonites, &c.

Observe, that he promises twice to publish these sermons, as being the infallible way to detect and expose the falsehoods asserted by his accuser. But in the same page 3, where this promise is made, he gives notice, that, instead of publishing these sermons, he may, perhaps, put out a complete treatise on this part of Morality. A little lower he acquaints us that honest people shall, at a proper time, be instructed in this matter; but that at present these sermons will not be published, because he is informed, from several quarters, that his enemies have prepared their batteries, and were resolved to find Heresies in them at any rate.

(43) I shall wait a while, continues he, till their fire is spent. I pass by the rest, it is only a heap of praises and invectives, which Mr Jurieu bestows, the former on himself, commending his own great feats, and the latter on his enemies. I likewise pass by a writing which appeared against this Minister's remarks, not with regard to the accusation, but with regard to his quarrels with Mr de Beauval. That piece, and Mr Jurieu's Apology (44), and Mr de Beauval's Reply, are incidents entirely foreign to the accusation, and consequently to my digression; my sole design being to consider what happened in consequence of the accusation.

If the accusation made Mr Jurieu's two sermons the subject of great talk, his remarks on it, made them still more so, and as this happened on the day before the Synod met at Tergow, every body was impatient to know what resolution that assembly would take in relation to an affair which was so nice, and so scandalous. That appeared very soon. The Synod treated both the pamphlet of the accuser, and that of the person accused, as libels, and dropped the affair, as a thing which had never happened. This was very strange and surprising to those who had expected that the Synod would inform themselves of the fact; nor did it remove the great scandal which had been given to the public, either by the accuser, if he calumniated Mr Jurieu, or by the person accused, if he had preached the doctrine laid to his charge. Here is the question which I design to clear up. It is a shame for our age that people dare to impose, with so much boldness, upon the public; this is the way to deprive us of the most specious maxims we can offer against the incredulous in matters of fact. Since therefore the bulk of this work may probably withstand the injuries of time better than a little book, I think myself obliged to communicate to my readers, whilst the affair is fresh, an explanation of this charge of a new Heresy, to the end that no unfortunate Sceptic may object, that in the year 1694, there having arisen a dispute whether a Minister, who had more than 1200 hearers, had preached a certain doctrine, or had not, it was impossible to decide it three days after the sermon was preached. Those who will duly consider my remarks will own, I am persuaded, that in this affair it is possible to discern the truth and the falsehood.

I. I begin with this consideration, that no regard is to be had to the following principle, If it was false that a Minister preached before 1200 persons the Heresy of the hatred of our neighbour, no body would have been bold enough publicly to accuse him of it three days after. The reason why this principle is here of no force, is because another proposition may be opposed to it, namely, If it was true that a Minister preached that Heresy before 1200 persons, he would not have dared publicly to deny it three days after. If you conclude from the former principle that such an Heresy must have been preached, since the Minister was immediately accused of it before the public, I may conclude from the other principle that it must not have been preached, since as soon as the accusation appeared, the person accused publicly denied it. The shortest way is to set aside this manner of arguing, and to balance the affirmative of the accuser with the negative of the person accused. Let us imitate the Synod of Tergow, which paid no regard to either, and treated the pamphlet of the accuser, and that of the person accused, as equally libellous. In general, let us lay down this as a maxim, that all the proof we can draw from one man's affirming any thing, is defeated by another man's denying it, and let us now determine, by the particular circumstances of this question, which is the safest side of it, the affirmative, or the negative. This is my design in the following observations.

II. The accuser was not obliged to declare his name, since his design was only to engage the Synod to examine whether the Heresy which he attacked, had been actually preached. So that nothing can be inferred in Mr Jurieu's favour from hence, that his accuser did not publish his name.

III. The accuser was not obliged to answer Mr Jurieu's pamphlet; for it became him to wait the determination of the Synod, in relation to a fact which he affirmed, and the other denied: and when he saw that they would not meddle in the question, it became him to give it over, since no private man has a right to put interrogatories, and that was the only way of deciding the question. Nothing therefore can be inferred in Mr Jurieu's favour from hence, that his accuser did not support his first writing by a second; for let him have written what he would, all was to no purpose, unless witnesses were judicially examined.

IV. It is a certain and unquestionable fact that the Walloon Synods favour Mr Jurieu. He has more than once boasted of the regard they paid him, and has as often gloried in the triumphs which they gave him over his enemies. To be convinced of this we need only see his answer to the accusation (45). His adversaries complain of the indulgence, shewn him by the Synods, and observe that he has abused their excessive lenity (46). See the history of this Synodal favour in a book of Mr Saurin, a Minister at Utrecht (47). From hence we may draw two consequences, one to justify the accuser's silence, and the other against Mr Jurieu. In effect, if, as that Minister himself owns, the Synod of Breda threw aside among the rubbish the accusations brought against him by the deputies of some churches, if the Synod took into consideration only four of them, from which they took care to justify Mr Jurieu; we may easily understand that the author of the accusations ought to have been silent; and if in truth he was in the right, it was however prudent in him not to prosecute his first design, as it would have been to no purpose. The other consequence I am to mention is this. A Synod, which manifestly favours a Minister, does not neglect to examine an affair, when it is certain that such an inquiry would fully justify that Minister, and confound his accusers. Since therefore the Synod, tho' strongly solicited by the author of the accusation to examine the fact, neglected to make any manner of inquiry, it is very probable that they feared lest the event of it might not be favourable to Mr Jurieu. Thus it must be presumed that this Minister preached the Heresies laid to his charge.

V. It

(43) See the reflexions which Mr de Beauval made upon this, in his Considerations on two sermons of Mr Jurieu, pag. 2.

(44) That Apology left Mr de Beauval's remarks in all their force; and this he made appear in his reply, in a manner which confounded Mr Jurieu so much, that not being able to disentangle himself, he imitated the Missionaries of France, who finding themselves too hard pressed by a book of Controversy, had recourse to the Civil Magistrate, and obtained the suppression of the book.

(45) These gentlemen are very incorrigible. The Synod of Leyden tore their libel; and after they had renewed their objections under a greater authority; the Synod of Breda had so little regard for all that heap of accusations, that they only considered four of them, from which they took care to justify Mr J. and left all the rest among the rubbish: Tho' his absence gave his adversaries a full liberty, which they knew well how to employ.

(46) Démonstration de la Nouvelle Héresie, near the end.

(47) See the Preface, of the book intitulé, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu.

V. It is certain Mr Jurieu was persuaded that the author of the accusation was a Divine (48), and that the whole party, with which he has had so sharp encounters, had a hand in that piece. Hence it is that in his remarks he generally uses the plural number, these gentlemen. It cannot therefore be alleged that if he did not take an effectual method of refuting the accusation, his reason was because he would have only exposed a single person, and one unknown; for it is certain that he would have exposed, as he imagined, all those Ministers with whom he is at variance. Why then did he neglect this advantage at so decisive a juncture? Why did he not desire the Synod to name commissioners who might be sent to the place where his sermon was preached, and interrogate the most intelligent hearers? Why has he not produced any deposition in his favour, having so many friends who would not have refused him any thing, which their consciences had allowed them to declare in his vindication? In a word, why did he not publish his two sermons? The accusation should have made him desirous to publish them; on the contrary, it occasioned his putting a stop to the printing of them. A man must be a very stanch Pyrrhonist, who does not decisively affirm that such a conduct fully justifies the accusation. All appearances incline us to believe, that Mr Jurieu resolved to publish these sermons, when he knew they had shocked his audience. Doubtless he wrapped up and disguised the harshest maxims he had preached, and hoped that such a remedy would remove the scandal which had been taken. But when he beheld with what an air of importance the matter was treated in the accusation, and what an odious and seditious turn his doctrine would bear, he perceived that he had not sufficiently softened matters, and that, in order to blind his censurers, it was fit to make several more considerable alterations in his copy. Whereupon the only course he could take was to stop the impression: for had he corrected the copy so far as to get beyond the reach of his enemies, he would have put forth the most horrible medley that ever appeared, his system would have been a contradiction, from beginning to end; besides, several people would have well remembered that the sermons, as they were printed, were not the same which they had heard. The general talk would have been the insincerity of this Minister, who preached one doctrine, and published another. An attestation of the Consistory, that the printed sermons were perfectly like those which had been preached, was not easy to be obtained, and would not have convinced his auditors that they had heard such a doctrine preached, which they well remembered they had not heard. He therefore had no option to make, he was obliged to resolve upon suppressing them, and thereby deprive himself of the most effectual and expeditious method of covering his enemies with eternal shame, in case he had been innocent, in case the accusation was false. This is a decisive argument against him.

(49) In the year 1694, that Consistory was extremely favourable to him.

VI. Whoever has but a slender knowledge of the situation of affairs in this country, certainly knows that the Walloon Consistory of Rotterdam grants every thing that Mr Jurieu can reasonably demand (49). Nay, there are people who believe that his interest is not confined within so narrow limits. However, I suppose, that he obtains from the Consistory nothing but what is reasonable. Now had he not preached the doctrines laid to his charge, nothing was more just than to grant him a certificate of this. He would therefore have obtained it, had he asked it of his Consistory. Why then did not the Minister accused, instead of denying the accusation, in an anonymous pamphlet, disavow, in the face of the world, that he had preached the errors imputed to him, and support his denial by an ample certificate from his colleagues, Elders, and Deacons? He passes for being very tender of his reputation, and does not cease to say that his honour is necessary to the Church; it cannot therefore be pretended that he neglected to obtain a certificate, because it was indifferent to him whether he was defamed, or commended, being contented with the testimony of his own conscience, and that of honest minds who love him. Such a manner of defending him would be to impose upon the world, and upon himself in the first place.

VII. He well foresaw that the suppression of his two sermons would be the triumph of his adversaries. Accordingly he did not say that he intended to suppress them; he only gave some reasons why the publication of them was suspended for some time; and in case he suppressed them; he promised a complete treatise on that subject. All this pleads in favour of the accuser, better than an able Advocate could: for here are the reasons of this delay. He was informed that these gentlemen intended to criticize the two sermons, and did not think it proper at present to give them the pleasure of the attack. That would divert them; but that would scandalize the public. It is fit to wait a little till their fire is spent (50). But it is obvious that these gentlemen would have only rendered themselves ridiculous by criticizing two orthodox sermons, since they had accused them as full of Heresies. Where could they find these Heresies, if the accusation was such as Mr Jurieu pretends? The public would not have been scandalized to see a famous Minister make out his innocence: on the contrary, the public would have been greatly edified to see a false accuser put to shame. A dispute on this subject in writing, could not appear too soon, since it would contribute so greatly to shew the innocence of the Minister, and the calumny of his censurer. The more his critics had acted according to their first heat and passion, the more would they have entangled themselves. A man of parts would have taken advantage of their fury. But let us grant to Mr Jurieu that his delay was reasonable, what will this avail him, since it now appears that he did not intend to publish these sermons. A year is now elapsed without the publication either of them, or of any book on the hatred of our neighbour. Is not the fire of his adversaries yet spent? But, if the reasons he has assigned for the suppression of these two sermons betray his insincerity, the remarks he has made on the occasion betray it likewise.

VIII. He has not distinguished those two points which the accuser has so clearly done. See, above, the two points of the accusation. The first relates to the doctrines asserted by Mr Jurieu: the second concerns the effects which these doctrines may produce. All those who know the laws of disputation, tell us, that the consequences resulting from any doctrine ought not to be imputed to the defender of that doctrine, when he is known to reject them; but let him reject, or admit them, it is still allowable to point them out to him, because this may be a means of converting him. How many people would abandon a principle, if they knew the bad consequences which may justly be deduced from it? Thus the accuser has done nothing but what was reasonable, when, in order to induce and prevail with the Synods to censure the Heresy which he accused, he pointed out the pernicious consequences of it. He would have been in the wrong to assert that Mr Jurieu expressly preached these consequences; neither has he asserted it: the most ignorant readers may discern, as easily as the most learned, which are the propositions his accuser imputed to him, and which are the propositions he infers from the former, without pretending that he preached them; can it therefore be thought that Mr Jurieu dealt sincerely when he confounded these two kinds of propositions? Is it not manifest, that, in order to delude honest minds, and credulous people, he complained that he was accused of having preached, that it is lawful for a man to communicate with baired in his heart, and imprecations in his mouth? All the hearers of whom it should be asked if they had heard him utter such a proposition, would answer, No, and yet would they say with wonder, this is what the base accuser imputes to him; after such a calumny what may not be expected from him? This whole pamphlet is nothing but an infamous libel. This artifice, gross as it is, may have deceived a great many people; and for that reason Mr Jurieu employed it in his answer. Let us affirm the same thing of this other proposition, namely, that he is accused of having preached, that we ought to break off all the commerce of civil society with Papists, Mennonites, Arminians, &c. that is, we ought neither to give bills of exchange to the Jews, nor take them from them. It is very false that he was accused of having preached these words, and of having descended into these particulars; one one must take him for a madman to accuse him of such things. It was only represented to the Synod that if we were to live according to the doctrines which he taught, we must renounce all manner of commerce with the enemies of the truth. It is his part to shew, if he can, that his principles do not infer such monstrous consequences.

(50) See how Mr. Jurieu has refused all the reasons, as his Examination de la Théologie de Mr. Jurieu, Tom. ii, p. 112.

Observe, that some consequences have so close and obvious a connexion with their principle, that we can never be persuaded that a man of sense, who teaches the principle, rejects these consequences. If once you teach that it is lawful to hate, and to curse those who persecute, how can you deny that it is not lawful for a man to present himself at the communion-table with his heart full of hatred, and his mouth full of imprecations against those who persecute. Is it not evident that in order to prepare one's self for receiving the communion, it is enough to depart from things unlawful? But let that be as it will, what the accuser imputes upon this head is an obvious consequence, which he draws from the Heresy charged upon him, and is not one of the propositions imputed to him. This discovers more and more the dissingenuity of the preacher. And from henceforth we may believe him very capable of denying that he preached such a Heresy, though it is very true that he did preach it.

IX. The same dissingenuity will evidently appear, if we consider how he answers in relation to the doctrines imputed to him. Let us compare his answer with the terms of the accusation. He is accused of having preached, that the sentiments of hatred are good and commendable against the enemies of God: his answer is, it is false that he affirmed that the sentiments of hatred are good and commendable against any person whatever, if hatred is taken for a human passion, which hath its principle in self-love. This is a downright imposition upon his readers; for thus he supposes that he was accused of having said, that hatred, even when it is a human passion, which hath its principle in self-love, is good and commendable. But it is evident that this is not the question: he is accused only of having said that the sentiments of hatred are good and commendable against the enemies of God. A man who deals plainly, and is conscious of his own innocence, does not recur to such artifices; he does not justify himself against chimerical accusations, he faithfully represents the crime of which he is accused, and answers plainly and precisely to the sense of the words of the accusation. Has Mr Jurieu done this? Has he answered, as a man ought to have done, who could justly deny the charge? I did not say that the sentiments of hatred are good and commendable against the enemies of God. Not in the least; he chose rather to entangle himself in captious distinctions, I did not say that the sentiments of a human hatred which has its principle in self-love, are good and commendable against any person whatever. But was you accused of this, might it be answered? What avails a justification of this nature, which is foreign to the accusation? I go farther, and maintain that his own distinction undoes him; it proves that he preached that, provided the sentiments of hatred be not founded in self-love, they are good and commendable against the enemies of God, and ought not to be called a human passion; he therefore preached that his hearers might lawfully hate the Papists, provided their hatred was not grounded upon some injury received, but upon the war the Papists make against the truths which God hath revealed. Now this is what the accuser calls a new Heresy in Morality, relating to the hatred of our neighbour. He did not make this new Heresy consist in the following proposition; It is good and commendable to hate our enemies; but in this, It is lawful and commendable to hate the enemies of God: and consequently the person accused owns all that is charged, and, in spite of his wrangling, justifies the veracity of the accuser.

It does not concern me to examine whether the doctrine in question is justly styled Heretical; I only inquire after the truth of the fact, and do not think it necessary to acquaint any body that this doctrine is really a pernicious Heresy (51). None but such as have never understood the New Testament, can doubt of it; and if once it was commendable to hate the person of our neighbour for the love of God, there is not one precept in Scripture which a man might not transgress for the love of God.

X. I expressly set down the words, bate the person of our neighbour, because this gives me a fresh occasion of shewing the sincerity of the accuser. Mr Jurieu owns that he rejected this maxim, We ought to love the person of a sinner, and hate the vice, not as a dangerous or false one, but as being too subtle, as being not very intelligible; and, in short, as not being applicable in all cases. For instance, says he, it is not applicable to those who put a criminal to death. It would not have been an easy matter to give a better proof than this of the accuser's sincerity. He said that one of the objections which Mr Jurieu rejected with the most disdainful airs is this, that we ought to war against error and vice, and yet have charity for the person of the sinner. Does Mr Jurieu own this charge, since he confesses that he rejected that objection as being too subtle, as not very intelligible, nor applicable to Judges who punish criminals? In the stile of disputation, those who reject a distinction as too subtle, and too obscure, and those who reject it as false and chimerical, differ only in their expressions. The former use polite terms, and a sort of compliment; the latter an uncivil language: but, in truth, both of them form the same thought, and it is certain that the greatest defect in the distinctions of the Irish, or Spanish, Logicians is, that they are not very intelligible, they are too abstract, and too susceptible of exceptions. Add to this, if the distinction between the crime, and the person of a criminal does not take place in the tribunals of Judges, it cannot take place any where else, since no man living lies under so great an obligation as a Judge does, to renounce all passion against the person of a criminal. I refer my reader to Mr Saurin (52), and shall only say, that Mr Jurieu's answer, concerning the two principal doctrines which had been imputed to him, raises a presumption against him, which is not less forcible than a good proof.

If we would multiply presumptions against him, we need only observe the passages in his remarks where he acts with dissingenuity.

XI. He acts with dissingenuity, and with a seditious and persecuting spirit, when he affirms that his accuser is a Socinian and Anabaptist, with regard to magistracy and war. His accuser only said that the precepts of Jesus Christ, and the maxims of charity are believed and taught by those very Heretics who attack the Trinity, the Incarnation, and Predestination. Does this mean that he approves what they teach concerning war and the magistrates?

XII. He acts with dissingenuity when he says, that he was obliged to preach these two sermons, in order to refute, among other maxims, this, that charity does not permit us to trouble any person under the pretext of piety and religion, and that Heretics ought not to be disturbed, as enemies to God. He preached these two sermons in order to refute what one of his colleagues had lately preached. Now it is certain that this colleague never said, nor ever believed, that Heretics ought not to be troubled, or disturbed. He is well persuaded that we ought to write against them, demonstrate their chicaneries, press them hard upon their sophisms, and shew their system in all its falsity and absurdity: and these things cannot fail to trouble and disturb the Heretics.

XIII. He acts with dissingenuity when he alleges what passed with relation to certain letters, which Mr Jurieu had written to the Duke of Montausier, as a proof of a correspondence with the court of France. Mr Jurieu's enemies have had transcripts of these letters, and of that Duke's answers, and have made use of them to vex, and, as they express themselves, to unmask him (53). They have published some extracts of them, which shew that he made most flattering compliments to the King of France, and such as were the very reverse of the language he held here in conversation, in the pulpit, and in his books. The accuser touched upon this point by the way. This de Mr Bayle, greatly angered Mr Jurieu: he affirmed that these gentlemen, by producing these extracts, had given an unanswerable proof, that they held an unwarrantable correspondence with the enemies of the State (54). He affirmed

(51) See Mr Saurin's Dout, intitulé, Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, Tom. ii, pag. 307, & seq. where he refuses Mr Jurieu's Remarks, on the Accusation, and shews him that his Moral Doctrine, concerning the hatred of one's neighbour, is one of the loosest maxims of the Jesuits.

(53) See the Cabale Chimérique, pag. 51, 52, of the new edition, and Lettre de Mr de Beauval sur les Différens de Mr Jurieu & de Mr Bayle, pag. 35, 36.

(54) Réflexions sur la Dénonciation, pag. 4.

This avails nothing; for when the magistrates prohibit a book, they do not warrant that it contains false facts. Mr Jurieu does not pretend that when the States of Holland prohibited the book intitled l'Esprit de Mr Annauld, they determined that the facts contained in that book were lies. In fine, a minister venerable on account of his age, his gravity, piety, and learning (65), such a minister, I say, who hath seen Mr Jurieu an hundred times in the Synods, affirms that Mr Jurieu's presence usually ruins his affairs, because he has fits of raving which he cannot keep up, and he rashly advances things of the falshood of which he is presently convicted. What man does not see that since either the accuser, or the person accused, must needs be an impostor, reason and good sense would have us suspect the latter, rather than the former (66).

(65) Mr Saurin, See his Preface to his Examen la Théologie de Mr Jurieu.

(66) Semel machos (and by so much the more reason Sæpe machus) semper presumitur in eodem genere mali, say the Christians.

(67) See la Chimère démontrée, pag. 515, and in the Preface, pag. 64.

(68) Réflexions sur la Dénonciation, pag. 5.

XX. Some body perhaps will say that in an affair of this nature, one might give more credit to a person unknown, if the question was not concerning a falshood to which so many persons living were witnesses. In answer to this objection, I shall make two remarks, one is, that Mr Jurieu was so bold as to publish in the year 1691, that the Burgo-masters of Rotterdam had shewn a particular regard to him, when they sent for him and the author of the Cabale Chimérique, to acquaint them with their resolution. Yet it is certain that these gentlemen had held an even balance between the two parties, and required nothing of one, but what they required of the other (67). There were five witnesses to this, the four Burgo-masters, and the Pensionary of the city. Nevertheless, Mr Jurieu immediately published that they had shewn him this pretended regard, without fearing that any of these worthy persons should detect him in that false assertion. He had his evasion at hand; viz. that he had not put his name to his factums or cases; and besides that, he well knew they would not go so far as to judicial proceedings. What he has done since that time is much bolder, he has said (68), that these gentlemen will ever lament the zeal which the worthy magistrates of Rotterdam shewed against their friend the professor of Philosophy. A few days after he perceived that this professor lost his post, only on account of religious opinions, and therefore that the accusations of state-crimes which Mr Jurieu laid against him, with so great a noise that it resounded throughout all Europe, were not regarded. This comes very near to make him known for a public calumniator, or a rash and heedless accuser, utterly void of discernment. What has he done to ward off this blow? Why he has changed his tone; he has affirmed, that the book on comets was not the true cause of the Professor's disgrace, and that it was chiefly on account of the Advice to the Refugees that his salary, and permission to teach, were taken from him, not without having been heard, but after the Magistrates had taken up a considerable time in examining all the pieces, answers, replies, &c. This is an assertion of the falshood of which the whole city of Rotterdam is convinced, for there is not one citizen who did not ask of some of the Counsellors how the affair passed, and consequently must have known that the very first time it was proposed in the council, whether they should revoke the permission granted to that Professor, in the year 1681, to teach both in public and private, with a salary of 500 florins, the majority were for the affirmative: thus the affair was proposed and concluded in the same meeting: I know not if it lasted a full hour. The Advice to the Refugees was not mentioned there, directly, nor indirectly. Some of those who gave their opinions only alledged the Thoughts on the Comets, and represented the danger of suffering youth to be instructed in such opinions as are contained in that book. How bold must the man be, who after two or three months, whilst all the members of the Council are living, publicly asserts, that these gentlemen grounded their resolution chiefly upon the Advice to the Refugees, and had thoroughly examined that affair long before? This boldness is the more surprising, as several of these gentlemen, when they came to the Council, knew not that such a proposal would be made, I mean that of revoking the salary, and the permission to teach. Never had a word been said of this matter in their meetings, never were the members exhorted to examine the pieces, never were commissioners named to examine them, and make their report. It is well known that most of these gentlemen do not understand French, and consequently could not examine any factum (or case) on the accusation of the Advice to the Refugees, nor examine the book on comets. Mr Jurieu's temerity, indiscretion, and want of respect for the Council of Rotterdam, whose conduct he has unreasonably, and without the least occasion, taken upon him to justify, might be fully exposed, if one knew as little as he does how to render to Cæsar, the things which are Cæsar's. The Council of that city has no need to justify their conduct in that affair. They are absolute sovereigns, with regard to the permissions of teaching; and may order, as they think proper, that every Philosopher who would obtain a salary, and permission to teach, should follow this or that system; so that the author of the book on Comets might have been removed from his professorship merely because he was no Voëtian, after the same manner as in other countries all Ramists, Cartesian, &c. are excluded from professorships. Let us conclude, that a man, capable of asserting, that the Magistrates of Rotterdam, did a thing which they have not done; capable of asserting it, I say, whilst these Magistrates are still living, and have fresh ideas of the affair, is very capable of denying that he preached a doctrine, though it is certain that he did preach it.

XXI. I have one observation more to make, which appears to me considerable. It is easy to conceive, may our posterity say, that the anonymous author of a pamphlet may wrongfully accuse a famous Minister of having preached Heretical doctrines; whereas it is incredible that such a Minister would dare to deny that he preached what he did actually preach. Two thousand hearers, if you please, will detect the assurance of the false accuser; but what harm can they do him? They know not who he is, nor where to find him, he is sure never to meet with the shame which he deserves. The Minister cannot flatter himself with these hopes. Two thousand hearers, provoked at his boldness, or rather effrontery, would mortify him wherever he appeared. Common sense teaches us that this punishment is inevitable. It is not therefore probable, that a Minister would expose himself to it; since therefore Mr Jurieu, a few days after he had preached these sermons, published a pamphlet, in which he denied that he preached the Heresy imputed to him, he deserves more to be credited than the accuser.

This is a plausible objection, and may forthwith strike foreigners; but they and our posterity will easily avoid being surprized, if they consider the two things which I am going to observe.

First, this objection proves too much; for if it was a good one, Mr Jurieu had not publicly advanced what I have already mentioned; nor asserted in the Synods several falshoods of which he was presently convicted, as Mr Saurin, an eye-witness, has charged upon him in the face of the public (69). Fifty Ministers, and about as many elders, all present together in a Synod, are more to be feared than a multitude of people spread in a city; I say, they are more to be feared by a Minister who dares to deny a known truth.

(69) In the Preface to his Examen de la Théologie de Mr Jurieu, pag. xxx, 4. See above the end of number xix.

In the second place, the greatest number of hearers are not capable of certifying whether a Minister preached the propositions charged upon him, or those which he owns that he preached. They have not attention, or penetration, or memory enough, to be able to answer that there were, or were not, such and such restrictions and explanations in the doctrine preached. So that a Minister may be very easy as to the greatest part of his hearers; he may assure himself that he can safely deny that he preached what he has actually preached, and disguise it as he thinks fit, without fearing the consequences. As for intelligent hearers, they are to be feared; but Mr Jurieu is on such a footing that he has no occasion to fear them.

He

He foresaw what has happened to him; I mean that he should raise many enemies to himself: for this reason he had the address to fortify himself more carefully than they fortify frontier towns the most exposed. He shewed a zeal full of fury for the ruin of Popery, and that of France (70). He insulted and affronted all the sectaries in Holland, both as being Heretics, and Republicans, in order to make a merit of being odious to them. He made a great show of his interest: and having persuaded his emissaries that he had not this interest by the recommendation of others, but originally and directly by himself, they spread this news from house to house: so that those of Mr Jurieu's congregation are persuaded, that he can do a great deal of good to those who are devoted to him, and a great deal of mischief to those who oppose him (71); I am persuaded, that, by a subtle and artful galconade, he has increased the idea of his interest: but it is certain that he has powerful patrons, who, through maxims of state, will bring him off in the worst affairs, in which he can engage. Hence it is that there is hardly any body who does not carefully avoid incurring his indignation. He well knows this, and therefore was not concerned if two or three hundred private persons were convinced that he denied the truth, by denying the accusation. He was well assured that no body would stand as a witness against him: he knows that good Christians are persuaded that they ought to hide the faults of their pastors, as Shem and Japhet hid the nakedness of their father. He has so often affirmed and repeated that it is not possible to blame him, without injuring the Church, that he has persuaded a great many people into the belief of it: he has so often, and so pathetically, represented that he has worn out his strength and vigour in the service of the cause, and now only leads a wretched, lingering life, because he has sacrificed his watchings and labours to the good of the Church, that most of his brethren are persuaded that they should be guilty of a cruelty, if they should cast the least stain upon his honour; and they will not reproach themselves with having made his grey hairs descend with sorrow to the grave. This is one of the reasons of what his adversaries call the excessive lenity of the Synods. Now since the appearing of his Important Advice to the Public, and his marvellous accusation of the Cabal of Geneva, people are afraid of being incorporated in it, if they speak or act in the least like those of that pretended Cabal. One would think they imagine that he is an open dealer in wares of this sort. This puts me in mind of one thing, which, of all the expedients he has used to establish his authority, I ought first to mention. He set up for an informer of two great conspiracies, which he pretended to have discovered among the Refugees. One is a Cabal both of state and religion, the other of religion only. The former is spread from south to north, and has its center at Geneva, and its design is to render the King of France master of all Europe, in order that he may ruin the Protestants. The other is composed of a great many Ministers come from France, who are infected with the Pelagian and Socinian Heresies, and are resolved to sow them as much as possible, since they are no longer restrained by the fear, which, in France, obliged them to conceal their opinions. These two conspiracies proved to be equally chimerical; nevertheless, the informer reaped a great advantage by them. He thereby made himself considered as the rampart of Orthodoxy, and honest people were very near giving him the title of MARSHAL OF THE FAITH: I mean Marshal, or Provost at least, of the long robe. Several of the brethren have attributed his greatest faults to an excess of zeal, and have only considered them as irregularities, which might, with a safe conscience, be protected, or excused, that the Church might not be deprived of so necessary a defender. Several others did not dare to declare against him, lest they should pass for members of one or other of these two imaginary Cabals. One is in fear for his pension, another of being never promoted. After all, if we are surprised that the Ministers, in a body, would not meddle in the affair of the accusation, we ought not to be surprised that no private person gave his attestation in that cause. The lawful authority did not require it of any person, besides the fact to be attested was scandalous, and the scandal seemed to be sufficiently removed by the public disavowal of the person accused. It is a great matter to see such a man not dare to maintain what he has preached. It is a tacit retracting of his doctrines, which they thought might be sufficient. And he well knew that they would be content with it.

Where is the man, who, after having reflected on all these things, thinks it strange that Mr Jurieu dared to deny the accusation.

These are the weapons with which I thought it became me to furnish posterity against future Sceptics. A Sceptic glad to render all facts uncertain, might have said thirty years hence, It cannot be known for certain whether a famous Minister did or did not preach an Heresy on such a day: how then can we certainly know what passes in councils of state? He may be answered by virtue of my explanation, that it is very easy to aver that the Minister did preach the doctrines with which he is charged by the accuser. If whilst things were fresh, any person had taken the pains to explain them, as I have done this, we should not be obliged on so many occasions to fall in with Scepticism in history. The negative argument would not in that case be of any force. I call a negative argument the silence of cotemporary authors, with regard to remarkable accidents, whether mentioned by no body, or mentioned without being contradicted. We are in this last case. Mr Jurieu denies, and every body suffers him to deny; even the accuser suffers it. For this reason, in future generations, the strength of the negative argument might be used in his behalf, if they did not know the contents of my digression.

There is no reason why what I have attempted to do in favour of our posterity, may not extend even to foreigners: for as to the persons who are now living in Holland, they do not want this information. They doubt not that Mr Jurieu preached the hatred of our neighbour in the sense of the accusation. The suppression of these sermons speaks very clearly on this head, and such of his hearers as can speak out without fearing the effects of it, very frankly tell the truth when occasion offers. This indeed is only the talk of conversation, and not a public certificate. It was said once in the presence of a Magistrate who had heard these sermons, that Mr Jurieu denied the whole accusation. How, said the Magistrate, does he deny he preached that a man fulfils the command, provided he wishes spiritual felicity to persecutors? Yes, it was answered, that is one of the points which he most boldly denies. The Magistrate shrugged up his shoulders, and protested that he distinctly remembered to have heard him speak this new doctrine. I was present at that conversation.

ZUYLICHEM (CONSTANTINE HUYGENS, LORD OF) Secretary and Counsellor to the Princes of Orange, one of the most ingenious men and best Poets [A] of the XVIIth Century, was born at the Hague, on the fourth of September 1596. He was the second son of Christian Huygens [B], Secretary to the Council of State of the Republic

[A] And best Poets. There are of his composition an infinite number of Dutch verses: he also published some Latin poems under the title of Momenta delatoria.

[B] He was the second son of Christian Huygens. This CHRISTIAN was the son of CORNELIUS HUYGENS, a gentleman of Brabant, and of Gertrude Back (1). He was the first of his family who settled in Holland. He married (2) into a very considerable family of Antwerp, by taking for his wife Susanna Hoefnagle, the daughter of James Hoefnagle, and Elizabeth Veleler (3). This James Hoefnagle was so rich, that he gave three hundred thousand florins for his redemption from the Spanish garrison when it was continued in Antwerp in the year 1576. This large ransom secured him and his family from the fury of the soldiers,

(1) Being the son of a family of Antwerp, by taking for his wife Susanna Hoefnagle, the daughter of James Hoefnagle, and Elizabeth Veleler (3). This James Hoefnagle was so rich, that he gave three hundred thousand florins for his redemption from the Spanish garrison when it was continued in Antwerp in the year 1576. This large ransom secured him and his family from the fury of the soldiers,

(1) The daughter of Christian Back, and Lucy Back de Weelden, of the same family with those of Aften.

Republic of the United-Provinces, and was preferred to the post I have mentioned under Prince Frederic Henry. He continued in the exercise of it under his successors, until he resigned it to his eldest son (a). In the year 1661, he was sent to the Court of France, to solicit the restitution of Orange, of which Lewis XIV had taken possession. And in the year 1665, having at last obtained what he demanded, he took a journey to Orange, in order to cause that principality to be delivered to its lawful sovereign. This was performed with great solemnity (b). He lived to a great old age, with the happiness of retaining both the solidity of his judgment, and the vivacity of his wit, and also of seeing his family well settled, and the sixty-two years services he had done to the house of Orange well approved. He had kept a great epistolary correspondence with the most illustrious learned men [C], and as he loved and understood the Liberal Arts, he delighted in favouring those who made profession of them. He died in the year 1687, aged ninety years and six months. He was President of the Prince of Orange's Council. Mr Huygens, one of the greatest Mathematicians of Europe, was one of his three sons [D].

(a) See the remark [D].

(b) See the relation published by Mr Chambrun, Minister of Orange, in the year 1666.

(4) Called Theodorus van Liefvelt, Lord of Hamme, Ste. Anne, Opdorp, &c.

soldiers, as well as the fine house which he had built; but did not prevent their killing, even in his arms, one of his relations who fled to him for protection. The country-seat which he built, about a quarter of a league from Antwerp, is still known by the name of Lanternhorf. Balthazar Hoefnagle, his eldest son, married the daughter of the Chancellor of Brabant (4). As for CHRISTIAN HUYGENS, he served Prince William in quality of his Secretary, ever since the foundation of the Republic of the United-Provinces. The histories of Reydanus and Hooft relate a noble action of his, when he was Deputy to that Prince, after whose death he was Secretary of the Council of State. He died at the Hague, in the year 1624, leaving two sons and two daughters. MAURICE HUYGENS, his eldest son, and godson to Prince Maurice, was born at the Hague on the twelfth of May 1595, and was Secretary to the States after the death of his father, and left issue. CONSTANTINE HUYGENS, the second son of Christian, is the subject of this article. He had two sisters: GEERTRUDE HUYGENS, the eldest, was married to Philip Doublet, Lord of St Annelant, &c. Receiver-General of the United-Provinces. From this marriage proceeded Philip Doublet, Lord of St Annelant, &c. who married SUSANNA HUYGENS, his cousin-german, the daughter of our CONSTANTINE HUYGENS. The other sister of the said Constantine, named CONSTANTIA HUYGENS, was born on the second of August 1602, and married David le Leu de Wilhem, as I have said above (5).

(5) In the article of WILHEM, remark [F]. All this is extracted out of a Memoir imparted to the Book-keeper.

[C] He had kept a great epistolary correspondence with the most illustrious learned men. Chiefly with Daniel Heinisius, Nicolas Heinisius, the son of Daniel, Voffus, Erius Puteanus, Balzac (6), Corneille, and still more with Father Merienne, and Mr Des Cartes (7). Observe also, that he is frequently mentioned in the printed letters of several learned men. See amongst others those of Mr de Wicquefort and Barlaeus, lately published in Latin and French (8).

[D] Mr Huygens, one of the greatest Mathematicians of Europe, was one of his three sons.] His name was

CHRISTIAN; he died on the eighth of July 1695, at the age of sixty-six years, without ever marrying. Hymen could not well agree with a person like him, wholly devoted to the enquiry after what was most profound in Mechanics, Astronomy, Geometry, &c. See his elogy in the History of the Works of the Learned (9). To make it compleat, Mr de Beauval had no occasion for any thing else besides a catalogue of the writings and inventions of this great man. You will also find his elogy, as well as that of Mr de Zuylichem, his father, in a letter written by Sorbier, on the thirteenth of July 1660 (10). Mr Huygens was then only thirty-one years of age (11). His eldest brother, named CONSTANTINE, was Secretary to the Prince of Orange, upon the resignation of his father, and continued in the possession of that post after the accession of that great Prince to the British throne. He died at the Hague in November 1697. Mr de Zuylichem left a third son, who died at Rotterdam in the beginning of July 1699. He had the office of Deputy of the Admiralty of the Maese for life. He left a very fine family. His eldest son possesses the lordship of Zeelhem, of which Mr Huygens, the Mathematician, bore the title during the last years of his life.

(6) Balzac inscribed to him his criticism upon Heinisius's Herodes infanticida. Several Letters which he wrote to him are printed.

(7) See Mr Baillet in his Life of Des Cartes, page 542, & seq.

(8) At Amster-dam 1696.

(9) For August, 1695, Art. ix, page 542, & seq.

(10) Sorbier, Lettres & Relations, p. 143, & seq. Paris edition, 1660, in 8vo.

(11) Sorbier says he was but 24. He is mistaken.

A N

Historical Discourse

On the LIFE of

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS,

KING OF SWEDEN.

CHAP. I.

Containing his actions till the truce concluded with Poland in the year 1629, some time before he entered Germany, to make war on the Emperor Ferdinand II.

SWEDEN had been governed for almost a century, by Princes different from those who reigned in Denmark, when GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS ascended the throne. The vicinity and warlike temper of these two nations, raised so great an antipathy between them, that the one has always attempted to subdue the other. They have some times succeeded in these attempts, and Sweden and Denmark have reigned over each other by turns. Near the close of the XVth century, it was the turn of Denmark to reign over Sweden: for CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN I, King of Denmark, who died in the year 1482, was likewise King of Sweden, and left a son, named JOHN II, who for some time enjoyed both these kingdoms. He was expelled by the Swedes; and this made CHRISTIAN II, his son, more desirous to re-unite these two kingdoms in himself. He at first succeeded in his enterprise; for notwithstanding the valour and resistance of the Swedes, he laid siege to Stockholm, and obliged them to acknowledge him as their King. But he did not long enjoy either this new kingdom, or that which he possessed already. His cruelties rendered him so odious, that, upon his return from Sweden, the Danes took from him the crown of Denmark, and gave it to his uncle FREDERIC, Duke of Holstein, who having defeated CHRISTIAN, confined him in a castle, during the rest of his life.

This change gave the Swedes an opportunity of shaking off the Danish yoke. Fortune was so favourable to the courage of a Prince of the house of VASA, called GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, (that is the son of ERIC) descended from the antient Kings of the Goths, and from CHARLES CANUTE, who had sixty years before been King of Sweden, that he drove the Danes out of all their garrison-towns, and was afterwards proclaimed King of Sweden, amidst the joyful acclamations of all the people. From him descended the famous GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, who is the subject of this discourse.

This great revolution, by which in the same year Sweden and Denmark had each a new King, was not like to stifle the antient quarrels between these two kingdoms. One might have thought that FREDERIC, the better to justify the choice which had been

ANNO 1523.

1523.

1523.

made of him, would have laboured to recover to the Danes the superiority which they had lost; and that GUSTAVUS, for a like reason, would have used all his efforts to secure the advantage, which he had gained from the Danes: but the contrary happened: each of the new Kings only endeavoured to establish himself in the throne which he had obtained by the voice of his subjects, and believing that the friendship of each other was necessary for that purpose, they contracted together a very strict alliance, which doubtless greatly contributed to introduce the Lutheran religion into these two Northern kingdoms: for as Princes are usually disposed, they rarely embrace the same novelties, when they hate one another, and the attachment of their enemies to a new religion, is to them a strong argument of the falshood of it.

I should depart from my subject, was I to explain how ERIC, the eldest son of GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, was deprived of his crown by JOHN, his brother, Duke of Finland, and husband to the Princess CATHARINE, sister of SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS King of Poland; and how afterwards CHARLES, Duke of Sudermania, another son of King GUSTAVUS ERIC-SON, was made King of Sweden, in prejudice to Prince SIGISMUND, the eldest son of King JOHN, his brother. I shall only observe that this exclusion of SIGISMUND, sowed great discord between the Poles and the Swedes, because SIGISMUND having been elected King of Poland during his father's life, and not having been able to prevent his uncle CHARLES, Duke of Sudermania, from being declared King of Sweden by the States of the kingdom, he employed the forces of Poland, to take satisfaction for the injury he believed the Swedes had done him, and transmitted to his posterity the care of making good his pretensions. But notwithstanding this, as the reign of SIGISMUND, and that of his son ULADISLAUS were very glorious in Poland; so CHARLES enjoyed Sweden with great reputation till his death, and left that kingdom to his son, under whom it became one of the most glorious and flourishing in Europe.

ANNO
1587.

In the year 1611, upon the death of CHARLES, was raised to the throne of Sweden this illustrious son, who has done so great honour to his nation, the famous GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, the scourge of the House of Austria, the terror of the Court of Rome, and deliverer of the Protestant religion. He was born at Stockholm on the ninth of December 1594, and his birth gave a most sensible joy to his father, and to the Princess CHRISTINA his mother, CHARLES's second wife, and daughter to a Duke of Holstein. SIGISMUND King of Poland, had in the same year been crowned King of Sweden, and returning to Poland, had left the regency of Sweden to CHARLES his uncle. In the year 1600 this regency was changed into a true and full royalty, by the States of the Realm, and in an authentic manner, such as removes every just charge of usurpation from the memory of that Prince. Otherwise, we must say that SIGISMUND ought to have laid no claim to the crown of Sweden, since he was the son of a Prince, who only ascended the throne upon the exclusion given by the States to him who filled it. But tho' the royal name, and the royal authority had been conferred on CHARLES in the year 1600, he was crowned only in 1607, three years after the same States of the kingdom had settled on his family the succession to the crown of Sweden by way of election, without excluding the daughters, if the male issue should fail.

1596.

We may easily imagine that Poland did not lie quiet, and that CHARLES put himself in a condition to make head against the Poles. He immediately passed into Livonia, chusing rather to carry the war out of his kingdom, than to wait for the enemy in his own dominions. He knew besides that the places belonging to Sweden in that country, lay the most exposed to the attacks of the enemy. Thus Livonia became the theatre of the war which arose between Sweden and Poland.

1600.

The first campaign was very prosperous to the King of Sweden, the greatest part of Livonia having then been reduced. But the two following years, the Poles in their turn gained very considerable advantages over him, by the valour of JOHN ZAMOISKI, one of their most famous generals. Afterwards both sides had their share of success, and tasted a little of good, and of bad fortune.

It having been reported in the year 1609, that SIGISMUND had attacked Muscovy, in order to get himself declared Great Duke; CHARLES, thought himself obliged to traverse that design, the success of which could not but prove fatal to him. The affairs of Muscovy were then in a bad situation, by reason of the frequent seditions, which in a very short time had cut off three or four of their Emperors.

(1) He was crowned on the first of June, 1606.

BASIL ZUSKI (1) who reigned at that time, ascended the throne, by putting to death DEMETRIUS, who had got possession of it, by making the people falsely believe that he was the son of the Great Duke JOHN BASIL, the second of that name, who died in the year 1584. Under cover of this imposture, he had formed a great party; and by the powerful succours he received from the Poles, had caused the Great Duke FOEDOR-BORIS-LOWIZ to be strangled. This FOEDOR-BORIS-LOWIZ had succeeded his father BORIS-GUDENOW, who died two months before (2) of the uncauseness that was given him by the warlike preparations of the pretended DEMETRIUS. No man was better acquainted with the imposture of this DEMETRIUS than BORIS-GUDENOW; for he knew very well that he had rid himself of the true DEMETRIUS, the brother of the Great Duke THEODORE, as well as of THEODORE himself, whom he had had poisoned in the year 1597. The good fortune which DEMETRIUS had to become Emperor, made a greater impression on some turbulent spirits, than the violent death which precipitated him from the throne: for BASIL ZUSKI, who upon his death was become Great Duke, in a short time found he had to contend with two false DEMETRIUS's, who raised great disorders in Muscovy. Such was the state of affairs in that country, when the King of Poland carried the war into it. There was a great probability that he would oblige the Muscovites to choose him their Emperor, and even that this new dignity would enable him to subdue the Swedes, whom he only considered as his rebellious subjects. All the maxims of policy determined CHARLES to give his assistance to the Great Duke, who strongly importuned him for it.

(2) Boris-Gudenow died on the third of April, 1605.

The affair having been proposed to the States-General of the kingdom, they resolved to make a treaty of alliance with the Great Duke; whereupon King CHARLES sent him some good troops under the conduct of Count JAMES LA GARDIE: these troops did the Czar great service, and signalized themselves on many occasions. But the restless, wild, and odd, humour of the Muscovites furnished the factious with too many means of supporting themselves; besides the Swedish troops having mutinied, because they did not receive the pay which the Czar owed them, that unfortunate Emperor, destitute of every resource, was dethroned, and confined in a monastery. Upon this SIGISMUND conceived greater hopes either for himself, or for his son ULADISLAUS. There was indeed much talk of choosing his son Emperor of Muscovy. Some people also cast their eye on Prince CHARLES PHILIP, the King of Sweden's second son, and this was much talked of, even after the death of that King: yet neither was elected. The Muscovites preferred a sovereign born in their own country, and elected MICHAEL FEDEROWITS, a relation (3) of JOHN BASILIDES.

ANNO
1613.

During these last disorders in Muscovy, CHARLES was involved in a new war. CHRISTIAN IV, King of Denmark, being unwilling to lose so favourable an opportunity, as the King of Sweden presented to him, by engaging in the war with Muscovy and Poland, resolved to break with him. He found out several pretences, and several subjects of complaint, he wrote letters, he insisted much on his patience, and proposed ways of accommodation, as they always do, who are fully determined to come to a rupture. In a word, he made use of all the formalities which are commonly employed either to hide from the public the injustice of the aggressor, or to retard the preparations of the enemy, and by which none but very simple people are ensnared. At last, after having used all those little formalities, he wrote to King CHARLES, that he declared war against him, and at the same time set out in order to besiege at once both Calmar and Elfsburg.

(3) Michael Federowits was the son of Theodore Kikiuits, Patriarch of Moscow, and of Mary daughter of John Basilides, and sister to the true Demetrius.

This was the first war in which GUSTAVUS served, being only sixteen or seventeen years of age. Something had been always observed in him, which promised that one day he would be a great man; and the King, his father, who had perceived this better than any other person, relying upon it, had taken an extreme care of his education, and neglected nothing that might render him an accomplished Prince, both in the qualities of his body and mind. Finding himself obliged to repel the Danes, who besieged two of his towns at the same time, he carried his son with him to the army, and sent him towards Christianopol, a place which belonged to the Danes, hoping to give their forces a diversion, by threatening one of their towns. The success was greater than had been expected; for though there was a strong garrison in Christianopol, yet the Swedes seized it at the first onset, after having blown up the gates by petards. The garrison not having had time to capitulate, was put to the sword, and the city was set on fire.

GUSTAVUS transported by the ardour of his courage, ran a great hazard in this expedition; for having exposed himself too far, he was forced to escape the danger he was in, by pushing his horse into a water half frozen, where he had perished, if PETER BANNIER, knight of the order, and Senator of the kingdom, had not come to his assistance.

The taking and sacking of Christianopol, and some other attempts which were made on the Danes, did not hinder them, after they had made themselves masters of the town of Calmar, from taking likewise the Citadel. It is true that this was not so much owing to their valour, or to any neglect in CHARLES to relieve the Citadel, as it was to the treachery of the officer who commanded in it. The surrender of that place was soon followed by the invasion of the island of Oeland, and by the taking of the castle of Borkholm.

These disgraces so much incensed the King of Sweden, that not having been able to take satisfaction of the enemy, in some battles which he hazarded, he proposed to the King of Denmark that they should terminate their quarrel by a Duel. CHRISTIAN ridiculed this proposal, and answered that such a combat was rather the affair of an adventurer, than of a Prince. Nay he rallied him on the infirmities of his old-age, as if there was but little glory to be won, by gaining an advantage over a man in his years, or as if it was an unfair dealing to place the lives of a young and of an old King in balance, when the course of nature alone would soon put an end to that of the latter. A little after, he attacked the King of Sweden in his camp, and killed more of King CHARLES's soldiers, than he lost of his own.

V.O.L. V.

8 C

We

We may easily imagine that all this grievously vexed the King of Sweden, who had never wanted vigour nor courage, and had acquired great glory on many occasions. He thought of the means of revenge, and met with some: but doubtless the most pleasing was that which GUSTAVUS procured him, by retaking the island of Oeland and the castle of Borkholm, shewing that his very first attempts were masterly strokes.

How unwelcome and afflicting must death be to the father of such a son, from whom he might daily expect so many grounds of comfort? yet he must resolve to die near the end of the same campaign: for on the thirtieth of October 1611, CHARLES IX, King of Sweden, died after a few days illness. Four days before his death he had been informed that Count LA GARDIE had retaken several places from the rebellious Muscovites, and that the inhabitants of Novogrod whom he had subdued, had given him their promise to elect CHARLES PHILIP to the crown of Muscovy: but he seemed to take little concern in all this. He shewed that from thenceforth his only care was to prepare for death, and that he left all the affairs of this world to his son GUSTAVUS. He died very piously in the sixty-first year of his age, much regretted by his subjects, who considered him as the preserver of the Protestant religion, which the artifices of the Jesuits, backed by the credit of SIGISMUND, had infallibly banished out of Sweden, if CHARLES had not prevented it.

The loss of so great a Prince would have occasioned a longer and more sensible grief to the whole kingdom, had it not been for the great qualities of the young GUSTAVUS, who succeeded. I have already said that his father had conceived the greatest hopes of a son who had such natural endowments, and so careful an education. He had often expressed to his court the good opinion he had of his dear GUSTAVUS; for speaking of various things which he had wished for the grandeur and glory of the nation, but such as he did not hope to accomplish, he used to say to those who were present, this lad will do it, laying his hand on the head of his son. And as this kind of discourse never fails to pass from the court to the city, and to run from mouth to mouth, throughout the whole kingdom, all Sweden knew the esteem which King CHARLES had for his successor, and had conceived very great hopes of him, as well as CHARLES. How great a burthen is this on a Prince! For, on one hand, nothing is more difficult for him than to answer the high ideas which a whole people have preconceived of him; and, on the other, nothing is more blasting to his reputation, than not to answer them. We shall see hereafter that GUSTAVUS surpassed all that had been expected of him.

As a long interregnum could not but be prejudicial to the Swedes, in the situation of the general affairs of the kingdom at that time, being at war with Poland, Denmark, and Muscovy; the States of Sweden, without loss of time, assembled at Nicoping, in the month of December which followed the death of the King, and, by the general voice of all the deputies, elected to the crown GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, his son. This Prince being only seventeen years of age, made a speech which charmed the whole assembly, so full was it of greatness of mind, and of modesty together. He said, 'That considering his youth, and the difficulty of the affairs of the kingdom, he would rather have chosen not to take so heavy a burthen upon him; but that the States having thought it proper he should, he would undertake that charge in the name of the most holy Trinity, and apply all his care, and all his forces to maintain all the orders of the state in the true religion and in all their privileges.'

In the beginning of his reign, he applied himself wholly to the war against the Danes, because that was the most pressing evil, as it threatened the heart and center of the kingdom. He therefore took the field as soon as the season permitted, being resolved to recover Calmar, and drive the enemy from the frontiers: but before he set out, he disposed of the principal offices of the crown, and filled them with persons of a distinguished merit, especially the office of Great Chancellor of the kingdom, which he bestowed on the famous AXEL OXENSTIERN, one of the ablest men that ever appeared in Europe.

A King who had no other endowments but the courage of GUSTAVUS, would not have failed to open the campaign with the siege of Calmar; but as for him who notwithstanding his fire, and the impetuosity with which his youth inspired him, was not incapable of entering into himself, and deliberately consulting the maxims of prudence, he considered that the Danes had so strongly fortified that place, that it was more proper to think of recovering it by gaining equivalent advantages, than by attacking it with main force. Therefore he did not lay siege to Calmar, but was only intent on giving the enemy a diversion: and for this end the King himself entered Schonen as far as was possible, and having ravaged it, he returned to his camp, after having had a sharp encounter with the enemy in his retreat.

But whatever pains GUSTAVUS took either to vanquish the Danes, or at least to defeat their enterprises, he had but little success. CHRISTIAN IV King of Denmark, was a courageous Prince, skilled in the art of war, and had more troops than his enemy. He therefore took some towns from the Swedes, and put to sea a fleet which alarmed the city of Stockholm, and to say the truth, the advantage of that war was on his side. For though by the treaty of peace concluded in the beginning of the year 1613, he restored

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

restored to the Swedes all the places he had taken from them, yet they were obliged to pay him great sums of money for his reimbursement, and to make him several concessions. From hence, to observe it by the way, we may learn that it is not always sure to judge of the reign of a Prince by the first years of it, for here is one of the most glorious reigns that ever was, the beginnings of which were attended with a kind of disgrace. Here you see the great GUSTAVUS, who being involved in a war in the beginning of his reign, only comes out of it by dearly purchasing peace, at the mediation of the King of England.

His honour did not suffer by it; for there are a great many occasions, when Princes have the disadvantage without deserving to be blamed. If we would justly blame an unsuccessful Prince, it is not enough for us to say that he was unsuccessful, we must add that he had but very small obstacles to encounter; and this could not be alleged against the King of Sweden. Moreover the maxims of policy determined him to make peace with the King of Denmark, for besides the disposition of the King of Poland; always to create troubles to the Swedes, he likewise saw the Muscovites at variance with Sweden. King CHARLES, earnestly solicited by the Great Duke to assist him against the enterprizes of SIGISMUND, and sufficiently induced to it by his own interest, had sent some good troops into Muscovy, as I have said already. These troops greatly conduced to keep affairs in balance; and if they did not obtain, as the Swedes had been made to hope, that GUSTAVUS's brother should be chosen Great Duke in the room of BASIL ZUSKI, who was confined in a monastery, the Poles on their side could neither obtain the election of SIGISMUND, nor that of ULADISLAUS. The Muscovites chose an Emperor from among their own Princes, and at least they ought to own that the assistance of Sweden had been useful to them, in procuring the liberty of that election. But no sooner was the new Czar installed, than he declared war against Sweden.

GUSTAVUS, to convince him that he had judged wrong, if he had founded his hopes on the youth of the King of Sweden, resolved to invade Muscovy in the year 1615. Accordingly he entered that country, immediately seized on some towns, beat the Muscovites who durst keep the field in his presence, and laid siege to Pleskow, a rich town, and one of the principal keys of Muscovy. He opened the trenches with great vigour, and his batteries had already made a considerable breach in the walls of the town, when at the pressing solicitations of the King of Great Britain, the greatest peace-maker of the world, he raised the siege. The rigour of the season, which was already far advanced, had not been able to make him take that resolution; but the intreaties of King JAMES joining with this consideration, GUSTAVUS raised the siege with a good grace, shewing, in opposition to the notions entertained by some people, that the greatest generals, and those who are appointed by Heaven to perform the greatest exploits, do not take all the towns which they attack.

It must be added in his vindication, that he entered Muscovy, not with the design of making conquests there, but only to oblige the Czar to make a peace. Had he aimed at conquest, he would not have cast his eye on that quarter; he would have been contented to have nothing to fear from it. Thus the Ambassador of Great Britain, having assured him that the Great Duke desired a peace, but that out of haughtiness he would not enter upon a negotiation, while he saw his towns besieged, GUSTAVUS abandoned the siege of Pleskow, and wrote a handsome letter to King JAMES, wherein he did not fail to make him sensible of the sacrifice which, in his consideration, he had made to the work of peace, by raising the siege of a very considerable town, the taking of which appeared to him infallible. He then returned to Sweden, and held the State of Finland and Nordland, which he had summoned to meet on the nineteenth of January 1616.

As he was not a Prince who only sought to be admired by his subjects for his valour he made in the assembly a very eloquent speech, and such as was very proper to persuade the people that he chiefly desired to be loved by them, as a Prince incapable of sacrificing their wealth and repose to his own glory. This was wisely considered by GUSTAVUS: for we need not question but there were ill designing persons in the kingdom, who tacitly accused him of too great ambition, and said that he had more regard for his own glory, than for the repose of his subjects, when he engaged in the war with Muscovy. This was not only said, but was also written in certain libels which SIGISMUND, King of Poland, spread about in the kingdom, to sow discord among the Swedes. In order to dissipate these suspicions, GUSTAVUS shewed in his speech what conduct the Muscovites had held with regard to Sweden, and from thence drew several reasons to shew that they ought indispensibly to undertake and pursue the war against them. He did not forget to warn his subjects against the artifices of SIGISMUND, and after having given a particular account of what had passed in Muscovy he concluded with a protestation that all his designs were only directed to obtain a good peace, and to secure the public tranquillity. This speech produced the most desirable effect for the King of Sweden, and procured him what he had thought the most difficult to obtain; for the States consented to raise the supplies which were necessary for carrying on the war. It would not be a hard matter to make subjects approve of conquest and battles, provided they cost them no money. The difficulty lies in persuading them that it is often the part of policy and oeconomy to expend a great deal of money for that purpose, which indeed is very true.

and

It appeared that GUSTAVUS had spoken sincerely; for in the year 1617, a peace was actually concluded with the Emperor of Muscovy, by the mediation of England and Holland, and would have been concluded sooner, had it not been obstructed by the long preliminaries which were necessary in order to examine the full powers of the Ambassadors, and to agree on titles and dignities, which it is not an easy matter to regulate with the Ambassadors of the Great Duke; and generally the most important part of their embassy is over, when the affair of precedence and titles is terminated. By this peace the whole province of Ingria, which is very considerable, was yielded to Sweden.

After this peace, King GUSTAVUS made several establishments in domestic affairs, for the interior felicity of the kingdom: this is never more necessary than in the reign of a conquering Prince, because it generally happens that a kingdom which acquires great glory abroad, is exhausted and miserable at home. He made useful regulations for the holding of the States, established a council for maritime affairs, a Chancery, a court of Exchequer, and besides, a chamber of Commerce, with several good statutes concerning Merchants, whether Swedes, or foreigners.

But as it was not enough to provide for domestic affairs only, GUSTAVUS did not forget what kind of a man his cousin the King of Poland was. He did not forget that SIGISMUND was a Prince who left nothing unattempted to recover the crown of Sweden, and had his emissaries in that kingdom, who dispersed libels against the present government, and endeavoured to seduce as many people as they could from their allegiance to GUSTAVUS. To prevent the effect of these secret practices, in the year 1614, an edict of the King had been published in the general assembly of the States of the kingdom, prohibiting all his subjects from studying in the universities of Roman Catholics, and from travelling to the court of the King of Poland, or having any correspondence with his courtiers or officers. SIGISMUND was not contented to seduce the Swedes by libels, but went so far as to spread about manifestos in Sweden, wherein he exhorted them take up arms against their King.

GUSTAVUS found no better means of guarding against these indirect hostilities, than to attack Poland with open force. He had capacity enough to defend himself against his enemy by the weapons of the cabinet; but besides, that these are not much in use among the northern nations, he had too great a soul to submit to these artifices; and, to say the truth, the match had been too unequal in that respect, between a Lutheran Prince, and a Prince assisted by the counsels of the court of Rome, who had at his service as many Monks and Jesuits as he pleased. GUSTAVUS therefore very wisely resolved to repel SIGISMUND's intrigues by arms, and he had no difficulty to obtain the consent of the States to the war with Poland.

After such a resolution had been taken, the important affair was to prevent his enemy. For this purpose, the King of Sweden, without loss of time, sent troops into Livonia, with a fleet of eighteen men of war, and seized Dunamond, a place which checks the town of Riga, at the mouth of the river Dwina, and defends the harbour. To this conquest he soon after added that of Pernaw and Windaw; and he might easily have carried his conquests farther, because the King of Poland was at that time greatly pressed by the Turks and Tartars: but he sacrificed all these advantages to generosity, and granted a truce for two years, which his enemy demanded of him. An example of moderation which the Swedes would have set off with many pompous panegyrics, had they been acquainted with the modern Rhetoric.

The moderation of GUSTAVUS did not make him forget what he owed to the tranquillity of his dominions, and he would not gain any praise by this virtue, at the expence of his other qualities. When therefore he granted to SIGISMUND a truce, which gave him leisure to defend himself against the Infidels, GUSTAVUS thought himself obliged to join this condition with it, that during these two years they should endeavour to put an amicable end to all the differences subsisting between Sweden and Poland. This was reasonable, for it was not to be expected that GUSTAVUS should renounce the advantages he possessed, without taking precautions against future evil; besides, he granted as long a truce as could be desired for the discussion of the differences between him and SIGISMUND. Two years would not perhaps have sufficed for that discussion in the Diet of Ratisbon, but they ought to suffice to the Poles; so that GUSTAVUS, besides the moderation of taking no advantage of the incursions which the Turks and Tartars made on his enemy's frontiers, had likewise the generosity not to prescribe him too short a time for the pacification of their differences. But as he was well persuaded that SIGISMUND had only demanded the truce, that he might have leisure to gather new strength, and more forces, he took, with his Council and the States of the kingdom, all the necessary measures to prevent being surprized by that dangerous neighbour, and to begin the war as soon as the truce should be expired.

If

If GUSTAVUS had valued himself on craftiness, he would have concealed his design, and given several plausible reasons for all these warlike preparations; but his great courage would not suffer him to dissemble. On the contrary, he ordered Count JAMES LA GARDIE, Governor of Estonia, and Great Marshal of the kingdom, to write to the Governor of Livonia for the King of Poland, that he would not be kept eternally in suspense between peace and war, and was therefore resolved, as soon as the two years of the truce were expired, either to conclude with the King of Poland a perpetual and irrevocable peace, or at least a truce for many years, or to attack him with all his might. Certainly this is a sincerity which is no longer in practice; where are the Princes who give their enemies notice so long beforehand that they intend to declare war on them at a certain time? How many Princes do we see who attack their enemies while they are protesting that they have no design to break the peace? They who on one hand will applaud the great candour of GUSTAVUS, will not blame him on the other for any want of prudence, when they know what great preparations he made for the war with Poland, for which he was willing that SIGISMUND should also be prepared, since he gave him notice of his design. These preparations were such as manifested that GUSTAVUS was as great in prudence as courage. He gave full satisfaction to Christian IV, King of Denmark, upon some grievances which he complained of, and had a personal interview with him on the borders of the two kingdoms, in order to confirm the friendship and good understanding which subsisted between them, and that he might have nothing to fear from Denmark, while he should make war in Poland.

As GUSTAVUS well knew the importance of naval forces in a war, he took particular care to equip a good fleet, and with so great success, that he rendered it the principal hope and firmest support of the State. He caused a great number of cannons to be cast, and all sorts of small arms and warlike machines to be forged. He levied many troops, and ordered some officers, well skilled in military discipline, to make them perform their exercises regularly, to make them encamp, and in general to keep them enured to all the military functions. He was frequently present at all these exercises, and established good order every where, to which his presence contributed as much as his capacity.

Before he came to a rupture with Poland, he married the Princess ELEONORA, daughter of JOHN SIGISMUND, Elector of Brandenburg, and after the nuptials were over, he summoned the States of the kingdom, who took the necessary resolutions for the charges of the war. They likewise appointed public prayers and rejoicings in memory of the Reformation, which had been introduced into the kingdom an hundred years before; so that this became a secular solemnity.

ANNO
1620.

The truce being expired without the King of Poland's accepting the condition which had been proposed to him, or shewing any inclination to a decisive treaty of peace, GUSTAVUS began the war by making an irruption into Livonia. He sent no Herald of Arms to SIGISMUND to declare war against him in form, because he had plainly and publicly signified to him, that the very moment the truce should be expired, he would attack him, if no treaty was then concluded. The Poles complained of having been attacked without any previous declaration of war, but this complaint was entirely groundless, since they had been threatened with a war two years before.

1621.

The first attempt which GUSTAVUS made was the siege of Riga, the strongest and most important town in all that country. Such a conduct is not always attended with success, and there seems to be some temerity in attacking the chief places at first; because, if the attempt miscarries, the General suffers in his reputation, or discourages his soldiers, whilst he raises the courage of the enemy; whereas if he fixes on a less difficult siege, he may depend on succeeding, or gaining all the favourable opinions and prejudices that accompany happy beginnings. But, on the other hand, if he takes the capital, he makes all the rest of the province tremble of course, and it is usually by these decisive strokes that great things are brought about in a little time. GUSTAVUS having maturely weighed all the reasons on both sides, determined to open the campaign with the siege of Riga, the capital city of Livonia.

Riga is a large town, fortified with good bastions and fraized half-moons, and has a large trade by reason of its situation, being only two leagues distant from the sea, where the river Dwina, which runs through it, opens so commodious a harbour, that vessels of all kinds pass and repass within its enclosure. In the year 1181, it surrendered to STEPHEN BATTERY, King of Poland, having been formerly subject to the temporal jurisdiction of its own Archbishop. Livonia had already been almost wholly subdued by King SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS, the last of the JAGELLONS, who had overcome GOTHARD KETTLER, Great-Master of the Teutonic order in Livonia, and had obliged the Livonians to take an oath of allegiance to him, and acknowledge themselves subjects of the crown of Poland. This SIGISMUND AUGUSTUS likewise forced the Great-Master to consent to the suppression of his order, and to yield all his rights on Livonia to Poland. In consideration of this, in the year 1561, he was invested for himself and his descendants with the duchy of Courland and Semigalia. It was an easy matter to subdue Livonia; for the Great-Master, the knights of his order, and most of the ecclesiastics, having embraced the Lutheran religion, met with

V O L. V.

8 D

nothing

nothing but rebellion and disobedience among their subjects; which formed several parties in that province. WILLIAM OF BRANDENBURG, brother of ALBERT, Duke of Prussia, nephew of the King of Poland, and Archbishop of Riga, having died a Protestant much about the same time that the Great-Master KETTLER made his treaty with SIGISMUND, Riga was erected into a Republic, and SIGISMUND seized on the rest of the diocese: but it afterwards surrendered to Poland, in the reign of King STEPHEN BATTORY, that it might enjoy the same privileges with Dantzic, and secure to itself a powerful protection. This is a short account of the revolution which brought the town of Riga under the Poles, who possessed that place when GUSTAVUS laid siege to it in the year 1621.

His fleet met with such a violent storm near the mouth of the Dwina, that a timorous and superstitious man would have imagined that Heaven warned him not to continue in his enterprize. But GUSTAVUS, without being astonished at this unhappy beginning, in which some of his ships were lost, and others were dispersed, continued firm in his first resolution, so that having brought together his fleet, and landed his army, which consisted of about twenty or twenty-five thousand men, he encamped before the city of Riga. The principal officers who served under him were Prince CHARLES PHILIP, his brother; Count JAMES LA GARDIE, Great Marshal of the kingdom; HERMAN WRANGEL, Field-Marshal; GUSTAVUS HORN, JOHN BANNIER, MANSFELD, ROSENCRANTS, OXENSTIERN, illustrious names in the History of that age, and two brave Scottish Colonels, SEATON and RUTHWEN. The quarters having been marked out, and occupied by the troops that were to be posted there, they immediately began to throw up the lines of circumvallation; and in the mean time, the Admiral CHARLES GYLDENTRILHM, and CLAUDIUS FLEMING who commanded the fleet under him, had orders to keep at sea at the mouth of the river, to prevent any succours of men or warlike stores from entering the town.

The inhabitants made the greater preparations for a defence, as they judged by the manner in which GUSTAVUS went about the siege, that he was resolved not to leave the place till he should make himself master of it. The citadel was sufficiently provided with a garrison, arms, and provision. The town indeed had only three hundred soldiers to defend it; but the citizens, jealous of their liberty, and well disciplined, supplied that deficiency. We may judge of the resistance they made by the length of the siege, by the capacity and intrepid activity of GUSTAVUS; and we may form a pretty great idea of the difficulties he met with to reduce the besieged, if I only say that they did not surrender to GUSTAVUS, till after a siege of six weeks. I shall not enter into the particulars of all the assaults, and all the sallies; these details, which do well in a journal, and would not be disagreeable if I was speaking of the last siege of Vienna, would strangely tire the reader, when they concern a town which was attacked in the year 1621. I shall content myself with saying that the batteries of the Swedes overturned several steeples, and several public buildings, and made several breaches in the bastions, and in the walls, that the Swedes spared neither grenado's, nor bombs, nor mines, nor countermines, nor any of the things which the reader well enough imagines of himself, when he knows that a town has been well attacked, and well defended.

The intrepidity and activity of GUSTAVUS were conspicuous every where, nay, sometimes appeared a little too much; for it is said that he did not always remember he was a King, so much did he expose himself to danger, like the meanest soldier of fortune. He was far from the circumspection of those Princes, who always keep without the reach of cannon-shot; for at the first approaches, GUSTAVUS observing from an eminence what places were the most proper for the different quarters of the army, a cannon-bullet struck the very place from whence he had just removed. Another time some people were killed with a cannon-shot so near him, that his cloaths were stained with their blood; and a third time, a bullet pierced into his tent, and made a kind of circular motion, as if it was to seek the head of the King, as they say who find wonders in every thing. In short, GUSTAVUS was very near disproving the observation of Charles V, who said one day to one of his Generals, who exhorted him not to hazard himself so much, that there never was a King killed by a cannon-shot.

If upon this any one should imagine that GUSTAVUS had been sorry to take the town without resistance, he would certainly be mistaken: for by his letters he frequently exhorted the Senators and citizens to surrender voluntarily, and not to wait for the sad extremities which they might apprehend. He endeavoured to intimidate them. He promised to grant them an advantageous capitulation, and surely was not well pleased that they paid no regard to his summons. I am willing to believe that this conduct proceeded, in some measure, from his finding himself obliged to lay waste a fine city, by his cannons and bombs, and to destroy many people: yet we must not doubt but that he had a more prevailing motive to it; and that was the saving of his time and preparations, which he might have employed to better purpose, had he soon been master of the town and citadel of Riga. Generals are glad to persuade the towns they besiege, that their only motive in exhorting them to a timely surrender is their good-will good-will towards the besieged: but for the most part clemency is not the motive to these exhortations, and the besieged likewise do not believe it.

Though the King of Poland was then still at war with the Ottoman Porte, yet he sent some troops to the relief of Riga, under the conduct of Prince CHRISTOPHER RADZWIL. They approached the lines, but finding from some slight skirmishes that nothing could be done, they quickly retired. The inhabitants were made to hope they should soon be relieved, and this rendered them more obstinate in rejecting any capitulation.

At last GUSTAVUS vexed to be so long in taking a town, resolved to spring the mines which were ready under the walls, at the same time to make a general assault, to expose the town to pillage, and afterwards raze it to the foundation. But the Prince, his brother, and the other great lords of the kingdom interceding for that town, obtained of the King that the inhabitants should have notice of the destruction which threatened them, and that six hours should be granted them to come to their final resolution. The magistrates and inhabitants having maturely considered the condition they were in, resolved at last to surrender; and thus they saved themselves from a terrible destruction which hung over their heads.

The King used them with a singular clemency, though their obstinacy had greatly provoked him, and promised not only to allow them the enjoyment of their liberty, but likewise to augment their privileges, provided they should prove as faithful to him, as they had been to the King of Poland. The Poles were not wanting to publish that GUSTAVUS had made himself master of the town by means of a treacherous correspondence, the faction in the city which favoured him having raised a sedition in his behalf. Thus men endeavour to comfort themselves in their disgraces, by lessening the glory of the enemy who has beat them: yet as it cannot be denied but that there is very frequently ground for attributing the taking of towns to the perfidy of their governors and inhabitants, it must likewise be owned that the vanquished on many occasions have recourse very wrongfully to that weak consolation, and would be more equitable, if they bestowed greater praise on the valour of their enemy. The taking of Riga is one of these occasions.

After this important conquest, the King secured Mittau, the residence of the Duke of Courland; soon after he re-established him in it on certain conditions, having concluded a truce for one year with the King of Poland. The city of Riga appeared by its deputies in the States-General of Sweden, summoned to meet at Stockholm the following year, and there took an oath of loyalty and allegiance to GUSTAVUS.

The truce seemed only to have been agreed upon, that both sides might have time to make great armaments. It appeared by the steps which SIGISMUND took, that he was resolved to make great efforts to invade Sweden. In effect, his preparations in Prussia were made with this view. To prevent this irruption, GUSTAVUS discussing some differences he had with the King of Denmark, concerning the duties on the importation and exportation of merchandizes, demanded of him not to suffer SIGISMUND to levy men in Denmark, nor his ships to pass the Streight. Not content with this, GUSTAVUS obtained an order in the States of the kingdom, that the war should be transported into Prussia, the better to secure to the Swedes their commerce in the Baltic; and because the duties laid in the year 1620, on cattle and sown lands were not a sufficient fund for the charges of the war, it was moved in the assembly of the said States that a new duty, till then unknown in Sweden, should be laid on all provisions consumed in the kingdom; and though this motion at first startled most of the members, yet they agreed to it. It appeared that this kind of impost would be less burthen-some to the inhabitants, and would produce a greater revenue, because no person of whatever quality or condition would be exempt from it; and the more easily to obtain the consent of all the orders, a promise was made that as soon as this new duty should be laid, the other extraordinary duties should either be taken off, or lessened. These promises are very often made, but very rarely kept.

Besides, the King by a solemn edict took under his protection all those who should be appointed to collect this duty, for it was easily foreseen that they would be exposed to the fury of the populace, or would at least bring upon themselves a volley of imprecations and abuse. In this edict it was declared that all who should use these persons ill, either in deed or in word, should be punished with death, as disturbers of the public peace, and violators of the royal edicts; and because it is very often useful to the Prince, (that he may be supplied with money all at once) to farm out his taxes, and it is to be feared that the Farmers and Underfarmers should stir up tumults among the people, the King made another edict in which he precisely determined what the Farmer could exact without fraud, and when, and in what manner he could exact it of every person.

I observe all these things the better to shew the capacity and prudence of GUSTAVUS; for it appears that he well knew what he had to fear from the people, and what was fit to be done in order to bring them into his measures, and to prevent the greatest inconveniences on both sides. It is in vain to murmur; a kingdom cannot possibly preserve its reputation abroad, and keep its neighbours in awe, if the sovereign has not the funds in readiness; but for this purpose must there not be duties and extractors of these these duties, under the protection of the laws? It is true if we except the first beginnings, the public peace requires much more that laws should be made against the exactor, to restrain his avarice, than laws to guard him against any insult.

In the beginning of this year, King GUSTAVUS had the affliction to lose his only brother. This loss was the more affecting, as GUSTAVUS had no children, and thus the King of Poland seemed to have better pretensions, at least for a day to come. That King was a terrible pretender, and it would be hard to find a house which has in the same time produced two Kings so warlike as GUSTAVUS and SIGISMUND, one King of Sweden, and the other of Poland, both descended from the illustrious house of VASA, and first cousins. The misfortune was that they were on bad terms together, and this proceeded from reasons of interest which rendered their differences irreconcilable. Accordingly we see that they never found the least opportunity to treat of the foundation of their differences: all they could do, was to agree on a cessation of arms. But though they agreed on a cessation, in order the better to examine the bottom of the affair, and to commence a decisive treaty of peace, they never came to that point; for the truce being expired, the business was either to prolong it still for some time, or to renew the war.

The last of these two courses was taken in year 1623. GUSTAVUS not being willing to give his enemy the advantage of making war out of his own country, embarked in a fleet of sixty-six sail which he stationed near Dantzic, and by this quick and bold expedition he not only prevented SIGISMUND from executing his design of carrying the war into Sweden, but likewise obliged him to demand the prolongation of the truce till the first of June 1625, which was granted him.

ANNO
1624.

Among the pacific actions of GUSTAVUS during this cessation of arms, Historians make a particular mention of his liberalities to the university of Upsal, to which he granted several considerable funds for perpetuity, even from his own patrimonial estate; which enabled that university to maintain a great many professors and necessitous students.

Eight years after, he founded the university of Derpt in Livonia; and this could not be forgot by Historians, who commonly, being men of letters, think it very incumbent on them to immortalize the honour which Princes do to learning by granting it their protection; and it may be said that the more a Prince performs praise-worthy actions, the more he ought to procure the favour of the learned, because it is only by the testimony of their books that posterity is acquainted with the greatest heroes. AUGUSTUS owes the greatest part of his glory to the interest he had made among the learned men of his court. Nothing therefore was more politic in GUSTAVUS than to gain by his bounties the love of a famous university.

It had been agreed upon between the Kings of Sweden and Poland, that if during the truce which was to continue till the first of June 1625, a peace was not concluded, one party could not attack the other without having declared war on him two months before that first of June. GUSTAVUS desiring to observe this condition, dispatched a courier to the King of Poland to acquaint him that he would attack him at the end of the truce. He dispatched him I say, in the time agreed upon; but the rigour of the season so much retarded his journey, that he did not finish it in two months before the truce was expired. The Poles loudly complained of this want of sincerity; the Swedes excused themselves by the badness of the roads, and complained in their turn of several things, and especially of the little inclination which the King of Poland shewed towards a peace. The Polish Ambassadors were of opinion that all manner of hostilities ought to cease, whilst the accommodation of the two crowns was negotiating; but Chancellor OXENSTIERN who was at the head of the Swedish embassy, shewed that there was some artifice in requiring such a cessation, while Sweden appeared to be in so good a condition to make great progress in the war, and represented the loss his his master would suffer, if he neglected so favourable an opportunity, and waited peaceably till his enemy's troops were reinforced. In short he required that several articles should be granted to him, before he would promise a cessation of hostilities.

The Poles giving no positive answer, but inveighing against the conduct of Sweden both in their speeches and writings, GUSTAVUS resolved to answer them with sword in hand, and as his valour and good-fortune had acquired him a great authority in his kingdom, he obtained of the states all the assistance he desired. They augmented the tax on cattle, and laid a new duty on all milled grains, a duty which the more easily passed as the common people saw that it would lie heavier on the rich than the poor. Besides all this, the States-General of the kingdom made an act for keeping a settled number of troops, and promised the King a sum of money for the maintenance of land and sea forces.

With so many good helps, GUSTAVUS, finding himself in a condition to make a powerful irruption into his enemy's dominions, set sail for Livonia, with a fleet of seventy-six ships, and in a short time drove the Poles from all the places which they still held in that province, from the important fort of Kokenhusen, from Felburg, Duneburg, Nidorp, and Derpt. He discovered the intelligence which the Poles had in the city of Riga, and totally defeated the young SAPIEHA, who with more courage than

than prudence, had dared to face GUSTAVUS. He passed the Dwina, entered Livõnia, and seized on Põswol, whither the Cossacks had retired, after having made some incursions on the Swedes, and he took the strong town of Birfen, where he found more than sixty pieces of cannon. He returned through Courland and the province of Semigalia, seized on Mittaw, Bouschia, and several other places, and did not forget in so great a train of success, to press SIGISMUND to an accommodation.

This is not surprizing. GUSTAVUS, having a very solid judgment, well knew that the proper time for a Prince to make peace is the time of his enemy's ill fortune; for if he cannot entirely ruin him, he does better to secure his conquests by a good treaty, while his enemy is weak and unfortunate, than hazard them by continuing the war, the event of which repeated experience shews to be very uncertain. Thus we see that worsted Princes generally defer an accommodation with the victor as long as they can; which succeeds sometimes well, sometimes ill, there being no fixed and certain rule of human actions.

GUSTAVUS therefore judging that he had now a favourable time of making peace, sent safe-guards to the Ambassadors of the King of Poland, by Messieurs HARWITS and HORN, and by SALVIUS, Great Sub-delegate of Chancellor OXENSTIERN in the conferences of peace. But for the very same reason that GUSTAVUS desired the renewal of the conferences, SIGISMUND desired nothing less, so that they were obliged to turn their thoughts to the war, and GUSTAVUS, no doubt, brave as he was, soon resolved upon it.

The event convinced the King of Poland that his hopes that fortune would quit GUSTAVUS, were vain. The Lithuanian troops commanded by General SAPIEHA, and reinforced with several regiments of Cossacks, Hussars, Heyducks, and Germans, thought themselves sure of the victory, if they could engage the enemy in the open field. But the Swedes defeated them in a plain of the province of Semigalia, near Wagonia, and taught them to know GUSTAVUS better. Upon this occasion GUSTAVUS shewed them that he was none of those warriors whose talent is confined to one only manner of fighting, and who being fit for taking towns, are not capable of winning a field battle, or who being able to succeed in places full of defiles and mountains, know not how to fight in a plain and open country.

On that day he performed all the duties of an able and courageous General, and gained so memorable a victory, that we may justly wonder why Historians have not more exactly preserved the memory of it. But perhaps the last campaigns of GUSTAVUS have appeared to them so glorious, that they have saved all their abilities to speak worthily of them, without much minding the rest. Count TURN who commanded the right wing, and GUSTAVUS HORN, who commanded the left, acquired great praise in that battle.

This new victory made no change either in the disposition of GUSTAVUS towards a peace, or the repugnancy of SIGISMUND to treat with a victorious enemy; so that the King of Sweden resolved to try whether by distressing him more, he could not at last oblige Poland to terminate the differences between the two kingdoms. It is not surprizing that GUSTAVUS so earnestly desired to put an end to that quarrel; for besides the reason which I have already mentioned, he loved his subjects, and was tenderly loved by them, and as he knew that SIGISMUND and his descendants would on all occasions protest against the exclusion which the States of Sweden had given them, and thus that Poland would never want a plausible pretence for making war against the Swedes, he would have been glad to extirpate the seeds of those troubles, and to give his country peace on that quarter, as well for the present, as for the time to come. For this end he desired to settle the pretensions of SIGISMUND, and to fix them in such a manner by a decisive treaty, that the succession to the crown of Sweden might certainly be known, without being continually exposed to the vicissitudes of fortune, and to the chance of a war between the two rivals.

In order to reduce the King of Poland to the necessity of entering once for all into a treaty on his pretensions, the King of Sweden thought fit to carry the war into Prussia. This is the name of a very considerable province, situated between Pomerania, the Baltic sea, Poland, Lithuania, Livonia, and Courland. It was possessed for a long time by the knights of the Teutonic order, whose valour and power appear in History with lustre. But that power fell at last by the two most general causes of the overthrow of human grandeur, namely by vanity and corruption of manners. The pride of that order having carried them so far as to aim at aggrandizing themselves at the expence of their neighbours, created them enemies, which ruined them; and the debauchery of the knights rendered them so odious both to God and man, that the Prussians were glad to get rid of such masters. Accordingly when JAGELLON, Great Duke of Lithuania, and afterwards King of Poland, whom they had dared to provoke, had chastised them in a terrible manner, though they did not amend for all that, the Prussians shook off their yoke, and submitted to CASIMIR III, King of Poland.

Yet the order was not abolished; for the Great Master LEWIS OF ERTICHAUSEN having gained a victory over CASIMIR, made an agreement with him in the year 1466, by which he yielded the western Prussia to the crown of Poland, and held the eastern

VOL. V.

8 E

Prussia

* Frederic William, Elector of Brandenburg, and first sovereign Duke of Prussia, died on the twentieth of April 1688. Therefore, as that Prince was living when Mr Bayle composed his Historical Dictionary on the Life of Gustavus Adolphus, he must have written it before the year 1688.

Prussia in loyalty and homage to the said crown. After this manner the eastern Prussia became a fief of the crown of Poland, but because the Great Master ALBERT OF BRANDENBURG refused to pay the homage which he owed to King SIGISMUND, his uncle, the order was suppressed and converted into an hereditary duchy, dependent on the crown of Poland, with which Albert of Brandenburg was invested in the year 1525. This is now called Ducal Prussia, to distinguish it from Royal Prussia which belongs to Poland since the year 1466. The former belongs to the Electors of Brandenburg since the year 1611. But the Elector FREDERIC WILLIAM *, full of life and of glory even to this day, has enjoyed the sovereignty of it ever since the year 1657. I thought this little Historical digression would not be disagreeable to the reader.

From what I have just said it appears, that when the King of Sweden went into Prussia, it belonged partly to Poland, and partly to the Elector of Brandenburg. GUSTAVUS offered the latter a neutrality, and was glad that he accepted it; but for the greater precaution he demanded of him the port of Pillaw, as a pledge of his promise, and it was granted him. This port was very serviceable to GUSTAVUS for exacting great contributions from the Dantzickers. Soon after he made himself master of Frawemberg and Braunsberg, from whence he expelled the Jesuits, and sent their library to the university of Upsal; but it was not a compensation to the Protestants for the library of the Elector Palatine, which had been sent to Rome some years before; for there was no comparison between these two libraries.

I know not whether the Jesuits whom GUSTAVUS had expelled from Riga in the year 1621, were sorry to be treated in that manner by a Protestant Prince. As they are neither said to be very humble, nor very disinterested, it is probable they were not much grieved to be used with that distinction, and to have so fine a pretence of glorying that it is to them chiefly the Heretics bear an ill will. It is certain they turn every thing to their own advantage, and so magnify their losses, representing themselves to the world as the sole victims sacrificed to the fury of sectaries, that they get more wealth than they have lost. But it is equally certain that GUSTAVUS did not expel them through a spirit of persecution; he expelled them, because he had been informed that they meddled in too many affairs, and in a conquered town were obnoxious to a Prince whom they deemed an Heretic. They are therefore in the wrong to glory so much that the Protestants hate them more than the rest of their communion. The most intelligent persons of their church have been sensible that the true cause of the aversion which the Protestants bear them, is not a matter which they have reason to boast of. But let us return to GUSTAVUS.

He was already one of those warriors whose name alone strikes the enemy with terror, and prevents strong towns from preparing for a defence. Accordingly the report of his arrival having been spread throughout all Polish Prussia, in a very short time Varmia, Ravensburg, Elbing, Marienburg, Stum, Christburg, Brodnitz, Wormitz, and the two isles lying above Dantzic, between the branches of the Vistula and the Nagpht, all fell into his hands. I am willing to believe that the absence of SIGISMUND, and a secret jealousy between his Generals, contributed to the success of the King of Sweden. Notwithstanding, it is certain that the principal glory of his success is due to his diligence, his vigour, and the reputation he had acquired by his great exploits; his reputation going before him, astonished his enemies, and prepared them to submit: Besides he had very good troops, and officers of consummate experience, whom the example and glory of so great a King inspired with a courage and ardour, capable of surmounting the greatest difficulties.

The taking of Dantzic would have greatly augmented the glory of the King of Sweden. Nevertheless he did not attack that flourishing city, perceiving that he had neither troops, nor strength enough to subdue it. He was contented not to have that town against him, and to threaten it from time to time, in order to draw the greatest advantage from it, which he could, and to render it useless to the King of Poland. But the inhabitants proud of their riches, and full of themselves, did not grant to GUSTAVUS all he demanded. This obliged him to draw near them with his army, after he had passed the Vistula and seized on Dirschaw, which he put in a state of defence. He signified to the Dantzickers that he expected that all their ships should pay him a tribute; that they should keep a perfect neutrality, furnish him with provisions for money, and send out of their harbour all Polish ships. They agreed to all these articles except the last; and not to irritate GUSTAVUS by too blunt a refusal of it, they sent deputies to him several times, to lay before him their reasons. By this means they carried their principal end, which was to amuse GUSTAVUS, and gain time, till the arrival of the King of Poland; for whom they designed to declare openly, as soon as they could do it, without putting themselves too much in danger.

In effect, SIGISMUND arrived some time after in Prussia, with a considerable army. The loss of so many towns and castles, and the impetuous course of GUSTAVUS's victories had given him a cruel vexation, and raised in him an immoderate desire of revenging himself. Having therefore brought together about twenty-thousand men, he encamped at Graudentz; whereupon the Dantzickers espoused his party so warmly, that they they laid siege to Pautske where GUSTAVUS had a garrison, and made themselves masters of it; upon this likewise the Swedes treated them as enemies, and did them great mischief.

After some attempts on Marienburg, and the castle of Munden, which were very unfortunate to the Poles, SIGISMUND knowing that he should lose all his reputation, if he stayed longer in Prussia without doing any thing, decamped from Graudentz, and having passed the Vistula, laid siege to Mew, in the small province of Pomereillia. He knew GUSTAVUS too well to doubt of his coming to the relief of the besieged. He therefore fortified himself upon an eminence, by which the Swedes must necessarily pass in their way to Mew.

GUSTAVUS having drawn near that post, to attempt the relief of the place, was very much annoyed by the enemies cannon; but this only increased his desire to force their intrenchments. Having therefore secured himself against the insults of the Poles, he ordered the ground to be viewed, and understood that there was a small by-path which led to the summit of the eminence. They were forced rather to climb than to walk, in order to reach it. Nevertheless, in a short exhortation he made the soldiers, to shew them that there is nothing which courage and fidelity cannot compass, he so animated them, that they earnestly desired to march. Count TURN and General MUSTEN had the charge of this affair. They conducted it so wisely that they gained the eminence, the soldiers having helped themselves up by some branches of trees. They immediately killed the centinels and all they met, and were intrenching themselves on the eminence, when they were warmly attacked by the Polish troops. The fight was maintained for two hours with great vigour, and the advantage was on the side of General MUSTEN, for he put the enemy to flight; notwithstanding, when they returned to the charge, Count TURN retired, not to fly, but to gain a more favourable place. He was pursued, the fight began afresh, and the Swedes boast of having slain a great number of the enemy. Was it otherwise, they cannot be denied the glory of having relieved the place, since SIGISMUND raised the siege of Mew.

Soon after he seemed to be disposed towards an accommodation. They agreed on a place where the deputies of the two crowns should confer on that important affair; but their conference came to nothing. The deputies having come out of their tents, observed one another for a long time; without opening their lips, or so much as saluting one another. Each of them was afraid lest he should not support the honour of his master with a becoming gravity. Thus they were to take great care not to advance faster than the deputies of the other party, and not begin to pay civilities. At last after several grave steps, several majestic looks, and a long silence, SCHEMUKI, one of the Polish Ambassadors, being probably tired of a countenance so forced, and so useless to the design which had brought them thither, opened the conference, and demanded for his master conditions which were absolutely rejected. They prepared therefore for war. KONIECKSPOLSKI, a famous Polish General, formed an enterprize on Dirschaw, but GUSTAVUS having thrown men and provisions into that place, obliged him to retire with loss. The other attempts which the King of Poland made on Mew and Marienburg were not more successful. Thus the campaign was very favourable to the Swedes.

To compleat his happiness, GUSTAVUS became a father near the end of this same year 1626; it was indeed only of a daughter: but as the States of Sweden had already declared the daughters of the posterity of CHARLES IX capable of succeeding to the crown, and as they renewed the same decree at this time, GUSTAVUS had no longer the grief not to see an heir to his kingdom. In effect, this daughter of whom the Queen of Sweden was delivered on the eighth of December 1626 succeeded him, and has at least been as much known as GUSTAVUS, under the famous name of CHRISTINA.

What obliged the States to declare CHRISTINA heiress of the kingdom soon after her birth, was that they observed SIGISMUND to be more proud and more inflexible, under pretence that there was no Prince in Sweden who could succeed GUSTAVUS. Therefore, in order to humble that pride, they thought fit to shew him that they had a successor at hand, in the person of an infant newly born.

This was not the only resolution which the States took at that time, in order to humble the pride of SIGISMUND; they came to several others which ought to mortify him still more: for GUSTAVUS having laid before them the conditions of peace, which he had proposed to the King of Poland, they resolved that no better conditions ought to be offered to him, and that if he did not accept these, the war ought to be continued with greater vigour than ever. And the better to succeed in it, they promised the King not only the necessary supplies of money, but also their personal services and their lives. In this we must admire the conduct and good fortune of GUSTAVUS: for whereas in several kingdoms, the assemblies of the States are only theatres of disputes, where nothing is ever concluded but after a thousand complaints, and a thousand reproaches, the States of Sweden, meeting almost annually in the reign of GUSTAVUS, perfectly agreed to furnish him with whatever he desired, and even prevented his desires. This is very remarkable; but it will appear more so, when we consider that it was necessary to obtain the consent of the deputies to the continuation, and even very often to the augmentation of the state of the war, and that their business was almost always to provide for for new levies of soldiers, and new equipments of fleets. This good fortune must be attributed, 1. To the address of GUSTAVUS, who persuaded his subjects that he desired nothing so much as an end of the war, and that all the pains he took, and all the dangers to which he exposed himself, were only directed to that end, but that he had to do with an enemy who aimed at nothing less than invading the whole kingdom, and extirpating the Protestant religion out of it: 2. To the glory he had acquired; for tho' the conquests of a King are generally very useless to his subjects, and though it is indifferent to them whether their sovereign contents himself with the dominions of his ancestors, or extends them, yet they are taken with I know not what admiration mixed with love of their Prince, when he renders himself famous over the whole world. The Te Deums which they frequently hear, and the bonfires they make for the taking of towns, or gaining of battles, dispose them more cheerfully to contribute to the charges of the war. And as it has been very well observed, that though valour is not the virtue of women, yet they prefer soldiers to all other men, so it may be said, that though the conquests of a monarch are not the affair of his people, yet they ruin themselves with more satisfaction for the sake of a warlike Prince, than for the sake of any other.

GUSTAVUS, before he took the field, did two things which shew his humanity, and the care he took of his subjects. He published an edict in favour of those who were forced to leave their country on account of their religion. He offered them a sure retreat in his own dominions, and promised them a general exemption from all public duties. As these unhappy people were very numerous, by reason of the furious and tyrannical zeal with which the Emperor was wretchedly possessed, several of them took the benefit of GUSTAVUS's generosity; and this rendered his kingdom still more flourishing.

Besides, he desired the States carefully to examine the proposal which had been laid before him, for establishing a company to trade to the West-Indies. That company was established; but the success did not answer the hopes which had been conceived of it. In this, however, we must praise the virtue of that great Prince, who was moved to make this new establishment, only by the facility which he hoped from it of instructing the Infidels, and promoting the benefit of the whole kingdom.

In the spring of the following year GUSTAVUS returned to Prussia, being resolved to conquer the haughtiness of the Dantzickers. For this purpose he passed into one of the isles of the Vistula, where they had several forts, and attacked the principal one. He would certainly have taken it, had not a musket-shot which he received in his belly, forced him to abandon that enterprise. This disgrace was largely recompensed by the advantage which the Swedes gained at Kefmarck, a fort where the Poles had a garrison. They were dislodged from it, and immediately after a detachment of the Polish army, which came to relieve the garrison, was defeated.

Some time after there was a sharp engagement between the two armies at Dirschaw, where the Swedes were encamped. The Polish infantry having attacked them, were so warmly received by GUSTAVUS's cavalry, that they would have been cut to pieces, had not the cavalry of the King of Poland come to their assistance. The Poles being superior in number could not be repulsed but with difficulty; yet they were repulsed, and had not GUSTAVUS been dangerously wounded with a fauconet-shot, while he was viewing from an eminence the King of Poland's camp, it is very probable that the Swedes would either have cut the Poles to pieces, or put them to flight.

On this occasion the principal officers of the army, having Chancellor OXENSTIERN at their head, made a most humble remonstrance to the King, intreating his majesty to have more care of his person than he had hitherto had. They represented to him that his life was absolutely necessary for the good of the whole kingdom, and therefore that he ought to preserve it with the same care as he did the welfare of his subjects, for whom he had so great a tenderness. GUSTAVUS answered that he was sensible of this mark of their affection; but told them at the same time that he did not believe himself to be so necessary to his kingdom as they represented, and was persuaded that after his death, the providence of God would display itself for Sweden in the same manner as it had hitherto done, 'God hath committed this charge to me, continued he, neither fear nor sloth must make me neglect it; and what can happen more glorious to me than to lose my life in fighting for the glory of God, and the good of my subjects?' The event has but too well shewn that the remonstrance made less impression than the answer.

His courage supported him during the greatest pain in such a manner, that he then preserved all his presence of mind, and even his gaiety; for his Physician not contented to consider the wound, but having likewise exhorted him to take more care of himself for the future, GUSTAVUS smiling exhorted him in his turn not to meddle in another man's profession, which he expressed in the Latin proverb ne sutor ultra crepidam. Another time his Surgeon not being able to take the musket-balls out of a wound which they had made, let them continue there, said he, as an illustrious monument of a life which has not been spent in sloth and idleness, alluding, no doubt, to a saying of ALEXANDER the Great.

As GUSTAVUS was the soul of his army, we are not to imagine that it did any thing considerable, while he could not act by reason of his wounds. The Swedes were content to observe the Poles, who likewise did nothing remarkable during the rest of that campaign, though the Emperor had sent them some auxiliary troops commanded by the Duke of Holstein. A peace was proposed, and there was room to hope that it would be accepted by both parties, when the Spanish Ambassador came to break all their measures. He had his own ends; the house of Austria began to fear GUSTAVUS, and it was their interest to neglect nothing to keep him at variance with Poland. The Spanish Ambassador, guided by this principle, flattered SIGISMUND with a thousand vain hopes. He promised him a fleet of twenty-four men of war, ten thousand soldiers, and two hundred thousand crowns in money, which, in his opinion, would render him master of Sweden. SIGISMUND was credulous enough to give into the snare, and reckoned that the following campaign would make him King of Sweden. He therefore would not hearken to any peace, and by this means GUSTAVUS had another expedition to make into Prussia in the year 1628.

It was always his maxim to make war in the enemy's country. He therefore made haste this year to return into Prussia, knowing that the Poles designed to carry the war into his own dominions. His thoughts were chiefly bent upon humbling the proud city of Dantzic, from whence SIGISMUND drew his best supplies for the war which had for some time continued in royal Prussia. With this view, before he embarked, he published an edict, wherein he declared that he would confiscate all ships belonging to Dantzic, which carried contraband goods, and that, with regard to merchandises of another sort, he would not suffer any to be brought into that city, without paying a certain duty to the ships which he should keep at the entry of the Vistula; this shews that he did not prepare to take the city, but only to humble it. GUSTAVUS's first approaches were successful; for his fleet meeting with seven Dantzic ships between the town and the mouth of the river, took three or four of them, and sunk one. What followed did not answer this happy beginning, for a very small number of Polish ships beat forty Swedish. The assaults made on some forts of Dantzic were so vigorously repulsed, that the Swedes lost a great many men, whereas the Poles recovered Pofke and Mew, without any loss. These disgraces were somewhat lessened by the surprising of one of the isles of the Vistula, where the Swedes got twenty brass guns.

The Poles perceiving their advantages were not yet decisive, endeavoured to bring on a pitched battle. For this purpose they encamped pretty near the Swedes, and had several skirmishes with them. GUSTAVUS, who could not bear to be insulted by the enemy, especially when he was able to make head against them, finding he had twenty-four thousand foot, two thousand horse, and three thousand archers, drew up his army in battalia, to shew the Poles that he was as willing as they to come to a general engagement. They engaged and fought vigorously; but while GUSTAVUS was bearing the efforts of the Polish army, and amusing them with a part of his troops, he sent the best of his horse and foot, by a side-way, to attack the enemy in the rear; and by this march, well concerted and well executed, he put the Poles in disorder, slew three thousand of them, wounded KONIECKPOLSKI, the best of their Generals, took four of their field-pieces, fourteen colours, and returned victorious to his camp, with so much the more glory, as the loss of several of his men shewed that the advantage had been obstinately disputed.

The city of Dantzic now began to be apprehensive, because after the battle it was more straitened both from sea and land. In effect, GUSTAVUS was chiefly intent upon Dantzic, after he had gained that advantage over the Polish army. He ordered eight great men of war continually to cruize upon the coast, that nothing might enter into the town while he drew as near it as possible with his army. The inhabitants who desired above all things to have the sea open, and who were besides very good seamen, were chiefly bent upon attacking these eight ships. They attacked them with ten of theirs, and after an engagement of three hours, put four of them to flight, made themselves masters of the admiral-ship, and would have also taken the vice-admiral, had not he who commanded it, blown it up, to deprive the enemy of the pleasure and advantage of that capture. The Swedes lost four hundred men, and the commander of their fleet. It is easy to imagine with what vexation and resentment GUSTAVUS was transported, when he saw that Merchants (for thus monarchs treat those Republics which apply to commerce) triumphed over his ships, and led his Admiral into their harbour, to the view of all the citizens, and as a monument of their victory. But how could all this be helped? The best course that could be taken was unquestionably to send other ships in their room, instead of repining to no purpose; and this is what GUSTAVUS did.

He sent twelve ships to the mouth of the Vistula to block up the town again on that side; by this means commerce began to be established at KONIGSBERG, a town in Ducal Prussia, and to diminish in proportion at Dantzic. These twelve ships not content to cruize, attacked the enemy's fleet upon the Vistula, and after an engagement which lasted a whole day, they made themselves masters of one of the largest ships of

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

Dantzic, called the Dutch house. Yet they did not carry her off, because a lighted match falling by chance into the powder-magazine, blew up the ship; but thereby they gained more than they lost, for the consternation which seized the enemy at the dismal sight of it, obliged them to fly, and their admiral-ship foundered on a sand-bank, where she was entirely destroyed by the Swedish cannon.

In the mean time the King had occupied several posts around the city, had, with great labour, passed a morass about three German leagues long, and built three bridges of boats to bring over his army into a forest, from whence he pressed the city more closely; and then at last the inhabitants were no longer so proud. The magistrates were afraid of a sedition among the populace, because the stop put to commerce, and the blockade of the town, had made them want success that plenty and affluence to which the Dantzickers were accustomed, and for this reason they pressed the King of Poland to make peace with Sweden. SIGISMUND had all the motives in the world to a peace, but what might chiefly induce him to it was, that the promises of the Spanish Ambassador proved vain and fruitless; for so far were twenty-four men of war from coming to his assistance, that on the contrary he was obliged to send nine of those which vined near the Baltic. This was doubly prejudicial to Dantzic, 1. As it weakened the naval forces of that city: 2. As it irritated against them the King of Denmark; for WALSTEIN employed these nine ships to maintain the unjust dominion which he had usurped in the Baltic, and to disturb the two northern kingdoms.

CHRISTIAN IV revenged himself by permitting his subjects to seize all ships belonging to Dantzic, and all ships trading to that place. Notwithstanding all this, the famous city of Dantzic was preserved.

The rains came to its relief; the Vistula overflowed with so great force, that it broke all the bridges; whereby the several quarters of the Swedish army were deprived of communication and provisions. The waters having subsided, the Swedes were obliged to leave that place, and comfort themselves in their retreat as well as they could, by taking, with an immense booty, Newemburg on the Vistula, and Straßberg on the frontiers of the kingdom.

Newemburg was re-taken some time after, and the covetousness of the soldiers was the occasion of it. As they found a great deal of booty in those parts, they dispersed and did not keep a good guard, so that the Poles falling upon them in a village, slew many of them. They who escaped retired into the city, and promised to surrender it, if the Poles would save their lives. The Poles promised they would, and afterwards put them to the sword. Then GUSTAVUS, so much the more irritated against the Poles, as they had broken the law of nations, made incursions even to the gates of Warsaw, and overthrew whatever opposed him. Among the prisoners who had been made in these incursions, there were several women and maids. GUSTAVUS strictly ordered that they should be treated with all manner of civilities, and his orders had so great an effect that no injury was done to their honour; this rarely happens to female prisoners of war.

GUSTAVUS had also twice the advantage of the enemy before he returned to Stockholm; for General WRANGEL, Governor of Elbing, being informed that the Poles were marching towards Brodnitz, in order to besiege it, passed the Dwina, at a ford which was ill defended, and suddenly falling upon them, defeated them, and seized their cannon and baggage. Besides, WRANGEL having been ordered to scour the country with eight thousand men, in order to bring provisions to the Swedish camp, which was greatly in want of them, met, near Straßberg, a considerable body of Hussars and Cossacks, whom he was obliged to fight. He would not, perhaps, have succeeded, if they had agreed among themselves; but perceiving some misintelligence among them, he so dextrously improved the opportunity, not giving them time to put themselves in order, that he took and killed a great number of them; and what was still more necessary, he carried off a convoy of two thousand chariots laden with provisions. By this means plenty was restored to the Swedish camp which had suffered very much for want of provisions during the greatest part of the campaign.

At this time the town of Straßund, threatened by WALSTEIN, implored the assistance of the King of Sweden, who sent it powder and a succour of five hundred men. This action greatly provoked the Imperialists, and made them hold a conduct which put them at variance with GUSTAVUS. This proved a great and irreparable prejudice to the court of Vienna, as we shall see in its place.

It looks as if the house of Austria had some foresight of what they were to suffer by GUSTAVUS, so much did they labour to keep him engaged in the war with Poland. We have already seen how the Spanish Ambassador made magnificent promises, in order to put off the conclusion of a peace between the Kings of Sweden and Poland. Spain had no intention to furnish the King of Poland either with twenty-four men of war, or ten thousand soldiers, or two hundred thousand crowns in money, in order to dispossess GUSTAVUS of his dominions. Nevertheless, Spain gave hopes of all this, because it was of great importance to that kingdom that Poland and Sweden should continue at war, and because the Spaniards knew that they could more easily find excuses for for their want of sincerity, than repair the mischiefs they apprehended from Sweden. Therefore they did not scruple to make their Ambassador act according to the definition which has been given of persons of his character, 'that they are men sent abroad to lye for the good of the State.'

Spain had played its part in the year 1627: the court of Vienna played theirs in the following years, by sending troops to SIGISMUND, in order to make him obstinate in refusing any accommodation. General ARNHEIM commanded these auxiliary troops, in the year 1629; they consisted of five thousand foot and two thousand horse; and he had the misfortune to pass for the cause of all the ill success of SIGISMUND; whether he really did not act as he ought to have done for the advantage of SIGISMUND, or whether the latter seeking on whom to discharge his vexation (for there must always be somebody who may bear the blame) found no person more proper than the General of the Imperial troops. However, the campaign of this year 1629 was not so unsuccessful to SIGISMUND, but that GUSTAVUS shared with him in the caprices of fortune. For if on one side HERMAN WRANGEL, Field-Marshal, defeated STANISLAUS POŁOSKI, Castellan of Caminieck; the Swedes on the other side were forced to raise the siege of Thorn, and some time after there happened an engagement wherein GUSTAVUS was made prisoner, but without being known, and in that manner he came back to his army. I am going to tell, in a few words, how the Polish authors relate this adventure.

They say that the great General KONIECKPOLSKI having attacked the Swedish army, commanded by GUSTAVUS in person, put them to flight, that GUSTAVUS having rallied, returned to the charge, and fell into the hands of a trooper who seized him by the belt; that he escaped from this trooper by leaving with him his belt and hat, and that immediately after he was taken by another, who was going to kill him, when a German, who knew him, cried out that he was a servant of the Rheingrave, that upon this the trooper left him, and the German having given him a horse, GUSTAVUS rode all that night to Marienburg.

The Swedes say, that the army of the King of Poland, being re-inforced with Imperial troops, marched up to GUSTAVUS, who prepared to receive them with his usual intrepidity, and ordered the Rheingrave, who was nearer the enemy with a detachment of the army, not to engage; that notwithstanding, the Rheingrave imagining he had a fair opportunity, attacked the Imperialists, but was forced to retire in disorder, and with loss; that GUSTAVUS joined him, and obliged the Imperialists to retire; that after this the latter made as if they designed to march to the great isle of the Vistula, near Dantzic, that there was a sharp engagement to hinder them, and that GUSTAVUS, having mixed with them, was taken prisoner by a Polander, who knowing him in general to belong to the contrary party, commanded him to follow him; that GUSTAVUS making a difficulty to obey, was upon the point of being killed, when a captain of the horse, called HENRY SOOP, came up and brought the King off from this danger by killing the Polander, and that this captain was afterwards created Knight of the Order in the assembly of the States. What may be gathered as certain from these two different accounts, is, that the King of Sweden, transported by the heat of his courage, mixed among the enemy too far, and too ill accompanied. He was a great General, and weighed things with the greatest sedateness, but he sometimes forgot himself in the action, and was not always master of his temper, heated with the passion of overcoming an enemy, who vigorously contended with him for victory.

The Swedish Historians add, that from that day till the truce, there were several engagements, wherein SIGISMUND's army was always worsted, and in some places with an irreparable loss. But the Polish Historians say, on the contrary, that SIGISMUND being informed of the great advantage gained by General KONIECKPOLSKI over the Swedish army, on the day when GUSTAVUS so fortunately escaped, came immediately to his army, to improve that advantage, but that General ARNHEIM, who would not consent to the siege of Marienburg, was the occasion that all the fruit of so important a victory was lost; that the King complained to WALSTEIN of the perfidy of this General, and that WALSTEIN recalled him, and substituted in his place, ADOLPHUS, Duke of Holstein, who did little service, because he was but little respected by the Germans who had served under General ARNHEIM. Finally, that the last warlike exploit was performed by the Cossacks in the isle of Marienburg, where they defeated and killed the young WRANGEL. According to this account, the Poles in that campaign suffered only by not improving their victory.

It would be a very difficult labour, and of a very doubtful success, to enquire whether the Poles or the Swedes are most to be credited in their narratives. Let us be content to know that it is at least unquestionable that SIGISMUND consented to a truce for six years, tho' the Emperor and the King of Spain dissuaded him from it, as much as they could, and offered him great succours, if he continued the war. It is equally unquestionable that SIGISMUND was a warlike Prince, and so passionately desired to recover the kingdom of Sweden, of which he pretended that GUSTAVUS was not the lawful possessor, that he consented to the truce with the greatest reluctance. In fine, it is unquestionable that the truce was concluded on conditions glorious for Sweden; for it was agreed agreed that the port of Memel in Prussia, Elbing, Brunsberg, Pillaw, and all the places which the King of Sweden held in Livonia, should remain in his possession, that Marienburg should be deposited in the hands of the Elector of Brandenburg, and that if a peace was not concluded, Marienburg and Dirfau, which were restored to Poland, should return to Sweden.

The Polish Historians, after this, may falsify and obscure, as much as they please, the detail of this war; they will never be able to obscure this truth, that the glory and advantage of it remained to GUSTAVUS, and that he was at least viſtor bello, --- viſtorious in the war, if he was not most frequently viſtor pugna, --- viſtorious in the battle. The truce could hardly fail to be concluded at that time; for both parties were greatly solicited to it by the Ambassadors of France, England, and Brandenburg.

The Elector of Brandenburg had been very much embarrassed during the course of this war: at first he secretly favoured GUSTAVUS, afterwards finding GUSTAVUS had conquered the best part of Prussia, he knew not which of his neighbours ought to have his good wishes, nor whether it was more his interest that the Swedes should possess that province, or be driven out of it by SIGISMUND, and then his thoughts were so confused that even GUSTAVUS doubted whether he ought to trust him or not, and therefore told him that he gave him six months to resolve upon taking one side, or the other. He treated secretly with GUSTAVUS; but because SIGISMUND, whose vassal he was with respect to Ducal Prussia, which was at that time a fief depending on the crown of Poland, threatened to divest him of it, if he did not openly embrace his party, he broke with Sweden, and sent succours to the King of Poland. To extricate himself from such troublesome circumstances, it was his interest more than that of any other Potentate, that these two Princes should come to an accommodation.

In the next place, the Republic of Poland was so weary of a war, undertaken by SIGISMUND only to revenge his private quarrels, and to recover a kingdom which he had lost by too blindly following the maxims and counsels of the Jesuits, this Republic, I say, was so weary of a war which did not concern it, and had only straitened the antient boundaries of Poland, without any appearance of repairing that loss, far from conquering a new kingdom, that their discontentment in this affair was now generally known. The Dantzickers in particular were so weary of a war which weakened their commerce, and by consequence deprived them of their greatest advantage, that they extremely pressed the King of Poland to accommodate with Sweden.

In fine, we must not doubt but that GUSTAVUS, however insatiable of war he may be thought, desired to make an accommodation with Poland, either by a peace, or a cessation of arms. For by that accommodation he did not lose the hopes of gratifying his warlike inclinations. The disorders in Germany, his own particular interest to lessen the power of the Emperor, who had made himself formidable in the Baltic, the solicitations of several States, which wished that the house of Austria were confined within its just bounds, and the designs of that house towards an universal monarchy, all this opened to GUSTAVUS the largest field for military valour, and he only wanted to be free on the side of Poland, to engage in the boldest and most glorious design that has appeared these many years. The house of Austria was not ignorant of it, and for this reason had greatly laboured to foment the war between him and SIGISMUND. But the efforts of that house were in vain. GUSTAVUS concluded a treaty with the King of Poland, in the year 1629, for a longer time than either of them was to live. Let us now see how he employed the years which followed that truce; and because the better to comprehend the reasons of his conduct, it is fit to know the state of Germany at that time, let us here give a short and faithful account of the enterprizes of the house of Austria on the liberty of Europe in general, and that of the Protestant religion in particular.

A N

A N

Historical Discourse

On the LIFE of

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, KING OF SWEDEN.

CHAP. II.

Of the situation of affairs in Germany, when GUSTAVUS entered it.

THE house of Austria owes the beginning of its glory and power to RUDOLPH, Count of Hapsburg, elected Emperor in the year 1273. The merit of RUDOLPH was so generally acknowledged, that the Electors of the empire, by giving him their suffrages, put a stop to all the factions and cabals which had for a long time created divisions in Germany, and they united all parties in the approbation of their choice. He worthily maintained the dignity they had conferred on him, and strenuously laboured to support the honour of the empire, but without forgetting the particular interests of his own house. In effect, if he would not suffer OTTOCARUS, King of Bohemia, to seize on Austria, in prejudice of the rights of the empire, his only view in this was to bestow that country on his own son.

Austria had been erected into a Markgraviate by the Emperor Otho I, in favour of LEOPOLD, his brother-in-law, who had worthily discharged the commission he had received from the Emperor HENRY I, to guard that frontier against the incursions of the Hungarians. It was afterwards erected into a duchy by FREDERIC BARBAROSSA, in favour of one of LEOPOLD's descendants; and, in fine, the last male of that family, named FREDERIC, having perished in the unfortunate expedition of CONRADINE against CHARLES OF ANJOU, in the tragical manner which every one knows, OTTOCARUS seized it by virtue of his wife's pretensions, she being the heiress of FREDERIC. RUDOLPH being arrived at the Imperial dignity, declared that OTTOCARUS had seized on a country, which did not belong to him, since it was a fief appropriated to the male heirs. But his reasons not being persuasive enough, he enforced them with good troops, cut off OTTOCARUS in a battle he gained over him near Vienna, in the year 1278, and invested his son ALBERT with the duchies of Austria and Stiria, and the lordships of Carniola and Windismarc. Since that time the name of Hapsburg appears no longer. RUDOLPH's posterity only took the name of Austria, and have rendered it very famous. They erected that fief into an archduchy, and endowed it with several ample privileges.

V O L. V.

8 G

This

ANNO 1260.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS.

ANNO
1298.

This house has furnished Germany with fourteen Emperors, all in an uninterrupted succession, excepting the three first; and Spain with six Kings, if we reckon in that number PHILIP, the father of the Emperor CHARLES V. Though RUDOLPH left sons capable of succeeding him, yet the Electors did not choose an Emperor out of his family, but out of the illustrious house of Nassaw, which to this day is one of the most glorious and flourishing in Europe. We may easily imagine that ALBERT OF AUSTRIA, the son of the Emperor RUDOLPH, was displeased at this election, and improved every conjuncture which might ruin his rival. He had powerful friends. He raised a formidable faction, laboured to get him deposed, and himself elected in his room; in a word, he overcame the Emperor ADOLPHUS OF NASSAW in the battle of Hafensuet near Spire. Having perceived him at the head of a squadron in the hottest part of the engagement, he singled him out, and killed him, and by this means secured to himself the Imperial crown. ALBERT was killed ten years after by his own nephew, leaving several children by his marriage with ELIZABETH OF CARINTHIA. This marriage united Carinthia and Tirol to the patrimony of the house of Austria, and was, as it were, the prelude to the aggrandisement of that house.

1314.

FREDERIC, ALBERT'S eldest son, was undoubtedly very much affected with the barbarous action of his cousin; but perhaps was still more displeased that HENRY VII, of the house of Luxemburg was then raised to the Imperial throne. He comforted himself as well as he could, with the hopes of a favourable opportunity, which he thought he had found after the death of HENRY. For some of the electors chose him Emperor. It was indeed the least part of them, and consequently his election was not regular. But he found too great an advantage in believing it valid, not to maintain that it was so; he knew besides, that, provided a Prince overcomes his rival, he will not want the means to rectify the irregularity of his election: accordingly FREDERIC used all his endeavours to ruin LEWIS OF BAVARIA, who had been elected by the greatest number of suffrages, and whose election was consequently more regular. As these two competitors were very brave, and supported by many friends, their dispute kindled a war in Germany, which lasted eight years. Whatever makes a war considerable, happened in this, several encounters, several towns either besieged or taken, two battles, in the last of which fortune openly declared against FREDERIC, by making him fall into the hands of his competitor, who did not set him at liberty till after three years imprisonment, and after he had made him swear to content himself with the empty title of King of the Romans, without ever pretending to the empire. He kept his promise; though, by reason of the great disputes between LEWIS OF BAVARIA, and the Pope, he was tempted to believe, that a man is not held by the promise which he makes in prison; and though the Pope himself strongly solicited him to come either to Avignon, or to Rome, and assume the Imperial dignity. After his death, which happened in the year 1330, there passed a century before the posterity of RUDOLPH of Hapsburg came again to the Imperial crown: but in the year 1438, this house, which has been so greatly beholden to marriages, again recovered that crown by virtue of a marriage, and got so sure a hold of it, that they have wore it ever since.

1346.

The house of Luxemburg which had lost the empire by the death of HENRY VII, recovered it thirty three years after, by the election of CHARLES IV, grandson of HENRY, which was made even during the life of the Emperor LEWIS OF BAVARIA, and at the instigation of the Pope, his mortal enemy; but CHARLES was hardly acknowledged till after the death of LEWIS; most of the Princes, and all the cities of the empire having judged that the thunderbolts of the court of Rome did not hinder LEWIS OF BAVARIA from being their lawful sovereign.

WENCESLAUS and SIGISMUND, both sons of CHARLES IV, swayed the Imperial scepter after him, the former immediately after his father, who died in the year 1378; and the latter after the death of RUPERT Count Palatine, who having succeeded WENCESLAUS deposed by the electors of the Empire in the year 1400, died in 1411. SIGISMUND left an only daughter; who was married to ALBERT Duke of Austria, and brought him the Imperial crown, with the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary in the year 1438; for in all elective kingdoms he who marries the heiress of the late King, is usually preferred to all others. The reign of ALBERT was very short; but in recompence FREDERIC OF AUSTRIA, his cousin, who succeeded him, filled the Imperial throne fifty-three years. He had the good fortune and address to marry his son MAXIMILIAN with the richest heiress in Europe, MARY OF BURGUNDY, only daughter of CHARLES THE BOLD, whose ambition and warlike temper are so well known. This marriage so considerably increased the power of the house of Austria, that perhaps it might have been wished for the tranquillity of Christendom that their power had not become greater. It might have been enough for one house to have annexed to it's antient patrimony, and to the Imperial dignity, the provinces of the Low-Countries, so rich, so flourishing, and conveniently situated: nevertheless, the providence of God has been pleased to suffer the great power of some, and the jealousy and diffidence of others to be a continual source of war; from whence we may conclude that the benefit of mankind requires that no Prince should become too powerful.

However

However that may be, MAXIMILIAN having been elected Emperor in the year 1493, after the death of his father, married his son with JOAN OF ARRAGON, daughter of FERDINAND OF ARRAGON, and ISABELLA OF CASTILE, and by this means added to his house the great and vast estates which FERDINAND possessed, both in the new and the old world. The marriage of FERDINAND with ISABELLA OF CASTILE brought him great advantages, both because she was heiress of several great kingdoms, and because she was capable to second her husband in his great designs. To the kingdom of his fathers, and to those of his wife, he added Granada, and Navarre, Naples, and Sicily, and all the countries discovered in the new world.

One could hardly have imagined that this great succession concerned the house of Austria; for besides that FERDINAND had a son, whom he took great care to marry sometimes with the daughter of MAXIMILIAN, he had only bestowed on PHILIP, son of the same MAXIMILIAN, the second of his four daughters: yet notwithstanding all this, she became the heiress of FERDINAND. The Prince, her brother, dying without issue, the Infanta ISABELLA, her eldest sister, the wife of DOM EMANUEL, King of Portugal, left only one son, who died in his infancy. Thus the Princess JOAN inherited all this great succession, and transferred it to her eldest son, who under the name of CHARLES V has been so famous in Europe.

CHARLES, born at Ghent on St MATTHIAS's day, which fell that year on the twenty-fifth of February, had lost his father, when the death of his grandfather by the mother's side opened to him the succession of all his kingdoms. His mother indeed was still living, but the distraction of her mind not allowing her to reign, she was obliged to resign her authority; and thus CHARLES reigned alone some time after the death of King FERDINAND. Besides the possession of so many kingdoms, he had soon a new accession of power. The Emperor MAXIMILIAN, his grandfather, dying on the twenty-second of January 1519, he came to the Imperial crown six months after. For this he was partly beholden to his German extraction, and the seeming mediocrity of his genius. Otherwise, it is not to be doubted but that FRANCIS I, King of France, would have been preferred to him; but the Germans were afraid of the temper, capacity, and courage of the latter, which had appeared on several occasions. I need not say that CHARLES now became the most powerful Prince in Europe; that is obvious; but after what I have hinted of the seeming mediocrity of his genius, I must add either that the Germans knew him very ill, when they believed that he was not a great man, or that his genius opened by degrees, and was formed by experience in affairs. This Prince was certainly endowed with great qualities, and to his great courage was joined much judgment, and much of that capacity which is necessary for the sovereign of a vast empire.

As miracles rarely happen, and it must have been a miracle if CHARLES V, endowed with such qualities, and possessed of such great power, had not aspired after new kingdoms, several people believed that he introduced into the house of Austria the design of an universal monarchy, a design which that house is not now accused of, (the accusation would be very unjust) but which was formerly imputed to them. Such a project necessarily required that his hereditary dominions should border upon the dominions of Spain, or at least that it should not be difficult to bring troops from Spain to Germany, and from Germany to Spain. For this end CHARLES, not content to have added, to the patrimony of the house of Burgundy, what he wanted in the seventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, fortified himself in Italy as well as he could. Knowing also how necessary it is to be assured of England, in order to subvert Europe, he did not pass by the opportunity which was presented, of marrying his eldest son with Queen MARY, the daughter of HENRY VIII. I enter not into more particular considerations, because they would carry me too far from my subject.

Several circumstances made CHARLES V fail in the design of an universal monarchy, supposing he entertained it; but nothing traversed that design more than the disadvantage he had to live in an age so ill-timed for his purpose, as it produced a number of great men. For whereas there have often passed compleat centuries, in which we cannot observe any Prince of a distinguished merit; in the age when CHARLES lived, appeared HENRY VIII, King of England, a Prince courageous and bold, who never suffered the balance to incline too much to one side; FRANCIS I, King of France, who thwarted the house of Austria in every thing, and every where, who had the heart of a lion, and the most active and stirring genius; SOLIMAN, Emperor of the Turks, a great conqueror, and one of the most formidable neighbours that ever ravaged Hungary.

I say nothing of several brave and prudent German Princes, who opposed CHARLES V with great resolution and glory.

He was too great a man to suffer himself to be possessed with a sanguinary and superstitious spirit, which incites Princes to persecute religions different from their own; so that it is probable whatever he did, with regard to the Protestants, proceeded either from a design of engaging the Pope to be always on his side, or from a fear lest the establishment of Lutheranism should continue to be prejudicial to him, by reason of the too passionate zeal of the Papists. But as soon as he was sensible that it was not his interest to persecute the Lutherans, like a man of great sense and courage, he threw off all the complaisance he had formerly shewn to the Pope, and rejected the counsels of Ecclesiastics, enemies to the public peace. From hence proceeded the treaty of Passaw, which gave full liberty of conscience to all the States of the empire. Had he done this twenty years sooner, he would have probably removed several obstacles to the execution of his great design; but he was somewhat too late in pacifying the differences in point of religion.

Fortune had already forsaken him, and favoured HENRY II, imitating coquets (as he himself mournfully said) with whom it is a strong reason for preferring one man to another, that he is fifteen or twenty years younger. The displeasure he had to outlive his good-fortune made him take the resolution of leaving the world; but in such a manner, as he might claim great merit by it; for he confined himself in the solitude of a monastery, knowing that Ecclesiastics would give a fine turn to this action, and that of all the actions of his life this would be by them the most extolled.

CHARLES had committed one fault which he in vain endeavoured to repair; he had caused his brother FERDINAND to be elected King of the Romans. He considered, but too late, that in order to preserve and increase the power of his house, it was highly important than all its dominions should be united in one person. He would therefore have been glad to revoke the election of FERDINAND, and substitute PHILIP his son in his room. But as FERDINAND rejected this proposal, CHARLES bestowing the Spanish monarchy on his son, was obliged to leave the Imperial crown to his brother; and in effect FERDINAND, who was already King of Hungary and Bohemia, obtained that crown, upon the retreat of CHARLES V.

FERDINAND refusing to yield the empire to his nephew, raised a kind of misunderstanding which lasted for some time between the two branches of the house of Austria, the elder of which reigned in Spain, and the younger in Germany, as they do to this day. FERDINAND entirely embraced the principles of Toleration, which had been so wisely followed by his predecessor in the treaty of Passaw. He had confirmed that treaty in the name of the Emperor his brother, in a Diet held at Augsburg in the year 1555, and three years after, he confirmed it anew, no longer as the bare deputy of his brother, but as fully invested with the Imperial authority.

ANNO
1564.

His son MAXIMILIAN II, who succeeded him, followed this noble example of moderation, and extended it even farther than his father had done, for he tolerated the exercise of Lutheranism in his own dominions, he highly detested the massacre of Paris, executed by the order of CHARLES IX, his son in law, and told HENRY III, as the latter passed through Vienna, that a Prince who tyrannizes over the consciences of men, invades God's right, and often loses the things of this world, by meddling too much with those of the other.

He died in the year 1576, greatly regretted by the Protestants, and made room for his son RUDOLPH II, whose conduct did not degenerate from that of his late predecessors, while he was guided by his own judgment; for he applied himself to maintain the public tranquillity which Germany enjoyed since the treaty of Passaw, and imitating the moderation of his father and grand-father, he disturbed no man in the possession of his privileges, judging, with great truth, that it is the principal virtue of a sovereign to content himself with the power he lawfully possesses. Far from treading in the steps of those Princes, whose ambition disturbs the public peace, it may be said that he loved peace too much, and had not even the ambition of being master in his own family. This was very hurtful to Germany, because disaffected persons abusing the facility of RUDOLPH, found means to insinuate themselves into the Imperial council, and to extort from this Prince some attempts on the liberties of Germany, as appeared chiefly in the affair of Juliers.

1608.

This honest Emperor suffered for his too great facility. His brother MATTHIAS so greatly abused it, that he forced RUDOLPH to yield to him the kingdom of Hungary, and Austria, and to consent to his being crowned King of Bohemia. These unnatural and violent proceedings of MATTHIAS, and the weakness of RUDOLPH in giving credit to the predictions of TYCHO-BRAHE, who studied Astrology as well as Astronomy, ruined this unhappy Emperor. For TYCHO-BRAHE having told him that he was threatened with some imminent danger from his own relations, and that he ought to be on his guard, threw him into so great fears that he no longer ventured to go abroad, or see any company; and as the conduct of MATTHIAS confirmed the astrological warning, the Emperor sunk at last under his uneasiness and grief, and died on the eighteenth of January 1612, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

Though the Protestants of Germany had, generally speaking, some reason to complain of RUDOLPH, who had some times been surprized into bad measures by the emissaries of the court of Rome, the Protestants of Bohemia, in particular, thought themselves very happy under the clemency of this Emperor. In effect, he had granted a liberty of conscience in Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia; and it is indisputable that before the war in Bohemia, the Protestants of that kingdom were equal with the Papists in every respect but this, that they had not a King of their religion. This equality was not an usurped power; but arose from the great privileges which RUDOLPH and and his successor Matthias had granted to the Bohemians of the communion sub utraque; this was the distinction between the Protestants and those of the Romish communion.

The Emperor MATTHIAS felt the same jealousy of his authority, which he had raised against that of RUDOLPH, his predecessor. He had no children; his two brothers, the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, Grand-Master of the Teutonic order, and the Archduke ALBERT, Governor of the Low-Countries, had likewise none. Thus the succession lay open to the children of the Archduke CHARLES, son of the Emperor FERDINAND.

This juncture was favourable to the Spaniards. They had the glory of the house of Austria extremely at heart, and believed it was the interest of that house that both the branches of it should be governed by the same maxims; and as they had a better opinion of their own politics than of those of the Germans, they were persuaded that it would be more conducive to the common glory of the house of Austria, that the court of Vienna, instead of governing that of Spain, should on the contrary be governed by it. Accordingly they resolved no longer to defer making themselves necessary to the Imperial court. Having observed that an opportunity of doing this seasonably offered at the approaching election of an Emperor, they intimated to FERDINAND, the eldest son of the Archduke CHARLES that he had great need of their good offices, in order to succeed the Emperor MATTHIAS. This he believed, and attached himself to them as much as they desired; so that they no longer doubted but if the empire was once in their hands, they should dispose of it as they would.

With this view they warmly undertook the affair, and proposed FERDINAND to MATTHIAS as a person whom he ought immediately to adopt. They prevailed without much difficulty on the brothers of MATTHIAS to yield all their pretensions to FERDINAND. In short, they made it so much their business to invest him soon with the whole authority, that this gave the Emperor great uneasiness. So natural it is for Princes who have no children, and sometimes even for those who have, to be uneasy when they observe the attachment of the people to their apparent successor. But notwithstanding this jealousy, MATTHIAS acquiesced in the reasons of the Spaniards, with regard to the crown of Bohemia, which they wished he would dispose of during his life, in favour of him whom they protected. They gave him to understand, that the affair was not to be left to the chance of an election made during the interregnum, lest his heir should be excluded; that after his death, the States of Bohemia, pretending that the kingdom was elective, might bestow the crown on some Heretic Prince, and that in such a case the empire would unquestionably pass to another house. MATTHIAS, affected with a fear so dextrously inspired, caused FERDINAND to be declared his successor to the kingdom of Bohemia, in the year 1617.

Besides the Spaniards made a secret treaty with FERDINAND, by which King PHILIP III renounced in his favour, all his rights to the hereditary countries of the house of Austria, situated in Germany; in consideration of which FERDINAND engaged to deliver Alsacia to the Spaniards.

I thought it proper to make all these observations on the conduct of the four immediate successors of CHARLES V, in order to undeceive the generality of readers, who taking only a superficial and general view of things, falsely imagine that all the complaints which have been made against the house of Austria, fall as well on the German branch, as on the Spanish. Nothing is more untrue: for the whole conduct of the house of Austria in Germany, while they were not directed by the Spaniards, was thought commendable, or at least tolerable; and it is certain that the Princes of the empire would never have resorted to the remedies they used, had they not been persuaded that the Imperial court blindly followed the orders which came from that of Madrid, and that the Jesuits inspired both these courts with the design of exterminating all the sects, by setting up an Inquisition. Here we have an instance of the weakness of our reasonings. For what was seemingly more rational than to say, that, for the greater glory of the house of Austria, it was necessary that the court of Vienna should act in concert with Spain, where there were so many wise men instructed in the politics of PHILIP II? And yet this concert has been the most hurtful both to the Emperor and the Spaniards, because people were prejudiced with a frightful idea of the Spanish politics, on account of all that had passed in the Low-Countries, of the share the Spaniards had taken in the civil-wars of France, of the invasion of Portugal, of the extraordinary efforts they had made to dethrone Queen ELIZABETH, when they equipped their invincible Armada, and on several other accounts. Whether this prejudice was just or unjust, certain it is, that people had frightful thoughts of the government of Spain, and for this reason the German Princes stirred so much, as soon as they believed the Emperor was abandoned to the conduct of that strange nation. Now from these great emotions arose the violent storm which fell both upon the Emperor and Spain.

For the rest, though I have said, or may sometimes say in the sequel of this discourse, that Spain was accused of aspiring after universal monarchy, yet this must not be taken as if I asserted that the accusation was just. In this I act merely as an Historian, who relates common reports, without warranting the truth of them. I have therefore no reason to be apprehensive of provoking the Spaniards; and was I even to declaim against their former ambition, I do not think they would take it amiss. In effect, they are at this day the first to blame those Princes who hold a conduct like that which was imputed to them about fifty or threescore years ago, they are the first to exclaim against ambitious Princes who aggrandise themselves at the expence of their neighbours, and they wish that all the powers in Europe would rise in arms against them. They are in the right to wish this; it is enough for ambitious nations to indulge themselves in the pleasing imagination, that it is the part of a great soul to aspire after the conquest of a great empire. It is not fit that they should also have the pleasure of conquering it. That would be too much. Let them freely enjoy pleasing imaginations, but let them meet with a vigorous opposition, and such as justice requires, when they would change their imaginations into realities.

Let us return to the Archduke FERDINAND. As soon as the Emperor MATTHIAS had caused him to be declared King of Bohemia, it was no longer doubted but that he would have him elected King of the Romans, especially since, having some time after gone to Hungary, he caused him to be declared King of Hungary at Presburg, on the first of June 1618.

The thoughts that FERDINAND would become Emperor extremely alarmed several German Princes, both because they saw that the empire would by this means be inevitably perpetuated in the same family, notwithstanding the golden bull, and because FERDINAND would re-unite in himself all the hereditary countries of the German branch. They could not conceive how they should preserve their liberty under an Emperor so powerful, and governed by the Spaniards. The Protestant Princes feared him more than all the rest, because they looked upon him as a Prince educated by the Jesuits, and who had already improved so much by the lessons they had given him at Ingolstadt, where he had studied, that as soon as he had succeeded his father, he had tolerated no sect in his dominions. Yet he had found them full of people who followed the new opinions; but by menaces and ill-usage he had forced a part of these people to change their religion, and had banished all the rest, whom neither the fear of exile, nor the confiscation of their estates and goods, could force to go over to the Romish communion. This rendered him both odious and terrible to all the Protestants; but on the other hand, it greatly recommended him to the three ecclesiastical Electors; and as he wanted no more than one vote, and was sure of giving that of the King of Bohemia to himself, he had great reason to depend upon succeeding the Emperor MATTHIAS.

The more this was likely to happen, the more did some Princes of Germany endeavour to prevent it. But none of them took this affair so much to heart as FREDERIC, Elector Palatine, the same who was King of Bohemia some time after. He was a Prince of great merit, and of exalted courage; and surely they who speak otherwise of him, must be ranked among those people of a vulgar understanding, who, judging of things only by the success of them, imagine because he was not successful in his enterprise, that he was not a great man. This Prince therefore took great pains to represent to his colleagues how necessary it was not to proceed to the election of a King of the Romans during the life of MATTHIAS. He told them that they would be more at liberty, in the interregnum, to transfer the Imperial crown to another house, and that it was necessary to do so, because if they did not interrupt the succession of the Princes of the house of Austria at that juncture, when the direct line failed, they could never entertain any hopes of interrupting it, especially if FERDINAND was elected, who being supported by a foreign power, and a numerous family, would establish himself and his posterity for ever in the Imperial throne.

But as these representations were insignificant speeches, unless there was found a Catholic Prince fit to be Emperor, (for the Protestants had only three votes, and four at least were necessary) FREDERIC cast his eye on MAXIMILIAN, Duke of Bavaria, a Prince of distinguished merit, and went to visit him at Munich, on purpose to persuade him to accept of the Imperial crown; promising him the votes of the three Protestant Electors, which, with that of the Archbishop of Cologne, whom he might depend upon, as being the Duke of Bavaria's own brother, would render the election infallible. The temptation was great: nevertheless, MAXIMILIAN resisted it, either because he knew himself too well to oppose so strong a party, or because the Ministers of the Pope and the King of Spain promised him other advantages, in the room of an empire which he could not preserve against the enemies he would raise by accepting it; so that he preferred a fortune less exalted, but solid, to one more pompous but tottering. And who knows but that he was threatened in the name of God with some horrible chastisement in this world, and with hell-torments in the other, if he accepted a crown, which, in the judgment of the court of Rome, could not be taken from the house of Austria, without manifest danger to religion?

I have already mentioned the journey of the Emperor MATTHIAS to Hungary. I add here, that during this journey the troubles of Bohemia broke forth; the Archbishop of Prague, and the Abbot Bruneau, gave the first occasion to them; the former by demolishing a church which the Protestants had built at Clostergrab; and the latter by shutting up another. The Emperor RUDOLPH had permitted the Protestants, by his Letters-

Letters-Patent, dated the ninth of July 1609, to build churches, hospitals, and schools, on their own ground in whatever jurisdiction they were situated, even without the permission of the lord of the fief or high-judiciary. They had peaceably enjoyed this privilege in the reign of MATTHIAS, and on a sudden saw two private men, without the Emperor's order, and merely by their own authority, demolish and shut up their churches. This provoked them to the highest degree, not so much on account of these two churches, as because they looked upon this as an omen of FERDINAND's conduct, from which they could only preface melancholy consequences; for since, without waiting for the approaching death of the good Emperor MATTHIAS, he signalized the beginnings of his reign by violences exceeding severe, they might be sure that he would not long delay to proscribe them, and to follow all the suggestions of the Jesuits who led him.

These fears increased some time after, by the approbation which was given in the Emperor's council to the violences of the Archbishop of Prague, and the Abbot Bruneau. The Protestants then saw that the old-age of MATTHIAS had delivered him a prey to his successor; so that having no hopes but from the resolution which they should discover, they thought themselves obliged to make FERDINAND, and the Spaniards, whose suggestions he followed, sensible that they should engage in a very difficult and dangerous affair, if they undertook to annul their privileges. They thought that the more submissive they should be, the more should they be trampled upon, and that they ought to render themselves formidable by some bold step, in order to stifle in their birth, the pernicious counsels which had been suggested to FERDINAND.

Accordingly they took resolutions not only too bold, but inexcusable on account of their violence. For not content to summon the States of the kingdom, in order to deliberate on the proper means of preserving the privileges of the country, they opened these States on the twenty-first of May 1618, without any regard to the Emperor's prohibition; and two days after sent several lords and deputies of towns to the council, in order to make their remonstrances. These discharged their commission with an air not like that of supplicants. Accordingly their petition was not received in the manner which they thought the equity of their cause required, which provoked them so highly, that they threw out of the windows, as traitors to their country, Count MARTINITZ, Count NAUATA, and PHILIP FABRICIO, Secretary of State.

After such a proceeding, the Bohemians found themselves engaged a new, to break with FERDINAND, because they could hope for nothing but by rendering themselves the strongest. Accordingly Count LA TOUR having made them sensible of the necessity they were under to repel force by force, they immediately sent commissions for levying troops throughout the whole kingdom. This Count had been very ill treated by FERDINAND from a hatred to his religion; for he had banished him out of Austria, and deprived him of his estate; and the Count expected no better usage when FERDINAND should come to the crown of Bohemia. This personal interest greatly prevailed on him to raise a general insurrection in the kingdom, and furnished him with a lively and animated eloquence in the speech he made to an assembly which he had summoned to meet. He represented to them the charms of liberty to which he invited them. Then he laid open to their view the loss of their privileges, and ruin of their religion, which they must unavoidably suffer under a Prince governed by Spanish counsels, and by Monks, both equally enemies to their liberty and religion; under a Prince inspired from his infancy with a violent hatred of Protestants, and who sufficiently discovered what measures he would take hereafter, by those which he had already taken in his own dominions, where the banishment of his subjects, the ruin and desolation of families, and the confiscation of lands and goods were the only monuments he had raised to his glory. He concluded with these memorable words. Remember that now there is room neither for repentance, nor for pardon. We must no longer reason, nor deliberate. We only want concord and steadiness. The lot is cast. If we prove victorious, we shall be a just, free, and sovereign people; if we are conquered, we shall be traitors, perjured persons, and rebels. He animated them to that degree, that they all resolved on an insurrection. They who disapproved it, durst not discover their sentiments, for fear of being ill-used by the rest: thus it commonly happens that men of a peaceable disposition are carried down with the torrent of a faction.

Upon the news of this great revolution, the opinions of the court of Vienna were divided. FERDINAND's cabal were for severely punishing the rebels. MATTHIAS, on the contrary, thought it proper to reclaim them by moderation, and by offering them new privileges. This was also the opinion of Cardinal GIESEL, his first Minister. The true cause of this opinion was not so much the clemency either of the Emperor, or of the Cardinal, though they were both moderate enough, as their jealousy of the Spaniards. MATTHIAS could not send forces to Bohemia, without giving the command of them to FERDINAND, and that was giving it to the Spaniards, whose conduct displeased him, as he had shewn by declaring for the new Republic of Holland. Therefore the Emperor and his first Minister would have greatly wished to avoid the war: but they could not prevent it, nor refuse the command of the army to FERDINAND.

All

All they could do was to limit his authority, by giving him a council made up of the creatures of MATTHIAS. This displeased him so much that at the instigation of the Spanish Ambassador, without whom he did nothing, he resolved to ruin Cardinal GLESEL, whom he believed to be the cause of the restrictions put upon his authority. In effect, after some complaints against the Cardinal's conduct, which tended to discredit him as a man too favourable to the Heretics, and too little concerned for the aggrandisement of the house of Austria, he was seized in the antichamber of the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, and immediately carried to Innspruch.

Very submissive excuses were made to MATTHIAS for this proceeding: but as he loved the Cardinal, and besides as the seizing of the Cardinal was a notorious contempt of his authority, all these submissions did not pacify him. Whether awake or asleep, he was heard loudly crying that his GLESEL must be restored to him. Nay it is said, that, in order to revenge that affront, he was upon the point of going over to the malecontents of Bohemia. Cardinal DIETRICHSTEIN appeased him a little, by bringing the King of Bohemia, and the Archduke MAXIMILIAN, into his chamber, to ask his pardon, and to protest that from thenceforth they would make no incroachment upon the Imperial authority. Nevertheless, the short time he lived, he passed it in continual apprehensions, feeling the judgment of God upon him, who permitted his cousin FERDINAND to deprive him of that authority, of which he himself had deprived his brother, the Emperor RUDOLPH. MATTHIAS died on the twentieth of March 1619.

The better to understand how the disorders of Bohemia agitated the whole empire, it is fit to know that ever since the year 1608, the Protestants, oppressed in several places, and fearing lest their patience should bring upon them new hardships, had laid the foundation of a particular alliance among several of them for their mutual preservation. This was done in the assembly of Ahaufen, on the fourth of May 1618; but the alliance was only concluded in the assembly of Hall in Suabia. The following year this alliance took the name of the Union, and the Princes who entered into it, that of Correspondents. The Elector Palatine was chosen the chief of the Union.

The Papists having met at Munich, made at the same time another alliance among themselves, and gave it the pompous title of the Catholic League; they chose for the chief of it the Duke of Bavaria, a very artful Prince, who well knew how to improve the public calamities to the advantage of his own house. These two great parties, or if you will, these two great Leagues, observed each other, without proceeding to extremities; but at last the troubles of Bohemia having taken birth from an affair of religion, and the whole empire being possessed either with the fears, or the hopes that the successor of MATTHIAS would persecute the Protestants, both the Union and the League prepared for a war which appeared inevitable.

But there was this difference between the chiefs of the Union, and those of the League, the latter acted with greater prudence and concord than the former, and signally triumphed over them. The Princes of the Union were not diligent enough in preparing for a war: they suffered themselves to be amused with proposals of accommodation, they gave the League time to bring together great forces, and after that, they could no longer brave it. They committed the fault which is very common in civil wars, viz. that people endeavour to save appearances. If a party would save appearances, they must lie quiet, but if they will not lie quiet, they must push things to an extremity, without keeping any measures. It rarely happens but that otherwise they are at once both criminal and unfortunate. Let this be said without any prejudice to the rights of the German Princes, who assert, that it was as lawful for them, with regard both to their civil and religious interests, to favour the cause of the Elector Palatine against FERDINAND, as it was for the King of France to favour the United Provinces against the Spaniards, and for the King of Spain to favour sometimes the League against the lawful heir of the crown, and sometimes the Duke of Rohan against LEWIS XIII. But if they had a right to succour the Protestants of Bohemia, who took arms against FERDINAND, they must at least own that they did them very little service. He who gave the most reputation to the arms of the Bohemians was ERNEST Count Mansfeld; who being informed of their insurrection, when he was in Piedmont, in the service of the Duke of Savoy, eagerly embraced that opportunity of signalizing himself, and offered them his service with two thousand men, whom the Duke allowed him to choose out of his troops, and maintained till the Count arrived in Bohemia. He was a brave man, who sought such opportunities in order to raise himself, and to subsist with splendor. He was natural son to PETER ERNEST, Count Mansfeld, Governor of the Low-Countries for the King of Spain, and had abandoned Popery, after having made several campaigns in the Emperor's service. He was cordially received by the malecontents of Hungary, who honoured him with the post of General of the artillery, and he became, with Count LA TOUR, one of the principal supports of the party.

The Imperial troops, which had been sent into Bohemia under the command of Count BUQUOY, there exercised unheard-of cruelties and violences; this still more exasperated the Bohemians, and determined Silesia and Lusatia to join them. The two parties fought, they besieged, lost, and took towns; but it is certain, that in the beginning beginning, the Imperialists had the disadvantage, and that almost all the towns of the kingdom fell into the hands of the male-contents.

As for the Princes of the Union, they contented themselves with assembling at Rottemburg on the Tauber, from whence they sent deputies to his Imperial majesty, humbly desiring him to consider that all the Protestants of Germany had a great interest in the affair of Bohemia, and beseeching him to recal his troops. The affair was brought to a negotiation. The Archbishop of Mentz, the Elector Palatine, the Elector of Saxony, and the Duke of Bavaria were nominated to make that accommodation; but the tedious proceedings so common in Germany in affairs of this nature, and the death of the Emperor MATTHIAS prevented all redress.

As the house of Austria pretended that the kingdom of Bohemia was hereditary, whereas the States of the kingdom maintained that it was elective, MATTHIAS would not submit his cousin FERDINAND to the election of the Bohemians, when he made him their King; for that had been to acknowledge the justice of their pretensions. Thus FERDINAND had not obtained the crown of Bohemia by election, and consequently, according to the Bohemians, he had no right to it. For this reason, being informed that FERDINAND had been invited to the election of an Emperor as King of Bohemia, they represented to the Electoral College that he could not assist at the Diet in that capacity. But these remonstrances were not regarded. He was not only present at the election, but was also chosen Emperor on the twenty-eighth of August 1619.

The Pope, the King of Spain, and the whole Popish party, were so impatient to see FERDINAND upon the Imperial throne, because they hoped he would destroy the Protestant religion throughout the whole empire, that there was no possibility of deferring the Diet which was to elect a successor to MATTHIAS. They in vain represented that it was necessary to wait till these disorders were somewhat appeased. The Popish party took all this for an artifice, and imagined that the Protestant Princes required time only the better to concert on the ways of excluding the King of Bohemia. Whereupon SUICOSD Archbishop of Mentz, one of the principal supports of the Catholic League, summoned the Electoral Diet to meet at Francfort on the twentieth of July 1619. This function belonged to him, both as great Chancellor of the German empire, in the capacity of Archbishop of Mentz; and as Dean of the Electoral College. FERDINAND was elected Emperor, as I have said, on the twentieth of August following, and was crowned a few days after, to wit, on the ninth of September.

Never perhaps did he find himself in more perplexing circumstances than the first year after the death of the Emperor MATTHIAS. The death of that Emperor revived the animosity of the Bohemians, and their diffidence increased, as they knew that MATTHIAS, who was more inclined to soften than to irritate affairs, could no longer check the restless humour of FERDINAND. In vain he made them advantageous, promises, they were not disposed to hearken to them, nor to believe that they were any thing more than Jesuitical artifices; besides by accepting the amnesty which he offered them, they would have acknowledged him as their lawful sovereign; which was very inconsistent with their pretensions. Most of the neighbouring provinces followed their example. Silesia and Lusatia had already done it; and Moravia did it some time after.

The States of upper Austria resolved to keep the government in their own hands, till it should be decided to whom the succession lawfully belonged, whether to FERDINAND, or to ALBERT the brother of MATTHIAS; the Lower Austria was so full of male-contents, that it would have followed this example, had not the presence of FERDINAND hindered it from revolting. But neither could his presence nor authority stop the progress of Count LA TOUR, who drew near the Danube, passed that river, seized on the suburbs of Vienna, and besieged the city with great hopes of taking it by the correspondence he held with some persons in it. Happily for FERDINAND Count DAMPIER defeated MANSFELD, which obliged LA TOUR to retire. Though this good fortune was followed by another more considerable, I mean the election of FERDINAND, yet he found himself plunged in new distresses, for on one side the Bohemians created FREDERIC Elector Palatine, their King, and on the other BETHLEN GABOR, Prince of Transylvania, entered like a torrent into Hungary, made himself master of Cassovia, Altenburg, Presburg, and several other places; while the Bohemian troops commanded by Count LA TOUR marching along the borders of Austria, threatened the capital city, and entered Hungary, to join the Prince of Transylvania.

All this was more than sufficient to disturb a Prince of the greatest resolution, and it must be owned that FERDINAND had more merit, and possessed more great qualities, than many Historians ascribe to him, since he was proof against so many attacks, and not only acted like a man who was not astonished, but likewise dissipated all these factions, and rendered all the enterprizes of his enemies vain and fruitless.

If I did not remember that I mention these things only by way of digression, I should with pleasure set forth all the events which heighten the fortune of this Prince; but as I must soon return to GUSTAVUS, I shall speak of what followed only so far as it is necessary to give my readers a distinct idea of the State of Germany, when

VOL. V.

8 I

when the King of Sweden entered it. Yet I shall do it in such a manner, that the brevity of my narrative may not render it too dry, and obscure the series of the events.

To have a full view of the bad posture of the Emperor's affairs, we must consider that Bohemia, Silesia, Moravia, Lusatia, and Austria, had taken arms against him, while the Transylvanian BETHLEN GABOR, a Prince of great credit at the Ottoman Porte, valiant, courageous, and already master of the greatest part of Hungary, hastens with extreme eagerness to make new conquests, and is on his march to join the malecontents. Besides, we must look upon the insurrection of these provinces, not as one of those popular commotions which have no considerable chief, no discipline, nor counsel. They were great provinces, which, after having shaken off his yoke, were directed by wise and experienced men, who corresponded with the neighbouring States. Provinces which gave the command of their troops to famous Generals, or rather provinces very considerable for their number and forces, which chose for their King one of the first Princes of the empire, young, valiant, son-in-law to the King of England, and nephew to Prince MAURICE, who was esteemed a great General, and had great power in a flourishing Republic, at enmity with the Spaniards. Besides, we must consider that the house of Austria appeared too powerful to several Princes of Europe; that France, its antient enemy, was not the only state which desired to prescribe limits to its great power; and that the Elector Palatine had accepted the crown of Bohemia with the consent of the Protestant Princes of Germany; which supposes that they would assist him, with all their forces, against an enemy whom they all feared, being induced to it both by the interests of their religion, and of their States.

By shewing all the distresses and apprehensions of FERDINAND in the beginning of his reign, methinks I have solidly refuted those who have censured the Elector Palatine. Some have called him inconsiderate, as having accepted the crown of Bohemia against all the rules of prudence; others have said that he was simple enough to yield to the importunities of his wife, a daughter of the King of England, and for that reason highly displeased that she did not bear the glorious title of MAJESTY. All these censurers, I say, are people of a vulgar understanding, who think nothing commendable, but what is successful, and blame all unfortunate enterprizes. Had they any penetration, they would find that human prudence is, properly speaking, the sport of the providence of GOD, who to humble us, and to convince us that he is the supreme governor of all things, very frequently permits that the best concerted enterprizes should be defeated, and that the most rash and inconsiderate should succeed.

I will not give an instance of the former kind in the enterprize of the Elector Palatine, for I own it must be ranked among those of a doubtful issue. But I believe when all things are carefully examined it will be granted me, that there was not more to be feared than to be hoped from that enterprize; and therefore that this Prince did nothing but what a man of courage might have done, without being guilty of imprudence. So that even if it was granted that the ambition and pride of his wife contributed to determine his accepting the crown of Bohemia, his conduct would nevertheless be commendable, since it is certain, that if a Prince may, without rashness, engage in an enterprize, when the probability of succeeding in it, is equal to that of failing, and when a crown is the prize of the former, much more may he do it at the solicitation of his wife, who begs of him to give her a rank equal to her birth. But in spite of all that can be said, the world will never be persuaded that a Prince who has lost all his dominions for having accepted a crown, acted prudently in accepting it. He who regulates his conduct according to the appearances of future events, is not, in the opinion of the world, a wise man, unless besides he foresees among future events, those which happen contrary to all appearances. The world ridiculously imagines that successful men foresee all those caprices of fortune to which they owed their success, and consequently that the unsuccessful are much to be blamed for not having foreseen those caprices which defeated their enterprizes.

It was by several events which happened contrary to all appearances, that the Elector Palatine unhappily failed in his enterprize. It was easy to foresee, say they, that King JAMES would assist his son-in-law no otherwise than by some offers of mediation, by letters and Ambassadors. This is the only service he ever did to his allies: but this is exaggerated; for it was not improbable that a father, notwithstanding his pacific temper would make some efforts in favour of his children; and even if we grant that the Elector ought to have looked upon England as a country lost to the rest of Europe, and whose fortune it seems to be not to concern itself for the oppression of the weakest, were there not Princes enough besides, from whom, according to all appearances, he might expect assistance?

Who could have believed that the Protestants of Germany would have abandoned the Elector Palatine, they, who under the name of Correspondents had engaged from the year 1609 to maintain liberty, and the Protestant religion in the empire? They who believed that the Emperor was an enemy to both? They, in short, who having been consulted by FREDERIC, their chief, in the assembly held at Rottemburg on the twelfth of September 1619, answered that he ought to accept the crown of Bohemia, not not only as being a new dignity, but also as what was necessary for the public good of Germany, and that of their allies, and advised him to set out immediately for Bohemia? Who could have believed that France, which, in those times, exclaimed so loudly against Princes that are too powerful, and solicited all Europe to make leagues against the house of Austria, would neglect so favourable an opportunity of weakening it? Who could have believed that France would side with FERDINAND, against those who aimed at depriving him of a part of his power? Who could have believed that BETHLEN GABOR, after such fortunate beginnings, after all the reputation he had acquired, and all the interest he had with the Turk, would be of no service to the Palatine. Let us therefore say, that FREDERIC was deceived by a train of events so singular, that the most refined prudence could never have suspected it. Let us not believe those who pretend that the vanity of the Duke of BOVILLON, his uncle, joined with that of the Electress, threw him into an imprudent undertaking. They say, that the Duke wrote to his friends at Paris, that while the King of France was making knights at Fountainbleau, he was making Kings in Germany. He might have said so; but as he was one of the ablest men of his age, it is not probable that he would have advised his nephew to accept a crown, if he ought in prudence to have refused it.

Observe that I only speak of human and political prudence: I enter not into the question whether FERDINAND was the true King of Bohemia, and whether, according to the spirit of the Christian religion, the Palatine could accept that crown to which he was elected by the States of the kingdom. That is not the matter in question. The question at present is, whether according to the maxims of an ambition, veiled over with the notion of political prudence, FREDERIC did well to accept the crown of Bohemia; and after all I see no great difference between a Prince who accepts a crown which has been taken from a King deposed, and a Prince who makes war on his neighbour in order to deprive him of his dominions. But though the Palatine had many reasons to hope for success in his enterprize, it was nevertheless unfortunate; so true it is that the divine prudence is pleased to confound the wisdom of man.

As soon as FREDERIC was informed that the States of Bohemia, Silesia, Lusatia, and Moravia, had unanimously chosen him their King, on the twenty-seventh of August 1619, (the very day before FERDINAND was elected Emperor at Frankfort) he assembled the Princes or Correspondents at Rottemburg, who, as we have already seen, advised him to go to Bohemia as soon as possible, and take possession of that crown. Neither he, nor the Electress his wife, had any aversion to it. Accordingly the ceremony of his coronation was only deferred till the fourth of November, and that of the Princess till the seventh. On the twenty-eighth of next April, the States of the kingdom chose his eldest son, being six years of age, for his successor. The Imperialists were not able to keep more than two places in Bohemia. Let us now see by what means FERDINAND surmounted all these distresses.

Religion was his principal machine for that purpose. He had approved his zeal for Popery by the two methods the most pleasing to the people and the clergy; namely, by a great devotion for the Virgin Mary, the saints, relics, and images, and by persecuting the Protestants. The first thing he did when he succeeded his father was to visit the church of Our Lady of Loretto, and there to make a solemn vow, that even if it should cost him his life, he would exterminate all the sects out of Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola. He engaged in the like vow after he was crowned King of Bohemia and Hungary; for he made a short pilgrimage to an image of the Virgin Mary, which is in great reputation on the frontiers of Stiria, and there he solemnly promised to God to purge Bohemia, and the adjacent provinces, from the venom of Heresy. Several years before his death he made a third vow which concerned Hungary, and wherein he promised to employ all imaginable means to reduce all that kingdom under the obedience of the Virgin, whom he used to call Generalissima in his letters, and in the orders he sent to his Generals.

This signal devotion, as the Papists called it, or superstition, according to the Protestants, was both of great service and of great prejudice to FERDINAND. He reaped many advantages from it for a long time, but at last it proved very prejudicial to the whole house of Austria, and has rather weakened than strengthened the Popish party in Germany. If after this we should wonder how his successors came to follow his example, not only with regard to the excessive worship paid to the creatures, and the spirit of persecution, but likewise with regard to the blind complaisance he paid to the Monks, we ought to consider, (and then our wonder will be over) that the Monks had the cunning to make them believe that all the blessings which God bestows on the most august house of Austria, are the rewards of its zeal for the extirpation of the Protestants, and that all the afflictions which God sends on that house, proceed from its not being rigorous enough against the enemies of the Church. But this is a manifest contradiction: for if the severity of the house of Austria was great enough to be rewarded by God, the indulgence of it could not deserve to be chastised. But Kings and Emperors do not much regard this.

Be that as it will, it is great pity that FERDINAND was inspired with a zeal so superstitious and inhuman; for it cannot be denied that he had great merit, and that he ought ought to be ranked among the illustrious men of that age. If we are not to believe that he deserved all the encomiums bestowed on him by the Jesuit LE MORMAN, his confessor, we must not on the other hand give credit to all that has been said in his prejudice by the Historians of the contrary party. It is reported that BETHLEN GABOR said, it was dangerous to make war upon FERDINAND, because he was neither daunted by adversity, nor dazzled with prosperity. After the coronation of the Palatine, FERDINAND made it appear that he was able to do something more than make vows to the Virgin Mary, for he used a very dextrous policy.

As his greatest apprehension was lest France should send forces to the new King of Bohemia, he sent Count FURSTENBERG Ambassador to the French court, and ordered him to represent that the design of the Protestants in Germany was only to ruin the Catholic religion, and that it was hoped his most Christian Majesty would powerfully assist the Emperor, who was engaged in so holy a cause. But he was far from representing matters in this light to the correspondent Princes. They held a famous assembly at Nuremberg, a little after the coronation of FREDERIC, who did not fail to be present there. Count HOHENZOLLERN was sent thither by his Imperial Majesty, and protested in his name, that he never had any thing so much at heart as the public tranquillity, the peace of religion, and of the State, and the preservation of the laws. He spoke afterwards of the affairs of Bohemia, and maintained that religion was only the pretext of the revolt, and that the Emperor had no difference with the Bohemians, on that account, nor would have any. At last he exhorted the assembly to find ways of accommodation, which might restore peace to the empire, in such a manner as might consist with the honour of his Imperial Majesty.

This was very artful; for it was imagined that FERDINAND, prompted by the Jesuits, aimed only at the ruin of the Protestant religion; and yet he intimates to the Protestant Princes that he has no such design, that religion is no way concerned in the troubles of Germany, and that he does not design to make the least attempt upon the liberty of conscience. By these fine protestations he lulled them asleep, so that they abandoned the unfortunate King of Bohemia.

It is true they did not come at once to such a strange resolution, for the answer they gave to Count HOHENZOLLERN made him fully sensible that they were aware of his artifice, and designed to assist the Palatine; but they did not long continue in that resolution.

The Princes of the Catholic League meeting at Wirtzburg, at the same time that those of the Evangelical Union met at Nuremberg, they resolved to raise an army which should be commanded by the Duke of Bavaria. This assembly at Wirtzburg was very numerous. There were present Ambassadors from the Emperor, Agents from the Spanish King, and Deputies from the Duke of Lorraine. FERDINAND's Ambassadors were far from saying that religion was not concerned in the quarrel, they strongly insisted on the contrary. So that one of the chief affairs which were laid before this assembly, was the preservation of the Catholic religion, threatened on all sides with utter ruin. This was as artful a conduct at least as that of declaring to the Protestants that religion was not concerned in the quarrel, and that the Emperor had no design to meddle in so tender a point: for most of the members of the Catholic League being either Prelates or Abbots, when FERDINAND persuaded them that the Protestants intended to destroy the Romish Church, he affected them in the most sensible manner; thus FERDINAND interested them in his cause by all that was dearest to them, namely, by the fear of losing a temporal and spiritual empire, which brought them great revenues, and made them lead a most delicious life.

The correspondent Princes, alarmed at the great levies made by the Catholic League, sent a deputation to the Duke of Bavaria, to acquaint him of their inclination to a peace, and presented to him a long deduction of their sentiments and demands. The Duke answered; they replied; and he also replied in his turn. There passed on both sides complaints, reproaches, justifications, protestations, and, in general, whatever is employed in the quarrels of the pen which precede, or accompany, the first acts of hostility. The result was that the Catholic League made prodigious armaments, and artfully amused the Princes of the Evangelical Union, who were content to be on their guard.

We shall soon see the effect of FERDINAND's embassy to the court of France. As to the Ambassadors whom he sent to CHRISTIAN IV King of Denmark, and to the Duke of Brunfwic, they obtained all that their master could reasonably expect, since these Princes promised to keep a perfect neutrality. The Ambassadors whom he sent to Italy obtained of the Pope considerable supplies of money, besides the troops sent by some Italian Princes, and two levies made in Sicily and the kingdom of Naples. FERDINAND had so well persuaded the world that his cause was the cause of the Church, that we may wonder the Pope did not publish a crusade against the Correspondents.

I know not whether it was owing to the address of this Prince, or to the stupidity of the court of France, that the French loudly declared for him. But at least it is certain that there never was a conduct more impolitic than this. France and the house of Austria had long been upon such terms, that they took all advantages of each other, and and it was then only ten years since the death of HENRY IV, when he was ready to begin a war, the design of which was to reduce both the Emperor and the King of Spain to a very low condition. That war had long been designed, and all the necessary preparations had been made for it. France had also for a long time openly supported the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, which had shaken off the Spanish yoke. The Spaniards had not been wanting on their side, and had like to have ruined the French monarchy, in the time of the League. In short, no nation in Europe had more reason than France to weaken the house of Austria; and yet the French neglected the finest opportunity of doing it, and not content to do that house no prejudice, they rendered a signal service to it, since they were the principal cause of the treaty of Ulm, which disarmed the Correspondent Princes, and ruined the affairs of the Palatine. The French boast of that oversight, which was a notorious and unpardonable blunder in politics. They have said that France assisted the Emperor for the love of religion. People must say something to justify their faults, and cover them, if possible, with the cloak of religion. But on whom would they impose? If Popery was the cause why the French would not assist the King of Bohemia, why did they favour the Dutch, why did they make a League with the King of Sweden?

What is most probable is, that the Emperor's Ambassador arrived at Paris in the reign of a favourite who had meditated the ruin of Calvinism. It is not certainly known whether the address of the Spaniards, who at that time had many creatures at the court of France, whom they retained in good pay, inspired the Constable DE LUYNES with the design of attacking the Huguenots; or whether he derived that design from the hopes he conceived that by signalizing his ministry by an enterprise extremely agreeable to the Monks and the rabble, he should blot out the remembrance of the low and mean arts by which he had risen to favour. But however that may be, he it was who kindled the civil wars which raged in France under the reign of LEWIS XIII. He had already broached this design, when FERDINAND sent to demand assistance from the King of France. He had observed that the Emperor represented the quarrel between him and the new King of Bohemia, as an affair in which religion was concerned, and that the Duke of BOUILLON had not defeated this artifice, when he wrote to LEWIS XIII that the Catholics enjoyed all manner of liberty in the dominions of the male-contents, and therefore that the Emperor deceived him, when he affirmed that they designed to ruin his religion. Upon this the Constable had either honesty, or simplicity enough to believe that it was not fit to assist Heretics abroad, while he persecuted them at home.

Some have said that he engaged in the design of ruining the affairs of the Palatine, because the Spanish Ambassador had promised that his brother should be married to the heiress of CHAULNES, who was then at the court of the Infanta. Whatever might have been the cause of this conduct, it is certain that by his means it was resolved that France should favour the cause of FERDINAND. This was adding a second fault to the former, for he had done very wrong to undertake the ruin of the Huguenots. By the treaty of Ulm he shewed that he was entirely ignorant of the principles which had guided the French politics for many years.

This treaty of Ulm was concluded on the third of July 1620, by the Duke of ANGOULESME, Count BETHUNE and Mr de CHATEAUNEUF Ambassadors extraordinary from France. By this treaty it was agreed that the Catholic League might act and undertake against Bohemia and the provinces incorporated with that kingdom, whatever they thought proper, and that the Evangelical Union should not be allowed to make any opposition in favour of the Bohemians and their confederates. The Princes who composed that Union must have been struck with stupidity, for they signed this treaty, which was certainly one of the greatest blows to ruin the Elector Palatine and raise the fortune of the Emperor.

To this may be added two others; the first of which was the truce concluded with BETHLEN GABOR, and the second the formidable armies levied by the Emperor, and commanded by the most experienced Generals in Europe. As for the truce, we must know that the Archduke CHARLES, brother to the Emperor FERDINAND, having been driven out of his Bishopric of Breslaw, when Silesia shook off the yoke, retired to the court of the King of Poland, his brother-in-law, and obtained his permission to levy ten thousand men, who did the Emperor great service, for HOMONAI, an Hungarian Baron, headed them, entered into Upper Hungary, defeated RAGOTSKI, General of BETHLEN GABOR's army, and very much contributed to the concluding of a truce for ten months between the Emperor, and the Prince of Transylvania. During this truce, FERDINAND's troops, freed from a great trouble, applied wholly to reduce the provinces which had withdrawn their obedience from the Emperor. And as these troops were very numerous, and had that affair only to execute, it is not surprising that they succeeded, nor must we praise so much the devotion of FERDINAND, as if in this affair it had wrought miracles, for sure any other man, without being acquainted with the Holy Virgin, or St Ignatius, might have done the like exploits, had he been in the same circumstances with FERDINAND.

On the 27th
of February 1620.

Besides the army of the Catholic League, which was in Suabia, consisting of thirty thousand men, at the same time that the Emperor published the sentence of proscription against FREDERIC; I say, besides this army the command of which the Duke of Bavaria gave to TILLY, a General of great reputation, the King of Spain sent the Emperor five thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot, without reckoning the Levies which he ordered Count Ognate, his Ambassador at Vienna, to make for the Emperor in the States of Italy, and in Austria. The King of Poland sent the Emperor five thousand Cossacks, and several Italian Princes furnished him either with money or soldiers. The troops commanded by Count BUQUOI in Hungary, drew near the revolted provinces, as soon as the truce was concluded with BETHLEN GABOR, greatly pressed the Bohemians on the side of Lower Austria, and defeated them in several engagements. At the same time, HOMONAI entered Moravia and Silesia, and ravaged these countries, and Count DAMPIERRE pursued the troops of Count LA TOUR as far as Bohemia.

This being the State of affairs when the Princes of the Evangelical Union promised by the treaty of Ulm to suffer those of the Catholic League to do whatever they thought proper in favour of FERDINAND, and against the Elector Palatine, it was humanly impossible but that the Emperor must entirely ruin that unfortunate Prince who was King of Bohemia. We must not forget that the King of Spain sent the Marquis SPINOLA with an army of twenty-five, or thirty thousand men into the Palatinate, where notwithstanding the resistance of the Correspondent Princes, he made himself master of a great many places. Nor must we forget that the Elector of Saxony, though a Protestant, took upon him to execute the Imperial Ban against Bohemia, and attacked Lusatia, at the same time that the Duke of Bavaria was marching against FREDERIC.

ANNO
1620.

In such a situation of affairs, this Duke could not doubt of the ruin of FREDERIC. Nevertheless being very politic, he judged that he must use great diligence, lest he should lose this opportunity by some unexpected change. Therefore as soon as the treaty of Ulm was signed, his army advanced to Austria, and, laid waste the whole country in such a manner, putting the peasants to the sword and setting the houses on fire, that the cities were terrified, and despairing of their safety, returned to their obedience, and submitted to the discretion of the conqueror. Afterwards the Duke of Bavaria having joined BUQUOI, they resolved to carry the war into the heart of Bohemia, and march directly to Prague, since FREDERIC, trusting to the promises of the Transilvanian, whose truce with the Emperor would soon expire, refused to resign his crown. They actually entered it

CRITICAL

C R I T I C A L
R E M A R K S
UPON THE
N E W E D I T I O N
O F
M O R E R I ' S
H I S T O R I C A L
D I C T I O N A R Y ,

Published in the year 1704.

W I T H

A Preface and several Observations written by Mr BAYLE, for the use of the new editors of that Dictionary.

Translated into English from the third edition of the Original French.

To which are added, NEW OBSERVATIONS upon those Critical Remarks, and on the edition of Moreri printed in the year 1725.

M^R B A Y L E'S

P R E F A C E

CONCERNING

The second edition of these CRITICAL REMARKS.

HERE are few books of such general use as an Historical Dictionary. The public is so convinced of this, that though it was well known that Moreri's Dictionary, even after it had been several times corrected, was full of faults, yet a great many editions of it have been sold off. It is therefore doing a good service to the Republic of Letters, to contribute to the correction of this Dictionary. For this reason it has been thought proper to reprint here (at Rotterdam) the Critical Remarks which an anonymous author published at Paris upon the last edition of Moreri. They may be useful both to those who have already purchased that edition, and still more so to those who propose to make further amendments in that Dictionary.

That last edition of Moreri, as well as the edition of Paris 1699, were revised by Mr Vaultier, and are undoubtedly much better than the preceding ones; for besides that Mr Vaultier is a man of parts, his great vivacity does not hinder him from being extremely laborious and capable of a very long and deep application. This last quality is absolutely necessary for those who correct such an extensive and defective work as is the Dictionary of Moreri; but let a man be ever so much endowed with it, that he alone should be able to perfect this work, does not seem possible; for there are certain little pains which a great genius cannot take, they are beneath him, he does not willingly undergo the trouble of correcting any thing else but the faults which are the most diffused through the body of the work, and while he bestows his chief attention upon that, is it to be thought that he will take notice of a false date, of a proper name ill spelt, and of several other minute particulars, the correcting of which must be left to a man who is fit for examining punctilio's, and has more patience than vivacity of genius? Those who shall attend to this will read the remarks of the anonymous author upon the edition in 1704, without lessening the praises which Mr Vaultier has so justly merited.

In the present edition of these remarks, care has been taken to correct several errors of the press, besides those which are pointed out in the Errata of the Paris edition. The notes that are put in the margin serve to rectify, or to explain the text, or to give hints to the correctors of Moreri. It was thought proper to follow this method, in order to hinder the readers from being sometimes mistaken in believing that the remarks of the anonymous writer are always just. He is no doubt a man of better sense than to take it ill, that we have preferred the interest of the public to that of him in particular: and as he seems disposed to continue his remarks, which is a very commendable design, and may contribute much to the public advantage, it was thought that he would execute his design, and improve his talent with greater vigilance, and in a more beneficial way to the editors of the Historical Dictionary, if his Critical notes were sometimes criticized upon. I say sometimes, because in his work there are certain things upon which we have made no observations though we might have animadverted upon them in a remark. For example,

He finds fault (a) that in enumerating the works of James Almain there is no notice taken of that which concerns the Laity. The very circumstances of the time, adds he, should have engaged the Editor to speak of it with some exactness. This censure may be justly blamed; for the greatest part of his readers will not understand it. A book which concerns the Laity, is something so indeterminate that one may form a hundred different ideas of it. The circumstances of the time are not indeed such a general object, but they nevertheless include several things, and thus a reader who does not precisely know the character of that book of Almain, will never be able to guess the relation it bears to the present times. Now as an Historical Dictionary ought to serve instead of a library to the ignorant, it should be so contrived that the reader may find perspicuity enough in the work itself to understand

MAIN.

VOL. V.

8 L

stand whatever is told in it without any other assistance. The same perspicuity should have appeared in the remarks of the anonymous writer, since they are a kind of supplement to Moreri, and a model for correcting him. It is therefore a fault to point out a book of Almain in a manner that is so obscure to a vast number of readers. We may add that to consult the conveniency of Moreri's Editors one should save them as much trouble as it is possible, and give them proper directions. This is what has not been done with respect to the omission that we find fault with concerning Almain, and it is what would have been done, if particular notice had been taken of the nature of the book, the place and time of the impression, &c. I would willingly supply this defect if I had the necessary helps, but the only conjecture I can frame of our author's meaning is, that Almain wrote a book wherein he treated of the authority of the people, and of the authority of the church, and maintained that as the power of the people represented by the assembly of the States of the kingdom, is superior to that of the head of the nation, that is to say to the power of the King, so the power of a council representing the whole body of the Church is superior to that of the Pope, notwithstanding his primacy, and quality of head of the Church. It is certain that James Almain having learned from John Major, a Scotchman by nation, this doctrine concerning the authority of the people, defended it vigorously and made use of it as a proof of the superiority of councils over the Pope. The catalogue of his books given by Dr de Launoi, (b) contains the following words: 'Expositio circa decisiones questionum Magistri Guillelmi Occam de potestate summi Pontificis, liberque inscribitur de suprema potestate Ecclesiastica & laica, ubi certa quaedam est propositio quæ tunc ut apparuit, tolerabatur, sed nunc tolerari desit. - - - - - An exposition concerning the decisions of the questions of Master William Occam touching the authority of the Pope, and the book is intitled; Of the supreme power, Ecclesiastical and Civil, where there is a certain proposition, which, as it appeared then, was tolerated, but has now ceased to be so.' There have always been Divines in France who maintained the superiority of the Pope over the council, and dextrously objected that those who lay so great a stress upon the writings of Almain and Major for the contrary sentiment, authorize a republican tenet altogether injurious to the majesty of kings. This is what contributed to the ruin of the famous Dr Richer in the reign of Lewis XIII, for it was not purely out of complaisance to the court of Rome that he was persecuted, they prepossessed the court of France against him, by shewing that he warmly maintained the inferiority of the Pope for no other reason but because he was strongly possessed with the tenet, That the States of the kingdom are superior to the King, and may dethrone, expel, shut up in a monastery, and punish their King in what other manner they please. They produced a thesis which he had defended in the year 1591, that the States were indisputably above the King, and that Henry III, had been justly proceeded against as a tyrant.

Had our author thought fit to explain what he expresses obscurely, and thereby to enable the editors of Moreri, to make the article of Almain curious, methinks he would have said at least in general what I have just observed; but in order to render himself thoroughly intelligible, it would have been necessary for him to particularize the relation which he finds between that Doctor's book, and the circumstances of the time, for in France there is no debate carried on concerning the question, whether the authority of the people be superior to that of the King; and as to what concerns the question whether councils be superior to the Pope, it was seasonable at Paris during the pontificate of Innocent XI, but from that time it is fallen into oblivion, and whoever should attempt to revive it, would render himself odious. It is not therefore easy to know that the circumstances of the time should have engaged Mr Vaultier to speak of Almain's book with some exactness.

We could shew, by other examples, that we had reason to say, we might have made more marginal notes than we have made. Notwithstanding we do affirm, that the critical remarks of which we here give a second edition, deserve to be read: they are short and lively, and will not tire any man's patience. If we had a mind to prepossess the readers in favour of them, we would not fail to take advantage of what is set forth in the Kings royal licence, that they have been approved by Mr Pouchard. This is the name of a formidable Critic who has vexed several authors in the Journal des Savans. The society that writes this journal had a great loss by his death: he embellished this work by the wit which he diffused through the articles that fell to his share, and which good judges readily distinguished; and he did not possess in a less degree than his brethren the talent of giving a sufficient idea of a large book in few words. This is a rare talent among the Journalists, some of whom cruelly fatigue the reader by bringing him back three or four times to the same book, which sometimes happens to be a very indifferent one, and would be treated with complaisance enough if it were but once mentioned. I think Mr Pouchard sufficiently ridiculed them, and with more reason than he ridiculed some other books, for it must be confessed that his criticism was a little too severe. People loudly complained of it, as will appear by the following instance. 'If the productions of wit had been formerly censured in the same manner as they are now, the empire of learning would be a desert, and several of those whose first performances succeeded ill would have ceased to write, and would not have become the ornament of France and the admiration of all Europe, where their writings are spread. At this day there are still to be seen, some, who began to make their appearance in the world by nothing higher than plain elegies, and who are grown to be lights of the Church. In fine the church, the bar, and several societies

(b) Page 613, of the Latin History of the College of Navarre.

'societies of the kingdom are full of learned men whose first performances made no great figure (c).'

What a prejudice would it not be in favour of the remarks upon the new edition of Moreri, that Mr Poucbard had allowed them to be solid! But as we have no mind to impose upon the reader, we honestly declare here that the approbation which is spoken of in the privilege, consists only in this, that Mr Poucbard declares he has read them by order of the Lord Chancellor, and that he has found nothing in them which can hinder their being printed. The meaning of this is no more than that they contain nothing against religion, morality, or the government.

If it be objected to our author that he should have communicated his remarks to the Paris editor, and not have published them, he may answer that he was willing that the Dutch editors, and the translators of Moreri into English, and German should reap the advantage of them: and after all, none but such morose Critics as can suffer nothing to escape their censure, will find fault with him for having published his discoveries, and for resolving to make himself further useful to the editors of the Historical Dictionary; for, as I said before, it is a matter of great consequence that a work of such a nature should be purged of all its defects. It is surprising that after having passed so many times under the eyes of the revisers and correctors of the press, it should be so full of gross faults, that, for example, we still find there that Postellus born about the year 1477, died in the year 1581, aged near a hundred years (1). No book should have been made sooner correct than this, for it has been read by more people than most other books, and the most ignorant readers are capable of discovering some faults in it. The first thing they do is to look out for their native country, and the towns where they have made some stay. The mistakes of Moreri in such articles cannot escape them. They should therefore inform the Booksellers of these mistakes, which would be a very easy thing, and as every reader may observe the falsities of this Dictionary in matters that come within his reach, it would not be difficult for him to communicate a list of them which might serve for the correction of new editions. It must be confessed that the indolence of readers has been very extraordinary, for they have almost all neglected to give notice of the mistakes which they had observed. How is it possible that among so many people who had been at Brisac, and who knew that according to Moreri that town had a stone bridge upon the Rhine, there has not been one who has had the charity to tell, or cause the Printers or editors to be told, that it was necessary to correct that passage (2). I should be glad that this reproach might serve to cure the almost lethargic indifference of the greatest part of readers.

But it would not be enough that every one should furnish a list of the faults he had observed; the labour of those who take upon them ex professo to correct Moreri, would still be very great. There will never be a thorough correction made, unless they take the pains to visit all the sources from whence Mr Moreri has drawn his materials. It is a troublesome piece of work, but not so terrible as it appears to those who consider the multitude of authors whom he quotes at the end of several articles, for we must not believe that he has consulted all these authors. I am certain that with regard to the Greek, and Latin Historians, he has generally consulted only Vossius, and that with respect to Ecclesiastical affairs and Ecclesiastical writers he has hardly consulted any but Baronius, Spondanus, Godeau, and Father Labbe. To what end therefore has he quoted so many others? I know not, but it seems to me that such an affectation which cost him little, since he did no more than name the authors whom Vossius &c. had cited, tends much less to the profit of the readers, than to persuade them falsely that he turned over an infinite number of books. He might have contented himself with referring to Vossius &c. Those who had Vossius would have known at the same time all the other writers mentioned at the end of Moreri's articles. I would not however advise the striking out these quotations which have stood so long, but it would be necessary to make them all intelligible; there are some of them which are not so, because they have too much abridged the names of the authors or the titles of the books. They have done worse sometimes, for they have disfigured both the titles of the books and the names of the authors. A book de Venatione which Moreri had cited, has in the Dutch editions been metamorphosed into a book de Veneratione. He has expressed himself so ill at the end of the article CALENTIO, that designing only to quote one author he quotes two, and disfigures the name of the latter. Cornelius Tollius, says he, in Append. Pierre Valere, de infelicit. Litterat. This should be rectified in the following manner, Cornelius Tollius in the appendix to the treatise of Pierius Valerianus de infelicit. Litterat (3).

(1) Mr Bayle takes notice hereafter of a like blunder, with regard to Mr de Sallo. See his remarks on our author's conclusion.

In the last edition of Moreri, printed at Paris 1725, it is said that Postel died on the sixth of September 1581 aged seventy-six years, three months, and nine days. This date is taken from the Memoires de Litterature of Mr de Sallengre, Tom. I. pag. 24. who had it from the History of the Priory of St Martin in the fields, by Martin Marrier, a Monk and Prior Claustral of that monastery, where Postel was buried: Regalis Monasterii Sancti Martini de Campis, Parisiensis, Ordinis Cluniacensis Historia; Parisiis 1637 in 4to. NEW OBSERVATION.

(2) See hereafter the preface of the author of the Critical Remarks. NEW OBSERVATION.

(3) In the edition of Moreri published at Paris in the year 1712, they changed Pierre Valere into Petr. Valerius: in that of 1725, they have corrected this fault, and put Pierius Valerianus; but they have left the rest as it was, so that they continue to cite two authors, though they design to quote no more than one. NEW OBSERVATION.

(c) Mercure Galant for the month of January 1706 pag. 226 in the place where it speaks of the death of Mr Poucbard who condemned almost all the productions of wit.

By

By consulting the authors whom Moreri has made use of, it will be found that he has often mistaken their meaning, that he has not chosen the most material circumstances, that he has maimed a great many things; and thus by comparing the copy with the original the work might be greatly improved and perfected.

In some things this comparison would not be sufficient. Moreri with respect to the Low-Countries had almost no other guide but Lewis Guicciardin, who made a very good description of them; but as great changes have happened in the towns of that country since the year 1587, when Lewis Guicciardin published the last edition of that work, there are several things which he affirmed with truth, but which cannot be affirmed now without a gross falsehood, and nevertheless Moreri affirms them just as he had read them in Lewis Guicciardin.

For example, Guicciardin says that near Mechlin, or Malines, a little beyond the gate St Catherine, on the road to Antwerp, there is a very large monastery built almost like a fortress, in which is a house consecrated to St Alexis, where above 1500 and sometimes even 1600 nuns continually reside, having the liberty to take care of their affairs, to go abroad, and even to marry if they please. Moreri has not failed to copy this. There is to be seen, says he, in the suburbs of Malines (or Mechlin) the monastery of St Alexis, where there are fifteen or sixteen hundred nuns who have the liberty to go out to take the air, to make and receive visits, and to marry when they think fit. This passage of Moreri always appeared suspicious to me, for as in our time several armies have encamped in the neighbourhood of Mechlin, and as many officers have passed and repassed by the same city, it seemed to me incredible that no body should mention this convent of fifteen or sixteen hundred canonesses, and that nevertheless it should be one of the rarities of Mechlin. My suspicions were strengthened by the reflexion I made, that when armies encamp near Remiremont, or Mauberge &c. the public almost constantly hears of the assiduity of the principal officers in visiting the canonesses of those places. But I have discovered at last that it is a long time since this monastery of St Alexis is no more in being, it was razed to the ground during the civil wars near the end of the XVIIth century. Thus we see that in order to rectify the Historical Dictionary, as to what concerns the Low-Countries, it is not sufficient to compare it with Guicciardin, the original which Mr Moreri followed, we must likewise consult more modern writers (4).

(d) I speak thus because I have not that of 1704. Since an occasion has offered to take notice of a gross error in the article of Malines, which passed from edition to edition till the (d) first revival of Mr Vaultier 1699, at least inclusively; I shall add, that part of the other errors are corrected in the Dutch editions, but that these are still left, viz. the inhabitants of Malines are free from all taxes on account of the good services which they did to Charles the Bold, Earl of Flanders, at the siege of Nans upon the Rhine. He should have said Nuis, and not Nans, and Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and not Earl of Flanders, for though he was Earl of Flanders, he never bore that title. The first of these two faults has been corrected in the edition of Paris 1699, but not the second (5). Neither have they corrected the name of the river which runs by Malines: it is called Dile, and not Dele (6). They have not observed that the Seignory of Malines is one of the seventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, and that the great royal council instituted in the year 1473, was not then fixed at Malines. It was ambulatory (I mean that it followed the court of the Prince) till such time as Philip of Austria, upon his going to Spain in the year 1503, settled it at Malines (7).

The more we should descend to particulars, the more would the readers be convinced that a thorough correction of Moreri cannot be the work of a single man. Mr Vaultier alone might very well be the director-general, and the last reviser of the whole, but he would stand in need of coadjutors, I mean people who should work under him according to the different parts he should assign them. He would especially want one of those severe, and, if you please, humour-some and fantastical critics, in whom the least shadow of irregularity breeds strong suspicions that the author is mistaken. Such a critic would not have had the patience to read twice the first lines of the article Madruce (Madrizzo) in Moreri, without suspecting that they served as a kind of den to some wild beast. It would have shocked him at the first glance. These lines are as follows:

MADRUCE or LIBER (Christopher) called the Cardinal of Trent, was son to John Gaudence Liber, Baron of Madruce. It is not impossible but that one and the same family

(4) This mistake had passed into the edition of 1707; and the reviser of that of 1712, only added that these nuns were called Beguines. In the edition of 1725 (article MALINES) it is corrected thus: In the suburbs was to be seen the monastery of St Alexis, where there were 1500 or 1600 nuns called Beguines who had the liberty to go out, to take the air, to make and receive visits, and to marry when they thought proper: but this monastery was entirely demolished during the civil wars near the end of the XVIIth century. NEW OBSERVAT.

(5) This second fault was still in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725, it is said that the inhabitants of Malines are free from all taxes on account of the good services which they did to Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and Earl of Flanders, at the siege of Nuis upon the Rhine. NEW OBSERVAT.

(6) The edition of 1707 had still Dele: that of 1712 says Deule: and in that of 1725 there is Dile. NEW OBSERVAT.

(7) In the edition of 1725 they take notice that the great royal council, instituted ambulatory by Charles Duke of Burgundy, in the year 1473, was fixed at Malines in the year 1503. They have not observed that lines in the year 1503. They have not observed that the Seignory of Malines is one of the seventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, they only say that this Seignory is enclosed within one of the seventeen provinces, in Brabant. Nevertheless at the word Low-Countries, it is reckoned among the seventeen provinces. NEW OBSERVAT.

may have the names of Madruce and Liber, and that thus some should call it Madruce and others Liber, and consequently that the author of a Dictionary following the safest course might make use of the disjunctive or without committing a fault; but there is nevertheless in all this, I cannot tell what strange want of probability that detains and strikes a suspicious and attentive reader. He considers before he proceeds further, and he may possibly conjecture that Moreri deceived by some French author, or not understanding the Latin writers who have mentioned this Cardinal of Trent, has improperly divided Liber Baro, and taken the first of these two words for the name of the family, instead of taking it for the character of the quality of Baron. It is well known that the Emperors of Germany create barons who hold immediately of the empire, and who are thereby distinguished from the barons that are vassals to some other member of the empire. A baron that holds immediately of the empire, is called a free baron, Liber Baro. It is very (e) probable that the first of the family of Madruce, or Madruzzo, who was created baron, was one of those free barons, and that from thence it comes that the Latin authors who have mentioned the Cardinal of Trent and his father, have given them the title of Liber Baro. If this be the case, what a blunder has Moreri fallen into? And how could it so long escape the editors (8)?

(e) I express myself thus because I have not the Latin authors quoted by Moreri.

I shall occasionally inform them that they ought to correct a mistake concerning Cardinal Lewis Madruce (or Madruzzo). He was not made Bishop of Trent after his promotion to the Cardinalship, as Moreri affirms, he was Bishop of Trent before by the resignation of his uncle Cardinal Christopher Madruzzo, when Pius IV presented him with the hat in the year 1561, and sent it to him even while he was at Trent, by a particular favour (9). They ought besides to correct the alternative of the time of Cardinal Christopher Madruzzo's promotion. They should fix the date thereof to the year 1542, and not leave it undetermined as Moreri does between the year 1542 or the year 1544 (10). It is shameful not to know the true time of the creation of a Cardinal of the XVIth century, and when a person corrects the work of a man who was ignorant of that, and who was lazy enough not to clear up the fact, that person should think himself obliged not to be guilty of the same laziness. We may likewise acquaint the editors that they will do well to make up some omissions. The State of Madruzzo erected into a barony, and situated in the country of Trent, requires a small Geographical article which is wanting in Moreri (11). The family of Madruzzo wants a Genealogical article which should bring it down from the time that it began to enjoy a title of honour, or to make a figure, to the present time. Cardinal Madruzzo the creature of Clement VIII, and who came to be so considerable that he was looked upon as a man qualified for being elected Pope in the conclave where Urban VIII was chosen in the year 1623, likewise requires an article (12).

There are a great number of passages in Moreri which abound as much in omissions and blunders as the article of Madruzzo.

I am not ignorant that some people will pretend that it is of no manner of importance to the public to know whether the family Madruzzo was called Liber, or whether Christopher Madruzzo came to the Cardinalship in the year 1542, and not in the year 1544, or whether Lewis Madruzzo was already Bishop of Trent when he obtained the Cardinal's hat. The Journalists of Trevoux may possibly make this objection, for after having treated as trifling (f) the remark made by our author that Giles Boileau died in the year 1669, and not as Moreri affirms, in 1671 (13), they add, the world forsooth will think itself much concerned in this error of the Dictionary! But the editors of Moreri, if they are wise, will not regulate themselves upon this false taste of the Journalists of Trevoux. They will be of opinion that it is the duty of every corrector of a book to take from it all the false facts, and to substitute true facts in their room, and that if under pretence that an error in fact hurts neither the fortune nor morals of any body, it must be left in a book; there would be very few lies in the Historical Dictionary which ought not to be spared and carefully preserved. A judicious man is pleased with knowing the truth even in things that neither concern his virtue nor the welfare of his family, and one ought to look upon it as an undoubted truth that if Father Paul, who has made so much mention of the Cardinals Christopher Madruzzo and Lewis Madruzzo, had fallen into the mistakes which I have taken notice of, his antagonist Pallavicini would have censured him for it, and the Journalists of Trevoux would not condemn that censure. They themselves would be very sorry to be convicted of an error like that which concerns Giles Boileau, and if any one accused them falsely of such a mistake they would justify themselves with a great deal of vivacity. They would not content themselves with answering that the world does not concern itself much in errors of this nature.

(f) In the Memoirs for June 1706. pag. 948.

VOL V.

8 M

One

(8) This fault had passed in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725 we find: 'MADRUCE (Christopher) called the Cardinal of Trent, son of John Gaudence, free Baron of Madruce, &c.'

They observe that Pope Paul III gave him a Cardinal's hat in the year 1542. NEW OBSERVAT.

(9) This is corrected in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(10) See, above, note (8). NEW OBSERVAT.

(11) This Geographical article is to be found in the edition of 1725, at the word MADRUZZO or MADRUCE. It is taken from the Dictionary of Maty. NEW OBSERVAT.

(12) In the edition of 1725, there are three or four lines added concerning CHARLES MADRUZZO, created Cardinal by Pope Clement VIII. NEW OBSERVAT.

(13) See hereafter at the word BOILEAU. NEW OBSERVAT.

MR BAYLE'S PREFACE.

One of the things wherein the editors of the Historical Dictionary have succeeded best, is that they have reduced to more reasonable bounds the excessive praises which Moreri had prodigally bestowed upon a great many persons, and the great slanders that he had thrown upon many others. He was guided by the spirit of a declaimer who frequently mounts the pulpit, and did not remember that he assumed the character of an Historian. But even in this point his work has not yet been brought to perfection. There remain still in it several flatteries and injurious reflexions which ought to be left out, and it is certain that by striking out some encomiums a person will do a good office to those on whom they were bestowed, and will act not only from a principle, of love for truth, but likewise from a motive of brotherly charity. I am going to give an example of this.

It is affirmed in Moreri that a Marshal of France whose name I do not mention, commanded armies with a great deal of prudence, success, and glory. Let a reader be never so unattentive, and eager in pursuing his journey, he will stop short at meeting with such an encomium, and reflect upon so surprizing an object. For above the space of fifteen years, will he say to himself, have I traced step by step the Gazettes, and other news-writers, and I do not remember any kind of event on which to ground this prudence, this success, and this glory that I find here. I can point out the time and place where the enterprizes of this warrior were extremely unfortunate, but not the time and place of their good success. His most glorious campaigns are those where he formed no project, and where no project was formed against him. Either my knowledge is very imperfect or these encomiums are very unjust, for they cannot be just but in consequence of some actions which had such a fortunate and glorious issue, that they have been sufficient to eclipse the frequent and remarkable disgraces of which all Europe is informed, and which have been the burden of a thousand satirical songs spread over the whole world. Whence can it come that I should be ignorant of these actions which are so glorious? I must go directly and enquire.

It is plain that such a reader will desire all those he shall meet with to inform him, and that he will find no body who knows more of the matter than himself, so that he will be the cause why an infinite number of people who thought no more of this Marshal, will recapitulate all his disgraces. It will therefore be doing him a piece of very good service to leave this passage out of the Dictionary. By this means will they remove a stumbling block, a troublesome Memento. The readers not finding it in their way will proceed without stopping, and thus many reflexions will be suppressed, which would be to the disadvantage of this Marshal of France. This encomium is nothing less than an officious lie, and bears a much greater resemblance to the praises which the most inveterate hatred and malice bestows, Pessimum inimicorum genus laudantes. However I own it was not made with that view.

(g) E. longinquo reverentia major.

The editor could not but know the opinion of all France, and that if the wishes of the nation had been regarded, the warrior of whom we speak had very soon been removed from the command of armies; but it looks as if the Prince had been willing to shew in this that he thought himself as much superior to his subjects by the clearness of his discernment, as by the dignity of his character. The editor could not excuse himself upon a certain humour which the French are observed to have, and which a modern author pretty well describes: The French, says he, often times are very incomprehensible. They love their King and their country, they love the honour of their nation, they entertain the highest opinion of it that it is possible for them to have: and yet their nation itself does nothing to please them: they always imagine that some thing better might be done. The wisest answers, the most successful enterprizes, and the best concerted measures seldom escape their censure. They commend foreigners, praise their works and their troops, admire their counsels, and extol their good successes. Distance heightens respect (g). They despise and find fault with every thing that France produces. Let the number of those whom this character suits be as great as it will all over the kingdom, an author is not however obliged to be ruled by them in his praises or censures; but as they were not the only persons that exclaimed against the general in question, and since, on the contrary, they did no more than join their voice to that of the public, the editor could not clear himself without alledging some other reason than this. If he should try to excuse himself by saying that the person whom he commends has rather gained than lost ground in his master's favour, it would be a very weak defence. This indeed proves that fortune which never followed him to the field, has been a faithful companion to him at court, but we can draw no consequence from that against the public evidence, and if a Prince has a mind to distinguish himself by acting a part so singular, as that of magnificently rewarding ill success, an author has no right upon that account to bestow praises which all the world knows to be false. If instead of these words, prudence, success, and glory, Moreri had made use of the terms, affection, zeal, good intention, he would not have scandalized the public, nor have done such an ill office to the warrior whom he commends. But, once more, the best way will be to leave out the encomium and to put nothing in the room of it.

To speak once more of the pains which a good correction of Moreri requires. I shall observe that the first editions of that Dictionary, though they be more faulty than the Dutch ones, may nevertheless be of great use in correcting them. The editors therefore should always have these first editions before their eyes, and compare them line by line with the following. Among the several examples of the corruptions that have crept into the latter, I shall only take notice of one. Mr Moreri had said in the article of GILLIS LE MAÎTRE, that the Duke of Mayenne, and the other chiefs of the League, named John le Maître President of the Parliament of Paris

Paris in the room of Barnaby Briffon, and that in this quality they were deputed to the pretended States of the kingdom held at Paris in the year 1593. That the Legate proposed there the publication of the Council of Trent, without any restriction or modification, that it was a nice affair in itself; that le Maître and du Vair, then a Counsellor, had orders to examine it, &c. There is a fault here which is corrected in the Dutch editions, where they have put he was deputed, instead of they were deputed, but they have committed an error in another place, for instead of le Maître and du Vair, then a Counsellor, they have put le Maître and du Vair, then Counsellors. This error is in the edition of Paris 1699, and shows that the attention of the editors is sometimes very remiss, for in reading the word Counsellors they did not remember that two or three lines before they had read that le Maître was deputed in quality of President (14).

The last thing I shall observe is, that new errors will continually creep into the editions of Moreri notwithstanding all the attention and ability of the revisers, if they themselves do not take the trouble exactly to correct all the proofs, or if they do not get them to be corrected by men who are both very knowing and very attentive. It is owing to the negligence of the corrector of the press that we find in the edition of Paris 1699, at the article Lodrin, a very gross fault which had been corrected in the Dutch editions. I shall quote this article according to the edition of Lyons 1688.

LODRIN, a city and gulf of Albania in Greece. It must not be mistaken for LODRON, a lordship of the country of Trent in Italy; near Bressan.

All this is in the edition of Paris 1699. But in the Dutch edition which I make use of, and which is that of the year 1698, they have put, as it should be, Bressan, instead of Bressan, and they have retained the line immediately following which is,

LODRON. See Lodrin.

It has been left out in the Paris edition, but it would have been better to let it stand as it was, because there are a great many readers who do not find that which they look for in a Dictionary, unless it appears there at the beginning of a new line. The best way of correcting it would be to leave out these words it must not be mistaken for, and to put what follows in a line by itself. They are words which without any further caution sufficiently shew the readers that they ought not to mistake Lodron for Lodrin (15). We may likewise hint to the editors that they will do well to lengthen the article Lodron both as Geographers and as Genealogists. They ought to know that the curiosity of the readers increases very much with respect even to places that are pretty obscure, when the Gazetteers happen to mention them often. Such persons who never had the least desire to know where the Oglio is, and the Adda; nor what kind of places are Sala, Dezenzano, Gavardo, Montebello &c. have complained a thousand times for these four or five years past, that they did not find in Moreri very particular articles upon the source, and the course of these rivers, and upon the situation, and the qualities of these towns. People have at present the very same curiosity with respect to Lodron. Besides it is not a bare lordship, but an ancient county, and it is a great while since the Counts of Lodron have made themselves famous. The series of their Genealogy would make a curious article in Moreri (16). The learned will think themselves concerned in it because Joseph Scaliger pretended that his grand-mother Berénice, or Veronica, of Lodron, was daughter to the Count of Lodron. Scioppius in his Scaliger Hypobolimus says this is false; and alledges several facts which may serve for materials to the editors.

I make no excuse for the length of this preface, or advertisement, which I have joined to the second edition of the Critical Remarks first published at Paris. Every one will see that this may serve as a supplement.

(14) In the edition of 1707 & Aq. we find a separate article of JOHN LE MAÎTRE, where instead of they were deputed, they have put he was deputed; and the words then a Counsellor are left out. NEW OBSERVAT.

(15) In the last editions this article runs as follows: LODRIN, a city and gulf of Albania in Greece, ought not to be mistaken for LODRON, an ancient county of the country of Trent in Italy, near the Bressan.

Thus they still make but one article of Lodrin and Lodron, instead of making two according to Mr Bayle's remark. NEW OBSERVAT.

(16) They have not yet given us in Moreri's Dictionary the Geographical description of Lodron, nor the Genealogy of it's Counts. NEW OBSERVAT.

T H E

P R E F A C E

T O T H E

P A R I S E D I T I O N.

WHAT I now publish is not a criticism upon Moreri's Dictionary; I am not rash enough to make such an attempt. Mr Bayle, after great efforts, has not fully executed it (1). Mr le Clerc, who came after him, and had the advantage of his observations, has only committed new faults, added to the old ones which he has not taken the trouble to correct: and indeed the edition which he published in the year 1699, to speak properly, is not exact in any thing besides the articles that have some conformity with those which we find in the Critical Dictionary of Rotterdam (2). The two editions which were published one upon the other at Paris, are not near so faulty as the former ones; and those who had the care of them, have purged them of several errors which we still find in the edition of 1699. The last especially seems to have been carried to a degree of perfection which a work of that nature may attain to: the chronology has been corrected; instead of varying as it did in several places, it is fixed to a certain order. The articles are put in a form more convenient to the reader, and purged of a great many false facts, which only serve to stifle the true ones, and to make people question the most fundamental points of history, when authors have had the indiscretion to confound both together: in short, every thing there is placed in an order that is agreeable to an eager reader, and useful to a learned one: and it must be said to the praise of Mr Vaultier, who has sustained alone the immense burthen of this labour, that it wanted a man of his patience and assiduity not to sink under the weight of so great an enterprize; especially when it is known that he was assisted by none, and that if you except one Friar, whose knowledge is limited to one certain kind of erudition, he was abandoned by every body else. It is true it might be objected to him, that he has received some memoirs, and that if he had shewed that he made any account of them, people would have furnished him with more, during the impression, and in proportion to the good reception they should have seen him give to the first. But this is not the question here, and as to what concerns me I have no complaint to make against him before the tribunal of the public.

After

(1) Our author pretends, that Mr Bayle undertook in his Dictionary to censure all Moreri's faults; but that after great efforts, he has not fully executed that undertaking. Mr Bayle never had such a design. He does not criticize Moreri but when he gives an article that is likewise to be met with in the Dictionary of that author. I have put by themselves in a remark, says he in his preface, the errors I have imputed to Moreri. I have not touched upon those that are found in the articles given by him, and not by me, though they are not less considerable, nor less frequent in these articles than in those I have given. A little after he subjoins: For the sake of youth, who want to have their judgment formed, and to be made sensible of the most scrupulous exactness, I have taken notice of the least faults of Moreri in the subjects we both handle: as for the mistakes that are in other places, I do not meddle with them as I said before. Here is a very plain proof of the little exactness of our Critic. His Remarks are almost every one taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, as will be shewn hereafter; and yet he has not at all attended to what Mr Bayle so expressly declares in his preface. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) This author does not do justice here to Mr le Clerc, who has corrected an infinite number of faults in the Dutch editions of Moreri's Dictionary, and has made very considerable additions to it. He has not seen these editions: what he says of them is borrowed from the reviser of Paris, who, the better to recommend his labour, had undervalued that of Mr le Clerc, at the same time that he made use of it. Mr le Clerc shewed the injustice of his proceeding in a memoir inserted in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for February 1700, Art. VII, pag. 207, & seq. He even observed, that the Paris reviser had left some faults that were corrected in the last Dutch editions; for example, at the article C A B, there was Cumberlund, instead of Cumberland. This error still continues in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

After such a particular account, it will be easy to judge of the nature of this little work: it contains only some remarks that have escaped Mr Vaultier; they are even, if you will, some faults which any other author, over-charged with such a prodigious labour, would infallibly have committed; and he might have esteemed himself happy if he had not been guilty of still greater ones. Among these faults there are some which particularly relate to certain nations, to certain countries, and even to certain districts, and which consequently do not much interest a reader, who has not seen these countries any where but in a map; but as I hope these Remarks may be of service to the first edition that shall be published of Moreri's Dictionary, I would not omit taking notice of these slight errors, being persuaded that it will be much easier for an editor to make a proper use of them when he finds them collected together in a small volume. There are other faults among those which I have censured, that will require a more serious consideration, and the correcting of which, as any reader may observe, was essential to the perfecting of the Historical Dictionary.

For example, it would never perhaps have come into the thoughts of the new editors, that there is no stone bridge upon the Rhine, and perhaps also if it were not for the remark I make on this subject, an editor who might have been present at the last siege of Brisach (a), would notwithstanding continue to write after Mr Moreri, that they cross the Rhine there upon a fine stone bridge. The remark, I own, is trivial; it nevertheless serves to correct an error which has run thro' twelve editions, and into which that skilful Geographer Mr le Clerc, who pretends to criticise Quintus Curtius, has fallen as well as the rest: I grant it is an error proceeding from want of attention, it cannot even be of any other kind (b); but is it the less an error upon that account? How many of those little authors who have no other stock for composing books, but the great Historical Dictionary, will believe hereafter that they cross the Rhine at Brisach upon a fine stone bridge? These little books, which are copied one from another, having once given a run to that false tradition, would be sufficient, in a few centuries, to make a probable opinion of what is said now, that there is a stone bridge at Brisach: and from thence would arise controversies among the Geographers; of the same nature with that which we see in our days, between Mr le Clerc, and Mr Perizonius, upon some passages of the celebrated Historian of Alexander the Great.

Will not what is said in the new edition of Moreri, concerning the year in which King James II died, be likewise one day the subject of a dispute among the Chronologers? Grounded upon incontestable records, some will place his death in the year 1701; others upon the authority of the edition of 1704, will maintain, that this Prince died (c) not 'till the year 1702. There will be a multitude of writings, and perhaps of slanders and abuse, and all this through the negligence of an Historian.

By

(a) There is too much hyperbole here: it is not in the least probable that an editor who should have seen with his own eyes, that the bridge of Brisach is not of stone, should nevertheless have neglected to correct this error of Moreri. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Our author will give me leave to say, that the error he takes notice of may not only be of another kind than errors proceeding from want of attention, but that it actually is so, for though we attend ever so much to Moreri's words, we cannot judge that he is mistaken in saying that the bridge of Brisach is a stone bridge. None but such as know by some other way that the thing is false can perceive he is mistaken. But here follows the example of an error that proceeds from want of attention. Moreri, speaking of a river called LE MORIN, said that it is in Brie, that it takes its source near Sedan, that it runs through la Ferté Gaucher, through Colmier, &c. He did not copy this last word right, for Coulon, his original, says, Colomier (he should have said Colomiers); but as for the word Sedan he copied it faithfully. They who have corrected Moreri, have changed Sedan into Sedan, although, without doubt, they knew enough of Geography, not to be ignorant that Sedan is at a great distance from Brie. It is therefore owing to want of attention that they have put in their editions of Moreri, that the Morin, a river of France in Brie, takes its source near Sedan. They should have said near Sezanne. As to what concerns Colmier, they might believe that there was a place of that name in Brie, but with a little more application they would have found that it should be Colomiers, and not Colmier (3). Perhaps Mr Moreri followed, more than he ought to have done, the custom of several Frenchmen, which is to pronounce, with two syllables, the names that are written with three. It is thus that some authors who have written against Mr de Vallemont, call him Valmont, and that others call Malment an author who writes his name Mallement: from hence it will proceed one day or other that the Bibliographers will give us an author whose name is Vallemont, and another whose name is Valmont, &c; but Mr Moreri would not be excusable from the custom that he might have taken of pronouncing Colgne and not Cologne, Colnie and not Colomie. He should have written proper names not according to his own pronunciation; but according to their Orthography. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

V O L. V.

(3) In the edition of 1725, it is said that this river takes its source near Sezanne, and that it runs through Coulmier. NEW OBSERVAT.

(c) I believe this false date is an error of the press; nevertheless, the Critic was not obliged to enquire whether it came from the editor or Printers. It is the fate of authors that they must bear the blame of the negligence of the correctors of the press. I do not pretend to affirm in general, that an author may not sometimes be mistaken as to epochs, that are both very remarkable, and very late. The author of the Supplement to Moreri fancied, that Marshal Turenne made the whole campaign of the year 1675. He did not remember one thing which all the world knew, viz. that Marshal Turenne was killed by a cannonball on the twenty-seventh of July 1675. Here follow the words of the author of this Supplement in the article MONTSCUCULI: But in the year 1675, Montecuculi could do nothing in Alfatia, because Marshal Turenne broke all his measures. Nothing can be more false than this, for Montecuculi did not go into Alfatia till after Marshal Turenne's death (4). I shall say, by the by, that they should not only have corrected

8 N

By these two instances, singled out from several others, one may judge of the usefulness of these Remarks, which only relate to the matters themselves; for if we had been willing to take the errors of the press into consideration, there would have been matter enough to make a large volume.

refted this blunder in the Dutch editions, but likewise have made that article more complete. It was not to be expected that the author of the Supplement should have enlarged much upon the glory of Count Montecuculi. That General was not loved in France; they considered him as the principal cause of their losing all the conquests of the year 1672; but for that very reason the Dutch editions should have given us a long article of this General of the Imperial armies, and adorned it with the finest encomiums which he deserved. Such an omission is more blameworthy than to partake in the error which has not been corrected, concerning the age of Montecuculi. The Supplement says, that this General died in the year 1680, aged more than eighty years. It is nevertheless true that he lived but seventy-two years and eight months. He was born in the year 1608, as we find in his life printed before his memoirs, at Geneva in the year 1704, and thereby we correct the fault of the Printers of that life, who fix his death on the sixteenth of October 1681, instead of 1680 (5). MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(4) This remained in the editions of 1707 and 1712. It was struck out in that of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(5) This likewise remained in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725 it is said, that Count Montecuculi died on the sixteenth of October 1680, aged seventy-two years and eight months; and at the end of his article they take notice that he had presented to the Emperor, in the year 1665, his Memoirs, composed during his campaigns in Hungary, published in the year 1704 by Mr. Hayfen, a German gentleman, Governor to the Prince of Muscovy. NEW OBSERVAT.

CRITICAL

C R I T I C A L
R E M A R K S
UPON THE
N E W E D I T I O N
O F
M O R E R I ' S
H I S T O R I C A L
D I C T I O N A R Y ,

Published in the year 1704.

A.

A C T O R .

MR BAYLE had already censured Mr Moreri for changing this word into that of Altorius. This error indeed has been corrected in the new edition ; as well as that where it is said that Ovid speaks of one Altorius : for these words, quæ fuit Altoride cum magno semper Achille, ought not to be understood of a man named Altorius, but of Patroclus, whom the Poets generally distinguish by the Patronymic name of Altorides, which signifies nothing else but descended from Altor. The explication which Mr Bayle has given of the Poet's thought is very full ; and it is their fault who published the editions of 1699 and 1704, that they did not reap the benefit of it, since they needed only to have consulted the Critical Dictionary. I confess it is troublesome to consult upon every article all the Critics, and all the interpreters ; but in that very respect will these Remarks be of great use to those who shall hereafter undertake to publish a new edition, since I collect into a very small volume part of the faults which were left in the old editions, so that one may run them over in a short time.

But if the new editor, on whose edition I make Remarks, has corrected this article in some places, he has changed it for the worse in several others ; the proof of which follows.

In the article of ACTOR the Locrian, the editor should have observed, that Peleus, the said Actor's son-in-law, was grandson to his (a) wife Ægina ; and that therefore Polymele, the daughter of Actor and Ægina, was at the same time Peleus's aunt and wife ; she was his aunt, as being sister to his father Æacus (1) : besides, Jupiter was (b) grandfather

(a) That is to say, Actor's wife. The word his is very ambiguous here. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is said, that ACTOR, born in Locris, or according to others in Theffaly, was son to Myrmidon, and grandson to Jupiter, that he married the nymph Ægina ; and that he gave his kingdom with his daughter Polymele (it should have been Polymele) to Peleus, the son of Æacus, and father of Achilles. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) This wanted proof, for we do not see that Jupiter was father either to Actor or Ægina. He had a son by Ægina ; but Polymele, daughter to the said Ægina, was daughter to Actor, which made no consanguinity between Jupiter and Polymele. MR BAYLE'S REM.

(c) Aspledon

ACTOR. ADAM. ADAMITES. ADRICHOMITES. ADRIAN VI.

grandfather to Polymele, and likewise to Peleus. In the article of ACTOR, the son of Axcas, and father of Astioche, the editor is mistaken when he says that Astioche had two sons by Neptune; it was by Mars that she had these two sons, who commanded the troops of Aspledon (c) and Orchomene at the siege of Troy (2). The editor might have taken this Astor, for the Astor of whom Pausanias speaks in his fifth book, and who was son to Neptune and Agamede, the daughter of Augeus (3). On this head you may consult the tenth book of the Iliad. We see from thence that the editor has confounded these two articles, and that of two Actors he has made but one, whom he makes the father-in-law of Neptune; whereas that god was father to the second of the two whom I have just now mentioned.

(c) Aspledon and Orchomene are names of towns: the reader might possibly take them for names of men. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(2) In the same edition we find that ACTOR, the son of Axcas, or Azeus, was father to Astioche, and that this nymph had by Neptune two sons, &c. Yet Mr Bayle had observed, that it was by the god Mars she had these two sons. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) In this edition they have not given us the article of ACTOR, son to Neptune and Agamede, the daughter of Augeus, though they might have taken it from Mr Bayle.

Our author has copied almost every thing that he says here from Mr Bayle. But he is mistaken in citing the fifth book of Pausanias. That quotation in Mr Bayle relates to another ACTOR, son to Phorbas. NEW OBSERVAT.

A D A M.

Moreri says that Josephus relates, that Adam engraved upon two different tables the observations which he had made upon the course of the stars. These are not the words of that antient Historian; he only says in the second chapter of the first book of his antiquities, that the offspring of Seth, the son of Adam, were the inventors of Astrology, and that they caused the principles which they had discovered, to be engraved upon two pillars, the one of brick and the other of stone, in order to secure them from the general destruction, which, as Adam had foretold, was to happen once by fire, and another time by water (1). Moreri likewise says, that the first man gave names to the plants, whereas the Scripture only ascribes to him the invention of the names of beasts. The editor has adopted the first of these errors (2), but has corrected the second.

(1) This Remark is taken from Mr Bayle. NEW OBSERVAT. (2) This is corrected in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

A D A M I T E S.

Moreri makes St Epiphanius say, that the churches of the Adamites were infamous places, on account of the abominable crimes which they committed in these caverns of horror and prostitution. That holy Father does not speak so in the summary of his second book; he only says, 'that the Adamites meet together as naked as they were born, and in that condition go thro' their lectures, prayers, and other religious exercises.' Besides, Moreri has too rashly affirmed, that there was a sect of these Heretics in England. This is absolutely false, and the editor has corrected that place, but he has not had the same precaution with respect to the text of St Epiphanius (1).

(1) All this is taken from Mr Bayle. What concerns St Epiphanius has been corrected in the edition of 1725; and Mr Bayle is quoted at the end of the article. NEW OBSERVAT.

AD RICHOMITES (a).

Moreri is mistaken in this article, when he takes Trajectum for Utrecht, instead of taking it for Maastricht. He says afterwards that Adrichomites himself published his Theatre of the Holy Land; whereas it is certain that this book was not published till after his death; besides, this same Bibliographer divides that work into two, by observing that the Theatre of the Holy Land, is different from the Description of the Holy Land, whereas it is but one and the same work. The editor has corrected the first fault, and adopted the second (1).

(a) He should have said Adrichomius, for so do we find that word written in the Dictionary of Moreri. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This Remark is likewise taken from Mr Bayle, at the article AD RICHOMITES. All these faults are corrected in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

ADRIAN VI.

In an article where mention is made of this Pope, he is said to be of the house of Fieschi. I see very well that the author meant Adrian V, who was really of that family. But, after all, it is still a fault which it is necessary to correct in the editions that may be published hereafter; for nothing can be more different than Ottoboni di Fieschi, who was Pope under the name of Adrian V, and Adrian Florentius, who was so under that of Adrian VI. The former lived in the XIIIth century, and the latter in the XVIth (1).

(1) They have put Adrian V in the edition of 1707, and the following ones. NEW OBSERVAT.

A I N S.

A I N S.

This article was right in the preceding editions, and they have spoiled it in this. The river Ains *, which comes from the county of Burgundy, and divides Bresse from Bugey, is in the last edition improperly called the river of Dain. Guichenon, who has written the history of these two little provinces, is the proper judge of this question. We need only consult him, and we shall see how he criticizes Cognatus (a) and Maffo upon the subject of this river (1).

* Ens, Indis, Indus, Danus, & Idanus, in Latin.

(a) That is to say, Gilbert Coufin (Gilbertus Cognatus, who had been Erasmus's servant), and Papyrius Maffo. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article AIN (1') it is said that the river Ains runs between Bresse and Bugey. NEW OBSERVAT.

A L C I A T U S.

In the article of Andrew Alciatus, a Civilian of Milan, the editor has forgot to mention the following book, among those which he ascribes to him: Rerum patriæ seu Historiæ Mediolanensis, lib. iv. ex M. S. Bibliothecæ Ambrosianæ. One would think he could not forget, in the article of a celebrated author, the work which he dedicated to the glory of his native country (1).

(1) There is no mention made of this work in the last edition: but at the end of this article they have added: those who would know the catalogue of Alciatus's works need only consult the Eluges des Hommes Savans de Mr de Thou, by Teissier, Tom. I. They should have referred to the edition of these Eluges, published in 1715, where they have collected the judgments of some learned men upon that history of the Milanese. NEW OBSERVAT.

A L E A N D E R.

Moreri, speaking of this Cardinal's death, had not determined what book he was about to publish when he died; but the editor tells us, that Moreri's words are to be understood as relating to his great work against the Professors (Opera contra i Professores: Lorenz. Craffo); nevertheless, it is not sure that it was the same which the Cardinal was writing when he died, and Mr Bayle is not certain of it (a). Therefore when a Critic of that penetration wavers upon any subject, another should not rashly form his opinion (1). The editor, in reckoning up the works of that great Cardinal, has forgot to mention his Tables of the Greek Grammar (2).

(a) This ought not to be understood as if Mr Bayle expressed some doubt upon that head: he neither affirms nor denies any thing: he only quotes the words of Paul Jovius, and those of Lorenzo Craffo. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our author should have assigned his reasons for doubting that the Work against the Professors was that which Alexander was writing when he died; and have shewn that Paul Jovius and Lorenzo Craffo are mistaken. Otherwise we have a right to consider his doubt as a pure imagination: and indeed it is only grounded upon a false supposition that Mr Bayle had raised doubts concerning it. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) There is no mention made in the new edition of Moreri of Alexander's Tables of the Greek Grammar, though Mr Bayle speaks of them, and it is from him that our author has taken this particular. NEW OBSERVAT.

A L E X A N D E R.

I should have believed that the editor would have corrected in this article a bad phrase which his author makes use of; at least I call it bad, because it is susceptible of a double meaning: it is this; Darius n'avoit point voulu faire le dégât dans l'Asie, selon l'avis de Memnon (i. e. Darius had refused to lay Asia waste according to Memnon's advice). To judge of this expression according to its obvious sense, we are as much inclined to believe that Memnon had not advised such waste to be made, as that he had advised it; so true it is, that the meaning often depends upon the order in which the words are placed, and upon the turn of a phrase. If the editor had carefully perused all the Remarks that have been made upon the different editions of Moreri, this fault would not have escaped him (1).

(1) This ambiguous expression has passed into the edition of 1725, where it is said that Darius n'avoit point voulu faire de dégât dans l'Asie selon l'avis de Memnon. Mr Bayle had already taken notice of it in the article Memnon, remark [D]; but in a more distinct and precise manner than our author, who still copies him here. NEW OBSERVAT.

A L M A I N.

When Moreri speaks of that famous doctor of the university of Paris, and is enumerating his works, he should not have forgot that which concerns the Laity. The very circumstances of the time should have engaged the editor to speak of it with some exactness (1).

(1) Our Critic commits here several faults which Mr Bayle has particularized above in his Preface. NEW OBSERVAT.

ARLENIUS.

I should have expected that this author, who lived in the reign of Charles V, and who called himself in the world (a) by the name of Peraxylus, would have found a place in the new edition of the Dictionary. The fine Greek edition of Josephus, which he published from the excellent manuscript of Dom Diego de Mendoza, the Emperor's Ambaffador at Venice, in whose retinue he was, should have entitled him to that place: besides, Arlenius was an excellent Poet. Moreri, and those who since him have been employed in reviving his Dictionary, are not the only persons who were ignorant of the merit of this great man (1).

(a) That is to say, in the learned world. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) Our author (as I said before) has taken almost all his Remarks from Mr Bayle's Dictionary; but he has concealed or disguised these little thefts as much as he could. Here, for example, he produces, under the word Arlenius, what Mr Bayle had said in the article Peraxylus. What is singular in the case is, that he complains that Moreri, and those who since him have been employed in reviving his Dictionary, make no mention of Arlenius; and indeed they say nothing of him under that word; but they have given him a very good article, taken from Mr Bayle, at the word Peraxylus. NEW OBSERVAT.

B.

BASIN.

Armand Basin de Befons is not Archbishop of Aix, as the editor affirms, but of Bourdeaux, and he succeeded in that dignity to the late Mr de Bourlemont (1).

(1) This mistake is corrected in the edition of 1725, at the article BAZIN (Claude). NEW OBSERVAT.

BAVARIA.

This article is not exact, and the editor varies in his chronology. The Emperor Frederic III was not father-in-law to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, who is supposed to have married Cunegonda, that Emperor's daughter; on the contrary, Frederic III married for his second wife Cunegonda, daughter to Lewis of Bavaria, his greatest enemy; and he had by that second marriage Elizabeth, wife to Walter, Count of Schwartzberg (1). Now Lewis of Bavaria, who was afterwards Emperor, and the third of that name, was great grandfather's grandfather of Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria. How then was it possible for him to be son-in-law to the Emperor Lewis III (a), and consequently his cotemporary (2)?

The editor perhaps meant that Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, married Cunegonda, daughter to the Emperor Frederic IV. But if he calls this Frederic III, he must then not reckon in the number of Emperors Frederic, called the fair, the third of that name, son to the Emperor Albert I, and grandson to the Emperor Rudolph I (3).

It

(1) Our author pretends that the Emperor Frederic III, (called the fair) married Cunegonda, daughter to Lewis of Bavaria, his greatest enemy. He has probably taken this from the work he criticizes: for in Moreri, at the word Austria, pag. 877, we find that the Emperor Frederic, called the fair, married for his second wife Cunegonda of Bavaria, daughter to the Emperor Lewis, by whom he had Elizabeth, wife to Guntier Count of Schwartzemberg. But, 1. Ritterhusius does not take notice that Frederic the fair had two wives: he only mentions Isabella of Arragon. 2. Heiff. in his History of the Empire, only says that Duke Frederic of Austria, and Duke Lewis of Bavaria, who disputed the empire with one another, were cousin-germans. 3. In Moreri, at the word Bavaria, and the article of the Emperor Lewis, pag. 135, we find no Cunegonda among the children whom he had by his two wives, and who are nine in number. Our author confounds here, after Moreri, Frederic the fair, who died in the year 1330, and had been competitor to Lewis of Bavaria, with Frederic the Pacific, who died in 1493. This last had by Eleanor of Portugal, a daughter named Cunegonda, who was married, in the year 1487, to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, as may be seen in Ritterhusius, fol. 57, and 66, of the edition of Tubingen 1664; and as it has been observed in Moreri, at the article Bavaria, pag. 136, (where the Printers have by mistake put Albert V, instead of Albert IV) and at the word Austria, pag. 878. NEW OBSERVAT.

(a) He should have said Frederic III. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(2) Mr Bayle imagined that they had put here Lewis III, instead of Frederic III. In effect, the connection of the ideas and of the reasoning required that our author should have ended by proving that Albert IV could not have been son-in-law to Frederic III: but we must not expect that he should be so exact. After laying it down as a certain fact that Cunegonda was daughter to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, he concludes from thence that Albert IV could not have been her husband, since Lewis of Bavaria was Albert the fourth's great grandfather's grandfather, and consequently was not even so much as his cotemporary. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) Ritterhusius and Heiff. give the title of Frederic III to Frederic the Pacific. Other writers call him with our author, Frederic IV. This matter is pretty

It is true that the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria disputed the Empire with him; but Pope John XXII, and a great part of the Princes of Europe, acknowledged him. Be that as it will, the editor should be consistent in the principles of his Chronology, and he is so far from being so, that he calls that Prince Frederic III, when he makes him father-in-law to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, and Frederic IV, when he observes that Lewis of Bavaria called the Rich, tore by way of contempt the letters which that Emperor wrote to him in the year 1457 (4).

As for the rest, it was the death of the Emperor Henry VII, of the house of Luxembourg, which gave occasion to the double election of Frederic of Austria, and of Lewis of Bavaria: it is this same Henry who was said to have been poisoned by a host or consecrated wafer.

pretty well cleared up in Moreri. At the article of Frederic called the Fair, pag. 192, that Emperor is named Frederic III, and they add that some authors do not reckon him among the Emperors: and at the article of Frederic called the Pacific, pag. ibid. they put Frederic IV, Emperor, or III, according to others. They likewise call him Frederic IV, at the word Austria, pag. 878. The case is the same with respect to the Emperor Lewis, of whom mention has been just made. Our author says Lewis of Bavaria III of that name: Moreri at the word Bavaria, pag. 135, calls him IV of that name: and at the article Lewis, pag. 219, IV, or V, of that name: and Heiff. says V, of that name. NEW OBSERVAT.

(4) In the last edition, at the word Bavaria, pag. 136, there is Frederic III. NEW OBSERVAT.

BEAUPOIL.

Lewis de Beaupoil of St Aulaire is improperly called the Marquis Danmarie: they should have said (a) Lanmarie. It is a fault which is peculiar to this edition, and the editor where he speaks of the late Mr Perrault has committed it (1).

(a) The Mercurie Galant for the month of April 1702, says Lanmarie, and speaks of the Marquis de Lanmarie Captain-Lieutenant of a company of the Gendarmery, married to the daughter of President Perrault, a lady of above two hundred thousand crowns fortune. But as proper names are ill spelt in the Mercurie Galant, it would not be reasonable to prefer Lanmarie to Lanmarie. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1707, and the following, at the article BEAUPOIL, they have always put Lanmarie. They likewise write Sainte Aulaire, and not Saint Aulaire as our author does, who is likewise mistaken in saying Perrault, for Perrault. I have not been able to find the place where he pretends that this fault lies. NEW OBSERVAT.

BELLAY.

In all the editions of the Historical Dictionary, and in this last as well in the first, when they speak of the dignities of the Church of Bellay, they omit that of Archdeacon, and substitute in the room of it that of Chanter. The latter is not a dignity in the said Church, and that of Archdeacon is the second (1): besides the last letter but one of Bellay is not an a but an e. This Church has produced great men.

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the word BELEY, Dignitaries, which are the Dean, the Arch-priest, the Archdeacon, and the Primicier. NEW OBSERVAT.

BOILEAU.

Gilles Boileau, Steward of the King's privy-purse, brother to the celebrated Mr Despreaux, and to the Abbot Boileau, Doctor of the Sorbonne, was dead before the year 1671, which all the editions of Moreri assign for the year of his death; since Mr de Montigny who succeeded him in the French Academy, was admitted there in 1669. This fault has gone through all the editions, in this as well as in the former (1).

(1) This fault is corrected in the edition of 1707. Questions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. chap. XVIII. Mr Bayle had taken notice of it in his Réponse aux pag. 134. NEW OBSERVAT.

BRANCAS.

The Abbot Brancas, who is still living, is not the son of Magdalen Clara of Lenoncourt, first wife to the late Duke of Villars, but of Magdalen Girard his second wife (1).

(1) Since these Remarks were designed for the correcting of Moreri, our author should have pointed out the place where this fault lies. NEW OBSERVAT.

BRISACH.

There is a fault here which has escaped Mr Vaultier, as well as Mr le Clerc, and the other editors (a) of Moreri's Dictionary. Is it allowable for one to be ignorant that there is no stone bridge upon the Rhine? and that the rapidity of this river has always hindered any such from being built? Nevertheless they all affirm very positively in the article Brisach, that this town is situated upon the Rhine, which has there a stone bridge over it: this river has no bridges but such as are of wood (1), and even these are only

(a) We may add that Mr Baudrand is in the same case, since he says in his Geographical Dictionary, speaking of Brisach cum ponte lapideo ad Rhenum fluvium: --- with a stone bridge over the Rhine. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1707 and the following ones, at the word BRISACH or BRISSAC, they say that there was formerly at that place a bridge of wood over the Rhine, which was demolished after the peace of Ryswick. In the edition of 1725, they always write Brisach. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) We

BRISACH. CAMUS. CANADA. CHRISTINA OF BADEN.

only bridges (b) of boats. The first bridge that we find in going up towards the source of this river, is the bridge (c) of Constance; and the last is that of Straßbourg. It is true that formerly Cæsar built a wooden bridge below Mentz, in order to transport his army, but there is no such thing now (d).

(b) We can hardly conceive that the bridge of Brisach was a bridge of boats, when we remember that the reason alleged by France why she did not forthwith evacuate that fortress, which by the treaty of Riswick she was obliged to restore to the Emperor, was that they wanted a great deal of time for pulling up the piles which supported the bridge. It had been stipulated by that treaty of peace, that the bridge of Brisach should be demolished. Those who read the account of the battle that was fought in the year 1678, between the French and the Germans at the bridge of Rhinfeld will still be at a greater loss to conceive that this bridge is only a bridge of boats. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) The Sieur Coulon in his book of the rivers of France Tom. 2. pag. 504. Says that there are twelve bridges upon the Rhine, the first of which is at Stein, and the last at Straßbourg: now he says pag. 508, that Stein is near the place where the Rhine comes out of the lake of Constance. Our author had expressed himself more accurately if he had said, the last bridge that we find in going up towards the source of this river is the bridge of Constance, (or of Stein according to the Sieur Coulon; but he is mistaken for there is a bridge upon the Rhine at Constance) and the first is that of Straßbourg. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(d) As the end of these marginal notes is the same with that of the remarks of the text, viz. to make the future editions of Morel's Dictionary more perfect, we shall say here occasionally that there is something in the article Brigaw which should be struck out. We read there that Brisach was formerly its capital, but afterwards Friburg got the start of it, and is become memorable by its riches and other advantages. It is likewise so on account of the famous battle which the Duke d'Anguien won in the year 1644, where General Mercy was killed. It will be proper in a new edition to stop at Friburg got the start of it. The rest is misplaced and should come in under the word Friburg (2). Besides it is not true that General Mercy was killed at the battle of Friburg in 1644. He was killed at the battle of Nortlingen in the year 1645. He had a brother named Gaspar who was killed at the battle of Friburg in 1644. This is what deceived Morel. In the article of General Mercy, Morel observes that he was wounded at Nortlingen on the third of August 1645. It should have been said that he died of his wounds. This capital omission ought to be supplied in the first edition that shall be published (3). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(2) This is corrected in the edition of 1725, after the following manner: Brisach was formerly the capital city, but afterwards Friburg, more famous on account of its riches, deprived it of that rank. The rest is wholly left out. At the article Friburg mention is made of the victory obtained by the Duke d'Anguien. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) All these faults are corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

C.

CAMUS.

THE editor calls the famous Bishop of Belley, John-Peter le Camus, instead John-Peter Camus. It is a fault which he has not taken from the old editions, but which he himself has made without doubt, by confounding the families of le Camus and Camus, which are nevertheless very different (1). The first is an ancient family of the Robe at Paris; Cardinal le Camus is of that family. The second is a family of military gentlemen though some branches of it at this day wear the Robe. Since I am speaking of John-Peter Camus, Bishop of Belley. I ought to remark that the author of the Paris Gazette, when he mentioned last year, or the year before, the death of Mr Camus, Abbot and General of the Order of St Ruf, is in the wrong to say that this Abbot was nephew to that Bishop; they were of the same family, but certainly the Bishop was not the Abbot's uncle.

(1) This fault is not in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

CANADA.

This article is curious enough, but it must be confessed that the author, speaking of the first Apostles who planted the faith in these newly discovered countries, should not have forgot to give the Jesuits their due (1). There are few religious societies to which the world is so much obliged as it is to this, and few that have acted with so much courage and zeal in declaring the truths of Christianity to these savage nations.

(1) Nothing has been added thereupon in the last editions. NEW OBSERVAT.

CHRISTINA OF BADEN.

The editor has confounded himself when he speaks of this Princess, who was third wife to Albert Marquis of Anspach; it is in the article of Brandenburg Anspach. He observes first of all that Albert was only twice married (1), and afterwards forgetting

(1) This error is corrected in the edition of 1725, at the word Brandenburg, pag. 455. NEW OBSERVAT.

CLAIRVAUX. CLEMENT XI. CLUSA. COMO. CREMONA.

701

no doubt the first proposition which he had advanced, he names the three Princesses who were wives to this Marquis. I do not know our author's real opinion touching this historical point; but whatever it be, it is most certain that Christina of Baden Dourlach was third wife to Albert of Brandenburg, Marquis of Anspach, and this Prince is grandfather to the new Princess of Hanover (2).

(2) Wilhelmina-Carolina, the late Queen-consort of England. NEW OBSERVAT.

CLAIRVAUX.

This abbey is not the chief of the order, it is only one of the four principal daughters of Cîteaux. Now if this abbey were chief of the order, the Abbot would not be subject to the jurisdiction of the Abbot of Cîteaux; it is nevertheless a certain fact, and easy to be proved that he is so (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is said, that the abbey of Clairvaux is the third daughter of Cîteaux, eleiive and regular. NEW OBSERVAT.

CLEMENT XI.

There is a fault here which is owing to nothing but want of attention, for besides that it is not common to all the articles where mention is made of this Pope, it is impossible to believe the editor so ignorant as not to know that Clement XI, who now fills St Peter's chair, is not the immediate successor to Alexander VIII, since Innocent XII, whose government will one day be so famous in history, on account of the great events which happened in his time, reigned between these two Popes; it is nevertheless affirmed in the new edition, that Clement XI succeeded Alexander VIII (1).

(1) Our author should have pointed out the place where this error lies. NEW OBSERVAT.

CLUSA.

They seem to doubt, in the article of James Clusa, a Cistercian Friar, who became afterwards a Carthusian, whether this author be a different person from him who is known under the name of James de Paradiso; it even looks as if the author of the new edition was unwilling to distinguish these two authors. This article should not have been treated so superficially, and the authority of those who distinguish James de Clusa, and James de Paradiso, is not of such small weight that this question deserved to be treated so carelessly (1).

(1) In the last edition they have put CLUSE (James PARADES, they refer to DE CLUSE (James). NEW de), who, according to most authors, is the same with OBSERVAT. JAMES DE PARADES: and at the word JAMES DE

COMO.

Among the authors who have spoken of Como, or of the lake of Como, the editor does not mention an history or a description of that city, which does not indeed contain above two pages, and which was composed by Mr Duker, who took it from several authors. There has been added to it the plan of that city. Mr Duker was poisoned in Sicily in the year 1635. Camillus Ghilini, a writer of the XVIth century, and one of the best Latin authors of that time, has also given a description of the lake of Como. The piece does not exceed three pages, and has had no better fate than Duker's, that is to say, it has been forgot, as well as the description of the lake of Como in eight pages, written by Paul Jovius. It is strange that in one single article three authors of such distinction should be forgotten (1).

(1) These authors are still forgotten in the edition Mr Grævius's Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. NEW of 1725. Their descriptions of the city and of the OBSERVAT. lake of Como are inserted in the third volume of CREMONA.

The editor, in reckoning up the authors who mention this city, has forgot Lewis Cavitelli, who wrote the annals of it from its foundation to the year 1583 (1). They are very extensive, because the author does not so much confine himself to his subject, but that he often takes in facts which have a relation to the general history of Italy, and even to divers other parts of Europe. This work, tho' written in an age when learning begun to revive, is not the more correct on that account. The editor, as negligent as Moreri was, does not so much as give a particular article of Cavitelli.

(1) This author is quoted in the last edition; but third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. instead of Cavitelli, the Printers have put Camelli. NEW OBSERVAT. This work of Cavitelli's is likewise to be found in the

VOL. V.

8 P

CREQUI.

CREQUI. DENIS. DEODATUS.

CREQUI.

There is an error in the last edition, touching the Marquis de Crèqui, who was killed at the battle of Luzzara. It is observed there that the said Lord left some daughters by the lady N . . . d'Aumont, his wife, which is absolutely false: this Marquis left no posterity, and by his death the Count de Canaples, his uncle, at present Duke de Lefdi-guières, who was second son to Charles II, Sieur de Crequi, who was killed at the siege of Chambery, in the year 1630, has got possession of the entailed estate: it is easy to judge that the entail would not have taken place in his favour, if the Marquis de Crequi had left daughters (1).

(1) All this is corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

D.

DENIS (Dionysius Ryckelius).

THE encomium upon this Carthusian Friar is excessive; it is just (a), I confess, but then the author should have shown upon what he grounded it; and should have said something of the admirable works of this Anchorite; of these works, I say, which obliged Pope Eugenius IV to cry out in reading them, Lætetur Mater Ecclesia que talem habet filium. - - - Let mother church rejoice in having such a son. The book then which has done the greatest honour to Denis, the Carthusian, is his treatise concerning the authority of the Pope, and of the Council; and I do not doubt but it was the reading of that work which drew the exclamation from the sovereign Pontif. Denis Rikel was certainly one of the greatest lights of his order, and even of the Church (b).

(a) It is difficult to conceive how an encomium that is excessivæ can be just; or if it be just, how it can be excessivæ. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Our author might have given several other hints touching this article; Moreri has forgot to mark the place where this Carthusian died; it was the Charter-house of Ruremonde in Guelderland (1). He was in the wrong to say that they surnamed him Extatic, on account of his attachment to contemplation, he should have added, that it was chiefly because it was thought he had divine inspirations during his extasies (2). There are several singularities in his life which would much adorn his article in the new editions of Moreri. The most common opinion is that he died at the age of sixty-nine years: nevertheless, Valerius Andreas, pag. 190, of his Bibliotheca Belgica, says, that Denys the Carthusian affirms, that he composed his book of Meditations (which was his last production) at the age of seventy-nine years (3). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is observed, that he entered into the Carthusian monastery at Ruremonde in 1423, and lived there forty-eight years. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) We still find in the last edition that his continual attachment to contemplation got him the name of Extatic Doctor. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) In the last edition it is said that he died on the twelfth of March 1471, aged sixty-nine years. They do not quote Valerius Andreas at the end of that article. NEW OBSERVAT.

DEODATUS (in Moreri) DIEU-DONNE'.

It is surprising that this article has not been corrected in any edition of Moreri's Dictionary; here they commit a capital error, for they confound two Popes into one. Certain it is that there have been two Popes of the name Deodatus, or Deus-dedit; the first succeeded Boniface IV, in the beginning of the VIIth century, that is to say, in the year 614: but besides the Deodatus of whom Moreri speaks, there was another, who succeeded Vitalianus about the year 669, the year in which the latter died. Moreri has taken this error from Platina and Onuphrius, who confound these two Popes. But what surprises me is, that we find the two Deodatus's in the chronological table of the Popes, at the article of Rome. This shews the little exactness and attention of the editors; besides the second à Deo datus reigned seven years, two months, and seventeen days; therefore the time of his administration is long enough to deserve to be mentioned (1). His pontificate was even remarkable for some things, which might have served as an epoch to the historians. It was this Pope who allowed the Venetians to choose a chief for themselves, and to create a Duke.

(1) In the edition of 1725, these two Popes are very well distinguished: but the article of the second is brought in at the word ADEODAT. The chronology of our author is not followed there, for it is affirmed that Adeodatus succeeded Vitalianus in the year 671, and that he died on the eighteenth of May 676, after having held the see five years, two months, and seventeen days. NEW OBSERVAT.

DIEPPE.

DIEPPE.

Dieppe is twelve leagues from Rouën, even according to the most exact calculation; consequently it is at least a fault in point of exactness, to say that these two cities are only ten leagues distant from one another. I will confess, if you please, that the fault is of no great consequence, but it may nevertheless appear worthy of a Geographer's attention; and in an Universal Dictionary care should be taken to satisfy every body (1).

(1) In the last edition it is said that Dieppe is twelve leagues from Rouën. NEW OBSERVAT.

E.

EGHMONT (a).

IT is not an exact way of speaking, to say that the only person who remains of the illustrious (b) family of Eghmont is the Count d'Eghmont, who married Madam de Cosnac; however this is what our editor says, as if he had visited all the provinces of Flanders, on purpose to see whether that great family was reduced to the single person of the Count d'Eghmont now in France (c).

(a) Our author should have warned the editors to correct this Orthography: it should be writ Egmont: and if custom did not authorize Egmont, it would be still better to write Egmond: the Latin authors say Egmonda, Egmondanus &c. Strada should not have made use of the word Egmontius (1). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Moreri says that it is the principal family in Holland. He should have said one of the principal, &c. (2). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) The editors should have been told that Moreri is mistaken, when he says that the Count d'Egmont who was beheaded at Brussels on the fifth of June 1568, left three sons and eleven daughters; he should have said three sons and eight daughters (3). He should not have forgot the date of the erection of Egmont into a county, he should have said that it was done in favour of John d'Egmont by the Emperor Maximilian I, in the year 1488 (4). The Count who was beheaded at Brussels deserved a longer article: they may enlarge it, if they please, in a new edition, and they will do well to consult the last History of the Duke of Alva (5). Mr Moreri has only followed the writers that were enemies to King Philip II. This was not discharging the duty of an Historian, he should have consulted the authors of both sides, and perhaps it would appear from thence that the said

Count was not clear from the crime of high-treason. It is not unlikely that he artfully endeavoured to manage matters so that Philip II, should not be King of the Low-Countries upon any other condition, than sending such orders there as were suitable to the advice given by the Nobility of the land. Those who aspired at this kind of sovereignty, connived at the mutinies of the populace and the pillaging of the churches. Count d'Egmont was accused of this perhaps with a good deal of reason. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the last edition at the word EGHMONT, family, they refer us to EGMOND, where, in effect, we find the article of that family. This last article is preceded by that of Egmont, village, so spelt, though in the following article they write Egmond. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the edition of 1712, and those that follow, it is said that the village of Egmond has given its name to one of the principal families in Holland, &c. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) In some editions they say, that Count had three sons and ten daughters. NEW OBSERVAT.

(4) Nothing has been added upon this head in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(5) They have not enlarged this article in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

ENCYCLOPEDIA.

This word puts me in mind that they have forgot to mention the book which Andrew-Matthew Aquaviva, Duke of Atri in the kingdom of Naples, composed under that title (1). The family Aquaviva has produced learned men.

(1) In the last edition at the word AQUAVIVA, and in the article of Andrew-Matthew d'Aquaviva III of the name (it is thus that our author should have named him) they take notice that this Duke, after he he had been present at two battles that were lost &c;

having a particular inclination for learned men and letters, consecrated the remainder of his life to study, and even became an author. But they make no mention of his Encyclopedia. NEW OBSERVAT.

ESPERNAY.

The author of the new edition does not do justice to the antient city of Espernay, when he makes it to be no more than a borough. One had reason to expect that he would have corrected the first editions in this article. Those who are desirous to be informed of the antiquity of that town, which is in Champaign, need only consult a letter directed to Father de Villers, and inserted in the Memoires de Trevoux for the month of May of this present year: but the writer of that letter wrongs the author of the new edition of the Dictionary, when he reproaches him with having said, that

Espernay

ESPINAY DU RETAL. ESTE. FELIBIEN. FRANCIS II.

Espenay is only a village; the editor is nearer the truth, since he gives that place the title of borough (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, they have put, ESPERNAT, a city of France in Champaign, &c. and they quote the Memoires de Trevoix, 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

ESPINAY DU RETAL.

This Genealogical article is not exact; it is said therein that Richard d'Espenay was High-steward and Great-Chamberlain of Bretagne; which is a mistake, since it was Robert, father to Richard, that was possessed of these dignities (1). They commit another fault in the same article, when they affirm that Guy II d'Espenay married Jane d'Estouteville: it was not Guy II, who married that lady, it was Henry d'Espenay (2). In fine, they do not tell us that Claudius d'Espenay, who was son to Margaret d'Espreaux, and who married Jane de la Rochefoucauld, left besides Frances, Charles d'Espenay, who married Margaret de Rohan, by whom he had no children, and consequently his estate returned to his sister (3). It will concern those who shall have the care of the next edition of Moreri, to improve this article, pursuant to these Remarks.

(1) In the same edition we find that ROBERT d'Espenay, the first of the name, was High-steward of Bretagne, and first Chamberlain to Duke John VI; that ROBERT, the second of the name, grandson (and not son) to Robert I, was High-steward of Bretagne; and that RICHARD, son to Robert II, was Chamberlain to Duke Francis II. NEW OBSERVAT.

Catharine d'Estouteville. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) This is corrected in the last edition: but where as our author says Margaret d'Espreaux, they have put Margaret de Scepaux; they have written Durestal, instead of Du Retal; and in the room of Jane de la Rochefoucauld, there is Frances de la Rochefoucauld. They observe there that CHARLES dying without issue, his estate went to Charles de Schomberg, his sister's son. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) We likewise find there that GUY II married Frances de Villefranche; and that HENRY married

ESTE.

The editor has varied speaking of Mary Eleanor d'Este, now Queen of England: in some places she is omitted, and in others not put in her right place. This Princess is daughter to Alphonso IV, Duke of Modena and Reggio, and to Laura Martinozzy, the late Cardinal Mazarin's niece; the late Duke of Modena, Francis II, was her brother, and the present Duke of Modena, formerly Cardinal d'Este, is her uncle. This Prince, who succeeded his nephew, who died without issue, is brother to the late Duke Alphonso IV. Such are the amendments to be made in this article in the subsequent editions (1).

(1) This article is corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

F.

FELIBIEN.

IN the article of Messieurs Felibien, they have forgot the Abbot Felibien, Archdeacon of Chartres, and, if I am not mistaken, brother to him who has given us that fine history of Painters. The Abbot Felibien is sufficiently known in the learned world to deserve being mentioned upon this occasion. The Pentateuchus Historicus, &c. which he published some months ago, should, methinks, have secured him a place in a Dictionary where his family holds a considerable one already (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, we find the article of brother to Andrew Felibien des Avoaux. NEW OBSERVAT. JAMES FELIBIEN, who is the man in question here, SERVAT.

FRANCIS II.

In the article of this Prince, they place his birth in the year 1543 (on the twentieth of January); they meant (a), without doubt, 1544. The mistake is of no more than one year; but one year is considerable when we talk of a Prince that lived only sixteen years, and some odd months. This Prince died on the fifth of December 1560. Now from the twentieth of January 1543, to the fifth of December 1560, they would certainly find it to be more than seventeen years (1).

(a) This error proceeded from their making the year to begin only at Easter, and consequently the month of January 1543, according to our way of reckoning, belongs to the year 1544. The editors of Moreri should be very exact, either in giving notice of the difference which arises from the time of beginning the year, or in reducing the dates to the present calculation. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1707, it is said that FRANCIS II was born on the twentieth of January 1543, according to the old way of reckoning. In that of 1712, the date of the day is corrected, and they put the nineteenth of January. But these words, according to the old way of reckoning, are left out in the last edition, and it is expressly said that this Prince was born on the nineteenth of January 1544. NEW OBSERVAT.

FURAN.

FURAN.

Is a small river of Bugey, which goes winding at a league's distance from Belley, and falls into the Rhône near Pierre-chatel. The editor calls it improperly le Foran (1).

(1) As Moreri gives no particular article of this river under the name of Foran, or Furan; our Critic should have pointed out the place where this fault is to be found. In the article Bugey, of the last edition, it is called le Furan. NEW OBSERVAT.

G.

GENOA.

IN speaking of this city and of James Bracelli, who was of Sarzana, in the Republic of Genoa, Moreri and his Continuator make use of an unpardonable exaggeration. James Bracelli, say they, left also a book concerning the illustrious men of Genoa, which he inscribed to Lewis of Pisa a Jacobin, &c. Do these words suit a small piece of three or four pages, which is tacked to another of the same size, intituled, A Description of the coast of Genoa, that is to say, of the country which extends from the Var to the Macra (1)? What Foglietta, Justiniani, Leander Alberti, Fascio, and de Voragine, have written upon the same subject, is more particular. Philip Beroaldus compares Bracelli's stile to that of Cæsar.

(1) In the edition of 1725 the following alteration is made here: James Bracelli also left a short description of the coast of Genoa; to which is added a small treatise on the illustrious men of Genoa, inscribed to Lewis of Pisa, a Dominican. These two pieces of Bracelli are inserted in the first volume of the Tesaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. NEW OBSERVAT.

GASPARD BARTHIUS.

The famous Gaspard Barthius was aged only seventy-one years and three months wanting five days when he died; the editor does nevertheless suppose him to have lived somewhat above seventy-two years; which I thus prove to be a mistake. Barthius was born on the twenty-second of June 1587, and died on the seventeenth of September 1658: we need only reckon the difference between these two years (1). This author, so famous among the learned, was very ill treated by Vossius, and he treated Scioppius very ill in his turn, being one of his severest adversaries. Barthius was a copious writer; and if we may justly blame any thing in the books which he published, it is the easiness with which he composed them.

(1) In the last edition they have put that Barthius died on the seventeenth of September 1658; which is taken from Mr Bayle, whom they quote. For the rest, our author should have spoken of Barthius under the letter B, and not under the letter G: but this preposterous order is pretty common with him. NEW OBSERVAT.

J.

JAMES II.

IN all the articles where mention is made of the late King of England, James II, they place his death in the year 1702. It is amazing that at three or four years distance from a matter of fact people should be already mistaken in a year. What would the case be then, if that Prince had died thirty or forty years ago? It is an inexcusable fault, since to avoid it, the editor needed only to have taken up the first almanack that came in his way, he would have learned there that the said Prince died in the year 1701, and he would have fixed his Chronology by that (1).

(1) They have corrected this fault in the last editions. NEW OBSERVAT.

S. JUSTIN.

In the article of this Father, the editor should not have forgot to say, that he was one of Aristotle's greatest adversaries. If he had consulted the seventh book of Eusebius, and St Jerom's catalogue of Ecclesiastical Authors, he might have seen with what warmth (a) this Father of the Church inveighed against the Prince of Philosophers. He published a treatise, in which he confuted several tenets of Aristotle's Philosophy, and wherein he shewed the dangerous consequences that might be drawn from them (1). If we search into past ages, we shall find few which have not produced adversaries to the Peripatetic Philosophy; it is true, all those who have attacked it have not been alike successful in decrying it; and it seems that it was reserved for (b) Mr Des Cartes to give it the deepest wounds.

(a) All this wants to be corrected; for, 1. He should have told us what work of Eusebius he means, when he says the seventh book is to be consulted, whether it be his Ecclesiastical History, or his Evangelical Preparation, or his Evangelical Demonstration. 2. In the catalogue which Eusebius has left us of St Justin's works in the eighteenth chapter of the fourth book of his Ecclesiastical History, we find no mention made of any treatise against Aristotle. 3. St Jerom's catalogue of Ecclesiastical Authors makes no mention of such a treatise written by St Justin. The treatise against Aristotle, which appears among St Justin's works, is accounted supposititious. See the Bibliobesque of Mr du Pin in the article of that Father of the Church. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and those that follow, we find only that Photius mentions some treatise of Justin, against Marcion and against Aristotle. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) Mr Des Cartes did not make any particular refutation of the Peripatetic system: the mischief he has done it proceeds from his having laid down other principles, which have given people a distaste for the school Philosophy. It was Gassendus, who, by attacks in form, shewed the falsity of the Peripatetic doctrines. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

L.

LE FERON.

IN this article it is said that the late Duchefs of Chaulnes had neither brother nor sisters, in a word, that she was an only daughter. The Marquis de la Frete, who is now living, would not readily agree to this assertion (1).

(1) In the last edition, at the word Feron, it is said that Elizabeth la Feron, who married the Duke of Chaulnes, for her second husband, was the only daughter of Dreux le Feron. They add, that her mother, Barbara Servien, was married in second wedlock to Peter de Gruel, Lord of la Frete . . . and left children by him. NEW OBSERVAT.

LE JAY.

This article is faulty, for they have ill spelt the name of Catherine de la Boutiere, who lately died, and who was married to the late Nicholas le Jay, Baron de Tilly, & de la Maison rouge, and Counsellor in the parliament of Paris, who died in 1700: they write it N . . . de la Boutire (1). Besides, in the same article they place the death of the late Mr le Jay, Bishop of Cahors, in the year 1679; as to this last point there is only a mistake of about twelve years, since the late Mr le Jay, who succeeded Mr de Noailles, at present Cardinal and Archbishop of Paris, in the bishopric of Cahors, has been dead not above that space of time (2).

(1) In the edition of 1725, we find at length, Catherine de la Boutiere. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the same edition it is observed, that Henry-William le Jay, named Bishop of Cahors in the year 1679, died in 1693: and in the article of the Cardinal de Noailles it is said, that he was, in the year 1679, made Bishop of Cahors, and transferred to Châlons-sur-Marne in 1680. NEW OBSERVAT.

LODI.

In the article of Lodi, a town in Italy, no notice is taken of the History which Otho Morena wrote upon that subject, and which his son Acerbus Morena continued (1). This work is, properly speaking, the history of what Frederic Barbarossa did in Lombardy, from the year 1154 to the year 1168, chiefly with respect to the town of Lodi. The two Morena's died before that Prince, consequently they could not bring their history further down. They were both in the interest of Frederic; from whence we

(1) In the last edition no mention is made of the History of Morena; but only of that of Defendente Lodi. It is intitled, Discorsi istorici intorno la Città di Lodi, and was printed in the year 1629, at Lodi in 4to. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In

LODI. LE MERCIER. LEYME. LORRAINE. LUCIAN.

707

we may justly conclude that their writings were not quite impartial. It was this no doubt that obliged Baronius to use them ill in his Ecclesiastical Annals: he speaks of them in very disobliging terms; but that Cardinal was still more partial to the Pope, than the Morena's were to the Emperor, notwithstanding that they writ, if we may say so, under his very eyes. What may be said in favour of these two authors, is that they writ nothing but what they had seen. Their Latin stile is such as prevailed in the XIIth century, that is to say, very bad. Felix Ofio, Professor of Rhetoric at Padua, has made upon that History long notes which deserve to be read.

The editor gives us an article of Morena, but he says in a very confused manner, that Otho Morena composed the History of Frederic Barbarossa, and that his son finished it; which is absolutely false, since that Emperor out-lived them: besides that book is rather the History of the wars of Lodi, than that of the said Emperor. By the History of a man is commonly meant, a particular account of his actions, from the beginning of his life to his death. Now the Morena's could not possibly have writ a particular account of Frederic Barbarossa's actions, since both of them died before that Emperor (2).

(2) In the last edition, at the article MORENA, it is said that OTHO MORENA began the History of what the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa did in Lombardy, from the year 1154 to the year 1168, chiefly with respect to the town of Lodi; and that his son ACRRUS MORENA, finished what his father had not been able to do. That History is inserted in the third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italianæ. NEW OBSERVAT.

LE MERCIER.

The editor speaking of John le Mercier, Royal Professor of the Hebrew tongue at Paris, does not express himself so exactly as he ought to do, when he says that this learned man translated from Greek into Latin Harmenopolus. From these words, any body would be apt to believe that le Mercier has translated all the works of that Greek author; it is nevertheless certain that he has only translated his Prochiron, or promptuarium juris civilis. Those who only know Harmenopolus's works by the idea which Moreri, or his Continuators, give of them, will not hesitate a moment in believing, by what they say, that le Mercier had translated them all, because they have been all collected in one body (1).

(1) Our author has taken this remark from Mr Bayle's Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. Cap. LIII, pag. 482, & seq. In the edition of 1725 at Avignon, translated from Greek into Latin, the Prochiron or promptuarium juris civilis of Harmenopolus. NEW OBSERVAT.

LEYME.

This word was right in the first editions, and they have made it wrong in the present by putting Leyne, instead of Leyme: it is an abbey of nuns in the diocese of Cahors, of which mention is made in the article Noailles, upon the subject of Frances de Noailles, great aunt to the Marshal and to the Cardinal de Noailles, who was abbeſs there, and died not long ago (1).

(1) In the last edition at the word NOAILLES, and the article of HENRY Lord of Noailles, Count of Ayen &c. they have put Leime. NEW OBSERVAT.

LORRAINE.

In the article of Lorraine the editor has committed a very gross fault: he says that Catherine de Bourbon, sister to Henry IV, and wife to Henry Duke of Bar, was mother to the Princesses Nichola and Claudia de Lorraine; the first of whom was married to Charles, afterwards Duke of Lorraine, and the second to Francis de Vaudemont, grand-father to the present Duke of Lorraine. These two Princes, who were brothers, were first cousins to those two Princesses who were daughters to Henry Duke of Bar, and afterwards of Lorraine, by his second wife; for Catherine de Bourbon his first wife, lived only six months with him, being of different religions they fell out and parted; Catherine died in the year 1604 (1).

In this same article the editor is mistaken in the list of the Dukes of Lorraine. Gerard, who died in the year 1048, was never Marchis of Lorraine, as it is said in the new edition; it was his second son Gerard who was so by his marriage with Hedwige, heiress of the county of Namur, which her mother Hermengarde had left her (2).

(1) This is corrected in the edition of 1725, pag. 209, col. 1. who died in 1048, is called Count and Marchis of Alsatia; and Gerard, his son, Duke and Marchis of Lorraine. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the same edition pag. 207. col. 2. Gerard, Lorraine. NEW OBSERVAT.

LUCIAN.

It plainly appears that the editor had a mind to correct what Moreri says concerning the Metamorphosis, or golden Asis of Apuleius, nevertheless what he himself says on this occasion is not so exact as it ought to be; for to say that the golden Asis is a paraphrase on the same subject which Lucian had taken from Lucius of Patras, author of a book of Metamorphosis, or transformations, which Plotius mentions, is not an exact expression; he ought ought to have said that Lucius of Patras had been abridged by Lucian, and paraphrased by Apuleius: and thus that article should have been corrected (1). In the same manner, when they speak of Apuleius of Madaura (2), should they have forgot in reckoning up his works, the Letters to Corellia, which, to say the truth, are (a) written in a very free style, and his other treatises de Republica, de Numeris, de Musica, and his Ludicra, of which he speaks himself in his apology (3)? It is (b) a pretty ingenious Poem (4).

LUCIAN. LUCIUS BRUTUS. LYCURGUS.

(1) Our author has taken this remark from Mr Bayle's article of Apuleius, remark (M). They have made no alteration here in the last edition of Moreri, except that instead of Lucius of Patras they have put Lucius Patras; but Lucius of Patras was right. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) By the manner of our author's expressing himself one might believe that Apuleius of Madaura is different from the Apuleius he was speaking of: he is however the same. NEW OBSERVAT.

(a) He should have said verses, for it is a long time since these letters have been lost. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(3) Nothing has been added upon this in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) It is very probable that the Ludicra of Apuleius was a collection of divers pieces some of which were in verse, and others in prose. He says that a letter contained in that collection had been objected to him; which letter was written in verse, and treated of the care to be taken in keeping one's teeth clean, de dentifricio. This does not prove that the Ludicra was a Poem. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(4) Our Critic having found in Mr Bayle the following words of Apuleius: legerunt à Ludicris meis epistolium de dentifricio, versibus scriptum, imagined that the Ludicra of Apuleius was a Poem; and though this work be not now extant, he speaks of it as if he had read it, and assures us that it is a pretty ingenious Poem. NEW OBSERVAT.

LUCIUS BRUTUS.

Moreri has followed the authority of Dionysius Halicarnassensis preferably to that of Livy, in speaking of this generous Roman. Dionysius Halicarnassensis makes him son to a daughter of Tarquinius Priscus King of Rome, who was sister (a) to Tarquin, whereas Livy makes him the son of Tarquinia sister to the last Tarquin. Mr Bayle demonstrates with an irresistible evidence, that the sentiment of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, upon this occasion is not to be defended, and that we must necessarily follow the opinion of Livy. I refer the reader to him (1).

(a) This is very obscure, for to which Tarquin must we suppose that the daughter of Tarquinius Priscus was sister? Was it to the last Tarquin? But in that case the opinion of Dionysius Halicarnassensis, which our author rejects, would not be different from that of Livy, which he would have us follow; and we should say that Tarquinius Priscus was father to the last Tarquin, which is entirely wrong, as Dionysius Halicarnassensis has plainly proved. The Tarquin who is said here to have been the brother of Brutus's mother, whom they make daughter to Tarquinius Priscus, would necessarily be the son of Tarquinius Priscus, but History says nothing of such a son except that he died before his father, and left two sons behind him. See Dionysius Halicarnassensis at the beginning of the fourth book. MR BAYLE'S REM.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and those that follow, it is said Lucius Junius Brutus was son to a sister of Tarquin King of Rome, and nephew to Tarquinius Superbus. NEW OBSERVAT.

LYCURGUS.

They have made some alteration in this article, I confess, and it is not so faulty as it was in the supplement of the Dictionary, but after all it is not yet exact: for they seem to me not to distinguish the two Lycurgus's, one an Athenian Orator, son to Lycophron, and grand-son to another Lycurgus whom the thirty tyrants put to death; the other the Lacedemonian Legislator. These two persons were entirely different, and it was a gross fault to confound them, as the author of the Supplement (a) did; but in short as we find only one Lycurgus mentioned in the new edition (b), it still shews a disposition in the editor to confound them (1).

The author of the Supplement had committed a great many blunders in this article; one of the chief of them was, that by mistaking Plutarch's words, he makes him say that Lycurgus drove out all idle and vagabond persons, whereas the Greek word rendered by that of maleficus only implies that he drove out all bad people. He afterwards makes him conqueror in the games that were celebrated in the presence of the people, though Plutarch, does not say a single word of it. He committed several other gross faults which convince me that this author was no great Grecian. Mr Faydit, when he speaks of Lycurgus in his new book *, doubts (c) whether there had been two Lycurgus's, and he seems to confound the King of Thrace with that

* Remarques sur Virgile, &c.

(a) This censure is wrong, Moreri had given us the article of Lycurgus the Lacedemonian Legislator. Since therefore the author of the Supplement gave us the article of some other Lycurgus's, and particularly that of Lycurgus an Athenian Orator (by which epithet he distinguished him from the very first line) he did not confound the Lacedemonian Legislator with the Orator of Athens. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) As I have not this new edition, I content myself with saying that there are several Lycurgus's in the Paris edition of 1699, and that the Lacedemonian Legislator is there plainly distinguished from the Athenian Orator. He has been placed among the other Lycurgus's. But in the Amsterdam edition of 1698 there are above fifty pages between these and Lycurgus the Legislator. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) The edition of 1707 distinguishes all the Lycu-gus's very well; and there is reason to believe that the edition of 1704 does the same. NEW OBSERV.

(c) I have looked in this book of Mr Faydit for the necessary page, and without being at all assisted by the index I found that it is page 540. I did not find there the fault which is taken notice of here, that is to say, the doubt whether there had been two Lycurgus's. Mr Faydit does not condemn the authors who distinguish the Lycurgus King of Thrace, from the other of Lacedemon, he only says that they all agree that these two Lycurgus's lived more than three hundred years after the destruction of Troy; it is upon this that he refers us to Moreri, and afterwards he concludes that it was absurd in Virgil to make Æneas say, when speaking to Dido, that he had passed through the kingdom of the Thracians, where the severe Lycurgus had formerly reigned in old times. Thracians are not acri of Lacedemon. In short after shewing that he was very uncertain on this head, he refers his reader to Moreri. This authority should not be of any great weight for such an high-spirited author as Mr Faydit appears to be in his works.

'acri quondam regnata Lycurgo.' But, 1. We do not find in Moreri that Lycurgus, King of Thrace, lived after the war of Troy. We find nothing precisely determined there as to the time of that King. We only find enough to make us conclude that he lived in the fabulous times. 2. It is certain that the Antients who have mentioned that Prince make him live before the war of Troy. Homer, in the sixth book of the Iliad, introduces Diomedes (one of the Grecian Captains at the siege of Troy) relating, as an old story, the punishment of that Lycurgus for having driven out Bacchus. Apollodorus, in the third book of his Bibliotheca, pag. m. 175, describes the adventures of Bacchus, with respect to Lycurgus, King of Thrace, in such a manner, that, by a plain consequence, this Lycurgus must have lived several generations before the war of Troy. This justifies Virgil, and demands a reparation of the injury done him. I should be very curious to know the name of the authors who have owned that Lycurgus, King of Thrace, lived more than three hundred years after the destruction of Troy. I do not know one that says so. As for the rest, the article of that King of Thrace is still very faulty in Moreri. There are several things wanting that ought to be there, and they have only quoted Plutarch and Propertius, who hardly say any thing of what is there related. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

M.

MARTIN AKAKIA.

MORERI and his Continuators have committed a great error concerning the native country of this Physician; they have translated the word Catalaunensis by Catalan or of Catalonia, instead of Cbalonais or of Cbalons. If they had carefully read Quenstet, in his book de patriis viror. to which they refer us, they would not have been guilty of such a blunder (1). I hope these remarks will prevent all mistakes in the following editions, concerning the native country of the chief of a family that is very considerable in the faculty of Physicians at Paris.

(1) This remark is taken from Mr Bayle. In the edition of 1725, we find that Akakia was born at Cbalons on the Marne. NEW OBSERVAT.

MATTHEW BOSSULUS.

He is different from another John Bossulus likewise a Frenchman, who lived above a century before him, but who, as well as he, has been very much forgotten in his own country. Mr Bayle had complained much that Matthew was so little known in the Republic of Letters, notwithstanding he had acted such a considerable part in the world. He was preceptor to Don Carlos son to Philip II, King of Spain: he had before that taught Rhetoric in the University of Valencia. These marks of honour have not however been able to rescue him from oblivion; and notwithstanding the tender anxiety of Mr Bayle he still continues in oblivion. Who could have believed that Mr Vaultier, who is so much concerned for the glory of his country, would have neglected to inform posterity, that France had given to the court of Spain a man of that consequence? It has been thought that the cause of this oblivion was his not having writ any books. If immortality can only be had at the price of being an author, it must be confessed that it would often be a greater advantage to remain buried in the dust with the generality of mankind, and to be of the number of those whose name does not go beyond the first generation (1).

(1) In the last edition of Moreri we find a good more than the transcriber in this place. NEW OBSERVAT. article of Bossulus; they have made great use there of MR BAYLE'S Dictionnaire, of which our author is no

MAZZOLIN.

The editor has adopted the error which prevailed in all the other editions concerning Sylvester Mazzolin, called Prierio or Prierias. That General of the Dominicans (a) did not die at Rennes in Bretagne on the twentieth of October 1520. Since he dedicated his book de Strigi-Magarum Demonumque mirandis, to Cardinal Auguftin Trivulfo, on the first of March 1521. I do not wonder that the editors have copied that error one from another, since not one of them mentions this book, which would have served to rectify their Chronology. I believe they have taken Francis Sylvester,

V O L. V. 8 R who

(a) There is reason to believe that Sylvester Prierias never was General of the Dominicans. MR BAYLE'S REM. (1) All who was likewise General of the Dominicans for this Mazzolin. Francis, it is true, died in the course of his visitation at Rennes in Bretagne; but if we should even allow these two Generals, who are very different, to be no more than one and the same person, the error would not be the less gross upon that account, since Francis Sylvester died, not in the year 1520, but in 1528: so that granting the editor's supposition to be true, there would still be an anachronism of eight years (1).

(1) All this is taken from Mr Bayle, Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial. Tom. I. Chap. LXVI, pag. 618, & seq. In Moreri's edition of 1725, they have given us the article of Sylvester de Priere, at the word Mozolino, upon what Father Quetif and Father Echard say of him in their Bibliothèque of the Dominican writers. Mozolino died at Rome in the year 1523, being then Master of the sacred palace. He never was General of the Dominicans. We find in Father Quetif and Father Echard the article of Francis Sylvester, General of the Dominicans, who died at Rennes on the nineteenth of September 1528, aged fifty-four years. This article is not in the last edition of Moreri, where they will do well to correct the following reference: 'SYLVESTER called de Pri-

'erio, General of the Dominicans, see Mozolino.' These words, General of the Dominicans, should be struck out. There is likewise another fault to be corrected in the article Mozolino: the Printers have put Edward Brown, instead of Edward Brown. NEW OBSERVAT.

MEDICIS.

In reckoning up the authors who have wrote the life, or who have made mention, of the famous Marquis of Marignano, John-James de Medicis, brother to Pope Pius IV, it is surprising that the editor should not speak of the Historia Cisalpina of Erycius Puteanus, or rather of the History of the actions of John-James de Medicis on the borders of the lake of Como. Erycius Puteanus is so well known in the learned world, that one has reason to be surprized at Moreri and his Continuators for not naming him among the Historians of the Marquis of Marignano. The History of John-James de Medicis, which he composed, ends with the unfortunate battle of Pavia, where Francis I. was taken prisoner by the Spaniards, and carried to Madrid. In a word, Erycius Puteanus was the chief author that should have been consulted in order to give us sure and faithful memoirs concerning the life of the famous Marquis of Marignano, since he was best acquainted with it, and knew the most secret circumstances of it (1).

Besides, in the article of Erycius Puteanus, the editor, when he speaks of his works, says nothing at all of that above-mentioned (2). Galeazzo Capella has composed a short History not exceeding five pages, which may serve by way of supplement to that of the Marquis of Marignano, written by Erycius Puteanus: and indeed they have been printed together: the latter is an account of the war of Muzzo, a small town on the west side of the lake of Como. The Marquis of Marignano was, properly speaking, the author of that little war; he got by it the town of Marignano, a large sum of money, and the title of Marquis. This supplement has been forgotten as well as the work to which it is subjoined (3).

(1) In the last edition, at the word MEDICIS, MEDICI, or MEDIQUIN, (John-James) Marquis of Marignano, they quote, Erycius Puteanus, Hist. Cisalpina. This History is in the third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In this edition at the article PUY (Henry du), or ERYCIUS PUTEANUS, they do not give the catalogue of this author's works: they only take notice in general, that he left a very great number of treatises concerning History, Rhetoric, Mathematics, Philosophy, and Philology, an account of which may be seen in Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheca Belgica. NEW OBSERV.

(3) They have not yet inserted this particular in the article of the Marquis of Marignano; nor mentioned the book of Galeazzo Capella de Bello Massim, which Grævius has inserted in the third volume of his Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. NEW OBSERVAT.

MILLET.

That name has been ill spelt in this edition, where they have put Milet instead of Millet, and that fault is peculiar to this edition, since it is not in the others. It is very necessary to take notice of it, that it may be avoided in the following editions. When I say very necessary, it is with respect to one of the greatest Mathematicians of the past age, who bore that name. I mean Claudius Francis Millet de Chales, a Jesuit, who besides, was of one of the most considerable families in Savoy; a family of which there have been Archbishops in the Tarentaise, first Presidents to the Chamber of Accounts of Chambery, and several other dignified persons (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find, 'MILET DE' and under the word Chales, there is CHALES (Claudius Francis), a Jesuit, see CHALES: 'dius-Francis Millet de' a Jesuit, &c. NEW OBSERV.

MILTON.

This article is not very correct. The editor would have given us a just idea of that author, if he had told us what were his true sentiments concerning religion. Milton, who wrote so much in vindication of the wicked and successful attempts which his countrymen made upon the life of the unfortunate King Charles I, their sovereign, was a man of no religion; he indeed professed several religions, but he did no more than flutter upon the surface of every one; for he was first of the church of England; afterwards finding the sect of the Puritans, who are rigid Calvinists, that sprung up in England

England in the year 1565 more to his liking, he embraced it. The same fickleness which had made him quit the church of England, made him likewise desert the sect of the Puritans, in order to join the Anabaptists; people believed then that Milton was entirely fixed, but they were mistaken; the declaration which he made at his death that he was attached to no religion, shewed, at last, what he was, that is, a downright Infidel (a).

Milton was a very bad Poet, and still a worse Orator: his poems are wretched; there is hardly any line in them where the laws of quantity are truly observed; one perceives in reading them, that it is a school-boy's performance; consequently he had no occasion to tell us so, it appears plainly enough upon a slight perusal. Some authors pretend that he did not write the apology for the people of England, and that he only lent his name to the work of a French schoolmaster, who at that time taught children at London (1).

The

(a) Our author should not have contented himself with informing the editor of Moreri that these things are wanting in the article of Milton: he should likewise have pointed out to him the sources where the proofs were to be had, for one of the most essential laws which the author of an Historical Dictionary should observe, is not to advance any thing without citing authorities. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Although our author had before him Mr Bayle's Dictionary, where there is a very good article of Milton, he has nevertheless ascribed to Milton sentiments which he was far from entertaining. Instead of relating them such as they were in themselves, he has judged of them according to his own prejudices, and has afterwards denominated them according to the judgment he made of them. This is not acting the part of an Historian, but that of a disputant, or of a declaimer. He even adds, of his own head, some circumstances that are absolutely false. Let us come to the fact. Mr Bayle, speaking of Milton's religion, says after his Historian, that the sect which pleased him most in his youth was that of the Puritans; but, adds he, in his riper years he liked best the Independents and Anabaptists, because they allowed more liberty to every private person, and in his opinion seemed to come nearest to the primitive Christians: but in the latter part of his life, he separated himself from all communions, and did not frequent any Christian assembly, nor in his house did he make use of the form of worship of any sect. As for the rest, he expressed the profoundest reverence to God, as well by his actions as by his conversation. These particulars have changed their nature and shape in passing through our author's hands. Milton, says he, was a man of no religion; he indeed professed several, but he did no more than flatter upon the surface of every one; he was first of the church of England; afterwards finding the sect of the Puritans . . . more to his liking, he embraced it. The same fickleness which had made him quit the church of England, made him likewise desert the sect of the Puritans in order to join the Anabaptists; people believed then that Milton was entirely fixed, but they were mistaken; the declaration which he made at his death, that he was attached to no religion, shewed at last what he was, that is to say, a downright Infidel. Nothing can be more false than the idea which this author gives of Milton, as being a man of no religion, and a downright Infidel. The works which he published evidently shew that this is a false and slanderous aspersions. The declaration which he is said to have made at his death, that he was attached to no religion, is another notorious falsehood. How could our author have the assurance to advance a thing which all England knows to be a lie.

He adds, that Milton was a very bad Poet, and still a worse Orator; that his poems are wretched, and that some authors pretend he did not write the apology for the people of England, and that he had only lent his name to the work of a French schoolmaster. He found all this in Mr Bayle, who took it from Salmasius's answer to Milton, but Mr Bayle has observed that they were idle stories with which some flatterers amused Salmasius. All these are fables, says he, which I am glad to rectify, that authors may learn to give no credit to calumnies wherewith people fill their heads against their antagonists. They think they make their court by this means to those authors, and occasion their publishing an hundred impertinencies. This remark has made no impression upon our Critic, it has not hindered him from making a grave and serious narrative of all those impertinencies.

2

In the last editions of Moreri, they have corrected the article of Milton from the Dictionary of Mr Bayle: but it is not yet entirely free from faults. I shall observe some of them here. 1. They call Milton's first wife Mary Powell, it should be Mary Powell. 2. They give the book ascribed to Charles I, the title of Icon regia, they should have said Icon Basilike. 3. Mr Bayle observes that Milton absconded at the restoration of King Charles II, and did not appear in public till the amnesty was proclaimed. He obtained a pardon, adds Mr Bayle, and lay under no other penalty, but that of being excluded from all public offices. In Moreri, it is said that he obtained from Charles II a pardon, without being subjected to any other penalty, than that of being excluded from public offices. But this was the Parliament's business, not the King's. It is true the author of Milton's Life says that in the act of Indemnity, the Parliament contented themselves with excluding him from public offices. But Milton is not named in that act; and this was sufficient to shelter him, without his having occasion for a pardon: for in the act itself it was declared that all those who were not by name excluded from the Indemnity, should be looked upon as comprised therein, and exempted from all penalties, in the same manner as if they were expressly named. John Goodwin, a famous Divine, who had published a book to justify the execution of Charles I, was excluded from public offices. 4. The new editors say, that Milton in his book of the true religion, &c, excludes none but Roman Catholics from salvation. They should have said, as Mr Bayle has done, that he excludes none but Roman Catholics from the benefit of a Toleration; and should have added the reason which moved him to exclude them from it. Milton, says Mr Bayle, shews that Popery ought to be wholly deprived of the benefit of a Toleration, not as it is a religion, but as it is a tyrannical faction which oppresses all others. 5. The editors have spun out this article by the recital of what passed at Oxford, in the year 1683. The university of Oxford, say they, being met in a body, on the 2d of July (they should have said the 21st of July) 1683, declared XXVII propositions, extracted out of Milton's works, to be heretical and scandalous, and contrary to the allegiance which subjects owe to their King, &c. But these XXVII propositions were not all extracted from Milton: several of them were taken from Knox, Buchanan, Baxter, and some other English and Scotch writers. They add, that *the English very much changed their way of thinking afterwards; as well as Bayle himself, who had commended them at that time, [in his Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for the month of April 1684, Art. III. p. m. 141.]* They should not have said that Mr Bayle changed his way of thinking afterwards, without giving proofs of it. As for the English, it would be easy to shew that they have not changed their way of thinking. By the English, we are not to understand the Court, nor the university of Oxford; but the English nation in general: and if we consult the History of those times, we shall find that the English nation was entirely averse to the arbitrary government, which the court was labouring to introduce; and that the spirit of liberty, which reigned in the two last Parliaments of King Charles II, was the occasion of their being dissolved. 6. In the new edition of Moreri, they may add, that on the 23d of March 1710, the House of Lords caused the decree of the university of Oxford, which we have been speaking of, to be burnt by the hand of the hang-man. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) These

MILTON. MONTROSE. MORIGGIA. NITARD.

The two most tolerable poems of Milton (b) are in blank verse; the first is intitled, Paradise Lost: the second, Paradise Regained. The first is much better than the second; which gave occasion for some people to say, that Milton is readily found in Paradise Lost, but not in Paradise Regained. Salmasius was the great (c) antagonist of Milton, he discredited him much.

(b) These two poems are in English, and they are accounted master-pieces. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) This expression is too indeterminate: Salmasius having written an Apology for King Charles I, was confuted by Milton. He wrote a Reply, which was not printed till long after his death. It is therefore certain that he published nothing at all against Milton. Can this be a sufficient reason for saying that he was his great antagonist? MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

MONTROSE.

It is surprising, that in speaking of this Marquis, they have forgot the name of his family: this is the first thing that should be observed when a person of distinction is treated of; and when a circumstance so essential to History is omitted, it is to be feared that the whole body of the article suffers by the author's negligence. But it would not be enough to make the reader take notice of this omission, if I did not supply it: I must therefore tell him, that the name of the Marquis of Montrose was John Grene (1).

(1) This Marquis was not called John Grene. In the edition of 1712, they have put James Grene; and in that of 1725, James Grene, or Grabam. James is right; but the other word was never spelt Grene nor Grenne. If our author had consulted some English book, he would have seen that it ought to be written Grabam. It is true that the pronunciation of Grabam, comes near the French Gréam or Gréme: but we are not allowed to change the Orthography of foreign names, and to express their pronunciation according to the French Orthography. By this means they would be entirely disguised. For example, if a Frenchman should write Lak, or Lac; who could guess that he speaks of Mr Locke, that celebrated Philosopher? As for the rest, in the edition of 1712, they had wrongly writ Mont-Rose, and placed that article among the names which are so divided: in that of 1725 they have put Montrose, which is right; but they have thereby misplaced that article; since it comes in before those of Montagnana, Montagne, &c.

I shall add, that speaking of the Marquis of Montrose, they should have observed after Father d'Orleans, that this lord had at first gone with the torrent, and carried arms for the cause of liberty. They should likewise have set down the reasons which the Scotch alledged to justify their manner of putting him to death; &c. The laws of History require that the pro and con should be fairly stated. Lastly, they might have consulted authors who were more impartial, and better informed, than Du Verdier, and Abbé Raguet, who are quoted at the end of this article. NEW OBSERV.

MORIGGIA.

In this article they confound the Jesuits and Jesuates, since they give the title of General of the Jesuits to Paul Moriggia, who was only General of the Jesuates: these are two very different orders. This error has escaped all the editors of Moreri; and it is so much the less excusable, as it is not natural to suppose that one should be ignorant to what order a writer of Father Paul Moriggia's reputation belonged; a writer, I say, who has enriched the Republic of Letters, with sixty-one different Treatises (1).

(1) In the last edition, at the word MORIGIA (Paul), they have very well said that he was General of the Jesuates. NEW OBSERVAT.

N.

NITARD.

THE editor is mistaken with respect to Cardinal John Everard Nitard, whom he styles Confessor to the King of Spain, Charles II. Father Nitard the Jesuit, was not Confessor to the King of Spain, but to the Queen his mother, Mary-Anne of Austria (1); and the thing is so much the less to be doubted of, as it was the blind confidence which that Prince repofed in him, that brought upon him those disgraces of which the late Madame d'Aunoy has given us such a particular and curious account in her Memoirs of the Court of Spain. It is true that this good Father was obliged to leave the kingdom of Spain somewhat abruptly, but to comfort him he was presented with a Cardinal's cap, upon his arrival at Rome. They had no other rewards to give him; for it is well known that the Jesuits do not accept (a) of Bishopsrics, and that consequently there is no way of crowning their services, but by the Roman purple.

(1) This is corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT. Mr Daillé says of it in the twentieth chapter of the third part of his Reply to Father Adam and to Cortibi.

(a) It will be proper to read upon this subject what MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

PATRICIUS.

P.

PATRICIUS.

MR Bayle had taken care to warn the editors of Moreri, that Francis Patricius the Venetian, who lived towards the end of the XVIth century, never was a Professor of Padua. If they had consulted Thuanus's History, they would not have copied this fault from the old editions. Patricius, after having been seventeen years a Professor at Ferrara, retired to Rome, whither he was brought by the liberalities of Clement VIII, and from that time he never left it (1). This Antiperipatetic proposed such singular tenets (2) concerning the five Categories of Porphyry, that the greatest part of the Philosophers of his time fell upon him.

(1) In the edition of 1707, and the following, they have put, that he taught Philosophy at Ferrara, and at Rome, &c. NEW OBSERVAT. words, you must consult Mr Bayle's Dictionary, in the article PATRICIUS (FRANCISCUS), remark [B]. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) To know the error that is contained in these

PAUL III.

Moreri and his Continuator, only say that Paul III had a son and a daughter, before he was created Pope. That expression is not particular enough; they should have said that this Pope had two children by a lawful (a) marriage, and this declaration was so much the more necessary, as the obscure expression of Moreri authorises the opinion which prevails among the greatest part of readers, that the children of Pope Paul III were not legitimate, and consequently that the present family of Parma is derived from the bastards of the first house of Farnese; which is absolutely false: Alexander Farnese, before he was Pope under the name of Paul III, had Constance, who married (b) Basio Sforza, the second of that name, Count of S. Fiore, and Peter Lewis Farnese, who was first Duke of Castro, and afterwards of Parma and Placentia (1). The famous Alexander Farnese, who came into France at the head of a numerous army, was his grandson.

The Abbot Faydit, speaking in his new book of the tragical death of Peter Lewis Farnese, whose interest obliged him to join the Fieschi against the Doria's, calls the latter Dauria's, as in another place, where he mentions the Abbot Cotin of the French Academy, he calls him Cautin. This odd Orthography serves only to disfigure names, and to make it impossible to know them. Thuanus, in giving them a Latin turn, has corrupted them, and others disfigure them by spelling them ill: both he and they only affect to be (c) singular.

(a) It would have been proper here to give proofs of the marriage contracted by Alexander Farnese, before he had entered into the Ecclesiastical Order; to name the wife that he married, to point out the time and place, and to quote creditable authors: till this is done, it is in vain to condemn those who express themselves as Moreri does. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) He ought to have said Basio, and as I observed, before, he should have named the wife, by whom Alexander Farnese had this daughter, and the son from whom the Dukes of Parma descend. This was so much the more necessary, as he confesses here, that the greatest part of the readers believe that the children of Paul III were not legitimate. Sanfovino, a famous Italian author in the XVIth century, expressly says, in his book of the Families of Italy, fol. 170, that Peter Lewis Farnese was natural son to Paul III. He speaks thus immediately after having bestowed great encomiums upon that Pope. Could he have been ignorant of the marriage, which a man of so distinguished a family, and who in the character of Cardinal, and afterwards in that of Pope, signalized himself so many ways, is supposed to have contracted? The Abbot Faydit, ubi supra, pag. 376, says that Peter Lewis Farnese was lawful son to Alexander Farnese, who after his wife's death, was created Pope, under the name of Onuphrius III, and afterwards under the name of Paul III. Our author has perhaps only this voucher for that Pope's marriage. We desire both one and the other in a very serious manner, that they would communicate to the public, the proofs of a thing so little known as this is. I observe, by the by, that according to Sanfovino, ibid. Alexander Farnese at first took the name of Honorius V. This is more probable, than to say that he took the name of Onuphrius III, for there has been no Pope called Onuphrius. He must therefore have taken the name Onuphrius I, and not of Onuphrius III. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and those that follow, they have said that, Paul III had been married before he entered into the Ecclesiastical Order, and by his marriage, had a daughter named Constance, who was married to Basio Sforza, second of that name; and a son called Peter Lewis Farnese, whom he made duke of Parma. But they give no proof of his marriage. NEW OBSERVAT.

(c) I believe that they who spell names ill are only to be charged with negligence, or a bad memory: I do not however pretend to excuse them upon that account. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

PAULICIANS.

Moreri and his Continuators are only mistaken in about a century, as to the time in which Paul and John, two brothers, who were heads of the sect of Paulicians, lived. If the editor had given himself the trouble to read the celebrated Bishop of Meaux's Histoire des Variations, he would have seen in the 11th book, that these two brothers lived in the VIIth century, and not in the VIIIth, as he has too slightly advanced upon the credit of those who had compiled before him the great Historical Dictionary (1). The fundamental doctrine of these Heretics, was, that there were two principles, Co-eternal, and Independent the one upon the other.

(1) In the last edition they say, after Mr Bayle, who made himself the head of that sect in Armenia that the Paulicians were so called from one Paul, in the VIIth century. NEW OBSERVAT.

PELISSON.

I do not know whether the editor designed in this article to correct Mr Bayle, on the subject of Raymund Pelisson, one of the ancestors of Mr Pelisson, Member of the French Academy: in the Critical Dictionary, Raymund Pelisson is First-President of the Parliament or Senate of Chambery: and in the new edition of Moreri, they change this title into that of First-President of Dauphiné. It is nevertheless very certain that this Raymund was First-President of the Senate of Savoy, and not of the Parliament of Dauphiné: this is a fact known all the world over (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find that Raymund Pelisson was First-President at Chambery: notwithstanding this our author expresses himself as if Mr Bayle had said that of his own head. NEW OBSERVAT.

PENELOPE.

I was surprized to find in the article of this Queen of Ithaca, the question so ill discussed, whether Homer was really one of her lovers. The editor contents himself with telling us in general terms, that, according to some authors, Homer praised Penelope so much, only because he had been in love with her: he would have been able to determine it in the negative, if he had taken the trouble to read Meziriac's notes upon Ovid's Epistles: that learned man brings demonstrative reasons (a) to prove, that Penelope was a very chaste woman; besides, what Aufonius says of her in his 135th Epigram (b), is an unanswerable proof of her virtue. The kisses of Penelope were hardly known during so great a number of years to her son Telemachus, because he was not her husband, for whom she kept all her careffes. I agree that Floridus Sabinus, in his book Lectionum subcifarum, Lycophron, Herodotus, and Dempsterus, in his Paralipomena, do not say the same thing: but after all, the proofs of Aufonius (c), set in their full force by the learned Mr de Meziriac, ought to prevail on this occasion; and the editor should have declared what he thought on this question, as he has done on several other questions, perhaps much less interesting (1).

(a) The reader will be a little at a loss to understand our author's reasoning, for to prove it to be false that Homer commended Penelope so much, only because he had been in love with her, would require other reasons than this, viz. that Penelope was very chaste, which is nevertheless the only reason that he makes use of. Besides, he does not think that Meziriac has proved by demonstrative reasons, that Penelope was a very chaste woman, nor even that he has so much as attempted to confute those who have spoken ill of her. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) This Epigram is no proof. Aufonius makes Penelope speak, it is therefore no more than a testimony which she bears to herself, and one could only infer from it, that the Poet had a very good opinion of that lady's virtue. Every body sees the difference

there is between praising a woman, and shewing by unanswerable proofs, that she was virtuous. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) To make a right judgment of the solidity of these words one needs only examine the two foregoing Remarks. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) All the learning which our author displays here did not cost him much; he has taken it from Mr Bayle: but the reasonings are entirely his own. In the last edition of Moreri, after these words: Some ancient authors have spoken in a very disadvantageous manner of Penelope's conduct, and have written that Homer commended her so much, only because he had been in love with her; they add, see upon this head Bayle's Dictionary. NEW OBSERVAT.

PHILIP D'AQUIN.

It was not a circumstance to be omitted in the new edition, that Philip d'Aquin, who was Professor of the Hebrew tongue at Paris, in the reign of the late (a) King Lewis XIII, and of whom great mention is made in the trial of the late (b) Marshal d'Ancre, had been a Jew. The very nature of that trial should have engaged the editor

(a) See the following remark at the end. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) It was needless to put here the word late, considering what a long time it is since that Marshal died; besides, that his memory has always been held in abhorrence. Several people think that we should never make use of this word late but when those to whom we direct our speech are ignorant whether the persons talked of be alive or not. They maintain, that a woman, speaking to people who know very well that she is a widow, should only say my husband, and not my late husband. They would not therefore approve of our author's writing in the year 1706; The late King Lewis XIII. MR BAYLE'S REMARK. (1) In tor to examine this fact in a particular manner; besides, the religion of authors should always be the chief thing minded by Historians (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, the article AQUIN (Philip) is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which is cited; but they have not taken all that was essential in Mr Bayle. They should have observed, 1. That d'Aquin had been a Jew. 2. That we find some curious particulars concerning him in the trial of the Marshal d'Ancre. 3. That Flavigny accused him of having corrupted the Hebrew text of Mr le Jay's Bible. 4. They say that he taught Hebrew at Paris in the reign of Lewis XIII, in the XVIIth century. After naming Lewis XIII it was needless to add, in the XVIIth century. NEW OBSERVAT.

P H R Æ A.

In the article of the Englishman John Phræa (not Phreas) the editor has forgot to speak of that author's master-piece, which, at the same time, was the first attempt he made in writing: I mean his translation of the discourse of Synesius, who, among the Greek authors, is the most difficult to be understood, and whom all the translators before that time had been afraid to meddle with. That discourse was an encomium upon baldness; Moreri and his editors are not the only persons that have forgot to speak of this translation (1).

(1) In the last edition, at the word PHRÆA, they speak of the translation of Synesius's discourse, copying after Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from whence our author has taken what he says here. NEW OBSERV.

P H I L O S T R A T U S.

Moreri did not consult this author, when he placed the death of Apollonius Tyaneus in the year 97 or 99. This fault should have been corrected in the new edition, since it is certain that this Philosopher died in the reign of Nerva, that is to say, in 96, or at most, in the beginning of the following year (1). There has been published, in the year 1704, a new book upon this subject, which ought to be consulted (2).

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article APOLLONIUS TYANEUS, it is observed that some make him die in the year 97, and others in the year 99. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) This book is intitled, Histoire d'Apollonius de Tyane convaincu de fausseté & d'imposture. Mr du Pin is the author of it. They have made use of it in that edition, in relating the judgments of ancient and modern authors concerning Apollonius Tyaneus. NEW OBSERVAT.

P R Æ T E X T A T U S.

It is a long time since Moreri has been censured for relating ill the story that is told of the young Papyrius Prætextatus; but this has not hindered his Continuators from copying the faults which he had committed in this article, and for which he had been so many times reproved. First, it is not true that Prætextatus, in order to get rid of the importunities of his mother, who pressed him to tell her what had passed in the Senate, where his father had carried him one day, declared to her, that a resolution had been taken, by which, for the time to come, every husband should have two wives; on the contrary, he told her the debate had been whether that would be more for the advantage of the Republic, than to order that a wife should marry two husbands. Those two things, you see, are very different. Secondly, Moreri had been called upon to confirm that tradition by an authority of greater weight than that of Macrobius; in effect, that author's testimony alone would not be enough to silence the Critics. It is very well known that he loved a jest, and sought rather to divert his reader, than to inform him of the truth of facts; but for all this they have added no other testimony to that of Macrobius in the new edition; they should have quoted that of Cato, and that of Aulus Gellius, who speaks of that affair in his first book (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, they have corrected this article, at the word PAPYRIUS, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from which our author has taken all he says here. NEW OBSERVAT.

P R I O L O.

I own they have done justice in the new edition to the memory of the late Mr Priolo, which had been cruelly bespattered in the first edition of Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary (a), and in the Sorberiana; but still the editor might have been more particular in describing the works which Mr Priolo had written, and which, I believe, have not yet been published: here follow the titles of them, which they may insert, if they please, in the next edition of Moreri's Dictionary. Libri iv. de stultitia humane gentis. (He might at least have composed a dozen more upon the same subject) Libri iii. questionum naturalium, &c. Opus emunctum, triginta annorum meditatio, quod jam celebratur sub aperiore titulo, &c. De vita & gestis Henrici Robanni Ducis. De vita & moribus Cesaris Cremonini. It is even said that he wrote notes upon that author's treatise of the Soul. Vita Benjamin Prioli. Judicium de Scriptioribus Græcis & Latinis. Epistolarum senilium ad

(a) Our author should have observed here what he observes at the end of the article; viz. that Mr Bayle had only spoken upon the credit of the Sorberiana, which he had quoted in Italicks without warranting any thing. All readers should take notice of this, and should always go directly to the source and stop there, without making those answerable who barely quote from it. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In

• Essay for Febr. 1703.

† Essay for April 1703.

ad maximos Europe proceres centuria singularis (1). The author of the Essais de Littérature, had likewise used that author very ill *, upon the credit, no doubt (b), of Mr Bayle; as the latter had done upon the credit of Messieurs Sorbier and (c) Graverol; but he (d) retracted afterwards †.

(1) In the last edition, they have said at the end of the article Priolo, that this author 'promised seven different books, the titles of which are in the last page of his History. Among these we find his own life, and that of the Duke of Rohan, which are not yet published.' This is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, of which our author is barely the transcriber here. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) To know whether it was upon credit of Mr Bayle, we should consult the Memoirs of Trevoux, pag. 476 of the fifth volume, Amsterdam edition. Our Author would have spoke, otherwise if he had seen the censure passed in that Journal upon the Essais de Littérature. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) Mr Bayle has neither quoted, nor was he obliged to quote upon that occasion, Mr Graverol who has not joined his testimony with that of Sorbier, MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(d) That is to say, the author of the Essais de Littérature. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

PRISCILLIAN.

Mr Bayle often censures Moreri; the Continuator of the latter, might, in his turn, have attacked that celebrated Critic. He furnished him with sufficient matter for censure in the article of Priscillian, especially when he says that the Priscillians (a) were condemned, in the IVth and Vth centuries, upon certain points that were canonized in St Augustin, and confirmed by the decisions of the Church: we must consult upon this head the XCIIIrd Epistle of St Leo (1).

(a) He should have said the Priscillianists. It is very true that the matter is ample and considerable, but it does not properly belong to a Dictionary purely Historical. In an Historical and Critical Dictionary, such a thing might properly be placed; it is a most curious subject, the question is to know whether, as St Augustin makes liberty to consist in this, that the mind wills without constraint although necessarily, we can approve his doctrine, and condemn that which supposes the acts of the human will to proceed from a fatal necessity, as the Priscillianists taught. It is easy to prove that there is no distinction alledged by the followers of St Augustin, which the Priscillianists had not adopted, and consequently that their doctrine is at bottom the same with that of St Augustin. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) See Mr Bayle's Dictionary at the article PRISCILLIAN, remark [H]. NEW OBSERVAT.

PRODICUS.

An Heretic of the IIrd century, being founder of a new sect, which, at that time, made a great noise, should not have been forgot in the new edition; I speak of the sect of the Adamites (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find the article of this Prodicus. They have made use of Mr Bayle's Dictionary there, though without quoting him. NEW OBSERVAT.

PUTEANUS.

The Continuator of Moreri had been told that they should correct their Chronology concerning the death of Erycius Puteanus; but not much minding the informations that are given them, which they seldom take the trouble to read, they have continued to place his death in the year 1646 (a). Mr Bullard, in his second volume of the Académie des Sciences, places that author's death precisely (b) in the year 1644. Speaking of the book Statera pacis & belli, they might have added, (c) that it was a book wholly to the advantage of his Catholic Majesty (1).

(a) They were in the right to continue to say that Puteanus died in the year 1646. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Bullard does not say in express terms, that Puteanus died in the year 1644. We can only infer this from his making him seventy years old, and placing his birth in 1574. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) But to add this so as to be understood, it would have been necessary to observe 1. That Puteanus advised the King of Spain to make peace with the United-Provinces (they insinuate this in Moreri). 2. That this peace would have been serviceable to the King of Spain, if we judge of it by the ill success of the war which he continued, and which, after a world of expense and disgrace, he did not get rid of at last in the year 1648, but by an ignominious peace where-in he granted the Dutch every thing that they were pleased to ask. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our Critic, who has taken all that he says here from Mr Bayle, would have us place, as Bullard does, the death of Puteanus in the year 1644. Yet Mr Bayle had observed, that having consulted the list of Puteanus, he had found there that he died in the castle of Louvain, on the seventeenth of September 1646. The editors of Moreri have corrected the article of Puteanus from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. They had said first: It is observed in his life, that he died in the castle of Louvain, on the seventeenth of September 1646: other writers place his death in the year 1644. They added afterwards: the Funeral Oration upon Erycius Puteanus was pronounced at Louvain, on the nineteenth of September 1646, the day of his burial . . . which shews the true time of his death. NEW OBSERVAT.

QUINTUS

Q.

QUINTUS CURTIUS.

IN this article the editor has corrected part of the faults that had been censured in Moreri: but after all he tells us nothing about the time or age in which Quintus Curtius lived. Nay he seems afraid to declare his opinion. But why not prefer to any other the sentiment of Father le Tellier, who makes that famous author to have lived in the reign of the Emperor Claudius? This opinion appears more probable than that which the editor seems to favour: he does not venture to say that he lived in the reign of Vespasian, but he insinuates it; such caution shews his uncertainty (1).

(1) Our Critic pretends that the opinion of Father le Tellier, concerning the time in which Quintus Curtius lived, is the most probable; but as he does not prove it, his Remark cannot be of any use. NEW OBSERVAT.

R.

RAMUS.

THIS article should have been more enlarged; the exact temperance of this Philosopher, compared with the delicacy and profusion at the tables of those who live now-a-days, particularly deserved some reflexions (1).

(1) The article of Ramus is very large in the last edition. They have corrected and improved it from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but an error has crept into it. They say that Ramus was son to a gentleman, who . . . was obliged to follow the business of a coal-man for his livelihood: it was not his father but his grandfather, as may be seen in Mr Bayle. They do not speak of the temperance of Ramus, which has furnished Mr Bayle with a Remark. NEW OBSERVAT.

RAPIN.

They have forgot a good many things in making an encomium on this learned Jesuit, especially when they give an account of his books; they have not said a word of that which did him the greatest honour: I mean the Disertatio de nova doctrina, seu Evangelium Jansenistarum. This book was printed at Paris in the year 1658. The anonymous letter (a) which he published in 1680, likewise made a great deal of noise, and annoyed the party which he attacked: the late Cardinal Cibo, to whom it was addressed, gratefully thanked the learned author for it (1).

(a) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, January 1686, at the fourth article of the catalogue of new books. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our author copies Mr Bayle here, according to custom. In the last edition of Moreri they have made great use of the Critical Dictionary to improve the article of Father Rapin. NEW OBSERVAT.

RIPAMONT.

All the editors of Moreri have forgot, in the article of Joseph Ripamont, to speak of his History of the Milanese; they have indeed quoted the Ecclesiastical History of the city of Milan, which he published; but besides that work, he composed the History of the Milanese; and these are two different books: besides, those editors constantly write Ripamont, whereas I maintain it should be Ripamonte (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article of Ripamonte, they have added nothing concerning the History of the Milanese, written by this author. Mr Grævius has inserted it, together with the continuation, in the second volume of his Thesaurus Antiquitatum Italiae. NEW OBSERVAT.

RONSARD.

This article is not very exact: the editor places the birth of that famous Poet in the year 1524, and several authors say that he was born the same year that Francis I. was taken prisoner in the battle of Pavia: this æra will appear singular to the reader: however, some authors have made use of it. Now Francis I. was taken prisoner before Pavia, Pavia (and who does not know it?) on the twenty-fifth of February (a), in the year 1525. Ronfard was therefore born in the year 1525 (1). The editor names the mother of that Poet Jane Chaudrier, whereas it is Jane Cbandrier (2). The family of Chaudrier was so illustrious, that they ought to have known the true way of spelling its name. They might have told us something of the law-suit, which Ronfard carried on against Joachim du Bellay, for the recovery of some Odes, which the latter had stole from him. This affair was for a long time an amusement to the Court; but Ronfard did not consider it as a trifle, he was extremely warm in it. Mr Gueret, in his ingenious fiction *, censures Ronfard, for the harshness and obscurity of his style, they are faults that other authors have likewise reproached him with; besides this Poet often transgresses the rules of modesty; and we find in his works some expressions that give us no great idea of the purity of his morals. The Critics especially have very much exclaimed against some verses in the second Ode of the second book, and not altogether without reason.

* Le Parnasse réformé.

The editor should have cleared the question whether Ronfard was really a priest, as some Protestant ministers called him by way of reproach: for my part, I am convinced that he was in Holy Orders; but I do not believe he had taken that of priesthood. I ground the first part of this proposition upon the very terms of his answer, to the ministers who had attacked him (3).

(a) Apply here, what has been observed above, in the article Francis II, Note (a), concerning the way of making the year begin at Easter. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.
(1) In the last edition, they say, that Ronfard was born on the 25th of February, 1525. NEW OBSERV.
(2) This error, is still in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.
(3) All that our author says here, is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. NEW OBSERVAT.

RUFINUS.

Mr Bayle refers us to Moreri's Dictionary, concerning the circumstances, and the year of the death of this favourite to the Emperor Theodosius. I readily agree to the circumstances, but I absolutely reject the epoch (a) of his death: in effect it is more reasonable, upon this occasion, to follow Mr Flechier, who places this death (b), under the year 397, in his History of Theodosius the Great, than to follow Moreri (1). Besides some reflexions of the editor, upon the doubts which the insolent fortune of Rufinus, raised in Claudian, whether there was any such thing as a providence, would certainly have been a great embellishment to this article.

(a) That the readers might not have the trouble of consulting other books, this author ought to have set down the year, in which, according to Moreri, Rufinus was killed. It was the year 395. He is in the wrong to reject this epoch; it is a true one, as might easily be proved. I content myself with saying that Socrates in the first chapter of the sixth book, of the Ecclesiastical History, fixes the death of Rufinus on the 27th of November, of that same year, in which the Emperor Theodosius died. Now Mr Flechier says, and he says right, that this Emperor died on the 17th of January 395. For the further information of the reader, I must tell him, that Mr Flechier does not say, in express terms, that Rufinus died in the year 397. It can only be inferred from this, that under the year 392, speaking of some injustices, committed by Rufinus, he adds, that five years after, Rufinus was one of the causes, &c. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.
(b) If our author had consulted Mr Flechier's book, he would have expressed himself otherwise. See the foregoing remark. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.
(1) In the edition of 1712, and the following, they have said that Rufinus was killed in the year 395; or 397, according to Mr Flechier. NEW OBSERVAT.

S.

SCHOMBERG.

IN the article of this Cardinal, the editor has forgot to speak of the fine letter which he wrote upon the death of Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of England. This Cardinal was a near relation (a) to the Nun whom Luther married (1). It was upon this subject, that he pronounced in the Sacred College a discourse so moving, that it drew tears from several

(a) Mr de Seckendorf has confuted this: it would be necessary to know whether in the Essais de littérature, they quote any author who has mentioned this moving discourse, on the subject of that Cardinal's relation having married Luther; for, as I said before, the author of the Essais de littérature, is only to be credited so far as he brings good vouchers. It is even proper to consult the authors whom he quotes, for sometimes he makes them say more than they have said. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the last edition, they have corrected the article of this Cardinal, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary; but they have not thought fit to speak of the letter which he wrote upon the death of Sir Thomas More, nor several of the Cardinals: mention has been made of this discourse in one of those periodical pieces * which have appeared in so great number for some time.

* Essais de Littérature.

nor of his pretended relation to the Nun whom Luther married; the first of these facts being not of consequence enough to be inserted in Moreri; and

Mr Bayle having observed, that Mr de Seckendorf had affirmed the second to be false. NEW OBSERVAT.

SCIOPPIUS.

It would seem that the editor could not clear up the true date of Scioppius's death, for he says nothing at all of it. It is true, that people have spoke very differently as to the time when it happened, but that very reason should have obliged our author to declare what he thought of it. Mr Baillet relates the different opinions of the authors of that time on this point; but most certainly Scioppius died in the year 1649. The proofs which Mr Bayle alledges are decisive: Patin likewise places his death in the same year, and we cannot doubt of it, when we read the fifteenth Letter (of the first edition) in the collection of that author's letters which are published (1). They have forgot in the new edition to speak of the most virulent book which he published against the Jesuits, for whom he had an implacable hatred; it is intituled, Anatomia Societatis, (a) & de Stratagematis Jesuitarum. This book made a great noise, and did not do Scioppius all the honour he expected. His best books are those (b) which have not been published, and which remained in the hands of the learned Pieruccius his universal heir. The conformity between the principles of that famous Critic, and those of the Jesuit Melchior Inchoffer has giving occasion to believe that the memoirs of the one had passed through the hands of the other, who had made use of them against the Jesuits.

(1) In the editions of 1707 and 1712, they had said that Scioppius died in 1649, aged above fourscore: but in that of 1725, they take notice that he died in the year 1649, at the age of 73. In effect, Mr Bayle quotes a passage of Scioppius, where he affirms that he was in his seventeenth year, in the year 1593. NEW OBSERVAT.

(a) The Anatomia Societatis is not the same book, with that de Stratagematis Jesuitarum, as our author supposes here. They are two different works: the Jesuit Forerus, who has answered this Anatomia, reckons up several other of Scioppius's books against the society, and proves that he had often copied himself. He falsely ascribes to him the mysteria Patrum Jesuitarum, which is a book written by Andrew Rivetus, Professor of Divinity at Leyden. For the rest, I think the editors of Moreri should labour to find out the cause of Scioppius's hatred to the Jesuits, for he behaved in a civil manner to them for some time. He vindicated them in his Ecclesiasticus, from the accusations which the King of Great Britain had brought against them. It is true that his apology is indirect, for it only consists of a numberless heap of passages from Luther, which animate the Protestants, &c. to extirpate the Kings and Princes who adhere to the Pope, and oppose the reformation of the Church. Never did any man more warmly excite the Roman Catholic Princes, to the extirpation of Heresies than Scioppius, and nevertheless he charges (in his Stratagemata) that spirit of violence, as a crime upon Fo-rerus. So true it is that he only wrote out of passion. He rather chose to contradict and criticize himself, than not to censure his enemies. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) This may be true as to some of them; but there are others (those for example which he wrote to explain the prophecies) that are not so good as what he published. Few people were more masters of the Holy Scripture than he: upon all occasions he found means to apply passages of Scripture in his disputes against the Protestants: one may particularly observe this method in his Ecclesiasticus, which was printed in the year 1611, and is a confutation of King James's apology for the oath of allegiance. But he puts new and forced constructions upon the greatest part of the passages which he quoted from Scripture. If he did this before, he was a visionary, judge what his writings upon the prophecies must be, when he was become a kind of fanatic. It is to be observed that his controversial works have always some new turn; and as he had read from end to end, all Luther's works, in order to extract out of them every passage which a satirical wit can so represent, as to make that Reformer odious and contemptible, he improved his talent in this particular, more than the greatest part of the other writers in controversy have done. He shews more strength in quoting facts than in alledging reasons, tho' in this last respect, he is not weak. His fine Latin is no small ornament to his writing. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

SENNERT.

The editor is mistaken as to the year of this famous Physician's birth, and he puts it five years back, without having any probable reason for it. He places it in the year 1577, whereas most certainly it comes under the year 1572; besides our author says in a very concise and dry manner, that the opinion of this Philosopher, viz. that the souls of beasts are not material, caused him to be charged with impiety. Speaking of this tenet, he should have told us every thing that accompanied it, and the arguments by which Sennert supported it. This Physician did not only affirm, that the souls of beasts are not material, but he rejected (lib. 1. de plast. seminis facultate) the opinion of those who maintain, they are not of a more noble nature than the elements (1); and he said that they are naturally as much immortal, as the soul of man; so that if the latter does not perish with the body, as well as the former, it is owing to a particular favour of the Creator. He owned indeed that the souls of beasts were not produced from matter, consequently

(1) Our author, who has seldom or never given himself the trouble of quoting, has altered his method here; and to prove that Sennert rejected the opinion of those, who maintain that the soul is not of a more noble nature than the elements, he quotes, in a parenthesis, (lib. 1. de plast. seminis facultate;) to inform us that this was the book where Sennert rejected that opinion. He imagined, no doubt, that this stroke of learning, would embellish his remark. What pity it is, that he did not succeed! He went very artfully about it. Thus; Mr Bayle, whom he copies here verbatim, had quoted Sennert. ubi sup. c. 9. p. 137. Our Critic being willing to fill up this ubi sup. and to give the title of the book, to which this quotation refers, ran backwards

over

SENNERT. SEXTUS AB HEMMINYA. SIMONIS.

consequently he laughed at the education of the schoolmen. But after all, so long as he did not say that their souls were really immortal, there was no room for taxing him with impiety (2).

over a dozen of quotations; but unluckily for him he stopped at this: vide Jacobum Schegkium, lib. i, de plast. feminis facultate, apud Sennert. ibid. cap. v, pag. 127; where, as you see, Mr Bayle quotes a book of Schegk's, and not of Sennert's. NEW OBSERVAT. (2) In the last edition this article is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which has supplied our author with what he says here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SEXTUS AB HEMMINYA (a).

This article has been omitted, or perhaps this author is not known (1); he should be very well known to the Astrologers, since he was in his (b) time with respect to them, what the famous Picus of Mirandola was in his: no man was ever more attached to that science than Sextus in the first part of his life; but having had time to discover the fallacy and uselessness of it, he became afterwards one of its greatest adversaries, and gave it terrible blows (c). Happy had it been for the world, if he could have succeeded in wholly undeceiving mankind as to an art which has already seduced such great numbers. The Sextus, of whom I speak, was a great Geometrician, and it was by the progress he had made in that mother of the sciences (d), that he discovered the vanity of Astrology, and resolved to write against its principles. Astrology has had illustrious favourers; Mr Faydit, in his Remarks upon Virgil and Homer, says, that Pope Paul III was strongly attached to it, and that he gave the bishopric of Civita Vecchia to Luke Gauricus de Fano, because he was very well skilled in it: this fact wants some proofs (e).

(a) He should have said Sextus ab Hemminga. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) We find this article in the edition of 1707, and the following ones, at the word Sixte de Hemminga. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) Our author's Remarks should be suited to the character of Moreri's Dictionary, which is a work chiefly designed for the instruction of readers that have no learning. A work of that nature should explain every thing without making it necessary to consult another book. Our author, after the manner he speaks here, does not inform us when Sextus ab Hemminga and Picus of Mirandola lived; instead of his age, he should have said the XVth century; and a little lower instead of in his, he should have said in the XVth. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) He should have told us what method Hemminga took to combat Astrology. It was this. He drew the horoscope of thirty persons, most of them Princes, Kings, Popes, &c. observed in these horoscopes the rules of art with great exactness, and shewed that nothing had happened to these thirty persons of what should have happened to them according to the rules of judicial Astrology. Those who will give the article of that author may consult Suffridus Petri, in the ninth chapter of the thirteenth decad of authors born in Friesland. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(d) I wish our author had quoted some authority upon this head, it does not appear, that, in order to know the vanity of Astrology, a person must make a progress in Geometry. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(e) It is certain that Thuanus relates, in the fourth book of his History, pag. m. 87. that Paul III being much attached to judicial Astrology, had for that very reason a great friendship for Luke Gauricus, admitted him to his conversation and table, and at last gave him the bishopric of Civitate. Ac tandem Civitatenſi Episcopatu donavit. There are books written by Luke Gauricus, in the titles of which he is styled Episcopus Civitatenſis. The Abbot Faydit is only mistaken in believing that the bishopric which Paul III gave to Gauricus was that of Civita Vecchia, and that Gauricus was a native of Fano. Civita Vecchia is not an episcopal city, and it belongs to the Pope, but the bishopric which Gauricus had lies in Apulia, in the kingdom of Naples, under the Archbishop of Benevento, and is not the same with that of Civita Ducale, as is affirmed in Moreri at the word Gauric (Luke). Gauricus was not born in Fano, but in a place called in Latin Geophanum, and in Italian Gisani, which is in the kingdom of Naples, in the hither principality five miles from Salerno. Consult Mr Baudrand under the word Geophanum.

It will not be amiss to confuse here a thing which Mr Teiffier, in his additions to Thuanus, has related on the testimony of Tollius, in Appendice de infelicitate Litteratorum. He tells us that Luke Gauricus having foretold that John Bentivoglio should be banished out of his native country, and deprived of his sovereignty, incurred the indignation of that Prince who caused him to be tortured to death. This cannot be true for John Bentivoglio was expelled Bologna by Pope Julius II, in the year 1506, and died at Milan in 1508; and it is certain that Luke Gauricus was made a Bishop by Paul III, whose Papal dignity commenced only in the year 1534. Mr Teiffier should have contented himself with saying, that John Bentivoglio, enraged at Gauricus's threatening predictions, caused him to be put to the rack; and he should have added, that he did not die on that occasion. Cardan treats him as a Quack, and accuses him of having rather conjectured the ruin of the Bentivoglio's from the situation of things, than of having foreknown it by the stars. Gauricus, says he, in libro Genitarum, pag. m. 206. à Bentivolis tortus in eculeo. Id certe ex astris non viderat, quamvis excidium familie ominaretur plus ex conjectura rerum quam astrorum, fuit enim Symplicius egregius. Thuanus having said in one place that Gauricus was a Bishop, and in another, that he died in the year 1559, it was easy to infer that he did not die upon the rack. Is it reasonable to think that a Bishop of Italy should have been treated in this manner, especially by a family such as that of the Bentivoglio's, who had no where any sovereign power. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

SIMONIS.

Theodore Simonis, or Simon, is an author who has made noise enough to deserve a place among the many articles of the Simons and the Theodores that we find in the new edition. I confess I expected with impatience to see how the editor would treat this article: I do not know whether he had any reasons for omitting it, or if it was a mere forgetfulness (1). Simonis was one of the most particular friends of the famous Bishop

(1) The article of SIMON or SIMONIS was still omitted in the edition of 1712: it is in that of 1725, taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. NEW OBSERVAT. (a) This

Bishop of Ypres (a), and if any thing did hurt to the memory of Janſenius, it was chiefly his intimacy with that German, to whom (b) is aſcribed the book de Atheiſmo in Polonia, ex atheo libello, &c. Some authors have attempted to clear him of this terrible accuſation, but they have not had all the ſucceſs they expected. There was one Francis Simonis, to whom has been aſcribed the book de fraudibus Hæreticorum, written by Father Heſtrier (c) (2).

(a) This appears to me very falſe, and is at leaſt very contrary to the facts which have been related in the Critical Dictionary, in the remark [f], of the article JANSENIUS, and in the remark [g], of the article SIMON. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) It is by no means true that the impious book of which our author ſpeaks is aſcribed to Theodore Simon or Simonis, who had ſome conferences with Janſenius. He does not give us the right title of it which he might eaſily have found in the Critical Dictionary, pag. 2719, of the ſecond edition. The title of that book, printed at Cracow in the year 1588, is Simonis Religio. By the date of the impreſſion it is evident that the Theodore Simonis, of whom we ſpeak here, is not the author of that book, for he was a young man when he had ſome diſputes with Janſenius, about the year 1630. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) He ſhould have ſaid that Father Eſtrix, a Flemiſh Jeſuit, is the author of the book de fraudibus Hæreticorum, which has appeared under the falſe name of Francis Simonis. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(2) Our author has confounded himſelf ſtrangely in relating what he had found in Mr Bayle: this is a pretty common thing with him; but he may be ſaid to have out-done himſelf here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SOPHRONIA.

The editor has not corrected the faults which Moreri had committed on the ſubject of this Roman lady. It is true Euſebius Cæſarienſis ſpeaks of her beauty and chaſtity in the fourteenth chapter of his eighth book; but he does not name her, neither do we know from whence it comes that Hiſtorians afterwards gave her the name of Sophronia. Mr Bayle, whom few things eſcape, owns that he no where found the name of Sophronia; conſequently the editor ſhould not have cited Euſebius, as his voucher with reſpect to this name. This is not the only fault which he has copied from the firſt editions; for example, his expreſſion is not juſt when he ſays that this lady may be called the Chriſtian Lucretia; this is not the meaning of Charles Stephens's words, which Moreri and his Continuators have ill tranſlated (1).

(1) In the laſt edition the article of this lady is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which our author continues to copy here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SPANHEIM.

In this article mention is made of the late King of England, William III, as if he were ſtill living: that Prince died in the year 1702, and the Dictionary was finiſhed about the end of 1704; conſequently the article Spanheim being in the laſt volume, which was printed more than two years after that Prince's death, they ſhould have avoided this expreſſion, William, Prince of Orange, (a) now King of England, ſince that King had been dead two whole years when they made uſe of the word now (1).

(a) That cenſure is well-grounded, and I ſhall take this opportunity to warn thoſe who ſhall publiſh new editions of Moreri in Holland, that they ought to rectify certain things in the article of William III, King of England. In the firſt place, they have ſaid in this article that while he was yet Prince of Orange he gave battle thrice to the French, at Senef, at St Denys, and at Mons. This ſhews they did not know that the battle of St Denys, and that of Mons, are the ſame; and thus inſtead of three battles they only mention two. They have forgot that of Caſſel. Beſides this they ſhould have ſet down the date of every one of theſe three battles, and not have made uſe of the word gave, as it ſignifies that the Prince of Orange was the attacker: which is not true. He was attacked at Senef; they met him at Caſſel; he attacked only at St Denys, and that too when the French, knowing that the peace was ſigned at Nimeguen, were not upon their guard. Laſtly, they ſhould have told us whether the Prince was victorious or vanquiſhed in every one of theſe three battles. In the ſecond place they affirm, that he ſet out in his expedition to England on the firſt of November 1688. They ſhould have ſaid the twenty-ninth of October 1688. In the third place they ſay, that contrary winds having obliged him to put back, he ſet out a ſecond time on the eighth, they ſhould have ſaid the eleventh. In the fourth place they affirm, that he afterwards gave battle twice to the French, once at Steenkerken, and another time near London (they ſhould have ſaid Landen). The ſame negligences that I have obſerved upon the firſt article are to be found here; the date is wanting as well as the circumſtance whether this Prince was the attacker or attacked, the vanquiſher or vanquiſhed. I make uſe of the Dutch edition of 1698. That of Paris 1699 has ſtruck out the greateſt part of this article of William III. I hope what I have been ſaying will be of ſome uſe to thoſe who ſhall take the trouble to give us new reviſals of Moreri. They will ſee in what manner an hiſtorical article ſhould be filled up, and that without being very long, it may contain the moſt eſſential circumſtances. They will do well to correct the article of the Marſhal de Luxembourg. It is falſly affirmed there that the Prince of Orange was obliged, in the year 1674, to raiſe the ſiege of Charleroi, and that he was worſted at the battle of St Denys near Mons, in the year 1678 (2). MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This has been corrected in the edition of 1712. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) See the advertiſement to the ſecond edition of the Critical Dictionary, near the end. NEW OBSERVAT.

STOFLERUS.

In the article of this famous Mathematician, it was natural to expect ſome account of the friendſhip which he had for his diſciple Munſter, to whom he left copies of all his works, of which the latter knew afterwards very well how to make a profitable uſe

VOL. V.

8 U

to

STOFLERUS. STROZZY. SULPICIUS SEVERUS. TASSO.

to himself, and by that means to publish excellent treatises in his own name (1).

(1) Mr Bayle, in the article of Stoflerus, says, that he had a great friendship for his disciple Munster, and that this did no small service to the learned world; since if it had not been for the copies which he allowed him to take of his books, they would have been lost for ever when the originals were burnt. Here is the use that our author makes of these words, according to his manner of conceiving things, and of relating them. 1. He pretends that it was natural to expect, in the new edition of Moreri, some instances of the friendship which Stoflerus had for his disciple Munster, but this is said at a venture, for Mr Bayle, his sole and his only author, takes notice of no other mark of his friendship than what we have just seen. 2. He affirms that Stoflerus left Munster copies of all his works, which is as much as to say, that Stoflerus did himself write, or caused others to write, copies of his works, and that he left them at his death to Munster: but neither of these things is true, he only suffered him to take copies of his books. 3. He adds, that Munster knew afterwards very well how to make a profitable use of them to himself; and by that means to publish excellent treatises in his own name: that is to say, that Munster gave himself for the author of Stoflerus's works, published them as his own, and took the glory of them from his friend: but what proof does he give of this? None at all: it is not his way to give proofs of what he asserts. NEW OBSERVAT.

STROZZY.

The article of Philip Strozzy is very dry: that generous citizen, who made himself a sacrifice for the liberty of his country, deserved to have something more said of him: particularly they should not have forgot this line of Virgil, which that brave Florentine wrote upon his chimney with the point of his dagger, a moment before he died (a):

Exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor (1).

(a) He should have said before he killed himself. This would have instantly informed the reader what kind of death that Florentine died, a remarkable particular. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the last edition we find a very good article of this Strozzy, taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from which our author has borrowed what he says here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SULPICIUS SEVERUS.

The Continuator of Moreri had already been told, that it is not certain this Historian was of the Agenois, and that his saying in his works that Phœbadius of Agen was his Bishop, is no reason for concluding he was himself of that diocese; they have nevertheless made short work with the difficulty, which, notwithstanding their decision, subsists still, and is even favoured by many (1).

(1) Mr Bayle, in the article of SEVERUS (Sulpicius), observes, that he was undoubtedly of the province of Aquitaine; but that it is not certain whether he was of the diocese of Agen: and he puts the following note in the margin: he says, that Phœbadius, Bishop of Agen, was his Bishop. This does not prove that he was born in that diocese. This occasioned our author's saying, that the Continuator of Moreri had already been told, &c. They have not yet made use of Mr Bayle's Remark. In the edition of 1725, we find that Sulpicius Severus was born at Agen in Aquitaine, or in that diocese, since, according to his own testimony, Phœbadius of Agen was his Bishop. NEW OBSERVAT.

T.

TASSO.

THE name of the author of this Poet's life is wrong, the editor writes it Decharné, instead of de Charnes: he is Dean of Villeneuve lez Avignon, a man distinguished by his love for learning, and by the works he published some years ago: he is now writing the Life of Petrarch; but what the editor might have added to his article, and which would have been a great embellishment to it, is, that John Baptista Pigna, who composed the History of the Princes of Este, to whom he was a domestic, was that enemy to Tasso, of whom Tasso complains on several occasions without naming him, and whose character and manners he has described so ingeniously in his Aminta, under the name of Mopsus. This observation was neither made by Mr Menage in his Commentary upon the Aminta, nor by the Abbot de Charnes in his Life of Tasso; I owe it to the author of the Essais de Littérature, who gave an extract of the Life of that Poet in his Essay (a) of June and July 1703 (1). Mr Bayle, who has said

(a) As I have not read that Essay, I do not know whether the author quotes any writer who may have told him this particular concerning John Baptista Pigna: if he has cited no authority, the editors of Moreri would be very much to blame if they inserted this particular in the article of Tasso: they ought to mistrust, as a romantic invention, every thing that is asserted without proof in the Essais de Littérature. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the last edition no mention is made of Pigna in the article of Tasso. They have written the name of the Abbot de Charnes well. In the Mémoires said but two words of Tasso, in the first edition of his Critical Dictionary, had promised to enlarge the article of that Poet in the second edition; he has not kept his word; I call upon him in the name and behalf of the learned, to fulfil his promise in the Supplement to that Dictionary, which, as they write from Holland, he is going to publish.

Memoirs de Littérature, of Mr de Sallengre, Tom. I, pag. 184, he is called Mr de Charner. This is, no doubt, an error of the press. NEW OBSERVAT.

T A V E R N I E R.

In the article of this famous traveller, the editor has forgot to tell us something of the disputes which he had formerly with the Dutch authors. He was the aggressor in his Histoire de la conduite des Hollandois en Asie, wherein he used the directors of the East-India company very ill. Soon after, the author of l'Esprit de Mr Arnauld vindicated these gentlemen: Mr Jurieu espoused their cause, and inveighed in a base manner against the poor Mr Tavernier, who likewise found himself engaged afterwards in the quarrel between Father Tellier, and Mr Arnauld. This traveller did not speak of the Jesuits with due moderation in the relation he gave of his travels; which conduct drew upon him some satirical strokes in the second part of the Defense des nouveaux Chrétiens. Mr Arnauld, it is true, afterwards vindicated him in the third volume of his Morale pratique (1). Who could ever have imagined that a Merchant should have any-wise been concerned in the controversy between these two learned Divines? Methinks this fact, and the first that I mentioned would have been no small embellishment to the article Tavernier (2).

(1) Our author has taken all this from Mr Bayle. NEW OBSERVAT. conduct of the Dutch in Asia: but no notice is taken of Father Tellier's complaints, nor of Mr Arnauld's answer. It was thought these particulars did not belong to Moreti's Dictionary, NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the edition of 1725, where the article of Tavernier is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, they mention this traveller's book concerning the

T E T T I.

This article deserved a place in the new edition: Scipio Tetti made so much noise in the XVth century, that he ought not to have been forgotten in this work: he was a man, they will say, who held bad principles of religion, the remembrance of which, it is proper to extinguish. According to this way of reasoning we must say, that St Epiphanius had given himself a very needless trouble, and even that his work may have dangerous consequences, he who has given us a collection of all the Heresies that had been formed in the bosom of the Church down to his time. Such a work as that is so far from being dangerous to religion, that, on the contrary, I believe, with an holy Father, it is very useful towards the establishment of it. Is not that diversity of sentiments, that perpetual opposition between those who have abandoned the fixed point of unity, an invincible proof for the Divinity of our religion? Does it not shew, that without this unity of the Church, there is nothing but illusions, precipices, and dangers?

To return to Scipio Tetti; what brought troublesome disgraces upon him, such particularly as they are described by Thuanus (in vita sua lib. 1.) was his short treatise de Apollodorus. Mr Baillet, who speaks of it in his works, puts a high value upon it; that Bibliographer should nevertheless have praised it moderately; the errors of which Tetti was accused, and which they pretended were to be found in that small piece, were not a just ground for Baillet to ground his esteem upon (a). That work excepted, Tetti's morals were good, and Benedictus Ægius, who published that author's book, praises him very much in his notes; and I am persuaded, that, if Tetti had not lived in a country where the appearance and shadow of a crime in certain matters passes for the crime itself, he would not have found himself in those melancholy circumstances to which he was reduced in his latter days (1).

(a) The treatise of Scipio Tetti de Apollodorus, was printed at Rome in the author's life-time, and from thence we may conjecture that it contains no Heresies. But we shall be fully convinced by reading it, that there is nothing in that small book which can offend the Inquisition: neither indeed was this the thing which caused him to be persecuted, and sent to the galleys. Mr Baillet therefore was not in the wrong to commend that treatise, and could not have been hindered from doing it by the errors which they said were to be found there: no body had said so. Mr. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1712 we do not find the article of Scipio Tetti: but they give it in that of 1725, taken word for word from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. NEW OBSERVAT.

T I M O M A C H U S.

The editor sometimes is mistaken in his Arithmetical calculations; for instance, in the article of Timomachus he says, that Cæsar bought of this Painter the picture of Medea and Ajax, for 80 talents, which are equal to the sum of 48000 crowns: he is mistaken, 80 talents make a larger sum in French money; if we believe the learned Jesuit, who has given us that fine edition of Pliny, where mention is made of

Timomachus,

TIRANNION. TIRESIAS. TANAQUIL. TANNERUS. TRUSCHES.

Timomachus, and of the purchase which Cæsar made, we shall find that 80 talents are equal (a) to 19200 livres (1).

(a) Our author's Printers have omitted a cypher here, and have thereby made him contradict himself, for 19200 livres are a smaller sum than 48000 crowns. Father Hardouin, (in Plin. tom. 5. pag. 230.) who is the Jesuit quoted here, pretends, that the 80 talents of Pliny make 192000 livres. MR BAYLE'S RE-MARK.

(1) Our author, in copying Mr Bayle here, has very ill expressed himself. He says the picture of Medea and Ajax, as if it were only one picture. Mr Bayle observes that this Painter drew an Ajax and a Medea, which were bought, &c. In the last edition of Moreri, where they have corrected this article from the Dictionary of Mr Bayle, they have said, that, among other pictures, he drew a Medea and an Ajax, which Cæsar bought, &c. NEW OBSERVAT.

TIRANNION.

This article has been pretty well corrected; but they should not have forgot to mention the number of books which that author wrote. That which he composed to prove that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, deserved particularly to be taken notice of in a book of the nature of a Dictionary (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 the article of Tirannion there is a fault committed in it. They say that Tirannion was before called Diocle; it should be as which our author has taken what he says here. But Mr Bayle writes it, Diocles. NEW OBSERVAT.

TIRESIAS.

Several things are wanting in the article of this antient soothsayer: by correcting it too much, they have entirely disfigured it. They say nothing concerning Necromancy, which Tiresias openly professed, nor concerning the opinion which Lucian ascribes to him in his treatise of Astrology (1).

(1) They have likewise corrected this article from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but they have not inserted the two particulars which our author mentions here, and which he has taken from Mr Bayle. NEW OBSERVAT.

TANAQUIL.

This article is maimed, the merit of that illustrious Queen is not known, by what Moreri and his Continuators say of her. The single merit of knowing how to make stuffs (which is all that the editor says of her) would not have been a sufficient reason to transmit her name to posterity, and to engage St Jerom to speak of her so advantageously, in his book against Jovinian. That Father observes, that Tarquinius Priscus is much less known than his wife, and that the virtue of that Queen will ever have a place in the memory of men. The only fault she was reproached with, is that of having been too imperious; Juvenal seems to charge her with it in his sixth satire: but this reproach is not consistent with the excessive praises which St Jerom has bestowed upon her. The editor should have employed his parts in reconciling these contradictions (1).

(1) In the last edition we find a very good article of this Queen, drawn up from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but they tell us nothing of the fault which it seems she was charged with, of having been too imperious. Let the reader decide whether this reproach, allowing it to be well-grounded, is inconsistent with the praises of St Jerom; and whether the too imperious humour of a woman, destroys the great virtues which she may otherwise be possessed of. NEW OBSERVAT.

TANNERUS.

This article has been omitted, and I think that it ought not to be so in a new edition. Tannerus was a very learned Jesuit in Germany, who has made himself famous by his works, and particularly by the anatomy of the Confession of Augsburg, which he published, and which raised terrible adversaries against him (1).

(1) We find the article of Tannerus in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

TRUSCHES.

The editors of Moreri should long ago have discovered a gross fault, which they have committed in speaking of Gebhard Trusch, Archbishop of Cologne, whom they make immediate successor to John Gebhard of Mansfeld, likewise Elector of Cologne. Ought they not to know that there were three Electors between Mansfeld and Trusch; in this the last editor is less excusable than the preceding ones, since if he had taken the trouble to consult the works of the Critics, he would have discovered the error of those who published the first editions, and of late he needed only to have consulted the Réponse aux questions d'un Provincial, of the celebrated Mr Bayle, where he would have found a particular article, in which that subject is very minutely handled. As Trusch is near the end of the Dictionary, which was only finished in the last months of the last year; and as Mr Bayle's book had appeared in France about the middle of the same year, the editor had still time enough to correct that fault, but it costs people too much trouble to do things with the utmost exactness. There is a great resemblance between the conduct of these two Electors. Trusch, after the example of Mansfeld, finding finding the law of celibacy too harsh for him, shook off the yoke, and married; but he did not imitate the docility of his predecessor, who, being convinced of the inconsistency between a wife and an Archbishopric, submitted to the laws of the Church, and quitted his dignity with a good grace; whereas Trusch, to the last hour of his life, insisted upon keeping both. The likeness that there is between the adventures of these two Prelates, is, no doubt, what obliged Moreri and his Continuator to bring them so near one another (1).

(1) Mr Bayle had censured this fault of Moreri, in his Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, Tom. I, Chap. LX, pag. 536. In the edition of 1725, they have made use of the particulars which he relates concerning Gebhard Trusch, though they do not cite him at the end of that article. NEW OBSERVAT.

U.

URCEUS.

THE native country of this learned man should not have been the subject of a paradox (a): the editor finding Mr Bayle uncertain in this point, and wavering (b) between the different sentiments of Pierius Valerianus and Gesnerus, hesitated after his example. But the doubt was not difficult to remove, upon this occasion the authority of Pierius Valerianus ought not to counter-balance that of Gesnerus, because the latter speaks upon the credit and testimony of Bartholomæus Bononiensis, who has written the Life of Urceus. Now an Historian, an author who has laboured ex professo (to make use of that phrase) in writing the life of a man, is much more to be credited than another who has done no more than compiled, and who has rather studied to give us the eulogies of some learned men, than to give us an exact History of their Lives. An author of this last kind is not much solicitous to go to the bottom of every subject; that would carry him too far: he makes it more his business to collect a vast number of materials than to choose the best; but a particular Historian, such as Bartholomæus Bononiensis, an author, I say, whose exactness is so well known, is much rather to be credited than Pierius Valerianus, who had more at heart the publishing his book (de infelicitate Litteratorum) as well as he could, than the giving a well connected and particular History of every one of those whom he mentioned in his work. Thus it is much more probable that Antony Urceus was born in Herberia, a little town in the territory of Reggio, seven miles from Mantua (c), than in Ravenna, as Pierius Valerianus affirms.

The editor might have given us the prayer which Spizelius puts in the mouth of Urceus (d), just as he was ready to expire. It is remarkable, and very proper to convince Atheists, if any such there be in the world, that there is no intrepidity which can hold out against the terrors of death, and that in these last moments the soul, being ready to break through the bonds of sin, begins to dispel the darkness which environed it, and at last to see things such as they are in themselves. Here follows the prayer.

‘ Qui cœlum incolis, fer quæso opem peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in sinum confugio supplicem rejicere. Si unquam peccantem hominem voti reum fecisti, sic mihi extrema oranti dextram ab alto porrigas oro. - - - O thou who dwellest in heaven, help a sinner, I beseech thee, and do not reject me, while I thus fly, in a suppliant manner, to thy bosom. If ever thou didst bear a miserable sinner, stretch forth, I beseech thee, thy right hand to me from on high, now that I am making my last prayer.’

For

(a) He should have said of a problem. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) An author cannot be charged with being uncertain and wavering, unless he has confessed that he does not know which to choose between the two opinions he relates: for to relate two opinions without saying, in express words, that he embraces this or that, is not a good proof that he wavers and hesitates, it is only shewing that he contents himself with being an Historian, and that he leaves the reader the liberty of choosing. Mr Bayle has plainly enough intimated which is the preferable side of the question, since he says that Gesnerus, QUOTING BARTHOLOMÆUS BONONIENSIS, makes Herberia the native town of Urceus, and since he observes that Bartholomæus Bononiensis wrote the Life of Urceus. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) He should have said Modena, and the same fault must be corrected in Mr Bayle's Dictionary. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(d) Note, That Spizelius only relates what he had read in the Life of Urceus, composed by Antony Bononiensis. It is the latter who may justly be said to have put that prayer in the mouth of Urceus. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

8 X

(1) In

For the rest, never did any learned man more justly deserve a place in Pierius Valerianus's book, than Antony Urceus. The despair he shewed at the burning of his library and papers, is enough to terrify all those who shall read the circumstances of it. And indeed the resolution which he took to withdraw for ever from the sight of men, and to retire into the thickest part of the forests, could only have been dictated by the greatest despair (1).

(1) In Moreri's edition of 1712, they corrected the article of Urceus Codrus from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but what Mr Bayle says of that author is not exact. He had not the life of Codrus: and he was obliged to follow Spizelius and Pierius Valerianus, who have committed several faults in speaking of Codrus. His life, written first in Italian by the brother of Codrus, was translated into Latin, and published with additions by Bartholomeo Bianchino, Bartholomæus Blanchinus, who had been Codrus's disciple, and his intimate friend. The authors quoted by Mr Bayle, call him Bartholomæus Bononiensis, taking the name of his country for his true name. This life is prefixed to the works of Codrus. See what Mr de la Monnoye has said concerning Codrus, in his Additions to the Ménagiana, Tom. I. pag. 336, and Tom. III. pag. 180, & seq. of the Paris edition.

Mr de Saint Hyacinthe has given us a very long extract of Codrus's Works, in his Mémoires Littéraires, Tom. I. Art. V. pag. 259, & seq.

I shall take from that extract almost word for word a continued narrative of Codrus's life, which may serve as a corrective and Supplement to Mr Bayle's Dictionary; and the new editors of Moreri, may make use of it if they please.

URCEUS (ANTONY) surnamed CODRUS, was born at Herberia, a small town in the territory of Reggio, on the 15th of August 1446. His great-grandfather, a Potter's son in the country of Brescia, was the first of the family, who settled at Herberia. He was so poor that all his labour could scarcely supply him with bread. He had a son called Bartholomew, who got his livelihood for some time by fishing; afterwards as he was digging in a field, he found a pot filled with a pretty large sum of money, part of which he laid out in the purchase of the field itself, and with the rest, he set up a Perfumers shop. Cortefius, son to Bartholomew, had by his wife Gherardine, two sons: Antony, who is the subject of this article, and another called Peter-Antony; the birth of the latter, cost his mother her life. The father died after the eighty-first year of his age. He did not neglect the education of his sons; he provided them with proper masters: but it is said that our Codrus, while he was still very young, left him and went to Modena, with a design to study under Tribac, a man sufficiently learned for those days. Some months after, he returned to Herberia, from whence his father sent him to Ferrara, to study under Baptista Guarini, a famous Professor in the Greek and Latin tongues: he likewise attended the Lectures of Lucas Ripa, Professor in Rhetoric, and a man whose modesty was equal to his parts. Codrus made such progress under these two masters, that he far surpassed all his other companions, and thereby confirmed the great hopes, which his relations had conceived of him.

Some say that he began to teach children at Ferrara, tho' he was then scarce twenty-two years old; but Blanchini doubts of this particular. What we know for certain, is, that he remained five years at Ferrara, and afterwards was called to Forlì, to teach the languages, where they gave him more considerable appointments, than had been allowed to his predecessors. He writes in his letter to Mengo, that he was there for ten years public Professor of the Belles Lettres; and his Historian says (which does not at all contradict this) that for thirteen years Codrus instructed the youth there, and in particular Sinibaldo, son to the Prince of Forlì, at whose house he had his board and lodging.

About this time an accident happened to him, which had like to have made him distracted. He had in the inner part of the palace, a room so dark, that without the assistance of a lamp, he could not so much as distinguish the walls of it at break of day; this obliged him when he had a mind to study early to make use of a lamp, which was very neatly wrought, and upon the top of which he had engraved these words, studia lucernam olentia optime olent. Studies that smell of the lamp, have an excellent odour. One day that he went abroad without putting it out, his papers took fire, which spread to every thing that was in the room: (for no body perceived it till such time as the flames came out at the windows:) a book which he had composed with the title of Pastor, was burnt with all his papers. It is said that when he heard the first news of this fire, he was so transported with rage, that he ran to the palace, and stopping at the chamber-door, (for the flames would not allow him to enter) 'O Christ, said he, what great crime have I then committed? Whom of thine have I ever offended, that thou shouldst exercise such an implacable hatred against me?' Afterwards turning towards an image of the Virgin Mary: 'O Virgin, said he, hear what I say to thee sedately, and from the bottom of my heart, if peradventure, at the hour of death, I shall come in a suppliant manner to implore thy assistance, do not hear me, I beseech thee, neither receive me into the number of thine, I am resolved to take up my residence in Hell.' Here follow the very words of his Historian: Ad primum incendii nuntium, tantam animo imbibisse iram, ut exclamans veluti furor quodam concitus ad Regiam usque præcipiti gradu ire pergeret: pro foribusque cubiculi aditus, (neque enim ob incendium late cuncta depopulans ingredi licebat) Quodnam ego, inquit, tantum scelus concepi, Christe? quom ego tuorum unquam læsi, ut ita inexpiabili in me odio debaccheris? Conversus postmodum ad simulacrum Virginis, Audi, Virgo, ait, ea quæ tibi mentis campus ex animo dicam, si forte cum ad ultimum vite finem pervenero, supplex accedam ad te optem oratum, neve audias, neve inter tuos accipias, oro; cum in Inferni diis in eternum vitam agere decrevi. Those who were present, endeavoured to soften his passion, but he would hear nothing; he earnestly begged his friends not to follow him, and, like a mad-man, he rushed with a precipitant pace into the middle of an huge forest, where he passed the remaining part of the day in the deepest affliction. He came back to the city in the evening; but finding the gates shut, he lay down upon a dunghill, and there waited the return of morning. At break of day, having got into the city, he went and hid himself in a Joiner's house, where he remained six months alone, and without books.

After the death of the Prince of Forlì, and of Sinibaldo, his son, who died six months after him, Codrus stayed ten months longer in that city, being uncertain what resolution to take. Then he went to Bologna, where he was chosen Professor of the Greek and Latin tongues, and of Rhetoric, in the university. He continued there all the rest of his life, and died in the year 1500, in the monastery of St Salvatore, whither he had desired to be carried. Codrus was at that time, fifty-four years of age.

The day before his death, his disciples on their knees, and with their eyes bathed in tears, so earnestly besought him to tell them something worthy of himself, that he found himself obliged to comply with their request. His Historian relates the discourse, which, as he says, Codrus made upon that occasion: this discourse is an exhortation to virtue, but it is so long and so methodical, that there is reason to suspect Blanchini of having embellished it. Codrus there betrays marks of an extreme vanity. He says to his disciples, pray to God that you may be like me. The day on which he died, he made another short discourse, wherein he proves that death is the supreme good. He complained that he had not been able to write before he died what he had designed: 'If I die, said he, for I can perceive that the hour of my death draws near, alas, how many fine things shall be buried with me!' Si ego, inquit, moriar, nam prope ineluctabilem legem fati mei adesse sentio, bene quæ bona mecum interibunt!

The night of his death, he shewed marks of a disordered imagination; he fancied that he saw a person of an enormous size, with his head shaved, his beard reaching to the ground, and flaming eyes, carrying torches in either hand, and having his whole body in in a violent agitation: Codrus quaking for fear, said to this spectre, Who art thou, that thus alone with the air of a Fury, walkest about at the time when every body is asleep? Come not to me as an enemy, to me, I say, who am God's friend. Tell me, what seekest thou? Whither wouldst thou go? Having said this, he jumped out of bed to shun the spectre.

People had always doubted, whether he had any religion while he lived, his Historian confesses, that he gave occasion to it by his conversation, circa Christianum dogma, si non re, saltem verbis, plerumque claudicabat. Nevertheless, at the hour of death, he himself desired to have the Sacraments administered to him, and when they brought him the host, he beat his breast like a man truly touched with repentance, saying, that he was a wretch, who had always been in a state of blindness. He likewise raised his eyes and hands towards heaven, and fervently implored the assistance of the Holy Virgin: ser quaeso opem misero peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in sinum confugio, supplicem rejicere. He received the Viaticum with great respect, shedding tears, and recommending himself and his soul to God: Deo & se animamque suam commendans.

After his death, he was carried to the grave by his scholars, followed by all the students of the university. Blanchini caused the following words to be engraved upon his tomb, CODRUS ERAM. Codrus had so desired it.

The name of Codrus, was given him in this manner. Being at Forlì, the Prince met him on the road, and recommended himself to him, the Professor answered, smiling, 'things go well, Jupiter recommends himself to Codrus: 'Jupiter Codro se commendat. From that time, every body called him Codrus.

Codrus was of a middle stature; his person was thin and slender, his face pale and meagre, his eyes whitish, and somewhat hollow, he had a Roman nose, few hairs, and his looks were sometimes silly, but always mild. He had been always sickly, from his birth to the age of forty-four years. He had a weak stomach, and sometimes laboured under so great a decay of his spirits, that he remained the whole day in bed, like a dying man, without speaking, or even bemoaning himself; but as soon as the evening returned, his strength returned also. He had a bad memory, which gave occasion to his often reading his speeches in public, instead of pronouncing them by heart; and tho' his pronunciation was disagreeable, he was nevertheless heard with extraordinary pleasure. He was such a rigorous judge of the works of others, that the old Beroaldus used to say he knew no Critic of more severity and penetration. He excelled in the art of teaching boys, he knew how to correct them, and make them fond of him, being ever ready to do them all the services that lay in his power: it nevertheless sometimes happened that he chastised them immoderately; for tho' he had a mild and complaisant air, he was at the same time extremely severe and passionate. Blanchinus gives us instances of it. Another fault he censures in him, is, that he never praised any Modern. When any body asked him his opinion concerning the great men of that age, he commonly answered, with respect to them all, Sibi scire videntur, they fancy themselves to be learned.

No man of his time gave more credit to prefaces than he, he believed that there was a particular providence concerned in them. For example, if his boy's lamp went out, 'take care, unhappy youth, take care, would he cry to him, some great misfortune 'threatens you;' and to preserve him from it, if any thing was then to be done, Codrus would do it himself. But the most singular thing of all was, that when they told him of any prodigy, instead of thinking that it was either a Prince, or a country threatened with some misfortune, he only believed that it was a preface which threatened him or some other Professor. His Historian tells us, that in his orations, he pronounced several facetious things, which have not been preserved in writing. We may judge by those which Codrus has left in them, what these facetious things were, which he struck out. When somebody asked him upon this subject, why he mingled so many pleasantries in his discourses, he answered, 'men are so 'framed by nature, that jesters are agreeable, and 'story-tellers entertaining.'

Codrus made his will some days before his death. The will begins thus: I ANTONY URCEUS, son to Cortheus Urceus, hope and wish for Salvation from the eternal God. . . . Afterwards he recommends his soul to God, and adds that he always believed it immortal, against the opinion of Epicurus, and of those, who under the name of Christians, do nothing that is Christian. After certain pious legacies, and some other, which he bequeaths to his brothers and sisters by a second marriage, he names with a great deal of friendship, Peter Antony his brother by the mother's side, for his sole heir and executor.

Concerning his works, Blanchinus says that Codrus has not put the last hand to them: that he applied himself first of all to make Greek and Latin verses: that he added many things to the Greek Vocabulary: that he corrected many other books: that he restored some other things which had been lost in the ruins of the Latin tongue. 'Among the most considerable 'works of this learned man, we find, says he, several 'fine orations, which may be compared to a table of 'rect, elegant, sprightly, full of learning, and of a 'profound erudition. I never heard, continues he, 'any thing more agreeable: the diction of them is so 'pure, that one would be apt to say, that none but 'Codrus speaks Latin: and tho' his orations be so 'full of graces, pleasantries, mirth, and good humour, 'the gravity of the discourse, is nevertheless not at all 'weakened by it.' This is the judgment of Blanchinus, in which friendship may possibly have had a great share. After all, Codrus has passed for a learned man, and he deserves that title better than many others, on whom it has been bestowed, if it was not vanity that made him say, when speaking of the learned, Hic vivimus ambitiosa paupertate omnes, sumus litterarum pauperes, & volumus videre omnia scire. 'We live all in a state of proud poverty, we are poor 'in knowledge, and we would seem to know every 'thing.'

Among the friends of Codrus, they reckon the Princes of Forlì and of Ferrara, those of Bologna, Politian, Buti, Aldus, Tiberti, Magnani, Garzoni, Guarini and Ripa who had been his masters, Lambertini, Mimo Roscio, Lorenzo Roscio, and Pompeo Folcarini. Galeazzo Bentivoglio, Apostolical Protomotary, had his picture drawn by Francia, a man that wonderfully kept up the reputation which the Francias had acquired by painting.

Among the great number of his scholars, they distinguished John-Baptista Palmari, Cornelius Volta, Camillus Paleotti, Antony Albergatti, Peregrin Blanchini, and Philip Beroaldus the younger, who was also Professor at Bologna.

The works of Codrus were printed for the first time at Bologn in the year 1502, by John Antony Platonides, in folio. They consist of fifteen Orations; ten Letters; two books of Sylva; with some Odes to the number of twenty-two; two Satires; one Eclogue; ninety-six Epigrams; and one Song for Martinmas-day. But among the pieces of Codrus, we likewise find in this edition a preface written by Philip Beroaldus the younger, and inscribed to Antony Galeazzo Bentivoglio, where we are informed that it is to the latter we owe the collection of Codrus's works, of which several people were endeavouring to take the honour. We likewise find there a letter of Beroaldus; seven Poems of Virgilius Portus; a Letter and an Epigram written by a learned man of Toulouse called John Pin, and an Epitaph which he made for Codrus; an Epistle of Blanchinus; and the Life of Codrus, written by the same Blanchinus. The works of Codrus, together with the pieces just mentioned, were reprinted at Venice in the year 1506, in folio: at Paris, in the year 1515, in 4to; and at Basil, in the year 1540, likewise in 4to.

We have seen that Blanchinus, speaking of Codrus's works, says 'that he restored some things 'which had been lost in the ruins of the Latin 'tongue: 'he means chiefly the Atulularia of Plautus, which Codrus restored by supplying the end, which was lost. This Supplement contains 122 verses. There is an edition of that Comedy, printed at Leipzig in 1513, in folio, with the following title: Plauti lepidissimi Poetae Atulularia, ab Antonio Codro Urceo, utriusque Linguae doctissimo, pristinae formae diligenter restituta; illius enim finis antea desiderabatur.

Codrus had written a book of antiquities, which is lost; and another of fables, which death hindered him from finishing. He likewise designed to write, as well in Greek as in Latin, a book of secrets and hidden things.

Blanchinus

Blanchinus says that several persons made fine epitaphs upon him, but particularly Hermico Caiado, a Portuguese Poet, and Philip Beroaldus the younger. They have not published them in the works of Codrus, though they have inserted those which Virgilius Portus made upon him: I shall quote one of them:

Codrus eram, natale solum Herberia, sed que Me sepelit Graium dixit & Ausonium.

'I was Codrus, Herberia is my native place; but that where I lie buried says that I was both a Grecian and a Roman.' NEW OBSERVAT.

W.

WESTPHALUS.

IT is true that the editor has corrected the article of John Westphalus, who is an imaginary Divine, to whom Moreri ascribes abominable errors. But he has done more than was required at his hands, for it was not demanded of him that he should suppress the whole article, but only that he should take from John Westphalus the title of Divine, which certainly was not his due, and restore to him that of Printer, which belongs to him. This John Westphalus, or John de Westphalia, was not such an obscure person but that he deserved a place in the Dictionary. He was the first Printer in the Low-Countries; he settled at Louvain in the year 1475, and Aristotle's Ethics was the first book (a) that he printed (1).

(a) This is the opinion of Gabriel Naudé, but the Sieur de la Caille, in his History of Printing, pag. 30, affirms, that as early as the year 1473, John de Westphalia printed at Louvain several books, such as Petr. Crescentius de omnibus Agriculturae partibus, &c. in folio. MR. BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Here again our author does no more than copy Mr Bayle, who has made it appear that the Joba Westphalus of Moreri, a Lutheran Heretic, &c. is an imaginary person. It is true, adds Mr Bayle, there was a John de WESTPHALIA; but this was a Printer who settled at Louvain in the year 1475; and for that he quotes Gabriel Naudé. This Printer called himself sometimes Jobannes de Westphalia, sometimes Jobannes Westphalia Paderbornensis, sometimes Jobannes de Paderborn in Westphalia, and sometimes Jobannes Padelborn de Westphalia. He printed not only at Louvain, but likewise at Aloft and Nimeguen. In the year 1475 he entered into partnership with Theodoric Martini of Aloft. He put out in the year 1475 Juveniani Institutiones cum Glossa, in folio, and added to it this kind of enigmatical advertisement, according to the custom of the first Printers: Institutionum præ- sens opus insignis . . . Jobannes de Paderborn in Westphalia alim in universitate Lovanienfi residens non siccis calamo sed Arte quâdam characterisendi modernissimâ suo proprio signo consignando feliciter consummavit Anno incarnationis Dominice MCCCC LXXV. mensis Novembris die XXI, &c. Twenty years after he printed Aur. Augustinus in libr. de Trinitate, Lovanii per Jobannem Padelborn de Westphalia, folio. At the end of the book we find this:

Numine sancte tuo Pater ô tuare Jobannem Padelborn: præsens qui tibi præsit opus.

Lovanii per Jobannem Padelborn de Westphalia in præfatio natiuitatis Christi finiente anno nonagesimo quinto.

Guard holy Father by thy pow'r divine
John Padelborn, a Printer here of thine.

See Mr Mattaire's Annales Typographici, Tom. I. NEW OBSERVAT.

X.

XENOPHANES.

THE article of this Philosopher is very deficient: if we were to judge of his doctrine by what is said of it in the new edition of the Historical Dictionary, and by what Diogenes Laërtius says of it in the Life of the Philosophers, and Cicero in his book de natura Deorum, one would be tempted to think that they were speaking of two different persons. The editor only tells us that he believed there were four elements, and an infinite number of worlds. If his whole doctrine had been reduced to these two principal heads, would it have appeared so pernicious to some learned men? and would it have given them room to infer that Spinoza had taken the foundation of his impious system from this ancient Philosopher? In short, would there be any thing more in this doctrine than what we find contained in the ingenious works of the celebrated Mr Huygens and Mr de Fontenelle. But Xenophanes had other principles of a very different nature nature; he expressly affirmed that the understanding is God, and that every thing which is infinite is God. Eusebius Cæsariensis charges him with having taught that nature is eternal à priori, and à posteriori, and that she is always like to herself. If we believe the conjecture of a learned Critic, this Philosopher pretended that the divine understanding endeavoured to give to all creatures a state of perfection; but that having met with invincible obstacles in matter or body, he could not always execute his designs; and consequently was forced, on certain occasions, to produce bad things: and this, without doubt, is the detestable source from which Manes took the doctrine of his two principles, the one the author of all good, and the other that of all evil. I do not say but that this principle, when considered in one particular light, is susceptible of a favourable interpretation; for if this Philosopher meant that the sweets of life do not equal the bitters which accompany it, we shall easily judge that he was not much in the wrong, and that his moral seldom fails to be true; and I am of opinion it was from Xenophanes that the famous Natural Historian, who appeared several ages after him, borrowed this thought, when he said in the beginning of his seventh book, that the good things which nature measures out to us, are mixed with so many evils, that he does not know si parens melior homini an tristior noverca fuerit. - - - whether nature is not rather a cruel stepmother, than an indulgent parent, to mankind (1).

(1) All this is taken, whether right or wrong, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. In the edition of 1725, after these words, be believed there were four elements, and an infinite number of worlds, they have added, be believed that the moon was inhabited, and had several other impious principles, as may be seen in Mr Bayle. But why should they rank among the impious principles of Xenophanes his having believed that the moon is inhabited; an opinion, which, on the contrary, does him a great deal of honour, as Mr Bayle has observed. NEW OBSERVAT.

THESE are the Remarks which I have made upon the last edition of Moreri; I might have enlarged their number, but I was willing before-hand to know how the public would relish them: if they are approved of, and be esteemed useful towards a new edition, I may possibly give the sequel of them.

I must not however conclude without mentioning the considerable additions that we find in the new edition of 1704. It contains several articles that were not in the former ones; as Differtations, Genealogies, and other important Remarks. For example, we find in the first volume a very curious Differtation upon the title of Royal Higbness, which has been given to so many Princes of late years. The article which concerns Mr de Sallo (the father and author of all the literary journals) has been corrected with a great deal of exactness (a). The article of Duranti is improved by a curious Differtation upon the book de ritibus, &c. It is the business of Father Mersenne (b), or his followers to examine the worth of it.

(a) I am nevertheless told that an Arithmetical error, which has passed from edition to edition, is not corrected in that of 1704, no more than it was in that of 1699. This error consists in saying that Mr de Sallo, who was born in 1626, died in 1669, aged forty-nine years. It plainly appears from these years of his birth and death that he lived no more than forty-three years (1). I wish the editor had confuted a lie which traduces Mr de Sallo in a cruel manner, and which, having at first been published by the Carthusian Friar, who disguised himself under the name of Vigneul Marville, has already appeared in a Latin book printed in Germany, and will, no doubt, in a little time pass from book to book, and from country to country, if a stop be not put to the unlucky spreading of it. For this reason I affirm here, upon the authority of the Abbot Gallois, that nothing is more false than the following passage of Vigneul Marville, (tom. i. des Melanges, pag. 304.) that Mr Sallo died in the year 1665, of a distemper to which the children of the Muses are very little subject, and for which there is no remedy either in Hippocrates or Galen, for he died of grief for having lost at play 100000 crowns, that is to say, his whole estate. It is certain that he died in 1669, and that gaming did not in the least contribute towards it. The book of a learned German (Struvius) where this passage of Vigneul Marville has been quoted, pag. 79, was printed at Iena in the year 1704, with the title of Introductio ad notitiam rei literariæ et usum Bibliothecarum. We may justly wonder, that though Mr de Sallo left both children and friends, yet no body has contradicted a public lie which traduces him in such a cruel manner, and that the authors of the Journal des Sçavans, who have a greater interest than others in his glory, and who have not spared Vigneul Marville upon other occasions, have nevertheless spared him upon this. There is in the new letters of Mr Bourfault, pag. 357, of the Dutch edition of 1698, a thing so singular, and so much to the honour of Mr de Sallo that they will do well to adorn his article with it in the next edition of Moreri. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This fault continued in the editions of 1707, 1712, and 1718, and was only corrected in that of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) He should have said Martens. He is a Benedictine Monk of the congregation of St Maur. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

The article of the Abbey of la Trappe has been added: the genealogies are reduced to a very convenient and intelligible method. That of Saulz-Tavanes, it is true, wants revising, for the two branches of that family are not well enough distinguished, and we do not know who was father to the last Count de Tavanes, who married Madam d'Agueffau. I know that he was son to James de Saux, and Louisa-Henrietta Poitiers-Trêmes, whereas they make the latter to have been the father of the Marquis de Tavanes, who married N de Bourbon Buffet, descended from a natural son of the Cardinal Charles de Bourbon (1).

V O L. V. (1) This is corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

8 Y

The

CRITICAL REMARKS.

The genealogy of Savoy has been very well cleared up, and several others have been added, such as those of Rouffelet-Chateau-Renaud, of Roisin, of Marca or la Marque, of Servient; of Tonnelier-Breteuil; of Tournebu; of Hoffung-la Baume; of Tournemine, the same family from which the learned Jesuit Tournemine is descended; of Constantin-Tourville; of Valbelle; of Vincent de Mauleon; of Saignez-d'Austraud de Caufans; of Frezeau la Frezeliere, and Fouquet.

That of Phelipeaux has been corrected. That of Bignon has been put in its proper order.

In the genealogy of Voyer they should correct the word Revau, which is wrong spelt, it ought to be Rivau (1).

(1) This is also corrected in the last edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

A. DISSER-

A

DISSERTATION

CONCERNING THE BOOK OF

STEPHANUS JUNIUS BRUTUS,

Printed in the year 1579.

IT is universally agreed, that he who composed under this name the book intituled, Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, five de Principis in Populum, Populique in Principem legitima Potestate, was not called so; but there are still different opinions concerning his true name. The most virulent of all the libels that were sent us from France by the post, in the year 1689, on account of the Revolution of England [A], ascribes Junius Brutus's book to Mr du Pleffis Mornai: which is somewhat surprizing; for after the proofs that the author of another libel (a), has taken from several very common writings, no body ought to be ignorant, that Hubert Languet and Junius Brutus are the same person. Here follow some mistakes concerning this famous book.

(a) Important Advice to the Refugens.

I. Deckher's error.

Mr Deckher (b) Advocate in the Imperial Chamber of Spire, pretends, that if the author had called himself Lucius Junius Brutus, he had taken a name more proper, and better founded on Livy's History, than that of Stephanus Junius Brutus, which he took in the Hanaw edition of the year MDVC; and he observes that Boeclerus (c) has cited him under the name of Lucius Junius Brutus. But first, this shews he was ignorant that the Prænomen Stephanus had appeared in the preceding editions, and even in the first, which is pretended to have been made at Edinburgh in the year 1579. The French version printed in the year 1581, in 8vo, bears also the name of Stephen Junius Brutus. Secondly, why must the author have had more regard to Brutus, who delivered Rome from Tarquin's tyranny, than to Brutus, who delivered it from Cæsar's? If there was no reason for his preferring one of them before the other, there was no reason for his calling himself Lucius rather than Marcus; he might therefore, as well have taken this Prænomen Stephen, as any other. Let no man say, that the manner of Marcus Brutus's resisting the tyrant, is not as agreeable as that of the other Brutus to the author's principles; nor let it be added in confirmation of this, that he allows persons in any office, as Lucius Junius Brutus, who was tribune of the Celeres, to excite the people to take up arms, but that he denies that privilege to private persons, and much more, that of assassinating the tyrant, except in case of a Divine Inspiration, in which he will even have a man to examine himself carefully. Let no one use these arguments, I say; for the author has clearly declared (d), that Brutus and Cassius are in the case of those murderers of tyrants, to whom the laws promise rewards, and erect statues. He has ranked Cæsar in the number of those usurpers, against whom it is lawful for any man to conspire. And so Mr Deckher's criticism is false, and little better than the pitiful and infipid jest of some people, who have said, that Hubert Languet disguised himself, amongst other names, under that of Stephen, not with respect to that Stephen, who assassinated the Emperor Domitian, to whom Apollonius Tyanæus cried out at

(b) De Scriptis Adefpotis, pag. 89, Edit. Amstel. 1686.

(c) In Grotium de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. i, cap. iv, pag. 271.

(d) See his Question III, pag. 193, & 211.

three

(1) It was printed at Paris, in the year 1696; but neither the place of the impression, nor the name of the Printer was put to it.

[A] The most virulent of all libels . . . concerning the Revolution of England. It is intituled The new Abolition, &c. and it is ascribed to Mr Arnauld: this opinion is printed in a book, called, The History of the troubles caused by Mr Arnauld after his death; or Mr Santeuil's quarrel with the Jesuits (1). This is found at page 29. If the author of this History is not mistaken as to the author of the libel, he is so at least, as to the place of the impression; for it is false that Mr Arnauld published this book in Holland. Nay, I do not think he was there at that time. The Historical and Political Mercury of the year 1696, has occasioned the discovery of the author of this libel, speaking of this Controversy of Mr Santeuil.

II.
Barclay's error.

III.
Hotman thought to be the author of the book.

IV.
The author of the News from the Republic of Learning censured.

COLOMIE'S cited, and a reflexion upon the citation.

V.
Three observations on d'Aubigné.

three hundred leagues distance, cheer up, strike the villain (e); but with respect to St Stephen, the first martyr of the Gospel, and the first victim of Christian patience.

But Deckher's criticism is nevertheless more tolerable, than the argument used by William Barclay (f), to prove Stephanus Junius Brutus's book to be pseudonymous, and that the author only chose the name of Brutus, to set out with greater distinction, on the foot of deliverer of the people; because, says he, it is not probable, that the posterity of him, who expelled Tarquin, continued to our age, since one of the best Historians affirms *, that he died the last of his family, in the war against the Veientes. Certainly, this is racking one's brain to no purpose: for it could never have entered into the head of any reader, that this writer might be defended in a right line from Junius Brutus, who abolished the Roman monarchy; and I do not think, that in reading the books of modern authors, whose true names are Brutus, any one will be so fully as to believe they are defended from the family of the ancient Brutus's.

The error of those, who father the book on Francis Hotman, is nothing near so great as the foregoing (g). There are still some learned men, who ascribe it to him; such as Mr Constant (h), a famous minister and professor at Lausanne, in his abridgement of Politics (i).

He who wrote the three first years of the News from the Republic of Letters, having said by the way (k), that Hotman was thought to be concealed under the name of Junius Brutus, gave some time after (l), for his voucher, a book printed at Paris in the year 1589, intituled, A Treatise concerning the power of Kings against the King of Navarre. But if he had been well acquainted with d'Aubigné's History, he might have likewise informed us, both that Hotman was the reputed author of Junius Brutus's book, and that it was ascribed to him without any foundation. I am going to shew what d'Aubigné has said of it: I begin with an author, who has been very curious in these sorts of inquiries (m); his words are these: 'Mr Daillé told me, he heard that the author of the book, intituled, Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, under the name of Stephanus Junius Brutus, was Hubert Languet, a learned man, and a great Politician. Which I have had since confirmed by Mr Legoux of Dijon, who added, that Mr de la Mare, Counsellor of the same town, had observed this in making Hubert Languet's elogy. Others attribute this book to Mr du Pleffis, to whom I could as readily ascribe it on this testimony of d'Aubigné: There came out another book, called Junius Brutus, or a defence against tyrants, written by a learned gentleman of this kingdom, famous for many excellent books, and still living with great figure. In another place of his History, d'Aubigné says, that this gentleman confessed to him, that he was the author of it. There was just reason upon such passages to attribute the book to Mr du Pleffis, as readily as to Hubert Languet. But if this author had known d'Aubigné's second edition, he could not have been in suspense; for he would have seen that after the year 1616, the date of the first edition, d'Aubigné had discovered the whole mystery. Let us hear then what he says in the second edition, which is of the year 1626.

(n) Many pens in all kinds of writing were employed both on account of religion and government. The first subject produced a great many books; as for the second, there was one in vogue, of which I will take a particular notice, called A Defence against Tyrants: in this, it was fully examined how far obedience to Kings extends, for what causes, and by what means, people may take up arms, and to whom it belongs to authorize them; whether foreigners may be called in; whether they may lawfully give assistance. Hotman was a long time wrongfully suspected to be the author of it; but afterwards a French gentleman, who is living when I write, confessed to me, that he was the author of it. But it appeared at last that he was the editor, it having been deposited with him by Hubert Languet, of Franche Comté (o), agent in France for the Duke of Saxony. In another place of his History (p), he repeats the same thing in these words: There appeared another book which was intituled, Junius Brutus, or A Defence against Tyrants, owned by one of the learned gentlemen of this kingdom, celebrated for many excellent books, and living still in great repute; treating the questions concerning the bounds of our obedience to Kings; in what cases it is lawful to take up arms against them; who ought to attempt it; whether neighbouring foreigners may justly give their assistance; in what manner all things ought to be managed: all this he handles like a great Lawyer, and a great Divine. Since that, Hubert Languet (q) is known to be the true author of it.

I shall make three observations upon these two passages of d'Aubigné.

The first is, that I do not believe the book in question was ever called Junius Brutus, and so this Historian must have taken the name of the author for the title of the work; which, at most, is but a little deviation from rigorous exactness. Not but at bottom, the book might have been intituled, Junius Brutus, and might be cited so. But this is not the matter in hand; we know well enough that a proper name has often been the title of a book, and that there is a tract of Cicero intituled Brutus; we know likewise that custom gives great privileges for the abridging of a citation. This is not therefore the matter in question. The question is, Whether the book we speak of had the title which d'Aubigné and Boëclerus give it.

My

(r) See the article ACIDALIUS, remark [G]; and the second article MALDONAT, remark [I], at the end.

(s) Printed
Giesse Hassorum
1687.

(t) It is his Musæum, robers be says, qui se Bruti nomine disimulat, sive Mornæus is est,
sive Hubertus Languetus.

(u) At Strasbourg in 1674, with his Institutiones Politicæ.

(x) See the Ild
Dissertation, p.
322, and the XVth, p. 209.

8 Z

(3) According to Voetius, Draudius, pag. 973, says, Stephani in the Supplement Juui Vindicia contra tyrannos, ec. Ederbergae 80 & 81. Latine & Gall. Drauidii's edition, which I use, is of 1625. If since this Supple-ment's book four times, viz. pag. 809, (where the Edinburghelement concerns edition 1579, and the Straburgion in 1210, are mentioned,) pag.
1235, where the edition of Amsterdum 1611 is mentioned: pag.
1275, where the Straburg edition again is mentioned; and p. 84, of French books, where we find the title of the translation as is (5) Pag. 300.
is in Du Verdier.

(4) Pag. 766, and thereby it appears that Voëtius ought not to take any advantage of Du Verdier's not mentioning Junius Brutus

in the Supplement to this Epitome, since this Supplement concerns only the omissions of the Epitome.

(5) Pag. 100.

tius of being Junius Brutus.
How justified
by Rivetus.

Voluntatis falsi, Discussio. In a former writing, I mean, in his Appendix de Anticristo, he would not name Mornai. Boucher's execrable book, says he (y), concerning the deposition of Henry III, King of France, was taken, both as to the arguments and expressions, not from Mariana, or Santarel, but from Junius Brutus, (I know very well who he is; but let him be concealed, since he defers it), and some other learned men of the same sect. Liber flagitiosissimus Boucherii de abdicatione Henrici III Galliarum regis non argumentis tantum sed & verbis desumptus est, non ex Mariana aut Santarello, sed ex Junio Bruto (quis is sit sat scio, sed quia latere voluit, lateat) & ex viris doctis quidem at factionis ejusdem. In a letter (z) which he wrote from Paris on the twenty-eighth of February 1643, he does not use that reserve. I think I have written, says he, that the author of Junius Brutus is Philip de Mornai, and that Lewis Villiers was he who got it printed; I repeat it again, because Marefius says that he is an unknown author: the thing however is known to a great many. Puto scripsisse me antebac auctorem Junii Bruti esse Philippum Mornæum Pleffiacum, editorem Ludovicum Villerium, Loifelerium. Repeto id quia ignotum esse scriptorem dicit Marefius, cum plurimis ea res nota sit: & idem Pleffiacus testamento generos & amicos suos hortatus sit, arma ut sumerent, si Edicta à Rege non servarentur (aa). In another letter (bb) he speaks of one Rufford, a German author, who has cited Junius Brutus under the name of Mornai. The Printers have blundered here; for instead of Ruffordius in Defensione causæ Palatinæ, they have put causæ politicæ.

It is certain that Marefius, in his answer to Grotius's Appendix in 1642, still maintained that Junius Brutus was an unknown and obscure person, whose work none of the Reformed would maintain, nor had ever praised or approved. He went so far as to say, that perhaps it was a Papist, as King James had suspected, who had published this work under the disguise of a Protestant, in order to render the Protestant religion odious. Quid quæso ille ipse Junius Brutus quem nobis exprobrat (homo anonymus, obscurus, ignotus, cujus scriptum privata emissum auctoritate Reformatorum nemo tueri velit (cc)); Junius Brutus quisquis ille sit (dd) . . . Nobis multo crimini dandum quod qua secus quam par esset ille (Junius Brutus) scripserat, homo à nemine nostrum nec laudatus, nec approbatus, Boucherius ex malis pessima fecerit & in virus transmiserit (ee) . . . Qui verà posset conferri Junius Brutus, qui sine Autoris nomine, sine ulla approbatione prodit, forte etiam confusus ab aliquo Pontificio in odium Reformatorum, ut suspicabatur Rex Jacobus, cum hoc Santarelli Tractatu, &c (ff).

Rivetius, answering Grotius's posthumous book, says indeed, that no proofs can be given of what is advanced against Mr du Pleffis; but that in case he was the author of Junius Brutus, some regard must be had to his age, and the circumstances of time, that is, he ought to be excused on account of his youth, and the horrible persecutions the Protestants suffered at that time (gg). From whence it follows, that if Rivetus does not confess that Junius Brutus is the fictitious name of Mr du Pleffis Mornai, he does not deny it neither: which shews that he was more inclined to believe it than not. The only thing he clearly affirms, is, that the book was printed out of the kingdom, during the heat of persecutions and massacres, when Mr du Pleffis was very young. But this plainly shews that Rivetus was not initiated into the mystery, and that he knew little better than d'Aubigné the true date of the book. It is surprising that neither Grotius, whom hardly any thing escaped in the Republic of Letters, nor Rivetus, nor Marefius, whose reading was very extensive, should know nothing either of what d'Aubigné had said concerning Junius Brutus, in his second edition in 1626, or of Simon Goulart's Funeral Oration, spoken and printed at Geneva, in the year 1628. The Learned are a strange sort of people, they run after remote and fleeting things, and neglect what they have as it were under their very noses (bb). It is much like a hunter, Transvolat in medio posita & fugientia captat (ii).

As a huntsman loves to chase his prey
But would not take it if it lay in 's way.

CREECH.

VIII.
The discovery made by Goulart's Funeral Oration.

At the death of Simon Goulart, the seals were opened for a full revelation of the mystery. Theodorus Tronchin (kk), Divinity-Professor, making this Minister's Funeral Oration declared, that his memory and reading were almost infinite; and that people resorted to him as to an oracle, to know the truth of what they desired to know. A proof of which is, that King Henry III being exceedingly desirous to know the author, who was concealed under the fictitious name of Junius Brutus, and all the means he used for this purpose having failed him, resolved, at last, to effect it by a shorter way, as he supposed; which was to apply to Simon Goulart. But he, that he might not expose those who were concerned in it, was silent at that time; though he had seen the original of the author, and knew it was composed by Hubert Languet, and that du Pleffis Mornai having got the manuscript into his hands after the author's death, caused it to be printed by Thomas Guarin.

By this it clearly appears, 1. That this book, as soonest, was not printed till the end of the year 1581, since Languet died but on the first of October of that year.

2. That

2. That all was fictitious in the title of the first edition, the time and place of the impression, as well as the name of the author; for the book was said to be printed at Edinburgh in 1579 (ll). Besides, there was a preface added to it in the name of the Publisher, in which, he took the fictitious name of Conon Superantius, Vasco, and a false date both of time and place was used; viz. Soleurre, the first day of January 1577. It is easy to prove, that du Pleffis was not in Switzerland, in the interval between Languet's death and the publication of Junius Brutus's book; and I do not think, that any one will affirm, that Thomas Guarin was a Bookseller of Edinburgh (mm). It appears in the third place that the excuses alledged by Rivetus are not good, since it is certain, that when Languet died, France was no longer in a condition of persecuting the Protestants, except by civil-wars, in which each party suffered, and that Mr du Pleffis who was thirty-two years of age, had already written some very excellent books, the best perhaps he ever wrote, viz. his Treatise concerning the Church, and that concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion.

(ll) See the remark [B].

(mm) They feigned at that time, that several books were printed at Edinburgh; such as in 1574. The Revelation des François, written by Eusebe Philadelphus Cypriote (it is a fictitious name) and the treatise de Furoribus Gallicis published under the false name of Ernestus Varumundus Frisius, 1573.

(nn) Giffertus Voëtius.

IX. Voëtius's Dissertation censured by Placcius.

Voëtius (nn), Divinity-Professor at Utrecht, a man of immense reading, might perhaps, as well as Grotius, Rivetus, and Mareflus, have been ignorant all his life, of this unriending of Theodorus Tronchin, had not the Vindicia contra Tyrannos been reprinted at Amsterdam, in the year 1660, in which, to these words, Stephano Junio Bruto Celso, this was added, sive, ut putatur, Theodoro Beza Autore. The magistrates of Geneva being informed of it, thought themselves obliged to vindicate Beza's name, from this false imputation. They feared it would be a blot upon his memory, seeing that Junius Brutus's book was treated with the utmost ignominy: for when King James undertook to vindicate the Protestants, from the objections occasioned by that book, he answered, that probably, some Papist had fathered it on the Protestants, with a design to make them odious. Quem nobis objicit Junius Brutus, auctor est ignotus, & forte Romanensis Ecclesie emissarius, ut per illum reformatæ religioni apud Principes conflarent invidiam. (oo). And when the Protestant writers were harassed on the same account, they failed not to say, that they objected to them an unknown person, a man without any name or figure in the Church, or in the world, a phantom. This was a new reason for them to justify this great servant of God; however, it was much better that the reproaches should fall upon Lay-men, who were the true authors of the opinions objected against, than upon innocent Divines. For these causes, and other considerations, the Magistrates of Geneva wrote to the Magistrates of Amsterdam, the proofs of Beza's innocence (pp); and thereby, probably Voëtius came to the knowledge of the mystery revealed by Simon Goulart. Be it how it will, Voëtius published in the year 1662 (qq), an anonymous Dissertation, which he inserted four years after, in the fourth volume of his Theses, wherein he shewed by many arguments, that Beza was not Junius Brutus, and enlarged much upon Hubert Languet.

(oo) Opus Regiorum, pag. 478, which has been thus translated; Junius Brutus, whom he (Cardinal de Perron) objects to us is an unknown author; and perhaps one of the Romish Church hath writ it on purpose to make the Protestants odious to Princes, pag. 127, 128, of the Vindication of the Rights of Kings; printed in 1615, against Cardinal du Perron's harangue.

(pp) Placcius, de Script. Anonym. pag. 169.

(qq) He himself mentions that year in the fourth volume of his Theses, p. 230. Placcius, ibid. puts it in 1661.

Mr Placcius has criticized one of his proofs in defence of Beza. For Voëtius having said, that before the year 1660, no body, either among the friends or enemies of Beza and Languet, or among the editors of Junius Brutus, had ascribed this book to Beza, either expressly, or by way of suspicion; and that therefore the new conjecture of an unknown man given at random (rr), was of no weight; Mr Placcius shews him, that in the year 1652, one John Philips an Englishman, who wrote an answer to an apology for the King and people of England affirmed, that Beza was the author of Junius Brutus's book.

X. Beza accused before the time mentioned by Placcius.

The thing might have been carried higher, since some French Jesuits had a long time been beforehand with this John Philips; so that Voëtius is wrong in taking advantage from the silence not only of Becanus, Gresserus, and Eudæmon Johannes, but also of the whole society of the Jesuits, totaque Jesuitarum natio; for in the year 1611, we find that Father Cotton (ss) having collected several passages from Protestant authors, which he thought afforded matter for recrimination, and having not forgotten Junius Brutus, put in the margin Theodorus Beza, sive Stephanus Junius Brutus, in Libro cui titulus, Vindicia contra Tyrannos, &c. The Jesuit Richeome (tt), with the very same view, and on the same occasion, thus addressed himself to his adversary: How will you excuse desbatvri Beza, who, being concealed under the sham-name of Junius Brutus, as you under that of Anti-Coton with the addition of three letters, wrote a book, concerning the lawful power of a Prince, &c. A minister of Gergeau, called David Home, answering in the year 1612, the Apology of the Jesuits, written by a Father of the Society of Jesus of Loyola, denied what the author of the apology had asserted, that Beza had taken the mask of Junius Brutus. David Home's book is intitled, le Contr' Assassin. It has these words in page 329: As for Stephanus Junius Brutus, whom he afterwards produces, we know no such man; but we say, that the Jesuit, in affirming him to be Theodorus Beza, without offering the least conjecture in the world for his assertion, lies Jesuitically, that is, impudently, and like a Machiavelist, who holds that tho' a lie be spread about but for half an hour, it still does good in state matters; tho' God forbids us to bear false witness against any one, as this man does against Beza, in whose writings there is not one word of exhortation to kill tyrants, &c. After some citations, the author goes on thus: This is what Beza says, which sufficiently disproves the Jesuit, who affirms that he is the author of the treatise produced under the name of Junius Brutus, which has no conformity with that of Beza.

(rr) The Greek phrase he uses, is perhaps more emphatical; ὡς ἂν ἐκκατακρύψει.

(ss) Réponse Apologétique à l'Anti-Coton, &c. à ceux de la suite, p. 2. 173.

(tt) At page 471, of the Categorical Examination of the li-tel Anti-Coton, printed in 1613. He puts in the margin, Junius Brutus de Beza de legitima potestate, &c.

Beza, and is in all probability, the true name of the author, since there are several learned men, who are surnamed Junius. An Irish Jesuit (uu) cited Junius Brutus's book as Beza's performance, in the year 1614. I question not, but many others, both before, and after the answers to the Anti-Coton, have employed this calumny against Beza, and I expect to have quickly returned to me, what I have lent Mr Placcius; I mean, that I shall be shewn, that I might have still gone higher; from whence it will still be more apparent, how reserved we ought to be upon general affirmations, tho' we should have the vast reading of the famous Professor of Utrecht; for after all, the great knowledge he had of all sorts of books, prevented not his being ignorant: 1. That before the year 1660, Beza had been often accused of writing the book of Junius Brutus. 2. That two years before the Funeral Oration of Simon Goulart, the public was informed by d'Aubigné, that Hubert Languet had taken that fictitious name. 3. That Grotius had publicly named Mr du Pleffis Mornai as the author of that piece.

XI.
The Protestants apology for the Roman Church, by Brereley.

Expecting the return of my loan, I will say here that one John Brereley, an English priest, in his book, intituled, The Protestants Apology for the Roman Church (a), cites an author, called Sutcliffe (b), who said, that the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, was a book written either by Beza or Hotman. Tho' I cannot discover at what time this apology was first printed; yet I doubt not but it was before the Jesuits answer to the Anti-Coton, since I learn from the translator, that as soon as it appeared in English, Bancroft, then Archbishop of Canterbury, ordered some learned Divines, and particularly Morton, to answer it, and that Morton's answer is called, Catholica Appellatio pro Protestantibus. Now this doubtless is the book of Morton, which according to the Oxford Catalogue appeared in 1606, under this title, A Catholic Appeal for Protestants; and therefore I ought not to believe that this Catalogue mentions the first edition of the apology, in these words of page 107, The Protestants Apology for the Roman Church 1608. Now, as Sutcliffe's book, cited by Brereley, is an answer to a petition of the Presbyterians, and the Oxford Catalogue places the impression of this answer in the year 1592, with this title, An Answer to a Petition of the Consistorian faction, presented to her Majesty, it is evident, that Junius Brutus's book was attributed to Beza long before the Jesuits answered the Anti-Coton.

It does not appear that Brereley, who produces a prodigious number of Protestant authors upon all subjects, had read Junius Brutus; for he cites nothing out of it: and for that reason the Bishop of Luçon (c) did not cite it in the book he published against the Protestants, in the year 1618, wherein he objects to them some other writers tainted with Hubert Languet's maxims, whose passages he had found in Brereley, as Rivetus intimates, in answering the Jesuit Petra Sancta. A quo (libello Episcopi Lusitanensis) video non pauca te mutuatum fuisse, quemadmodum ille, aut potius sacerdos Anglicus qui tum ei fuit à manu ex laciniis Anglo-Papistarum (d). I have not seen this book of the Bishop of Luçon; but what makes me think that he has not mentioned Junius Brutus, is, that David Blondel (e) answering this prelate, says nothing to him concerning this disguised author. We may easily see now, why Petra Sancta (f) speaks not of this author neither; it is because he borrowed from the Bishop (as Rivetus taxes him with it) all his citations of Anti-Monarchical Protestant authors. Hence it appears, that the author of the large answer to Maimbourg's History of Calvinism is mistaken in saying, (g) That the Method ascribed to Cardinal Richelieu, and the Jesuit Sylvester à Sancta Petra, have furnished Mr Arnauld with the objection he makes to us about the royal authority, in his Apology for the Catholics: for first, it is not in the Method, which was not published till after Cardinal Richelieu's death, but in a book he published before his Cardinalship, that he objected such republican writings: In the second place, if Mr Arnauld had taken his arguments from these two sources, he would not have found there Hubert Languet's work, nor the Magdeburg writing, which make the strength of his attack.

XII.
The Magdeburg writing.

This piece of Magdeburg is intituled, de Jure Magistratum in subditos, & officio subditorum erga Magistratus. Brereley (b) speaks of it only in general, and upon the credit of Sutcliffe, who ascribes it to Beza. This book was published in 1550, under the name of the inhabitants of Magdeburg. I cannot tell whether it be the same with that of which Sleidan has given the abstract (i). I know it only by the French edition of 1578, in 12mo. It is intituled, du Droit des Magistrats, &c. Of the Right of Magistrates over their Subjects. A Treatise most necessary at this time, to admonish both Magistrates and Subjects of their duty: published by the Magdeburgers, in the year MDL: and now revised and enlarged with several reasonings and examples. There were several editions before this. Mr Arnauld (k) made use of a Latin translation, printed in the year 1576, apud Joannem Marefcballum Lugdunensem, in 8vo, and done from the French. The author of the Commentaries De statu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Gallie, makes mention of a book published in the year 1573, which is the same with this. He owns that the author's design was to make an apology for the Protestants, who were then engaged the fourth time in a civil-war against Charles IX (l). Thuanus expressly observes under the year 1574 (m), that there came out a new edition of a book which had been printed in Germany, at the time of the siege of Magdeburg, and that this new edition was enlarged with several examples and reasonings. John Beccaria, who anferred this book in the year 1596, represented it as a very new book: 'Quum superioribus diebus commentabamur aliquid de bello, liceret ne scilicet Christiano bellare, vel non, prodiit libellus quidam cui hic erat titulus, De jure Magistratuum in subditos, & officio subditorum erga Magistratus (n). - - - A few days ago, when I was writing something concerning war, namely on this question; whether it is lawful for a Christian to go to war: there came out a little book intituled, Of the Right of Magistrates over their Subjects, and the Duty of Subjects to their Magistrates.' This shews there was lately a new edition of it, and that he knew nothing of the preceding. Some suspect that John Beccaria is not the true name of this author (o). What is certain, is, that he was not a Catholic: he was perhaps a kind of a Socinian. He uses his adversary very ill, and treats him as a sanguinary soul, and an enemy to peace. 'Videri homi-nem esse verè sanguinarium, bello, armisque amicum, hostem capitalem paci, nomini regio infensissimum, versatum in literis humanis, præsertim historiis, atque si divinare licet leguleium, in divinis haud adeò multum: nihil prorsus habentem illius mansue-tudinis & clementiæ illius pacifici, & mitissimi agni Jesu Christi (qui quidem dixit:

 † Discite à me, quòd mitis sum, & humilis corde: non autem dixit, Discite à me contendere, & litigare, multò certè minus bellare) sed abundare spiritu contentionis, ambitionis, & superbiæ: nescire prorsus quid sit vera concordia, quid pax, quid hu-militas, quid patientia, quid sit injuriam pati: sed optimè scire quid sit injuriam in-ferre, vel illatam vindicare: ignorare etiam omnino quid sit proximus, illud bene scire, † Proximus sum egomet mihi: Christi crucem nec scire, nec scire curare: omnia humana ad trutinam, id est, ad suum arbitrium ponderare (p). - - - This author seems to be a sanguinary man, a friend to war and to arms, a mortal enemy to peace, an implacable biter of the name of King; he seems to be skilled in human learning, especially in History; and if I may be allowed to conjecture he is some petty-fogger, very little versed in Divinity, utterly void of the meekness and clemency of the mild and peaceable lamb Jesus Christ (who said, Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart; but did not say, Learn of me to be quarrelsome and litigious, much less learn of me to make war upon your neighbour) he seems to be full of the spirit of contention, ambition, and pride, to be an intire stranger to concord, peace, humility, patience, and the bearing of injuries; but to know perfectly well what it is to do an injury; or to revenge an injury received; to be utterly ignorant of charity, but to abound with self-love; he seems neither to know, nor care to know the cross of Christ; and in judging of all human affairs to be guided by nothing but his own fancy.' We must confess that Mr Arnauld had but little knowledge of this piece of Magdeburg.

A Civilian of Bavaria, named John Baptist Ficklerus, knew only the edition of 1576, which induced him to answer it in a book which was printed at Ingolstadt in 1578, with this title: De jure Magistratuum in subditos, & officio subditorum erga Magistratus:
 Contra Libellum cujusdam Calviniani, sub eadem inscriptione, sed relicto nomine Autoris, & loci Typographiæ, superiori anno editum; nunc autem veritatis studio reformatum, retento quidem illius stylo, sed plerisque argumentis ad rei veritatem applicatis. Tractatus brevis & perspicuus, bisce ambiguis temporibus Christiano homini lectu admodum utilis & necessarius.

XIII. Let me observe by the by, that it is dangerous to speak of books which we have not seen. Father Labbe, who had an almost infinite reading, and yet had not seen Brekeley's Protestants Apology, heard of it whilst his Dissertation upon Ecclestical Writers was in the press; he would add to it something that was told him, but in three lines he made two faults (q): The one is, that he calls the author Breleius, instead of Breleius; the other is, that he ascribes to him the preface in which the Pope, St Gregory, is justified, whereas it is the translator who has wrote it.

XIV. What I have said of Sutcliffe, shews, that the proof Voëtius has founded upon the silence of all the Episcopalians, is not better than that which he has grounded on the silence of all the Jesuits. Besides, I observe that among Beza's adversaries, who Voëtius says, would not have spared him, if they could have fastened Junius Brutus's work upon him, he reckons at least five, whose silence proves nothing. These he names (r);
 viz. Charpentier, Baudouin, Castalio, Eraustus, Morellus, Saravia, Montague, Tilenus, Ladus, and Dr Bramble. As for Charpentier, who spoke very ill of Beza, in the violent satire he wrote to Francis Portus, in the year 1572 (s), he could not speak of Junius Brutus's book, which did not appear till some years after (t). Baudouin and Castalio, who died, the former in the year 1573, the latter in 1563, were still less able to speak of him. Thomas Eraustus, it is true, wrote against Beza on the subject of Excommunication; but this was long before Junius Brutus's book appeared. Eraustus's answer is dated on the twenty-fourth of December 1569: Beza's name was not in the original (u); it was inserted by those who published it in the year 1589, after Era-ustus's death. These two antagonists had been very civil to one another at Basil after the dispute. As for Morellus I do not think, that after the national synod held at Nîmes in the year 1572, where his opinion was condemned, he entered the lists.
 This man had maintained, in the year 1562, that the right of Excommunication belonged not to the Consistories and Synods, but to the whole body of the Church.

VOL. V. No. CXL.

9 A

He

(n) Jo. Beccaria, Refutat. cujusd.
 Libelli, pag. 1.

(o) Voët. Disp.
 Tom. iv, pag.
 238.

† Matth. xi.

† Terentius.

(p) Beccaria,
 ibid. pag. 9.

(q) Tom. i, p.
 786.

(r) Voët. ibid.
 pag. 234.

(s) Concerning this Letter see the remark [A],
 of the article
 CHARPEN-TIER.

(t) I do not think Charpentier wrote anything after the impression of Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.

(u) See Beza's preface to the tract de Vera Excommunicatione.

He was excommunicated for this opinion; and the writing he published on that subject was burnt, and the reading of it was forbidden (w). He nevertheless persisted in his opinion, and in the year 1572, was one of the members of the cabal, which endeavoured to make such a change in the discipline of the churches, that thence forward the power of the keys should be administered by the whole body of the people (x). Ramus was one of the heads of this cabal (y). Beza, who assisted in the national synod of Nîmes in 1572, opposed this faction viva voce, and by writing, and made it vanish into nothing. However, it cannot be denied, but that before the year 1660, Junius Brutus's Treatise was often ascribed to Beza in printed books: nevertheless, he who published it that year at Amsterdam, knew nothing of it; for the only reason he gives why he would have the title lengthened out with these words, five, ut putatur, Theodoro Beza Autore, is, that he had seen a copy upon which a learned professor had writ, that Beza had composed this book. This overthrows Mr Placcius's conjecture (z), viz. That the English author he cites, was the cause of Beza's name appearing in the edition of 1660. I wonder he did not quote Milton, who speaks thus, in one of his books: 'Doctrina hæc nobis haud magis quam Gallis, quos tu hoc piaculo cupis eximere, debetur: unde enim Francogallia illa nisi ex Gallia? unde Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos? qui liber etiam Bezæ vulgo tribuitur (aa). - - - This doctrine is not derived from the English, more than it is from the French, whom you desire to vindicate from this crime. For whence comes Francogallia, but from France? Whence the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, a book which is also commonly ascribed to Beza?' For the rest, several persons believed, that Milton was the author of John Philips's Apology. Salmasius affirms it roundly (bb). Others say, that he either wrote it, or advised the publishing of it: 'Eandem culpam commissam fuisse in Responso Philippi Angli ad Apologiam Anonymi cujusdam, &c. aliquando Hartlibo scripti, cujus libri authorem esse Miltonium, falem ejus consilio publicatum, firmissime creditur (cc). - - - I formerly wrote to Hartlib, that the same error was committed in the Answer of John Philips, an Englishman, to the Apology of an Anonymous Writer, &c. a book, which it is firmly believed was written by Milton, or at least published by his advice.'

XV.
Some late authors have been ignorant who was Junius Brutus.

XVI.
The libels of some private persons disowned.

Since Voëtius's Dissertation, it has been easier to know what to depend upon, as to Junius Brutus; and yet Mr Colomiés, and the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, had but a superficial knowledge of this matter, the one in the year 1668, the other in 1686 (dd). Nay, Mr Arnauld, composing his apology for the Catholics in the year 1682, and taking from Junius Brutus's book all that he could find capable of rendering the Protestant doctrine suspected to sovereigns, never attempted to strengthen his proofs with considerations taken from the person of the author; which makes it evident, that he knew not who he was. I observe all these little things to shew that those Protestants, who have said these last years (ee), that Junius Brutus was an unknown man, without name, character, or authority, might speak in this manner without any fraud; tho' one of the libels I have mentioned at the beginning of this dissertation, would insinuate the contrary: I mean, that kind of sermon wherein we are censured, for a pretended proneness to libelling and civil-wars, with as great vehemence, as ever a minister expressed in a fast-day sermon, when he lays the breach of the whole Decalogue to the charge of his hearers.

And since occasion offers, it will not be improper to say, that this man's violent reproaches have had a good effect. They are not perhaps the cause that little sorry satirical books, do not come so thick among us as before [C]; but it is certain at least, that they have obliged the most excellent writers of the party (ff), to inform the public, that it was unjust to make the body of the Refugees answerable for these bad books. So that posterity will always have some cotemporary records, to clear them from the malicious imputations that may be cast upon them. Let it not be said, that these ex-

[C] Perhaps they are not the cause, that little sorry satirical books come not so thick among us as before. This perhaps, is not improper here; for it is very probable that two other things have lessened their numbers; 1. The indignation that all honest men expressed against them. 2. The readers beginning to be tired with them; which never fails to happen when the same ragoo is served up too often, and when amongst the multitude of those who pretend to cook it, many of them make it very flat and insipid. It is a maxim that authors ought carefully to study; viz. that the greediness of the public, ought never to be abused, that satiety is to be avoided even in subjects of admiration; and therefore we ought not to yield with too great complacency, to this compliment of the Italian academies, Di gratia, Signor, un'altra volta. -- Again, Sir, if you please. This compliment is doubtless a testimony of approbation, and it is generally used to a Musician, who has charmed more than ordinary; and then the company is not sorry to be taken at their word: but he who should abuse the courtesy so far as to exceed the rule of the Greeks, δὶς καὶ τρίς τὸ καλὸν, bis et ter quod pulchrum, --- a good thing may be twice or thrice repeated; and even what a Latin Poet (6) has said, that there are some poems which please, tho' ten times repeated, decies repetita placebit, would deserve to be referred to the old proverb, twice seldem cabbage is death, δὶς κράμβη θάνατος, crambis bis posita mors. It is not fit the public should be exposed to the miserable condition of those teachers of Rhetoric heretofore, who were forced to hear the declamations of a whole class variously turned, concerning the overthrow of tyrants.

Declamare doces, ô ferrea pectora Vetti!
Cum perimit favos classis numerosa Tyrannos.
Nam quæcumque sedens modò legerat, hæc eadem stans
Perferet, atque eadem cantabit versibus iisdem.
Occidit miseris crambæ repetita Magi-stros (7).
But

cellent writers, who disowned those libels, have done it without naming themselves; for having answered for their brethren in general, whilst none has excepted against their declaration, it is a proof that the whole body acquiesces in it. Add to this, that the name of him, who writes every fortnight on the affairs of the present time, in so polite and judicious a manner, is known to every body. And as for the author of the inimitable History of the Works of the Learned, is any body ignorant of his name? A name, that has so long been famous both at the bar and in the church, both viva voce, and in writing; a name, which two brothers render more illustrious every day; the one (gg) by his eloquent sermons, and learned answers to the Bishop of Meaux; the other (bb) by the incomparable journal I have mentioned. To say nothing of a cousin (ii) who has relieved Casaubon in the attack of Baronius's Annals. As to the defence of the Refugees against the Important Advice, the author of it is no doubt very worthy of credit (kk) when he affirms any thing in the name of his brethren. He fully answers the reproaches that concern the satirical spirit, and sets forth his opinion on the other point, with a great dexterity of wit. All things well considered, it must be owned that tho' a disavowal which had preceded the severe reproaches of the adversary, and had been made by persons appointed for this purpose by the Synod, would have been much more honourable and more authentic; yet none but extravagant cavillers, can henceforth renew these accusations. But to return to my subject.

(gg) Mr. Bagnage, Minister of Rotterdam.

(bb) Mr. Bagnage de Beauval, a Civilian.

(ii) Mr. Bagnage de Flotteville, Minister at Zutphen.

(kk) It was a Minister called Coulan, who died in England two or three years ago. I write this in 1696.

XVII.
The Funeral Oration of Goulart leaves
some doubt.

Voëtius did not so far trust to Simon Goulart's testimony, as to think it strange, that any person should still be a Sceptic, with respect to Junius Brutus; and for my part, I confess, that I still perceive in it some difficulties and intricacies, tho' I seemed so strongly to declare for Hubert Languet, who is the person to whom Mr de la Mare adjudges the book. He does it in a work not yet printed [D], and I do not know whether the thing be there particularized, as in the oration of the Geneva Professor, or otherwise; nor what proofs are given. If it could be proved that Junius Brutus's book was published before Languet's death, farewell Goulart's deposition. This will perhaps excite some person, well furnished with books and time, to seek for some light upon this subject; and I hope Mr Baillet will exhaust the matter in the great work the public expects from him, concerning authors who have disguised their names.

XVIII.
A fault in the continuation of the Menagiana.

There is in the Continuation of the Menagiana an error which I ought not to pass by. Languet's letters have a great many good things in them. Mr Languet was Counsellor in the parliament, and a man of great merit. It is he who was the author of that admirable work intitled, Vindiciæ Regiæ contra Tyrannos. He wrote this book in defence of Henry the fourth's right. As the declaring himself the author, would have endangered his life, he took for good measures with his Printer, and the secret

was

*But oh, what stock of patience wants the fool,
Who wastes his time and breath in teaching school!
To hear the speeches of declaiming boys,
Disposing tyrants with eternal noise!
Sitting or standing, still confin'd to roar,
In the same verse the same rules o'er and o'er.*

DAYDEN.

The condition of schoolmasters is not better at present. They dictate an exercise to a whole class, to have it turned several ways by their scholars; literally by some, paraphrased by others; in verse or in Greek by a third sort, and in two sorts of Latin prose by a fourth. It is still the same exercise, still the same thing under different words. The public not being paid for this, has no reason to suffer it. Now it is certain our ears have so often tingled with the same things, and the number ten hath been left so far behind, that we need not wonder that these showers fall not so thick as formerly. Every body set up for the same trade (8); it is no wonder therefore that it proved good for nothing.

[D] Mr de la Mare adjudges the book to Hubert Languet. He does it in a work not yet printed. I spoke thus in the year 1696; but now I must say that it has been printed at Hall in Saxony, in the year 1700. I have not found in it what I expected, but am left in all the uncertainty I was in before. Mr de la Mare says (9), that the year 1580 abounded with Political Writings, since besides the treatise of Voluntary Slavery, composed by la Boëtie, and the Francogallia of Hotman, there came out Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, written by Hubert Languet. This is most certain, says he, I have a great many proofs for it, and had I only this I am going to mention it would be sufficient. Ad Vindicias redeo, quas est nonnulli tribuere videantur Francisco Hotomano, certissimum tamen est illarum auctorem esse Languetum, cujus rei quamvis alia me deferrent argumenta, sunt autem quam plurima, unum instar omnium hoc erit, quod modo sum prompturus Antonii Vioni Heroualli fide (10). This great proof, the only one that Mr de la Mare has been pleased to communicate to the public, consists in this, that he had heard Mr Vion d'Herouval say, that Henry III, understanding that Simon Goulart knew who was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, immediately sent for him, and asked his name; that Goulart only answered, that his oath obliged him to conceal it during the author's life; that the King in vain added threatenings to entreaties; and that nothing was capable of shaking Goulart's resolution, who by a rare instance of fidelity and friendship, persisted to conceal, during Languet's life, the secret which had been trusted to him alone. Cui (Henrico III) cum Gularius prefractè respondisset, non nisi post auctoris obitum nomen illius revelare sibi licitum esse, quod solemnè sacramento observaturum se promiserat, Rexque precibus minas adderet, persistit tamen in proposito Gularium, neque precibus neque minis adduci unquam potuisse, ut priusquam fato functus fuisset Languetus, quod sibi soli commiserat arcanum proderet, raro constantis fidei & amicitiae exemplum (11). Now here is a proof which can be of no use to us: for though Mr Vion d'Herouval should have better known the circumstances of the fact, he would have taught us only what we knew before. It is plain that he had mediately or immediately, from the Funeral Oration of Simon Goulart, the particulars he related to Mr de la Mare. He could not therefore be a new evidence. Now either for want of memory, or because others had misinformed him of Theodorus Tronchin's account, he related it very ill, since it is false that Henry III sent for Goulart, entreated and threatened him, and that Goulart answered, his oath engaged him to be silent, and that the secret was committed only to him. I wonder Mr de la Mare believed that a Minister answered Henry III, in that manner, with impunity. I say nothing of the false dates he gives of Stephen de la Boëtie's, and Francis Hotman's books.

(10) Ibid. pag. 124.

(11) Ibid. pag. 125.

[E] An

(8) Espectes eadem à summo minimoque poetæ. Juven. Sat. I, vers. 14.

(9) Vita Huberti Langueti, pag. 123.

was so well kept, by the mutual interest they had in it, that it was not known to be his book till long after his death; and the Printer, who after the peace declared he had printed it, discovered also to Henry IV how the matter was ordered. 1. This expression, Counsellor in the parliament, ought to signify here that Hubert Languet had that place in the parliament of Paris. But it is certain he had it not in any parliament of France. 2. His book had not the title of Vindiciæ Regiæ, nor ought to have it. 3. Mr Menage would never have called it admirable, if he had known what subject it treats, and upon what principles it goes. 4. Nothing could be more pernicious to Henry IV, than Languet's book, since it authorized the French to depose Henry III, and to place the crown on the head of the Duke of Guise. 5. Lastly, all the rest of the account, the secret of the Printer, and the discovery of the mystery after the peace, are quite contrary to truth, and all probability. I do not deny that in some sense Mr Menage might have thought that this work of Languet is an admirable piece: he might have found in it learning and art, a great order and method, and the best and most solid arguments that can be offered for the rights of the people, which is a very problematical point. It has several fair sides (ll), and may be maintained with so many plausible reasons, that it must not be thought strange, that not only factious, turbulent, and restless men should have espoused it, but also several persons of great judgment and of an exemplary virtue. I may reckon among the latter Stephen de la Boétie, who wrote the discourse intituled, de la Servitude volontaire, or du CONTRE-UN. There never was a better citizen, nor a greater enemy to commotions than he, and he would have much rather employed his skill and learning in order to suppress them than to raise them (mm). What cannot be justified is, that frequently the same persons who write for the rights of the people, would write for arbitrary power, if affairs should change; that is, if a despotic power came to be exercised in their favour, and to the great prejudice of a party which they hate. When the Catholics of France, in the XVIth century, saw the wars of religion arise, they wrote very much for the right of Kings; but when they saw the right of succession devolved on a Protestant Prince, they changed their principles (nn), and wrote very much for the right of the people. We have seen this ridiculous caprice in the article of Claudius de SAINTES. I question whether, after the death of Henry III, Arnaud Sorbin would have written what he published in the year 1576 (oo). Would Peter Charpentier have written against the civil-wars in the year 1590, what he wrote a little after the death of Charles IX? He received a smart answer intituled, Petri Fabri Responsio ad Petri Carpentarii famelici Rabule sacrum de retinendis armis & pace repudianda Consilium ad V. C. Lomanium Terridæ, & Seriniaci Baronem. - - - Peter Faber's answer to the advice of Peter Charpentier, a hungry pettifogger, concerning the continuance of the war, and the rejecting of a peace: dedicated to Mr de Lomanie, Baron of Terride and of Seriniac. It was printed at Neustad in the year 1575, and published in French the year following with this title, Traité duquel on peut apprendre en quel cas il est permis à l'homme Chrétien de porter les armes, & par lequel est répondu à Pierre Charpentier, tendant à fin d'empêcher la paix, & nous laisser la guerre: par Pierre Fabre, à Monsieur de Lomanie, Baron de Terride & de Seriniac. - - - A treatise wherein we may learn in what case it is lawful for a Christian to bear arms; and in which Peter Charpentier is answered, tending to hinder a peace and continue the war: by Peter Faber, dedicated to Mr de Lomanie, Baron of Terride and of Seriniac. It was necessary I should set down this French title; for the readers had never believed, by the Latin title, that Charpentier exhorted the people to lay down their arms, and only proposed to them an evangelical submission (pp). In all parties there are some indiscreet persons who publish books, which are afterwards upbraided to the whole body. An Englishman, named William Allen, under Cromwell's usurpation, published a book intituled, Killing no murder. A Canon of Ancis immediately imputed this doctrine to the Protestants, in a work that was answered by the late Mr Turretin. Was not this reproach ridiculous? Can the wisest and the best regulated communions restrain the unruly pen of every private member? Guy Patin spoke judiciously of this English book, but he was ill-informed of the circumstances. They have printed in Holland, says he (qq), a little book intituled, A Political Treatise, &c. that the killing of a tyrant is no murder. It is said to be translated from the English, but that book was first written in French by a gentleman of Nevers, called Mr de Marigni, who is a great wit. This doctrine is very dangerous, and it were better to be silent about it. I do not love that there should be so many books de venenis (concerning poisons) for the same reason: I have always the public good in view, and I do not love those who do any thing that may be prejudicial to it. It is not true that the English piece was written by Marigni: an Englishman is the author of it, and Marigni was not capable of writing so grave and so serious a book.

XIX.
Another book published under the false name of Junius Brutus.

For the rest, Languet is not the only person who disguised himself under the name of Junius Brutus. The famous Socinian Crellius did it also in a book concerning liberty of conscience. The catalogue of the Bodleian library mentions it in this manner: Junius Brutus Polonus; Vindiciæ pro Religionis libertate, and refers us to Val. Magnus. But if you consult the article of Father Valerian Magni, you will find nothing relating to this Junius Brutus Polonus, except that there is mention made of a book printed like his his at Eleutheropolis (rr); and there also the catalogue refers us to Pet. Haberkornius, though Dr Hyde has not put under that name any thing relating to Father Valerian, or Junius Brutus Polonus. We are referred still from the article Petrus Haberkornius, to that of Feurbornius, where we find nothing that has any affinity with the other articles. I am not ignorant of the relation that is between the Capuchin Valerian Magni, and the Professor Haberkorn; they disputed against each other viva voce, and Haberkorn has published, amongst other books, an Anti-Valerian [E], which Mr Baillet has not forgotten in his curious collection of Anti's (ss). But since Dr Hyde mentions nothing of this, methinks his references are to no purpose, and that it is a little want of exactness, in one of the most exact works that have been made in that kind.

I shall conclude this Dissertation with a passage of the preface to the Sorberiana. I have not been able to know what is become of his (tt) little treatise de Pace & Concordia inter Christianos concilianda, nor of the translation he made of a book printed in the year 1637, and intitled Junii Bruti Poloni Vindiciæ pro Religionis libertate, which was not written, as some have thought by the learned Hubert Languet, tho' he formerly disguised himself under that name in his Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, and which ought to be looked upon as a continuation of the treatise de Libertate Ecclesiastica, printed in the year 1607, which was doubtless written by Casaubon, who, besides, speaks of it plainly enough in his 539th letter of the Hague edition, though he had spoken of it in ambiguous words in two or three other foregoing letters.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary I have learned a particular which I thought very curious (uu). It is in an English book which was printed at London in the year 1649, as an apology for a book which the Ministers of that great city had lately published, and as an answer to the invectives dispersed in a book of John Price. The book in which this particular is to be found, is intitled, A modest and clear vindication of the serious representation, and late vindication of the Ministers of London, from the scandalous aspersions of John Price, in a pamphlet of his intitled, Clerico Clauicium, or The Clergies Alarum to a third war. John Price had made this reproach to the Ministers that several of them had published books which tended only to raise rebellions, and he had put Beza in the fourth rank, as being the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos. You are much in the wrong, says the answer, to follow in this the Popish writer of a book intitled, Imago utriusque Ecclesiæ, Hierosolymæ & Babylonis, per P. D. M. This writer, who is thought to be Tobias Matthews, said in the 105th page, that Junius Brutus's book was written by Beza: can you do justice to so orthodox a Divine as Beza, when you take up the calumnies of the Papists against so zealous a Protestant? Does not the same author, who accuses him of writing the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, accuse him also of having usurped the parish and wife of another man? The first accusation is as false as the last. It is easy to prove that he is not the author of that book: would so wise and so learned a man have affirmed, in one book, the contrary of what he had taught in another? In all his writings he labours to shew that we ought to be obedient to magistrates; he says nothing of the deposing or murdering of Kings, which is the only end of Junius Brutus's book. A great many passages, directly opposite to Brutus's principles, might be drawn from the works of Beza: here is one or two. Private persons, says he †, who are the subjects of a tyrant, have no remedy allowed them, besides amendment of life, prayers, and tears. He will indeed have them to disobey the orders of a Prince when they are contrary to the law of God, but not to take up arms against him. Aliud esse non parere quam resistere, vel ad arma se comparare quæ à Domino non acceperis ‡. - - There is a difference between disobeying and resisting, or recurring to arms, which God has not put in our hands. He wrote a book de Hereticis à Magistratu puniendis; but he never said one word de Magistratibus ab Hereticis puniendis. This work of Junius Brutus, continue they, which good authors, as you say, ascribe to Beza, was, in truth, written by a Jesuit. We know from good hands that the Jesuit Parsons was the author of it; some persons still living can witness, that one Rench, a Bookseller, was condemned to be hanged for printing this book with another that the same author wrote under the name of Doleman. There is a parliament-man, now sitting in the House of Commons, who has caused Junius Brutus's work to be translated into English by the same Walker who has written the monthly Mercuries. This translation has been published; but lest it should be known that it is the

VOL. V.

9 B

Jesuit

(rs) Baillet, Anti, num. xxxix.

[E] An Anti-Valerian.] Mr Baillet (12), says that the Anti-Valerian was written against a book of Controversy of Father Valerian Magni, printed at Vienna in Austria in 1641, with the title of Judicium de A. catholicorum & Catholicorum Regula credendi. This is true; but I observe that this Capuchin's work is composed of two treatises which are not twins. That which concerns the rule of faith of the Non-Catholics, is some years older than the other. It was published at Prague, in the year 1628. Several Protestants answered it. John Major, in the year 1630. James Martini, and John Botfac in 1631, Conrad Bergius in 1639. A Socinian attacked it in the year 1633, without naming himself: this was Joachim Stegman, whom I have mentioned above (13). He did more injury to the cause than good. This Capuchin's book was re-printed at Vienna in the year 1641, with the author's replies to those five antagonists, and with the Treatise intitled, Catholicorum Regula Credendi.

(rr) The Bibliotheca Antiquariarum, num. 151, pag. 117, that Cellus wrote a book under the name of Junius Brutus, informs us, pag. 133, that this other book was written by Joachim Stegman, with this title, Brevi Disquisitione quomodo vulgo dicti Evangelici Pontifices ac nominatim Valeriani Magni de A. catholicorum credendi regula Judicium, solidè atque evidenter reatue quantæ Eleutheropoli apud Godfridum Philalecium 1633, in 12mo.

(s) Num. xxxix.

(t) That is, Sorbier.

(uu) Mr Hill, Minister of the English Church of Rotterdam, was pleased to acquaint me with it, and to lend me the book.

† Nullum aliud remedium proponitur privatis hominibus tyranno subiectis præter vite emendationem, preces & lachrymas. Beza, in Confessione Fidei Christianæ, cap. 4, circa finem.

‡ Ibid.

(13) Citation (rr).

A DISSERTATION, &c.

Jesuit Parsons's book, Junius Brutus's name has been left out, and another title put to it.

This is the substance of the Latin extracts I caused to be made out of this English book. It is a curious thing, in my opinion, that Robert Parsons the Jesuit should pass in England for the author of Stephen Junius Brutus's Vindicie contra Tyrannos: but I do not believe that this work ought to be ascribed to him (xx). I can hardly think it possible that an English Jesuit should write at that time upon such a question, without saying any thing relating to England, and nothing but what bespeaks him a good French Protestant.

(xx) Mr. Hill told me, that Christopher Love, M.A. of London, who was libelled during Cromwell's usurpation, maintained, in a book, that Parsons is the pretended Junius Brutus.

A DISSER-

A DISSERTATION

CONCERNING

DEFAMATORY LIBELS,

On occasion of a passage of Tacitus, which I have recited in the article CASSIUS SEVERUS (a), and which informs us that Augustus was the first who proceeded against those libels by the law de Majestate. <sup>(a) Citation (9).</sup>

I.
An innovation under the empire of Augustus, with regard to libels.

I Would fain know what reasons the Emperor Augustus went upon, to involve Defamatory Libels, under the crimes of high-treason; for as Tacitus observes, before this, treacheries, which had weakened the armies, seditions which had weakened the people, and lastly, an ill administration of offices which had weakened the majesty of the Republic, were only comprehended under this kind of crimes: and actions indeed were punished, but not words. ‘Legem majestatis rederat; cui nomen apud veteres idem, sed alia in judicium veniebant: si quis prodtione exercitum, aut plebem seditionibus, denique male gesta Rep. majestatem populi Romani minuisse. Facta arguebantur, dicta impunè erant. Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis specie legis ejus tractavit, commotus Cassii Severi libidi-ne, qua viros feminasque illustres procacibus scriptis diffamaverat (b). - - - Augustus had revived the law concerning violated majesty; a law, which in the days of our ancestors, had indeed the same name, but implied different arraignments, and crimes; namely those against the state, as when an army was betrayed abroad, when seditions were raised at home; in short, when the public was faithlessly administered, and the majesty of the Roman people was debased: these were actions, and actions were punished, but words were free. Augustus was the first, who brought libels under the penalties of this wrested law, being provoked by the insolence of Cassius Severus, who had in his writings wantonly defamed men and ladies of illustrious quality. For which reason another Historian observes, that it was a novelty to see a lady of the family of the Claudii accused before the people, as guilty of high-treason, for having said in the hearing of a prodigious multitude, that stoop her coach, would to God my brother would return into the world, and lose another fleet, that there might be fewer people at Rome (c). The Commentators observe here a two-fold novelty; one in the sex of the accused, the other in entitling a simple wish, a treason. I do not see that even at present, it is a point of law, well established, and constantly practised, that slanders upon the Prince’s person, even in writing, should be deemed state-crimes, or high-treason (d). So that Augustus, did a thing, so much the more singular, because he principally established that law against satires, which did not concern his person. I have before related Tacitus’s words, which shew that Cassius Severus’s libels against persons of quality of both sexes, obliged this Emperor to make this new law. I do not find that this Cassius was accused of libelling Augustus, and I find in Suetonius, that this Emperor did not punish satirical discourses nor writings that concerned him. ‘Nec quidquam ultra aut statim aut postea inquisivit. Tiberio quoque de eadem re sedulo violentius apud se per epistolam conquerenti ita rescripsit, etati tue, mi Tiberi, noli in hoc re indulgere, & nimium indignari quemquam esse qui de me male loquatur, satis est enim si hoc habemus, ne quis nobis male facere possit (e). . . . Etiam sparsos de se in curia famosis libellos, nec expavit, nec magnâ curâ redarguit, ac ne requisitis quidem autoribus, id modo censuit cognoscendum posthac de iis qui libellos aut carmina ad infa-miam cujuscumque sub alieno nomine ederent (f). - - - Nor did Augustus make any further inquiry after these libels, either as soon as they came out or afterwards. Tiberius having written a letter to him, wherein he very earnestly and warmly complained of that affair, he wrote back thus. My dear Tiberius, do not indulge the warmth of your youth in that matter, nor be too much provoked, that there is any body who speaks ill of me;

(b) Tacit. An-
nal. lib. i, cap.
lxviii.

(c) Novo more judicium majo-ritas apud populum mulier fa-bit, quod in conferat multi-tudine agere procedente carpento palam optaverit ut frater suus pulcher revivifceret, atque ite-rum classem ammitteret quo minor turba Romæ foret. Sueton.
in Tiber. cap. ii.

(d) Aubert,
History of Cardinal de Richelieu,
lib. iv, p.
m. 405, quotes an arrest of the Parliament of Paris, of the 27th of April 1620, which condemned to the galleys a man convicted of high-treason for having had a hand in a libel against the state.

(e) Sueton. in
Aug. cap. li.

(f) Ibid. esp.
10.

me; for it is sufficient if we have this satisfaction, that no body can do us harm
 'And when some libels which defamed him, were dispersed in the court, he was neither much concerned, nor did he take much care to suppress them; and, without inquiring after the authors of them, he only ordered that, for the future, they who published under the name of another man, poems, or libels which defamed any person, ought to be prosecuted.'

II.
 Three Historians give an imperfect account of it, especially Suetonius.

But who will not be surprized at this, that tho' three different authors have spoken one after another, of this law of Augustus, yet we do not find the circumstances of it exactly explained and confirmed, by the mutual assistance of the three witnesses? Tacitus barely tells us that the crime of writing Defamatory Libels, was brought under the law de Majestate. Suetonius who came after Tacitus, makes no mention of this law de Majestate; he only says Augustus ordered, that for the future, those, who published such Libels under another name, should be prosecuted. Dion, who comes after Suetonius, likewise makes no mention of the law de Majestate, and only says, 1. That Augustus, two years before he died, ordered informations to be made against Defamatory Libels, and that the Ædiles of Rome, and the Governors of other places, should burn all the writings of this kind that they should discover. 2. That he punished some Libellers. Of those three Historians, Suetonius has the least cleared up this matter, since his words would allow us to think, that provided a man wrote Libels under no name, or under his own (g), he might safely defame all the court and the city. Why then was Cassius Severus banished? Why were Labienus's writings burnt? Can any one believe it was because these two authors had published their books under the names of others? What a foolish conceit would this be!

III.
 Vain attempts to justify Suetonius.

Torrentius would save Suetonius's honour by substituting, without the authority of any manuscript, these words suo alienove nomine, - - under his own name, or that of another man, for these sub alieno nomine, - - - under the name of another man. But I observe that this correction has been rejected with the utmost contempt; so far that Suetonius's Commentator in usum Delphini, thought it did not make a new sense, so little had he examined it. Others by sub alieno nomine, &c. - - - under the name of another man, &c. will have the satires to be understood, in which the names of the persons satirized, did not appear. But this explanation is only looked upon as a last shift: after all, notwithstanding these expedients, might not the most abusive satires have been published with impunity, according to Suetonius; provided they had been anonymous, or had not abused a man under a false name, but under his true name? And would not this be a shameful reproach to the Emperor's council? Lastly, some say, that whereas the laws of the twelve tables had sufficiently prohibited the making satires in one's own name, Augustus thought himself only obliged to condemn those which were published under the name of another person. But 1. We do not see that the laws of the twelve tables concern anonymous satires more or less, than those that appeared under a man's true name or false one. 2. It had been very needless to forbid only those that should come out with the names of the authors: and what probability is there, that the ancient laws of Rome should have left so large a gap, for any one who had a mind to evade them? 3. Is it usual in making any addition to a law not to renew and confirm the ancient orders? 4. Can it be conceived that if the ancient Roman laws had not punished the most punishable satires, that is, the nameless ones, whose blows fall thickest and heaviest, Augustus, when he was supplying what was wanting in them, should have forgot the most necessary remedy, viz. the punishment of anonymous libels? It is far more probable, that it was he, who caused the law or the decree of the senate to be made, the words whereof, Ulpian has preserved to us; 'Si quis librum ad infamiam alicujus pertinentem scripsit, composuit, edidit, dolove malo fecit quo quid eorum fieret, etiam si alterius nomine ediderit, vel sine nomine; uti de ea re agere liceat: & si condemnatus sit, qui id fecit, intestabilis ex lege esse jubetur (b). - - If any person should write, compose, or publish a book tending to defame another man, or is unlawfully concerned in the writing or publishing of such a book, notwithstanding he should publish it in the name of another person, or without any name; let him be prosecuted: and if the author of that book be found guilty, by virtue of this law, he shall be incapable of making any last will or testament.'

I confess the modern Historians are too prolix, and that some of them write more volumes upon the age they live in, than Livy wrote upon all the ages of conquering Rome, from the time of it's foundation, to the empire of Cæsar. But on the other hand the Antients are too short, and it is better for our instruction, that a History should contain too many particulars, than omit too many.

IV.
 Whether libels were comprehended under the crimes of high-treason, because they are an usurpation of the supreme authority.

Perhaps some will think that Augustus needed no very refined reasoning to shew, that Libellers deserved to be prosecuted as guilty of high-treason, since it is evident that a subject who defames his neighbour, usurps one of the rights of sovereignty, and that it belongs solely to the sovereign to inflict the pain of infamy, as well as that of banishment, imprisonment, death, &c. But this would be a very false way of reasoning, and at once convert into high-treason, the violation of all the laws, adultery, theft, seducing a virgin, &c. for it may be said that a robber not only despises the laws of his sovereign, but also usurps a right that belongs solely to him: none but a sovereign can take away a private man's possessions, either in whole or in part. The right of fining, confiscating, &c. must flow from the supreme power, as well as that of branding any one with infamy;

infamy; and consequently we cannot say, that a satirist, who defames his neighbour, is guilty of high-treason, without concluding that a robber, and a fornicator, are so too. This would hold so much the truer with respect to fornicators, because if they debauch a married woman, they hazard the defrauding the true heirs, by the intrusion of an illegitimate coheir, and at the same time, they bring a great dishonour upon the head of the husband: if they debauch a maid, they cast upon her an ignominious blemish, which reflects upon her family, and they cause her father a real damage and a pecuniary loss, like that which consists in the waste of merchandises. For indeed a deflowered maid, is like palled wine, which sinks in its price; it is a commodity which the proprietor has still upon his hands, unless he will put it off at a great loss; I mean by undermatching his daughter, or giving her an exorbitant portion. We cannot therefore this way justify the new law of Augustus: the shortest way is probably to confess that it was not regular. I do not know but by a forced construction, it was derived from a maxim or definition, that is found in Cicero, which makes it a diminution of the majesty of the Roman people, to take any thing from the dignity, grandeur, or power of that people, or from those to whom they communicated any power. Majestatem minuire est de dignitate, aut amplitudine, aut potestate populi, aut eorum quibus populus potestatem dedit aliquid derogare (i). I only believe, that by the law de Majestate, must be meant something more, than Auberi means in the place I have cited, where he says, that Augustus did but renew the prosecution for a capital crime, which the laws of the twelve tables had enacted against the authors of Defamatory Libels. I shall observe by the way, that Mr Naudé has mistaken the twelve tables for a decree of the senate. Nay, he affords a proof of his error, for what he cites from Arnobius, manifestly proves the justice of my censure. If the parliament, says he (k), had had leisure to cast their eyes upon all these Defamatory Libels, I dare say they would have bindred the sale of a great part of them, had it been only to imitate the virtue of that antient Roman senate, of which Arnobius said, if my memory does not fail me: 'Carmen malum conscribere, quo fama alterius co- inquinetur, & vita, decemviralibus scitis evadere noluitis impunitum. - - By the laws of the Decemviri (or of the twelve tables), you did not suffer the man to pass unpunished, who wrote any malicious poem, to defame the character and life of another person.'

Tiberius continued this innovation of Augustus, especially on account of some slander- ing writers, who attacked his person, and touched the most tender fores of his family. 'Mox Tiberius consultante Pompeio Macro Prætor, an judicia Majestatis redderentur, exercendas leges esse respondit. Hunc quoque asperavere carmina incertis auctoribus vulgata in sævitiam superbiamque ejus, & discordem cum matre animum (l). - - Tiberius afterwards, when Pompeius Macer the Prætor consulted him, whether process should be granted upon this law? answered, that the laws must be executed. He also was exasperated by satirical verses, written by unknown authors, and dispersed, exposing his cruelty, his pride, and his mind naturally alienated from his mother.' He afterwards extended this law to every body (m): poor Cremutius Cordus in vain pleaded (n), that he had written nothing offensive, either against Tiberius, or the Emperess, who were those, said he, whom the law de Majestate comprehended; this was not sufficient to clear him from his pretended crime of having praised Brutus and Cassius. 'Verba mea, Patres Conscripti, arguuntur, adeo factorum innocens sum. Sed neque hæc in principem aut principis parentem, quos lex majestatis amplectitur (o). - - As to facts, I am so guiltless, conscript fathers, that my words only are accused: but neither are any words of mine pointed against the Emperor, or his mother, who are the only persons comprehend- ed in the law concerning violated majesty.' Note, That Tacitus seems to have forgotten what he had said in the seventy-second chapter of the first book: for as he makes Cre- mutius Cordus speak, one would think that only libels against the Emperor, and the Emperess were comprehended under the law de Majestate: But there is not any shadow of that restriction in the seventy-second chapter.

V.
Nero bore libels somewhat patiently.

But I must not forget to say, that this law de Majestate, was not always fatal. Nero, cruel as he was, not only did not annul the decree of the senate, which condemned the Prætor Antistius only to banishment, and the confiscation of his estate, for having published some satires against the Emperor (p); but he declared to the senate, that he permitted them fully to absolve Antistius. Se qui severitatem decernentium impediturus fuerit, moderationem non prohibere. Statuerent ut vellent, datam etiam absolvendi licentiam (q). The senate stood to their first resolution. Almost at the same time Fabricius Veiento, author of several libels against the senators, and the clergy of Rome (r), having been tried by Nero himself, was only banished Italy. His books were condemned to be burnt: they were afterwards bought up and read with the greatest eagerness, whilst there was danger in doing it; but when it was permitted to have them, they were no longer minded. Convictum Veientonem Italia depulit & libros exuri jussit, conquisitos lectissimosque donec cum periculo parabantur, mox licentia habendi oblivionem attulit (s). Suetonius observes, as a very singular thing, that Nero was so passive, as to detraction, that he shewed no greater mildness to any, than to such as exercised their satirical wit upon him. Some galling verses upon him were handed about and posted up; but he was not concerned at it, he made no search after the authors; and some of them having been prosecuted before the senate, he prevented their being rigorously punished for it. Mirum & vel

(i) Cicero, lib. ii, de Invent. I say nothing of a passage of Cicero, Epist. XI, lib. iii, ad famili. wherein he says, as some will have it, that Sylla made it high-treason to defame any person; est majestas (& sic Sylla voluit) ne in quemvis impure declamari liceret; I say, I do not speak of it, because I do not think it is well corrected. Besides, I should prefer Lambinus's explanation to that of Manutius, though I am of opinion that they are both faulty.

(k) Naudé, Dialogues de Mæcenas, pag. 18.

(l) Tacit. Annal. lib. i, cap. lxxii.

(m) See Suetonius, in Tiber. cap. lxxiii.

(n) Apud Tacitum, Annal. lib. i, cap. xxxiv.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Probræ ad- versus principem carmina facta- vit, vulgavitque celebri convivio. . . . Exin . . . majestatis delatus est. Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xlviii.

(q) Tacit. ibid. cap. xl.

(r) Quod multa & probræ in Patres & Sacerdotes composuisset, iis libris quibus nomen codicillorum dode- rat. Ibid. cap. l.

(s) Ibid.

Et vel præcipue notabile inter hæc fuit, nihil eum patientius quam maledicta & convicia hominum tulisse, neque in ullos leniorem, quam qui se diis aut carminibus laceffissent, exitisse. . . . Vel contemptu omnis infamiae, vel ne fatendo dolorem irritaret ingenia (t). All the punishment he ordered for the galling raillery of a Cynic, who had insulted him in the open street, and for his being ridiculed on the stage, was the banishing the Philosopher and Comedian out of Italy. Suetonius could not tell whether there was more indolence than policy in it: For Nero, by shewing his repentment would have had reason to fear he should encourage the detractors; and every one knows Tacitus's sentence in the thirty-fourth chapter of the fourth book of his Annals, on occasion of a doubt like that of Suetonius: an injury, says he, that is despised, falls of itself: if you are disturbed at it, you propagate and strengthen it. 'Carmina Bibaculi & Catulli referta contumeliis Cæsarum leguntur: sed ipse divus Julius, ipse divus Augustus, & tulere ista & reliquere, haud facile dixerim, moderatione magis an sapientiâ: namque sprete exolefcunt: si irascere, adgnita videntur. - - - The poems of Bibaculus and those of Catullus, stuffed with virulent satires against the Cæsars, are still read. But even the deified Julius, even the deified Augustus, bore all these invectives and disdained them, whether with greater moderation or wisdom, I cannot easily say. For, if they are despised, they fade away, if you wroth, you seem to avow them to be just.'

VI. It is very necessary to restrain the licentiousness of libels. The ancient Heathens restrained it.

This is well enough, if the question is only about pardoning the slanders, in which a sovereign is personally concerned; but his subjects ought not to be left exposed to this outrage. Domitian would deserve to be highly extolled, had he only punished those who had slandered the persons of the best quality in Rome, in which he did not use too much rigour (u). It seems therefore that the excessive severity of Augustus against defamatory libels, if separated from the abuse his successors often made of that law, consisted only in the expression and in the pompous word de Majestate, and so his conduct is not in reality blamable: for this licentiousness of libels, is one of those that ought to be restrained in a government. The honour, glory, and reputation of families, things a thousand times more precious than gold or silver, would be very precarious, unless the insolence, and malignity of satirical writers were repressed. Indeed they would begin with persons of an ill life; but after such a beginning they would spread like the plague, indiscriminately upon places both sacred and profane, upon chaste as well as prostitute families. Antiquity would have had a full experience of this, had it not been at last prevented by good laws, and by submitting libellers to the secular power, when jests were carried too far, and when those who were not yet bitten by these mad dogs, considered that their turn would also come, and that therefore they ought to concur with those who had been already wounded, to put a stop to such a disorder. It is in this case as when a house is on fire; the neighbours labour as much to extinguish it, as they whose house is actually in flames (w). Let us see how Horace relates the affair.

Fescennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fudit,
Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos
Lusit amabiliter, donec jam sævus apertam
In rabiem cœpit verti jocus, & per honestas Ire minax impune domos. Dolere cruento
Dente laceffiti, fuit intactis quoque cura Conditione super communi: quin etiam lex
Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam Describi. Vertère modum formidine fustis
Ad benedicendum delectandumque redacti (*).

Hence grew the liberty of the looser Muse,
Hence they grew scurrilous and would abuse;
Hence those loose dialogues at marriage feasts,
Yet still they were but mirth, and country jests.
At last, they shew'd their teeth, and sharply bit
And railery usurped their place of wit.
Good persons were abus'd, and suffer'd wrong;
They loudly talk'd no law to curb their tongue:
The wounded griev'd, the smart provok'd their hate;
And all untouch'd bewail'd the common fate:
Till laws commanded to regard men's fame,
Severely lash the vice, but spare the name.
Fear made them civil, and design to write
With modesty, speak well, and to delight.

CREECH.

Cicero had also observed, that the ancient Greek comedies so much abused the liberty they had to censure the bad lives of private persons, by name, and directly, that no body

(t) Sueton. in Nerone, cap.
xxxix.

(u) Scripsit mola vulgare culta, quibus motus vari ac minime notuatar, absque fine satutum ignominiam. Ju-
ven. in Dom. cap.
viii.

(w) Dente Thronum non circumdat, equali
Ad te per pulverem parat Genua?
Nam tu tu alutar, post o-mnia ante Et agnita lo-lent canis le-more vire.
Hæc. Epil.
XVIII, l. 1.
v. 82.
Let him in the end as thy form depos
When every knee for him may bend in
The danger will at last come to be that:
For you're in danger when the rest is in peril.
And I am, as I shall show here
the danger.
CREECH.

(*) Hæc, l.
p. 1, l. 1.
ver. 145. To which may be added the following, de Arte Poetica, ver.
515.
Succellere
huius Comædiæ, non sine multa Laudis, sed in vitium Livium excidit & non Dignum legem
Lex est accepta, chorusque Turpiter risit falsitas jure ne-cessarii.
Nec stultus
censuræ sed pænitentia the apt,
But just then Liberty was tired to rage;
Such rage as civil power can force'd to have
And by good Laws, laws were in-act'd upon.
That was the element left, it was the railing. The Greeks, I think, were just in this.
CREECH.

body escaped the slanders of the stage, not even Pericles, who had so long governed the Republic both in peace and war. It had been a tolerable thing, said Cicero, if the wicked citizens had been exposed to these insults, though it were better that such men should be reprov'd by the Censor than by a Poet; but it is intolerable that such a man as Pericles should not be free from them. 'Apud Græcos antiquiores fuit lege concessum,

'ut quod vellet Comœdia nominatim vel de quo vellet diceret (y); itaque sicut in eisdem libris loquitur Africanus, quem illa non attigit, vel potius quem non vexavit, cui pepercit? Efto: populares homines improbos, in Rep. seditiosos, Cleonem, Cleophonem, Hyperbolum læsit: patiamur, inquit, etfi hujusmodi cives à Cenfore melius est quam à Poëta notari: sed Periclem cum jam suæ civitati maxima autoritate plurimos annos domi & belli præfuisse, violari versibus & eos agi in Scena non plus decuit, quam si Plautus, inquit, noster voluisset aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius Marco Catoni maledicere (z). - - - Among the ancient Greeks, their comedy was by law allowed to censure any action, and any person by name. Accordingly, as Africanus says, whom has it not attacked, or rather whom has it not galled, whom has it spared? Be it so: it wounded popular wicked men, who were seditious in the Republic, such as Cleon, Cleophon, and Hyperbolus. Let us bear this, says he, though it is better that such citizens should be stigmatized by the Censor, than by a Poet; but that Pericles when he had now governed the Republic for many years both in peace and war, with great reputation, should be abused in plays, and these acted upon the stage, was as intolerable, says he, as if our Plautus or Nævius had reviled Publius and Cnius Scipio, or Cæcilius inveigled against Cato.' Of all the treasures in the world, none could be more exposed to moth and rust, and to the rapacious hands of robbers, than honour and a good name, unless the insolence of these satirists was restrained: for as, by I know not what dismal fatality, the spirit of slander and revenge is often united with a seeming austere life, the impunity of libels would give birth to vast numbers of them against the best men; and if a man should provoke ever so little a bigot, or a choleric Enthusiast, he would presently find his reputation stained and blackened by that bigot's pen, and the proneness of the people to believe this sort of writers would afford them a sanctuary, even with respect to the most extravagant calumnies. If these people would not postpone the virtues with which they ought to begin a devout life, the virtues, I say, which make an honest man, and if they would follow the best advice that can be given them, viz. not to pretend to be devout before they are good men (a a), they would not distinguish themselves as they do, by their satirical discourses and defamatory libels.

(y) See Horace at the beginning of the fourth satire of the first book.

(z) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. ii, cap. ix, ex Ciceronis, lib. iv, de Republica.

(a a) See the Réflexions sur les Défauts d'autrui, printed at Paris in the year 1690.

(b b) Exod. ii. 4.

(c c) Exsequi sententias haud invidiosum nisi insignes per honestum aut notabilis dedecore: quod præcipuum munus Annalium fuit, ne virtutes illeantur, utque PRÆVIS DICTIS FAC-TISQUE EX POSTERITATE ET INFAMIA METUS SIT. - - - It is no part of my purpose to trace all the virtues of particular men, unless they are memorable for integrity, or for notorious infamy: this I conceive to be the principal duty of an Historian, that he suppress no instance of virtue, and that by the dread of future infamy and the censures of posterity, men may be deterred from detestable actions and profligate speeches. Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. lxxv.

VII.
What answer is to be made to those who pretend to justify the writers of libels.

Hence we see what answer is to be given to those, who say that libels are beneficial to society, in as much as they hinder several persons of both sexes from transgressing the bounds of decency: it is a bridle, say they, that restrains them: free them from the fear of being defamed to the end of the world, and in all future ages, by some ingenious satires, and there is no extravagance but what they will run into. This is all wrong: we do not find that hitherto there has been any scarcity of libels, and yet the world has not been, and is not bettered by them. Besides, would not this pretended curb become utterly useless, by the abuse that would be made of the remedy, by defaming without quarter or distinction all sorts of families?

But then, must some be allowed to commit infamous actions, whilst others shall not be allowed to punish them with all the trumpets of fame? I answer, that as it does not belong to private persons, to punish robbers and murderers, and the care of it ought to be left to those whom the supreme authority has appointed for the punishment of malefactors; the like ought to be done with respect to the punishment of infamy. It is encroaching upon the right of the sovereign, it is laying profane hands upon holy things, to pretend to inflict this sort of punishment, when we are not commissioned for it by our governors. A criminal may then justly ask the question that was put to Moses, who made thee a ruler and a judge over us (b b). What private persons may lawfully do against those who deserve infamy, is just what they may do against a robber or an assassin. They may bring him before the Judges, and witness against him what they know; they may in like manner impeach the criminal commerce, and infamous life of others; but they must do it with all the characters of a formal accuser: they must declare their names and the places of their abode; and especially prove before the Judges, if there be occasion for it, all their accusations. Now where are the libellers that take this method? The first thing they observe is to conceal their names, their profession, and abode. They are not very scrupulous about their proofs; the least suspicion or hear-say, the rattle in coffee-houses or taverns, serves them for a demonstration: and therefore they are justly liable to the punishment of slanderers and false witnesses; for to deserve this punishment, it is not necessary that what a man advances should be really false; it is enough that he maintains it without knowing it, and without being able to prove it.

VIII.
Of the right of History, and by whom

I am persuaded that justice and the public good require that evil actions should be brought to the tribunal of fame, there to receive the punishment due to them, interest Reipublicæ cognosce malos (c c): but every body ought not to pretend to do this. For if the evil action you desire to make public, is of such a nature that it may be punished

by it ought to be written.

Great abuse
in this.

by the laws of the land, you must leave it to the Magistrates, or at most help them, by a judicial testimony, that the crime may at once bear a double punishment, that of public fame, and that of the Judges. We must remember that we are not to give an account of our conduct to a Poet, or any other such writer, but to the Magistrates. This is the doctrine of a good author, as will appear by these Latin words. 'Nostræ contra duodecim Tabulæ cum perpauca res capite sanxissent, in his hanc quoque faciendam putaverunt, si quis occideret, sive carmen condidisset, quod infamiam faceret flagitiumve alteri. Præclare, judiciis enim ac Magistratuum disceptationibus legitimis propositam vitam, non poetarum ingeniis habere debemus, nec probrum audire, nisi ea lege ut respondere liceat & judicio defendere (d d). Though in our laws of the twelve tables very few crimes are made capital, yet the following is of that number: namely, if any person should publish or write verses, which defame another man, or injure his reputation. This is an excellent institution; for our lives ought to be submitted only to the lawful examination and judgments of the Magistrates, and not to the wit and railery of Poets; nor ought we to hearken to an accusation against any man, but upon condition that he is allowed to answer, and judicially defend himself.' If the evil action be of another kind, and passes unpunished, either on account of the indulgence of the Magistrate, or because of the persons who commit it, neither does it then belong to every man, to take upon him to write about it. This should be done by Historians, and none should write History but men chosen and authorized by the government. By this means the brand which History should fix on the name and memory of those who deserve the public infamy, would proceed from its true channel, being derived from the power of the sword, wherewith the sovereign is armed for the punishment of the wicked. As the sacred History was not the work of a private person, but of men who had received from GOD a special commission to write (e e); so the Civil History should be composed only by those whom the sovereign of each state appoints for that purpose, and then it might be presumed that History would not defame people upon false grounds; whereas, as the world goes at present, it distributes punishments and rewards, disgrace and praise, condemnation and absolution, upon the first reports of fame, sophisticated and wrested by a thousand passions. And what is surprising, is, that the meanest Historian claims the privilege which belong only to some; he pretends he is not bound to produce his proofs and his witnesses. Quis unquam ab historico juratores exegit (ff)? Whoever requires an Historian to bring affidavits for what he advances?

I do not say but that there are inconveniencies on the other side; yet there being some every where, the greatest ought to be avoided, as doubtless are that multitude of writers, who sully historical facts with their impure hands, fully them I say, not only for the present time but for future ages; since there will ever be too many continuators of Mellificium Pezelii, Setibus Calvisius, Sleidan's Commentaries &c. (g g) too many writers of abridgments, in usum studiosæ juventutis; in a word, too many writers who will fetch their informations from thence, and perpetuate the falsities that are daily divulged [A]. What is said of the first impressions in general, that they are of long continuance,

Quo semel est imbuta recens servabit odorem
Testa diu (b b),

What season'd first the vessel keeps the taste,

CREECH.

is most true especially with respect to the first alterations which events suffer from their beginning by the disguised relations that are made of them in haste, and dispersed with all the expedition imaginable. This is an original sin, the propagation whereof cannot be denied; too many examples prove it; and here lies the mischief: for as all people pretty much resemble those of whom a Cardinal Legate said, as he gave them his benediction, since

[A] Too many writers will perpetuate the falsities that are daily divulged. I might have spoken of another sort of writers. The Continuators of Pezelius, Calvisius; the Theatrum Europæ, &c; they who publish Synopses rerum toto orbe gestarum, and abridgements of Universal History, in usum studiosæ juventutis, are I confess the greatest propagators of false news; but they are not the only ones, nor perhaps the most dangerous preservers of falsities. There are some Historians, who taking a contrary course, deceive those very persons who pretend to be nice. I mean some Historians like Varillas: they love to say what is not to be found in common Histories: they aspire to the glory of having discovered secret memoirs, the occult qualities of the first ministers, and the secret of intrigues and negotiations, which no body knew before. If a thing has been left in oblivion by every body, they will be sure to publish it for that very reason. Nay, they go farther; they build a whole system upon it: this serves them as a key to open the cabinets of Princes and they pretend to unfold many mysteries by this means. When those gentlemen find in the corner of a library, or among the dusty old papers of an inventory, a printed piece which was unknown to them, they read it greedily, for which they are to be praised. But if they find in it any singular rare and surprising particular they immediately take it up, and make it the basis of the conjectures they design to vent as matters of fact, or Historical illustrations. For this they are not to be commended. It is very often the way to deceive people. If any of these men should find an hundred years hence, a copy of the Pastoral Letter, which was immediately suppressed by its author, he would make his advantage of it. He would boast of having discovered things unknown to all other Historians; he would reason upon this at random, and give all Europe a new face, with respect to the secret motives of since they have a mind to be deceived, let them be deceived; and moreover since it cannot be doubted that a false report believed for three days may do a great deal of good to a nation [B], whereas a true piece of news, believed as long, may occasion the ruin of it; it of Princes. He would revive a falsity, which lived but a few days in the common news, and would perpetuate it; for there will always be some Historians, who will relate what they shall read in Varillas, for instance. I must acquaint my reader, that the suppression of this Pastoral Letter, came to my knowledge only by a little pamphlet of fifteen pages in 4to, dated on the twenty-fifth of January 1696 (1). I there found (2) that the author of the Pastoral Letters having cited, as a proof of the favourable intentions of the Allies, a project of peace drawn up by the Diet of Ratisbonne . . . which had been contrived by a speculative Politician of Amsterdam . . . was so ashamed of being imposed upon by that spurious piece, that he immediately printed another edition of his Pastoral Letter, in which he omitted that passage.

[B] A false report believed for three days may do a great deal of good, to a nation, &c.] This maxim is ascribed to Catherine de Medicis, that a false piece of news believed three days may save a nation (3). Histories abound with the advantages of false news. The heads of the League maintained themselves a long time in Paris by that means. The Duke of Maienne not being able to deny, that he had lost the field of battle at Ivry, made people believe that the Bearnois (the King of Navarre) had been killed, and that in other places the League was triumphant (4). These are the words of an Historian: Seeing their army thus shattered, they had recourse to their usual artifices, which were to impose upon the Parisians with lies, they published in abundance of papers, importing that at the first assault given at Dreux, the inhabitants had killed above five hundred of the King's troops, and wounded a greater number, and that the Marshal Biron had been mortally wounded. That in an encounter near Poissy the League had obtained a great victory. That in the battle the fight was long, and the loss almost equal, and that if the Bearnois was not dead, he was as good as dead (5).

Peter Matthieu relates that the Count de Charolois, being under the necessity of encouraging his troops by the hopes of a speedy success, suborned a Franciscan who pretended to come from Bretagne, and said that he had left the army so near, that it would be seen the same day . . . This artifice increased if not the courage, at least the patience of the most disheartened, and he proved useful for the little time it was believed. The great desire of seeing the troops of Bretagne, made it believed without any consideration (6). These last words are not useless here, for they shew the bent and disposition of the people to give into such artifices: they easily believe what flatters them, and they wait patiently. Peter Matthieu's marginal note, deserves to be transcribed. When an army or a town, says he (7), is in expectation of relief, they must always be told that it is coming, and if there should be news to the contrary, it is prudent in the General to spread about a different report. Syphax sends word to Scipio that he cannot assist him, and that on the contrary he is for Carthage. Scipio treats and caresses his Ambassadors, and gives them presents, in order to make his soldiers believe that Syphax was coming, and that the Ambassadors returned to hasten his departure. It is with respect to these stratagems, that it may especially be said, nil sub sole novum, - - There is nothing new under the sun. The Moderns in this point are but the imitators of the Ancients (8). Sincerity was never pretended to in the fresh accounts of public misfortunes, and it would be generally prejudicial to pretend to it. Livy justly censures the Roman Consul, who after the fatal battle of Cannæ acknowledged to the deputies of the Allies all the loss he had sustained. 'Auxit rerum suarum sui que contemptum Consul nimis detegendo cladem nudandoque (9). - - - The Consul rendered his army and himself still more contemptible, by giving too bare and naked an account of the defeat at Cannæ.' The effect of this plain dealing was, that the Allies concluded from it that Rome would never be able to raise its head again, and therefore that they ought to join with Hannibal. We learn from Plutarch that an Athenian was cruelly tortured, for telling a piece of ill news, which however was very true (10). Having heard of Nicias's defeat from a stranger, who was come ashore at the port of Pyraeus, he went in all haste to acquaint the magistrates with that great misfortune. They asked him how he came by it, and because he could not produce his author, he was punished as a cheat and a disturber of the public peace (11): nor was he delivered from the rack till the truth of his news was known. Had he made a false report of a victory, he would not have suffered for it: the action of Stratocles makes me think so. He persuaded the Athenians to offer a sacrifice to the gods by way of thanks for the defeat of their enemies, and yet he knew that the Athenian fleet had been beaten. The news of the disaster was at last published. They were heartily vexed with the impostor; but his answer satisfied them, and there was an end of it: what injury have I done you? said he: I have made you live three days happily. Πολλὰ δ' ἂν ἔτι καὶ Σπαρτιάτας δέησαι τὴν στρατοκλήϊν ἔβριμ ὑπομένειν καὶ βαμολοχίαν, παίσανθ' αὖ μὲν αὐτοῖς εὐχυσέλια θύειν ὡς νενικηκότας. ἐπεὶ δὲ τῆς ἡττῆς ἀληθεία ἀπαγγελθείσης ἠγανάκτων, ἐρωτῶντων τὸν δῆμον, τί ἰδύκνται, τρεῖς ἡμέρας δ' αὐτὸν ἰδέας γυζονός. Nullo vero pacto arbitrator Spartanos toleraturos fuisse Stratocles scurrilem insultationem, qui fuit ut ob latum parva victoria nuncium acceptum, sacrificarent persuasit: cumque ii de accepta clade vero allato nuncio succerent, populum interrogavit equid injuriæ passi essent, qui ipsius opera triduum suavius vixissent (12).

It was so much gained over the enemy, you will say; the Athenians gained two or three days of rejoicing by it: they put off for that time the uneasiness which the ill news was to give them. But in reality it is but a small advantage; it is a sad thing to be brought off from a false persuasion that has raised a great joy; the weight of adversity fits more heavily afterwards. Besides, public rejoicings for an imaginary victory, expose a whole nation to contempt, and make the enemy very merry. If Stratocles had been treated as he deserved, he had been severely punished. For a private person to do as Cicero did is a thing of no great consequence: nay, in such particular conjunctures true prudence will not suffer us to believe any thing too lightly, Cicero battle is that of Amorgos. . . . cum Vatinius morte nuntiata cuius parum certus videbatur autem, interim, inquit, usura fruar (13). It is not certain that my enemy is dead, and perhaps in a few days I shall hear he is alive and well; but in the mean time I will take advantage of the current report, I will believe it; it is so much gain to me. This is what Cicero said; whether it was only a jest, or an ingenuous declaration of his thoughts, it matters not. But should a nation use this method, and take some measures upon the false news of the defeat of the enemy, it would sometimes run the risk of great misfortunes. An Historian relates that it having been reported that Scipio Africanus, and his brother, were taken prisoners, and that Antiochus had defeated the Roman army they commanded, the Ætolians immediately shook off the yoke of the Roman people. This must needs have been a pernicious step. I will relate Livy's words, which contain some remarkable particulars. We there find a remarkable instance of the deceits of fame: it appears from them that the very deputies of the Ætolians in the army of the two Scipios had spread that false report, and that only one Historian has mentioned it. 'Valerius Antias author est, rumorem celebrem Romæ fuisse, & penè pro certo habitum, recipiendi Scipionis adolescentis causa Cos. L. Scipionem & cum eo P. Africanum in colloquium evocatos regis, & ipsos comprehensos esse, & ducibus captis confestim ad castra Romana exercitum ductum, eaque expugnata, & deletas omnes copias Romanorum esse: ob hæc Ætolos suffulisse animos, & abnuisse imperata facere, principisque eorum in Macedonia & in Dardanos & in Thraciam ad conducenda mercede auxilia profectos: hæc qui nuntiarent Romanam, A. Terentium Varronem, & M. Claudium Lepidum ab A. Cornelio præpore ex Ætolia missos esse. Subtexit deinde fabulæ huic, legatos Ætolos in senatu inter cætera hoc quoque interrogatos esse: unde

(11) Δέας λέγοντος αἰεὶ καὶ παραμένει τὴν πάλιν εἰς τὸν πορὸν κατὰ δέας ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτὸ πάλιν χρόνον. ὅς τε πάλιν οἱ τὸ πάλιν καὶ ὡς εἶχεν ἀπαγγέλλοντες. Pro mendace & civitatis turbatore in rotam delatus & diu tortus est, donec advenirent qui totam cladem ordine annuntiarent. Ibid.

(12) Plut. de Repub. gerenda, pag. 799, F. He mentions it also in the Life of Demetrius, pag. 893, 894, and makes him answer, Εἴρα τί προσέβατε δεῖν, οἱ δὲ οὐκ ἠμέρας ἡδίας γυζονός. Quid tandem injuriæ accipitis si duos dies transegitis per luctum? This is that of Amorgos.

(13) Quintil. Inst. Orat. lib. vi, cap. iii, p. m. 294.

(1) It is intitled, Parallele de trois Lettres Pastorales de Mr. Jurieu, touchant l'Accomplissement des Propheéties.

(2) Pag. 14, he quotes the Pastoral Letter of January 1695.

(3) D'Aubigné, Confession Catholique de Saint, liv. ii, ch. vi, pag. m. 413, 414.

(4) D'Aubigné, Histoire Universelle, Tom. iii, liv. iii, ch. vi, pag. 322.

(5) Histoire des choses mémorables arrivées en France depuis l'an 1547, jusqu'à commencement de l'an 1597, pag. 720.

(6) Pierre Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI, liv. iii, pag. m. 144.

(7) Ibid.

(8) See the article AGESILAUS II, citations (b), and (c).

(9) Titus Liv. lib. xxiii, pag. m. 355. He relates the words of the Consul to the Deputies of Campania.

(10) Plut. in Nicias, sub fin. pag. m. 541.

it cannot be thought strange that the first relations should be so falsified: Politics, which some (14) Tit. Liv.

lib. xxvii, p.
m. 708.

unde audissent imperatores Romanos in Asia captos ab Antiocho rege, & exercitum deletum esse? Etolos respondisse, ab suis legatis se, qui cum consule fuerint, certiores factos. Rumoris hujus quia neminem alium autorem habeo, neque affirmata res mea opinione sit, nec pro vana prætermittam.

(14). - - - - Valerius Antias relates that at Rome there went a famous report, which passed almost for a certainty, that King Antiochus having called Lucius Scipio the Consul, and Publius Africanus, to a conference about the restoring of the young Scipio, had seized them, and having made the Roman Generals prisoners, had immediately marched his army to their camp, attacked and taken it, and cut off all the Roman forces; that upon the news of this pretended overthrow, the Etolians had taken courage and refused to obey the commands of the Romans, and that their chiefs had gone into Macedon, Dardania, and Thrace, to levy auxiliary troops; that A. Cornelius, the Prætor, had sent from Etolia Terentius Varro and M. Claudius Lepidus, to carry these tidings to Rome. What gave some authority to this false account was, that the Etolian deputies being asked in the Senate among other questions, Who had informed them that King Antiochus had made the Roman Generals prisoners, and cut off the Roman army in Asia; they answered That they had it from their own deputies who were with the Consul. As I have no other authority for there having been such a report, but that of Valerius Antias, I would neither affirm this as a certainty, nor pass it over as an untruth.

Don't think that Catherine de Medicis meant that a piece of false news believed three days, can save a nation upon all occasions. Such maxims as these are not without exceptions. A false persuasion is sometimes advantageous and sometimes pernicious: and the same may be said of a true one. But here is a thing more generally true, viz. that it is useful to conceal from the people, part of the loss sustained in battles and other great misfortunes. This deception is not what we call mysteries of state, Arcana Imperii, but the common steps of political prudence. No body ought therefore to blame a fallacious relation, that immediately follows the event. The public good requires the use of rhetorical figures, in order to extenuate our loss and our enemies advantages. But it were perhaps to be wished that these relations should not be written, or at least, that they should not be printed: for the printing perpetuates them, and makes them serve as a foundation for Historians. This brings a great uncertainty upon History, and deprives future ages of the knowledge of the truth; which is a great counterpoise, as some think, to the profit and pleasure that the reading of those daily papers occasions in the world. The most morose must acknowledge that this reading affords many useful and agreeable instructions, and even that it may be instructive to polite writers. But in short, will some say, there is no sincerity in those relations: they are rather Pleas than Histories. Now, what is a Plea? A discourse, in which a man studies to shew only the fair side of his own cause, and only the foul one of his adversary's. If they, who speak thus, could find out a good expedient to avoid what they condemn, they would have the best invention of all men living. After all, the understanding readers are not deceived by such relations: they can distinguish such as come nearest to sincerity; but it is not possible to publish in those writings all that one knows; something must be sacrificed to the public good, and even sometimes to our domestic interest. Besides; stratagems being allowed in war (15), the artifices of News-writers must be excused; for the pains they take to thwart the relations of the enemy are a kind of war; and therefore their writings have been called arma Asnerina by a political author. Hoc saltem indicium non abeat, quod ausu temerario quodam, Relationes ordinarias seu Novellas, uti vocantur, Armis Asnerinis meis non adjunxerim: nam, ut probe sciam, tales sæpe non in Sibyllarum foliis, sed hominum cerebris nasci, credulose facile incertæ famæ auram captare: interrim tamen etiam temporis filia comprobatur, atque hæcenus comprobavit, harumque sparsiones non semper Orestis somnia & vanitates esse atque fuisse. Sparguntur enim Victoriæ, deprimiturque pars adver-

(15) Dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirit?
Virgil. Æneid.
lib. ii, ver.
390.

† James Hu-rault des Offices
d'Etat, fol.
210.

fa. Sic constat, quod Literis à Pompeio per omnes provincias civitatibusque dimissis de prælio ad Dyrrachium facto elatus inflatusque multo, quam res erat gesta, fama percubuerit, pulsus fugere Cæsarem, pene omnibus copiis amissis; quæ & fama sane Pompeianos multis partibus auxerat. Finguntur clades ad vulgum (quia mundus, ut dicitur vult decipi) de-mentandum, ut iste faveat huic vel illi parti, &c.

Ita post cladem Iovensem, &c. (16). - - - I must not forget to mention, that I have presumed, not to add the ordinary relations, or news (as they are called) to my Arma Asnerina: for though I well know, that such relations proceed not from the leaves of the Sibyl, but are devised in the brain of man, and that the credulous readily catch at and swallow the common reports, however doubtful; nevertheless experience, the offspring of time, shews, and has already manifested, that the dispersing of these news, is not always, nor has always been as unprofitable thing, like the dreams of Orestes. For to spread the news of our victories, and to lessen the advantages of the enemy, is an art of policy. Thus it is known that Pompey having sent letters into all the provinces and cities of the Roman empire, wherein he spoke of the battle of Dyrrachium, with much more courage and boldness than he had fought it, there went a report that Cæsar had been defeated, had lost almost his whole army, and was now making his escape: and undoubtedly this report very much strengthened Pompey's party. Overthrows are invented to impose upon the vulgar (because the world, as they say, loves to be imposed upon) and to make them favour this or that party, &c. Thus after the battle of Irvy, &c. The author adds here what I have said of the Duke of Maienne.

Note, that people are so used to the Gazettes, that they would look upon the suppression of them as an eclipse. It would occasion a kind of public mourning. The Republic of Letters would lose several pieces by it, which are the very kernel and cream of the Gazettes, and contain some rules for a profitable reading of them. Observe the following passage. Cum vero omnes novi quid sciendi mira flagremus cupiditate, certaque juxta ac incerta avidissime arripientes, quique pro voto interpretamur, itaque NOVELLAS undique conquirimus, ut rerum gestarum, imò & gerandarum (tanta enim scribentium vel credentium vanitas est) cognitione sitientem animum expleamus. Hinc anxie curiositate legimus aut rimamur, quid Novellæ apponent Nostrates, Jeneenses, Lipsienses, Norimbenses, Hamburgenses, imò & Parisienses, Hafnienses, Amstelodamenses, Bruxellenses, aut alia, nescio unde accersitæ: Ut autem varia sint illorum, qui eas legunt vel mirantur ingenia, ita fieri haud potest, quin majorem ex illis fructum alius, alius minorem accipiat, quò igitur cum Voluptate, quam novitas sua sponte conciliat, Utilitas etiam jungatur, ideo insigni cum commodo adhiberi poterit Nobilissimi & Consultissimi Dn. Ahasueri Fritschii Discursus, De Novellarum, quas vocant Reve Beutungen boderno usque & abusu. Imp. Jenæ 1676, 4to. Itemque elegantissime docti Christiani Weisii in illustri ad Salam Augustæo Polit. Prof. Schediasma curiosum, de Lectura Novellarum, quantum scilicet illæ usum habeant in Geographiis, Historiis, & Politicis, imò quovis curio-graphicis, Historicis, & Politicis, quævis curio-cleum Novellarum, scilicet ab Anno 1660. ad ann. usque 1676. Weissenfelsæ anno eod. exc. (17). - - -

As we all have an insatiable desire, and a wonderful curiosity to know something new, and greedily catch at news, whether certain or doubtful, whilst every man interprets them according to his own wishes, we search for news papers from all parts of the world, in order to slack this thirst of the mind after the knowledge not only of past, but of future transactions: for such is the presumption of the writers of news, or those who believe them, that they will pretend to the knowledge of things to come. Thus with anxious curiosity, we read and sift the home-news, those from Iena, Leipzig, Nuremberg, Hamburg, nay, those from Paris, Copenhagen, Amsterdam, Brussels, and others whither come from the Lord knows where. But as the genius of those who read and admire them are various, so it cannot but happen that some reap more, some less advantage by the perusal of them. To the end therefore that profit may accompany

(16) Arma Asnerina, five Asneria Epitheta à Dædore militari Tacito fabulosa, &c.
in Dissertatione Politica docti à G. C. W.
pag. 19.

(17) Meiss-Herrn, &c.
Hofbuch Commission, five Scripserunt le-rum, &c.
pag. 12.

(ii) See the passage of Tacitus which I have cited above, citat. (57), of the article USSON.

(kk) At fubite horresco lapsa de montibus adfunt Harpyie, & magnis quantunt elaboribus alas, Diripiuntque da-pes contactuque omnium ferdant Immondo: tum vox tetrum dira
inter odorem.
Virg. Æn. lib.
iii, ver. 225.
... From the mountain tops,
with hideous cry,
And clattering wings the hungry harpies fly,
They snatch the meat, defiling all they find,
And parting leave a loathsome stench behind.

DRYDEN.

some body has defined ars non tam regendi, quam fallendi hominem - - - The art of deceiving rather than of governing men [C], will have it so. But men ought to own their error, which they never can do with a good grace: and tho' some should do it, this is of little service; so many pens having already canonized the first reports, that people would at least be divided in their opinions about them (ii).

It is not enough to compare these base writers to Harpies which defile whatever they touch (kk); it may be said they are executioners who distort and wring the neck, legs and arms of Historical facts, and even sometimes cut them off, and apply false ones in their room; and this even at the very moment that an event issues forth from the bosom of its causes, and the exploits of a battle are just born:

Modo primos incipientes
Edere vagitus, & adhuc à matre rubentes (ll).

As soon as ere they wail, as ere they spring,
Still blushing, from the parent womb.

It was formerly said of the Muses that they were the prostitutes even of slaves; this may especially be affirmed of the Muse who presides over History (mm): she is a true scortum tribolare, who plies upon the high-ways, and sells her self to the first comer for a morsel of bread. Her bargain with the Booksellers is much beneath that of Baudoin and

(ll) Juven.
Sat. VII, ver.
195.

(mm) It is Clio. Ἀδύαττοι
τῶν μισθῶν ἢ μὴν κακῶν συγγίναι τὴν ἱστορίαν. Scho-liast. Apollonii, in lib. iii.

accompany pleasure, which novelty of itself creates, it will be of signal advantage to read the discourse of the most excellent and learned Mr ANASTASIIUS FRITSCHIIUS, intitled, Of the modern use and abuse of the news; which they call Revee Beitungen; printed at Lena 1676, 4to. Likewise the curious and most elegant dissertation of the learned CHRISTIAN WEISSIUS, Professor of Politics, concerning the reading of news, shewing the great use of them in Geography, History, Politics, and all other branches of curious learning. To which he has added, a Specimen, being, as it were, the kernel and quintessence of news, from the year 1660 to 1676: printed at Weissenfels in the same year.

I have read somewhere in the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, that it were to be wished that some body was employed in taking an account at the end of every year, of all the false reports that had been spread during that year. This would not be necessary with respect to all of them; there are several, that the Gazettes themselves take notice of: such an employment had been more necessary when daily news were not printed. If it had been established at Rome when the Turks took Rhodes, we should know abundance of falsities that were then vented in Italy. Some of them are known by the letters which Ruscelli has collected: we know by those letters, that on the tenth of December 1522, the News-writers of Rome, gave out that the siege of Rhodes was raised (18). On the twenty-eighth of February 1523, they gave out that it was not certain that Soliman had taken the town (19); and yet it had capitulated on the twenty-second of December 1522. But what man will wonder at this news, when he knows, that in the year 1500, it was given out at Padua as a certainty, and even from Rome, that the Pope had been killed with a thunder-bolt on St Peter's day, and that all the citizens had taken up arms. It is only by chance, that we know that such an untruth was reported. It is mentioned in a letter of Matthew Boffus; without which probably we should have known nothing of it. 'Hac sub hora Augustine ad te dum scribo, ecce rumor aures implet civitatis, solempni Petri Apostoli die, paulo post vigesimam horam, Alexandrum Romanæ Ecclesiæ magnum Pontificem ictu fulminis interisse, & de periculis suis Pileatis unum tantum, pariter suum dominum parentasse, populares in armis esse, vias urbis obliquas parum tutas, Curiales quati timoribus, Hispanos infestos & hostes haberi (20). - - - At this very hour, while I am writing to you, there goes a report through the city, that a little after two of the clock in the afternoon, of St Peter's day, Pope Alexander was killed by a thunder-bolt, and that one of his merry cardinals had the same fate, that the people are in arms, that the by-streets of the city are not safe, that the magistrates are in the greatest fears, that the Spaniards are disaffected & accounted enemies.' The King of Spain, the King of France, and the Duke of Alba, were at the same time reported in Holland to be dead, in the year 1580. This falsity was preserved by chance in a letter of Justus Lipsius (21). A compilation of such things would be useful.

Mr de Vigneul Marville has made some good observations on the Paris Gazette. Here is one of his reflexions. 'There is but one thing disserviceable to the writer of it, which is, that he is not absolute master of his work, and being subject to superior orders, he cannot speak the truth with that sincerity which History requires. If this point was granted him, we should have no need of other Historians (22). The latter part of this passage is somewhat hyperbolic; however it is certain that author mentions the main cause of the mischief; the weekly News-writers, or of any other period longer or shorter, dare not speak all they know. It would cost them too dear; for not to mention the punishment they might fear from their superiors, their news would not sell well, and they would make themselves odious as disaffected persons, and in some manner enemies to the public good. No body will have them vent gross lies, for the sake of their country; but when they lie ingeniously, and with conjectures and reflexions equally witty, flattering and satirical, they are praised, admired, and loved, and every body reads their works. So that they find their account in following the example of the ancient Comic Poet, who only designed to please the people.

Poeta cum primum animum ad scribendum appulit,
Id sibi negotii credidit solum dari,
Populo ut placerent quas fecisset fabulas (23).

Our Poet when he set his mind on writing, Believ'd he had no more to do, but make Such plays as should be to the people's liking.

(21) Mors Regis Hispaniæ, Gallici, & Ducis Albani nunciata nobis sub idem tempus. Vera fama sit in uno saltem ex triade illa. Lipsius, Epist. IV ad Theodorum Leewium, pag. 9, Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1649. It is dated the first of December 1580.

(22) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. Tom. ii, pag. 198, Dutch Edit.

(23) Terentius, in Prologo Andriæ.

[C] Politics which some body has defined, Ars, &c. Guy Patin mentions this definition after having a little ridiculed the Jubilees. Thus you see new factions in Rome, that will give us a new Pope, and then pro jucundo adventu ad Papatum, - - - for his happy accession to the Papacy, a new Jubilee. The new wine of this present year, which is a liquor drawn from the vine, will produce more sensible effects in mens heads than this new devotion, which in its kind, returns but too often, ab assuetis non afficimur: - - - Things to which we are accustomed do not affect us. But the world is so made, populus vult decipi: - - - People love to be imposed upon. The late John Camus, Bishop of Belley, a learned worthy prelate, if ever there was any, said, that Politica ars est non tam regendi quam fallendi homines: - - - Politics is the art of deceiving, rather than governing men. I heard him say this once in his chamber, in the year 1632, and I have often remembered it since (24). This letter of Patin is dated on the thirteenth of December 1669. He had not recited the Bishop's words in that manner in a letter of the eighth of May 1665. He recited them on the following occasion. Six writers, says he,

(24) Patin, Letter DIII, pag. 479, of the third tome.

(18) It is thought that the succours will prove needless, if the siege be raised, as the report goes. Jerom Negro, Letter to Mark Antony Micheli, written from Rome the 20th of December 1522, folio 26, of the Epistoles of Princes, collected by Ruscelli, and translated by Belleforest.

(19) See the same Letter, fol. 28. It contains several things which shew how people deceive themselves in things which they wish.

(20) Matthæus Boffus, Part iii, Epist. XXI.

and du Ryer, whose stated price was to translate for half a crown, or a crown a sheet, and to write verses for six shillings a hundred, when they were long ones, and for three shillings when they were short (nn).

(nn) See Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, on the French translators, article 948, 949.

*Ab! pudor extinctus. doctæque infamia turbæ
Sub titulo prostant, & queis genus ab Jove summo
Res hominum supra evellit & nullius egentes,
Assè merent vili, ac sancto se corpore sadant.
Scilicet aut Menæ faciles parere superbo,
Aut nutu Polycleti, & parca laude beatæ.
Usque adeo maculas ardent in fronte recentes, Hæsternique Getæ vincla, & vestigia flagri (oo).*

(oo) See Balzac, Entret. IV, chap. iv.

(pp) Τὸ 'Αβ-δερτικὸν ἐκείνο πάθος καὶ νῦν τὰς πολλὰς τῶν περὶ δαιμόνων παρηλαλῶν.
Abderiticum illud malum etiam hoc tempore plerisque doctorum invasit. Lucian, quemodo sit con-scribenda Historia, pag. m.
658, Tom. i.

(qq) Ibid.

(rr) Sueton.
de clar. Rhetor.
cap. iii.

Lucian has unwittingly drawn the picture of our age, speaking of a war, which had produced such a multitude of Historians, that one would have thought it was a modish trade. He compares it to the epidemical distemper of the Abderitæ (pp). We have seen, continues he, the truth of the proverb, that war is the parent of all things. 'Αρ' ἔστι δὴ τὰ ἐν ποσὶ ταῦτα κινῆνται, ὁ πόλεμος ὁ πῶς τὰς βαρβάρους, καὶ τὸ ἐν Ἀρμενίᾳ τεγίμα, καὶ εἰ συνεχῆς νικαί, ἴδεῖς ὅς τις ἔχ' ἱστορίαν συγγραφεῖ. μᾶλλον δὲ Θυκυδίδαι, καὶ Ἡρό-δοτοί, καὶ Ξενοφῶντες ἡμῖν ἀπαντες. καὶ ὅς τοις ἀλλοῖς ἄρ' ἢ ἐκείνο. τὸ, Πολέμος ἀπάντων πατὴρ, εἰ γὰρ καὶ συγγραφεὶς τοσούτους ἀνέφυσεν, ἀπὸ μιᾶς τῇ πλῆθους. Ex quo res præfentes moveri cœperunt, puta bellum istud contra barbaros, & acceptum in Armenia vulnus, & continuæ illæ victoriæ, nemo non historiam conscribit. Imò verò Thucydides, He-rodoti, & Xenophontes nobis facti sunt omnes. Et ut apparet, verum fuit illud, Bel-lum omnium pater est, quandoquidem historiarum scriptores tam multos una hac plaga procreavit (qq). - - Since these things happened, namely the war with the Barbarians, the overthrow received in Armenia, and those frequent victories, all the world writes History. Nay, every man sets up for a Thucydides, an Herodotus, and a Xenophon. And it appears to be a true saying, that war is the parent of all things, since it has begot so many Historians in this single country. The antient Romans had infinitely more respect for the dignity of history; for before Pompey's time no body pretended to write it but such as were eminent for their birth and merit, and when this great man's tutor undertook to write the history of Pompey, and that of his father, some kind of inconveniency was found in that novelty, as Suetonius insinuates. Yet this innovator had sense and learning, and had taught Rhetoric, but he was a man of no birth. He was a freed-man. That was the grievance. ' Lucius Octacilius Pilius servisse dicitur; atque etiam ostiarius, veteri ' more, in catena fuisse: donec ob ingenium ac studium literarum manumissus, accu-
' santi patrono subscripsit. Deinde Rhetoricam professus, Cnæum Pompejum Magnum
' docuit; patris ejus res gestas, nec minus ipsius, compluribus libris exposuit: primus
' omnium libertinorum, ut Cornelius Nepos opinatur, scribere historiam orsus, non
' nisi ab honestissimo quoque scribi solitam (rr). - - It is said that Lucius Octacilius
' Pilius was a slave, and even a door-keeper, and that he was chained to the door, after the ' antient custom; till on account of his parts and inclination to learning he was made free,
' and assisted his patron. He afterwards professed Rhetoric, and was Præceptor to Pompey
' the Great: he wrote in many books a History of Pompey, and of his father. Cornelius
' Nepos is of opinion, that Octacilius Pilius was the first freed-man who engaged in writing
' History, which was usually the employment of none but men of distinction.

What

who got their livelihood by writing news, have been sent to the Bastille, within these three days, hominum genus audacissimum, mendacissimum, avidissimum ut faciant rem, &c. - - a kind of people, who are extremely audacious, given to lying, and greedy of gain, &c. They fill their news with things they know not, and ought not to write. They have printed here and cried about the streets, the Bull of our Holy Father the Pope, against the Jansenists, and three days after it was forbidden, and even, ne quid deesset ad rationem veræ fabulæ, - - that nothing might be wanting to complete the comedy, a report was published and spread that the commissary was ordered to imprison the Printer, if he had been found in his house. The late Bishop of Belley, who was an incomparable man, told me in the year 1632. Politica est ars tam regendi quam fallendi homines, - - politics is the art both of governing and deceiving men, and this is no new invention, it is the same play acted over again: the same comedy, and farce; but they are new actors: the worst of it is that this play will last a long time, and mankind suffer too much by it (25). There is a manifest difference betwixt the second and first definition of politics: the second is more discreet than the first; but neither of them turns to the dishonour of the masters of that art, since they aim only at the public good, which they cannot arrive to without imitating Physicians with respect to their patients. If you would know Patin's judgment upon the Paris Gazette, read what follows. They write nothing here that is good for any thing except the Gazette every Saturday, which is a very diverting and comfortable thing, for as much as this prattler never tells us bad news, though we perceive a great deal at this season (26). (26) Hist. Litt. Xvi, pag. 171. Remember what Petronius says, Mandus universus exercet histrioniam, - - The whole world is a farce, and these verses of Politian against such as condemned the plays that were acted in colleges.

(25) Ibid. Letter CCLXVI, pag. 61, of the same tome.

Sed qui nos damnant, histriones sunt maximi.
Nam Curios simulant, vivunt bacchanalia:
Hi sunt præcipue quidam clamosi, leves,
Cucullati, lignipedes, cincti funibus:
Superciliosum, incurvicervicum pecus,
Quique ab aliis habitu & cultu dissentiant,
Tristisque vultu vendant sanctimonias:
Censuram sibi quandam, & tyrannidem occupant:
Pavidamque plebem teritant minaciis (27).

But none are greater mountebanks than they
Who can't in colleges endure a play;
For whilst their lives are leud and dissolute,
Upright and pious men they personate:

(27) Politian.
in Pæd. in Pæd. Menest.
mon. ad Cass.
Epist. vii. lib.
viii. fides m.
165, 166.

The

IX.
The abuse just mentioned favours Scepticism in point of History.

X.
Modern fa-tires against some gallan-tries. Holland complained of without reason.

What would become of the enemies of Historical Scepticism, if this mischief had prevailed in the time of ancient Greece and ancient Rome? They are to be congratulated because Printing is so modern an invention, and they may justly exclaim bono Hercule publico ista licentia post casum imperii Romani inventa est (ss). - - - It is certainly an advantage to the public that this licentiousness came not into use, till after the fall of the Roman empire. For if the ancient Greeks, Romans, Persians, Carthaginians, &c. had done what is now practised, they would have much ado to prove any thing to us, even with the help of inscriptions and medals (tt), which the moderns boldly make use of to satisfy their caprices, without building upon any real fact.

Before I go further I must observe that there have been such men as Cassius Severus at all times. We have seen in our days a man of quality, who not content to write some relations disadvantageous to some court ladies, did not spare, as it is said, the royal family, and even the head of it [D]: which shews that one may truly say of fatires, what Malherbe said of death,

Que la Garde qui veille aux barrières du Louvre N'en defend pas les Rois.

The guards which watch the palaces of Kings
Can ne'er secure them from fell satire's stings.

This

The chief of these are certain noisy Friars,
With hoods, and wooden shoes, and rope attires;
A supercilious stiff-neck'd generation,
Differing in dress and mein from all the nation,
Who sell with solemn face their holy wares,
Set up for Censors, and in all affairs
Assume a tyrant pow'r, and terror spread,
By clam'rous threats, among the trembling herd.

Take notice, that the definition which the Bishop of Bellay gave of Politicks, would express a very great fault, if it denoted the mutual deceptions of sovereigns. They are not so uncommon as they should be. I have read, within these three days, a very sprightly thought: it is this; The Politicians have a language peculiar to themselves: words and phrases which they do not signify the same thing with other men. I do not know whether the gentlemen of the French academy have comprehended politics in the number of the arts and sciences of which they have given us a Dictionary. This, in my opinion, would be necessary. For instance, in the political file, to swear upon the holy Gospels to observe such or such a treaty, signifies sometimes barely that one swears it, but not that one will observe it; nay, it sometimes signifies, that nothing of the treaty shall be performed. The generality of people do not understand this language; but the Politicians understand it well, and take their measures accordingly (28). I add, that if the gentlemen of the French academy would give us an Universal Dictionary of all arts, they would engage in an endless work. They would daily discover new arts which have terms of a particular signification. The art of weekly relations is one of them; the art of controversy is another. Words do not go there in their usual sense: you see people who charge one another with horrid doctrines; they reply, and rejoin, and still reciprocally find their adversaries doctrine more and more abominable (29). This complaint appears almost in every page; and alarms the readers as if there was reason to fear, that, without a speedy remedy, this gangrene would diffuse its infection through the whole body. Such as are not used to this stile conceive a thousand scruples; they fear they have disobeyed St Paul's precept, a man that is an heretic reject (30); for they have conversed with the contending parties. Who would have believed, say they, that such Divines, who have eat for a long time the bread of the Orthodox, should have nourished such monsters in their hearts? We know not whom to trust. Either one or the other of them, or perhaps both, must be disguised wolves rather than shepherds. But have a little patience; stay till some expert arbitrators, initiated in that language, have reconciled the parties, and you will find those words signify nothing less than what you believed. The accusers on both sides will be declared Orthodox. They shall not be censured, but only admonished to correct some improper expressions which had escaped them. It is supposed then that in reality they only charged each other with these expressions, and that therefore the words pernicius Heretici, and the like, signify with them only an ill choice of words. We may very well with that the gentlemen of the French academy would not forget, in a Supplement which they may give to the Dictionary of arts, the proper signification of the words impious, Heretic, destroyer of the fundamentals of the Gospel, abettor of the Socinians, &c. when they are to be found in the writings of a Theological process; for otherwise our mother tongue will grow barbarous and unintelligible to most readers.

[D] A man of quality did not spare, as it is said, the royal family, and even the head of it. I add, as it is said, because, though common fame has ascribed to the same author l'Histoire amoureuse des Gaules, and les amours du Palais Royal, yet this author disowned the latter. He even denied judicially that he had composed it. For it is of this book we are to understand what he wrote to Mr de Saint Aignan in these words: 'My enemies seeing me in the Bastille, thought my imprisonment would not permit me to defend myself, and that they might safely accuse me; they therefore told the King that I had written against him. But his Majesty, who never condemns a man before he be heard, surprized them strangely by sending the Lieutenant-Criminal to examine me' (31). . . . After having shewn me the History written with my own hand, I mean the original I have mentioned to you, he asked me whether I had written nothing against the King. I answered that I was much surprized to have such a question put to me. He told me he had orders to do it: I answered I had not, and that there was no probability that having served twenty-seven years without having received any favour, being twelve years Major-General of the light horse, and expecting every day some recompense from his majesty, I should be wanting in my respect to him: that to destroy this probability my own hand-writing, or unexceptionable witnesses should be produced against me. That if either of them could be produced in the least thing contrary to the respect I owed to the King and all the royal family, I would be willing to lose my head: but that I also beseeched his majesty to appoint the same punishment for those, who should accuse me without being able to convict me (32). . . . From that time not having seen the Lieutenant-Criminal nor any other judge, I have been persuaded that so black and so ridiculous a calumny had made no impression upon the King, who is so discerning and hard to be surprized (33). What he says, in another place of the late Dukes of Orleans, is an argument that the chief persons of the court did not believe him guilty of this second head of accusation. The death of the Princess Henrietta of England, says he (34), was a new misfortune to me; she had done me many good offices with his majesty, and 292.

(tt) This is a parody of Seneca, Prefat. lib. vi. Controv.

(tt) See Rec. Fr. in 4to, pag. 781.

(28) Lettres Historiques, September 1696, p. 251.

(29) A small piece of Dofibus, Professor of Divinity at Strasbourg, intitled, Lutecianum Famae Theologorum, affords some instances of this. To which one might add many others.

(30) Tit. iii. 10.

(31) Le Comte de Buffly Rabu- ein, Usage des Adverbes, pag. 271, Dutch Edit.

(32) Ibid. pag. 272.

(33) Ibid. pag. 274.

(34) Ibid. pag. 292.

(22) See, above, citation (30), of the article CASSIUS SEVERUS.

that

to say he was deceived by some reports which went in his village, and that valuing but little this work, he did not care whether this passage was right or wrong.

It had been better to have said that in his disgrace he employed himself in keeping a large correspondence by letters, and in writing the memoirs of his life; for the works that were published after his death, shew that this was his chief occupation. To this must be added the care he took to make his own History serve for an instruction to his children. His treatise concerning the use of adventures (43), shews that this was his design. It is a little book full of good morality and religion. His memoirs in two volumes published in the year 1697, are curious and well written. His letters, printed in four volumes the same year deserve the same encomium. They would have pleased more, if, upon good considerations, many proper names had not been struck out, and many passages which affected the reputation of certain persons. Perhaps some time or other there will come out an edition of them, which will not be calumniated, or will have a key to them. There are several letters which shew that Count Buffu weaned himself by degrees from the vanities of this world, that he was sensible of the emptiness of it, and that at last he was deeply affected with the importance of his salvation, and the truths of the Gospel. The best Christians in the world could not be more charmed than he was, with Mr Abadie's excellent work concerning the truth of the Christian religion (44). But observe that his conversion was somewhat slow. For a long time he looked behind him like Leto's wife, and tried all the means that the most obstinate desire of returning to court could suggest to an ambitious man, who could not live out of it. The ill success of his petitions was a terrible mortification to him, but did not discourage him from preparing others on every occasion. This we learn from the writings which his heirs have published: had they suppressed these monuments of his impatience, they had belated his memory from the censure of some people, who cannot pardon a brave man his want of courage in bearing the loss of his employments. It is not enough to say they, to be courageous in a battle, a man must also express a great steadiness and resolution under the loss of his estate. They with Count Rabutin had imitated those heroes of ancient Rome, who encountered a sentence of banishment with contempt and indifference; and they think it strange that being disgraced like Ovid, for some treatises concerning love he should have also imitated that Poet's conduct in his disgrace: every body knows what repeated complaints Ovid sent to Rome, in order to be recalled. That vast number of poems full of supplications and humble lamentations do more honour to his wit than to his virtue or courage. But have those, who censure Count Buffu, known the allurements of court life? Do they know what habits and dispositions are contracted in it? If they did, they would perhaps be more indulgent to him. However, he at last resigned himself to the providence of God. Read what he wrote on the twenty-sixth of January 1697. (45). It was a long time before I could believe it was for my good, (as my ghostly fathers told me) that providence laid these calamities upon me by ruining my fortune. But at last I have been convinced of it, for they have been years; not only for my good in the other world, but for my repose in this. GOD does already reward me some measure for the pains of my resignation, and I am at present of this good master what in my soul I just laid off love.

Il paye en un moment un siecle de travaux.
Et tous les autres biens ne valent pas ses maux. (+6)

- (35) Philosophical Transactions, for August 1669.

- (36) See, above, citation (3), of the article MENAGE.

- (37) It is the ccclxxxviii.

- (38) Patin, Tom. i., pag. 11. He had said in his celebrated Letter: Mr de Buffly Ra butin has been this day (the 18th of April 1665) committed to the Bastille, for writing a libel, at which the superior powers are offended. The Prince of Condé complained of it to the King, who has caused him to be seized and imprisoned.

- (39) Buffy, v
supra, pag.
281.

- (40) *Mercurius
Galant, of J
1693. The Count de Buff died of an Ap plexy at Aut
the ninth of April 1693.
Abbet Bignon succeeded him the French A demy in June following.*

- (41) Februar
1700, pag.
89 seq.

- (42) See ibid.
Nouvelles de Republique Lettres, ibid.
pag. 168.

(xx) Am de-nique familes libelli qui statim in vulgus effundunt, quid Rex in autem Regia dixerit, quid Juno fabulata sit cum Jove. Hi autem omnes quoniam facta plerumque atque infecta canunt, nuncique tam
facti quam veri
tenaces existunt, Ecce. . . In fine, there are several other libels of the same kind which immediately give the people to know what the King whispered in the Queen's ear, and what conversation passed between Juno and Jupiter. As all these writers relate, for the most part, things which have happened, as well as things which have not, things real, as well as imaginary, &c.
Gabriel Naudé-us, Bibliogr. Polit. pag. m. 70.
See concerning the words printed in Roman, Plautus
in Trinummus, Act. I, Sc. II,
ver. 170, pag.
m. 735.

that bad examples rise higher and higher without stint [F]. How many Histories have been published against the principal persons of the court of France, that of Brussels, &c. with the names, surnames, and titles, of every one of them, with the most secret circumstances, and discourses, and an hundred things of such a nature, that it was impossible should have come to the writers knowledge? Gabriel Naudé might, upon this occasion say, with better grounds, what he said of Procopius's Secret History, of Martineau Paris's History, of the scandalous Chronicle of Lewis XI, of the Memoirs of the League, &c. (ww). Here one might reasonably exclaim,

Quod genus hoc hominum? quæve hunc tam barbara morem
Permittit patria (xx)?

What men, what monsters, what inhuman race,
What laws, what barbarous customs of the place!

DRYDEN.

(xx) Virgil.
Æneid. lib. i,
ver. 543.

